stranger, the orphan, and the widow (16:11). Israel was also to recall her bondage in Egypt and was admonished to keep the divine law (16:12).

Observance, Postexilic. From Acts (2:9–11) we infer that, perhaps more than to any other great festival, the Jews came from distant countries to Jerusalem. On the day before Pentecost the pilgrims entered Jerusalem, and the approach of the holy convocation was proclaimed in the evening by blasts of the trumpets. The great altar was cleansed in the first watch, and immediately after midnight the Temple gates were thrown open. Before the morning sacrifice all burnt and peace offerings brought by the people were examined by the priests. The following order was observed for the various sacrifices: (1) The regular morning sacrifice. (2) The festive offerings, as prescribed (Num. 28:26–31); the Levites chanting the Hallel, in which the people joined. (3) The firstling loaves, with their accompanying offerings. These loaves were prepared as follows: “Three seahs of new wheat were brought to the temple, threshed like other [grain] offerings, ground and passed through twelve sieves, and the remainder was redeemed and eaten by anyone. Care was taken that the flour for each loaf should be taken separately from one and a half seah; that it should be separately kneaded with luke-warm water (like all thank offerings), and separately baked in the temple itself. The loaves were made the evening preceding the festival; or, if that fell on the Sabbath, two evenings before. These loaves, with the two lambs, formed part of the same wave offering.” (4) The freewill offerings of the people, which formed the cheerful and hospitable meal of the family and to which the Levite, the widow, the orphan, the poor, and the stranger were invited.

Present-Day Observance. This festival is annually and sacredly kept by Jews on the 6th and 7th Sivan—i.e., between the second half of May and the first half of June, thus prolonging it to two days. In accordance with the injunction in Lev. 23:15–16, the Jews regularly count every evening the fifty days from the second day of Passover until Pentecost and recite a prayer over it. The three days preceding the festival, on which the Jews commemorate the giving of the law, are called “the three days of separation and sanctification,” because the Lord commanded Moses to set bounds about the mount and that the people should sanctify themselves three days prior to the giving of the law (Ex. 19:12, 14, 23).

On the preparation day the synagogues and private houses are adorned with flowers and fragrant herbs; the males purify themselves by immersion and confession of sins, put on festive garments, and go to the synagogue, where, after evening prayer, the hallowed nature of the festival is proclaimed by the cantor in the blessing pronounced over a cup of wine. The same is also done by every head of a family before the evening meal. After supper, either in the synagogue or in private houses, the reading of Scripture continues all night, the reason given being that, when God was about to reveal His law to Israel, He had to awaken them from sleep; to remove that sin they now keep awake during the night.

In the general festival service of the morning special prayers are inserted for the day, which set forth the glory of the Lawgiver and of Israel; the Great Hallel is recited; the lesson from the law (Ex. 19:1, 20, 25), the Maphthir (Num. 18:26–31), and the lesson from the prophets (Ezek. 1:1–28; 3:12) are read, the evening prayer (Musaph) is offered, and the benediction is received by the congregation, their heads covered by the fringed wrapper. On the second evening they again go to the synagogue, using there the ritual for the festivals, in which are again inserted special prayers for the occasion, chiefly those on the greatness of God and on the giving of the law and the Ten Commandments. The sanctification of the festival is again pronounced, both by the prelector in the synagogue and by the heads of the families at home. Prayers different from those of the first day, also celebrating the giving of the law, are mingled with the ordinary prayers; the Hallel is recited, as well as the book of Ruth; the lesson read from the law is Deut. 15:19–16:17, and the lesson from the prophets is Hab. 2:20–3:19, or 3:1–19; prayer is offered for departed relatives; the Musaph Ritual is recited; the priests pronounce the benediction; and the festival concludes after the afternoon service, as soon as the stars appear or darkness sets in.

Atonement, Day of (Heb. yôm hakkippūrîm). The day appointed for a yearly, general, and perfect expiation for all the sins and uncleanness that might remain, despite the regular sacrifices.

Significance. The Levitical ritual was a constant reminder that “the Law ... can never by the same sacrifices year by year, which they offer continually, make perfect those who draw near” (Heb. 10:1). Even with the most scrupulous observance of the prescribed ordinances many sins and defilements would still remain unacknowledged and therefore without expiation. This want was met by the appointment of a yearly, general, and perfect expiation of all the sins and uncleanness that had remained unatoned for and uncleansed in the course of the year (Lev. 16:33). Thus on the Day of Atonement Israel was reconciled unto Jehovah, which was necessary before the feast of Booths, the feast that prefigured the ingathering of all nations. In connection with this point it may also be well to remember that the Jubilee year was always proclaimed on the Day of Atonement (25:9).

Time. The tenth day of the seventh month, or Tishri (October), and the fifth of Atonement (Lev. 16:1–34; Num. 29:7–11). The day was a high Sabbath, on which no work was done. All the people were to afflict their souls, i.e., to fast (from the evening of the ninth to the evening of the tenth), under penalty of being cut off from Israel (Lev. 23:27–32). The chronological link connecting the Day of Atonement with the death of Aaron’s sons (10:1–5) was intended to point out that event as leading to it and also to show the importance and holiness attached to an entrance into the inmost sanctuary of God (16:1–2).

Sacrifices. From Lev. 16:5–28 and Num. 29:7–11, it would appear that the sacrifices for the day were as follows: (1) The ordinary morning sacrifice. (2) The expiatory sacrifices for the priesthood, namely, a young bull. (3) The sin offering for the people, a kid from the goats for Jehovah and another for Azazel. (4) The festive burnt offerings of the priests and people and, with them, another sin offering. (5) The ordinary evening sacrifice. If the Day of Atonement fell on a Sabbath, the ordinary Sabbath sacrifices were offered besides all these.

Ceremonies. Ceremonies on the Day of Atonement were connected with the preparations for the high priests, the expiatory rites, and the festive offerings.

Preparation. The center point of this feast was the expiation offered by the high priest after the morning sacrifice. In later times, at least, the high priest underwent a special preparation for this service. Seven days before, he had left his own home and taken up his residence in the Temple chambers. A substitute was provided, lest the high priest should die or become Levitically unclean. During this week he practiced the various priestly duties, such as sprinkling the blood, burning incense, lighting the lamps, offering the daily sacrifices, etc.; for every part of the service on Atonement Day depended upon the high priest, and he could make no mistake. Further, he was to abstain from all that could render him unclean or disturb his devotions. On the morning of the Day of Atonement the high priest bathed his entire person, not in the place ordinarily used by the priests but one specially set apart for him. He then put on the holy garments—the coat, drawers, girdle, and headdress of white cloth—thus signifying that he was entirely cleansed from the defilement of sin and was arrayed in holiness.

Expiatory Rites. After everything was ready, the high priest slew the bull (the sin offering for himself and his house), then filled a censer with burning coals from the altar of burnt offering, and, putting two handfuls of incense into a vase, bore them into the Holy of Holies. He poured the incense upon the coals, “that the cloud of incense may cover the mercy seat.”

As the burning incense was a symbol of prayer, this covering of the Mercy Seat with the cloud of incense was a symbolic covering of the glory of the Holy One with prayer to God, and thus served as to protect the worshiper. The high priest now returned to the altar of burnt offering to fetch some of the blood of the bull, which he sprinkled upon the Mercy Seat (“on the east side,” Lev. 16:14) and seven times upon the ground before it. After this he slew the goat selected for a sin offering and did the same as with the blood of the bull, namely, sprinkled it upon and before the Mercy Seat. He thus made atonement for the Holy of Holies because of the uncleanness of both priests and people (v. 16). He was now required to atone for the “tent of meeting,” which he did by sprinkling the blood of both the bull and the goat, first on the horns of the golden altar once, and then seven times toward the altar, on the ground (see Ex. 30:10). Atonement having been made for the building, the high priest was to expiate the altar of burnt offering, which he did by first putting some of the blood of the bull and the goat upon the horns of the altar and sprinkling it seven times. Thus the dwelling, the court, and all the holy things were expiated and cleansed. The question as to how often the high priest went into the Holy of Holies on this day is not of great importance. The biblical account seems to indicate that he entered four times: (1) with the incense, while a priest continued to agitate the blood of the bull lest it should coagulate; (2) with the blood of the bull; (3) with the blood of the goat; and (4) to bring the censer, which, according to the Talmud, was done after the evening sacrifice. The high priest then, going out into the court of the Tabernacle, laid his hands on the head of the scapegoat, confessing over it all the sins and transgressions of the people. It was led away into the wilderness by a man standing ready and there let go free to signify the carrying away of Israel’s sins that God had forgiven. See Azazel.

Festive Offerings. The high priest then went into the Tabernacle, took off his white garments, laid them down there (because they were to be worn only in the expiatory ritual of this day), washed himself in the Holy Place (in the laver of the court), put on his usual official robes, and completed his own and the people’s burnt offering in the court, at the same time burning the fat of the sin offerings on the altar. But both of the sin offerings were carried outside of the camp and burned with skin, flesh, and dung. The persons who had taken the live goat into the wilderness and burned the sin offerings outside the camp were, before they returned into it, to wash their clothes and bathe their bodies (Lev. 16:2–29). “This act of expiation for the people and the holy places being finished, there was presented immediately before the evening sacrifice, according to Jewish tradition, the offering prescribed for the feast of the day, a goat as sin offering, a bullock, a ram, and several lambs as burnt offerings, with the corresponding meat and drink offerings (Num. 29:7–11), and therewith the feast of the day was closed.” According to the rabbis, the high priest on this day performed all the duties of the regular daily service; sprinkled the blood eight times, once toward the ceiling and seven times on the floor; and after returning the third time from the Holy of Holies to the Holy Place sprinkled the blood of bull and goat toward the veil, mixed the blood of the two animals together, and sprinkled the altar of incense with the mixture, pouring out what remained at the foot of the altar of burnt offerings. The two goats were similar in appearance (size and value); the lots with which they were chosen were originally of boxwood, later of gold. The high priest, as soon as he received the signal that the goat had reached the wilderness, read some lessons from the law and offered prayer. Very strict rules are given by the Mishna for the fasting of the people.

Modern Observance. The strict Jews, on the day previous to the Day of Atonement, provide a cock slain by a lower-ranking rabbi; the person whose property it is then takes the fowl by the legs, swings it over the heads of himself and company, and at the same time prays to God that the sins committed by them during the year may enter the fowl. This fowl seems to be a substitute for the scapegoat of old. In the evening, after a sumptuous meal, they go to the synagogue dressed in their best. After a blessing by the clerk, each contributes toward the free gift offering, after which begins the evening prayer. The reader, the chief rabbi, and many of the congregation are clad with the shrouds in which they are to be buried, continuing in prayer and supplication for upward of three hours. Some remain all night, and those who go to their homes come again in the morning at five o'clock and remain until dark. The following is the order for the day: morning prayers; the usual prayers and supplications peculiar to the day; reading the portion from Lev. 16, the maphter (Num. 19:7–11), the portion from the prophets (Isa. 57:14–58:14); the prayer of the musaph, i.e., “addition,” which makes mention of the additional sacrifices (Num. 29:7) and supplicates Jehovah to be favorable; the offering of the day from 29:7–28. They abstain from food altogether during the day. See Expiation.

Booths (or Tabernacles), Feast of. The third of the great annual feasts, the other two being the Passover and Pentecost.

Names. (1) The festival of Tents (Heb. ḥag hassūkkôt, “Feast of Booths,” 2 Chron. 8:13; Ezra 3:4; Zech. 14:16, 18–19; Gk. skēnopēgia, John 7:2, “Feast of Booths”) was so called because the Israelites were commanded to live in booths during its continuance (cf. Lev. 23:43). (2) The feast of Ingathering (Heb. ḥag hā-āsīp, Ex. 23:16, “Feast of the Harvest”; 34:22), because it was held after the ingathering of the harvest and fruits. (3) The festival of Jehovah (Heb. ḥag YHWH, Lev. 23:39, “feast of the Lord”), or simply the festival (1 Kings 8:2; 2 Chron. 5:3, “the feast”), because it was the most important or well known. The principal passages referring to this feast are Ex. 23:16; Lev. 23:34–36; 39:43; Deut. 16:13–15; 31:10–13; Neh. 8.

Origin and Import. The origin of this feast is connected by some with Succoth, the first halting place of the Israelites on their march out of Egypt, and the booths are taken to commemorate those in which they lodged for the last time before they entered the desert. It was ordered by Moses in the regulations he gave to the Israelites respecting their festivals, and it unites two elements: the ingathering of the labor of the field (Ex. 23:16), the fruit of the earth (Lev. 23:39)—or the ingathering of the threshing floor and the wine press (Deut. 16:13)—and the dwelling in booths, which were to be matters of joy to Israel (Lev. 23:41–43; Deut. 16:14). The dwelling in booths was to be a reminder to them of the fatherly care and protection of Jehovah while Israel was journeying from Egypt to Canaan (Deut. 8:7–18). “In comparison with the ‘house of bondage’ the dwelling in booths on the march through the wilderness was in itself an image of freedom and happiness” (K. & D., Com., ad loc.). Such a reminder of God’s loving care and Israel’s dependence would, naturally, keep the Israelites from pride and conceit.

Time of the Festival. It began on the 15th of Tishri (the seventh month), five days before the Day of Atonement, and although, strictly speaking, it lasted only seven days (Deut. 16:13; Lev. 23:36; Ezek. 45:25), another day was added (Neh. 8:18). This day was observed with a sabbatic rest.

Observance. To distinguish between the pentateuchal enactments and the rites, ceremonies, etc., that gradually developed, we divide the description of its observance into three sections: Mosaic, postexilic, and post-Dispersion.

Mosaic. On the first day of the feast, booths were constructed of fresh branches of fruit and palm trees, “boughs of leafy trees and willows.” These were located in courts, streets, public squares, and on house roofs. In these all home-born Israelites were to dwell during the festival, in memory of their fathers’ dwelling in booths after their exodus from Egypt (Lev. 23:40; Neh. 8:15). The day was also to be observed as a Sabbath and a holy convocation, in which no secular work was to be done, and all abled-bodied male members of the congregation not legally precluded were to appear before the Lord. The booth in Scripture is not an image of privation and misery but of protection, preservation, and shelter from heat, storm, and tempest (Pss. 27:5; 31:20; Isa. 4:6). Table 9 lists the sacrifices offered during this festival.

1. The sin offering

Each bull, ram, and lamb was accompanied with its prescribed grain and drink offering. The above sacrifices were offered after the regular morning sacrifice (Num. 29:12–34). Every sabbatical year the law was to be read publicly in the sanctuary on the first day of the festival (Deut. 31:10–13). The six following days were half festivals, probably devoted to social enjoyments and friendly gatherings, when every family head was to extend hospitality, especially to the poor and the stranger (16:14). To these seven days there was added an eighth, the twenty-second of the month, as the close of the feast. This day was observed with a sabbatic rest and holy convocation but had only a simple sacrifice, similar to the first and tenth days of the seventh month (Num. 29:35–38; see table 9). There is only one instance recorded of this festival's being celebrated between the entrance into the Promised Land and the Babylonian captivity (1 Kings 8:2; 2 Chron. 7:8–10; Neh. 8:17).

Postexilic. After the Babylonian captivity the feast of Booths began to be strictly and generally kept, and more minute definitions and more expanded applications of the concise pentateuchal injunction were imperatively demanded, in order to secure uniformity of practice, as well as to infuse devotion and joy into the celebration.

It was ordained that the booth must be a detached and temporary habitation, constructed for the festival and not for permanent residence; the interior must neither be higher than twenty cubits nor lower than ten palms; it must have not less than three walls and must be so thatched as to admit the view of the sky and the stars. The part open to the rays of the sun was not to exceed the part shaded by the cover; it must not be under a tree, or covered with a cloth or with anything that contracts defilement or does not derive its growth from the ground. The furniture of the booths must be of the plainest, and only such as was fairly necessary. Every Israelite was to dwell in the booth during the whole of the seven days of the festival, while his house was to be only his occasional abode; and he was only to quit the booth when it rained heavily. Even a child, as soon as it ceased to be dependent upon its mother, must dwell in the booth. The only persons exempt were those deputed on pious missions, invalids, nurses, women, and infants.

There was a controversy between the Pharisees and Sadducees respecting the use of the branches of trees mentioned in Lev. 23:40; the latter, from Neh. 8:15–16, understanding them to be for the erection of the booths, whereas the Pharisees applied them to what the worshipers were to carry in their hands. The rabbis ruled that the aethrog, or citron, was the fruit of the “beautiful trees,” and “the boughs of leafy trees” meant the myrtle, provided it did not have more berries than leaves. Every worshiper carried the aethrog in his left hand, and in his right the lulab, or palm, with myrtle and willow branch on either side of it tied together on the outside with its own kind, though on the inside it might be fastened with a gold thread. The lulab was used in the Temple on each of the seven festive days; even children, if able to shake it, were required to carry one.

1. The day before the feast, 14th Tishri, was the Preparation Day. On this day the pilgrims came to Jerusalem and prepared all that was necessary for the solemn observance of the festival. When evening set in, the blasts of the priests’ trumpets on the Temple mount announced the advent of the feast. As at the Passover and at Pentecost, the altar of burnt offering was cleansed during the first night watch, and the Temple gates were thrown open immediately after midnight. The time until the beginning of the ordinary morning sacrifice was occupied in examining the various sacrifices and offerings that were to be brought during the day. If this day was the Sabbath all lulabs had to be deposited somewhere in the Temple, as it was contrary to law to carry the palms from the booths of the pilgrims to the Temple on the Sabbath.

2. On the first day of the feast, 15th Tishri, while the morning sacrifice was being prepared, a priest, accompanied by a joyous procession and with music, went down to the Pool of Siloam, where he drew water into a golden pitcher capable of holding three logs. On the Sabbaths the water was brought from a golden vessel in the Temple itself, to which it had been carried from Siloam the preceding day. At the same time that the procession started for Siloam, another went to a place in the Kidron Valley (i.e., Motza), to which they brought willow branches. These they stuck on either side of the great altar, bending them over so as to form a canopy. The priest who had gone to Siloam timed his return so as to join his brother priests as they carried the sacrifice to the altar. On reaching the water gate he was welcomed by three blasts of the trumpet. He ascended the steps of the altar with another priest, who carried a pitcher of wine for a drink offering. They turned to the left, where there were two silver basins with holes in the bottom; the basin for the water at the W with a narrower hole, that for the wine at the E with wider hole, so that both might empty at the same time. Into these respective basins the water and wine were poured; the people shouting to the priest, “Raise thy hand,” to show that he really poured the water into the basin. The reason for this was that Alexander Jannaeus, a Sadducee (about 95 B.C.), had shown his contempt for the Pharisees by pouring the water upon the ground. He was pelted by the people with their aethrogs, and the soldiers, being called in, killed nearly six thousand Jews in the Temple.

As soon as the altar was decorated with the willow branches the morning sacrifice was offered, followed by the special festive sacrifices. While these sacrifices were being offered, the Levites chanted the Great Hallel, as at the Passover and Pentecost. When the choir came to the words “Give thanks to the Lord” (Ps. 118:1), again when they sang, “O Lord, do save, we beseech Thee” (118:25), and once more at the close, “Give thanks to the Lord” (118:29), all the worshipers shook their lulabs toward the altar. The chant finished, the priests marched around the altar, exclaiming, “Hosanna, O Jehovah; give us help, O Jehovah, give prosperity” (cf. 118:25). The benediction was then pronounced, and the people dispersed, amid the repeated exclamation “How beautiful art thou, O altar!” or “To Jehovah and thee, O altar, we give thanks!” This prayer for succor was applied to Christ when the multitude greeted Jesus on His entry into Jerusalem (Matt. 21:8–9; John 12:12–13).

Each pilgrim went to his booth, there to enjoy his social repast with the Levite, the stranger, etc. On the first day of the festival every Israelite carried about his lulab, or palm, all day—to the synagogue, on his visits to the sick and mourners.

3. The second through sixth days of the feast, 16th–20th Tishri, were called also the middle days of the feast (John 7:14), or the lesser festival. These days were half holy days, on which necessary food or raiment might be privately purchased, and work required for the observance of the festival might be performed. During these days the sacrifices were offered, the palm and the citron were used, and the priests marched around the altar as on the first day of the festival, with the exception that the number of animals offered diminished daily.

4. The seventh or the last day of the feast, fell on the 21st Tishri (but according to some authorities this title was given to the 22nd Tishri). This seventh day of the festival was distinguished from the other days as follows: after the Musaph, or special festival sacrifices of the day, the priests marched seven times around the altar instead of once, as on other days; the willows that surrounded the altar were then so thoroughly shaken by the people that the leaves lay thickly on the ground; the people also brought palm branches and beat them to pieces at the side of the altar, from which the day was called the day of willows and the branch-threshing day. This over, the children who were present threw away their palms and ate their aethrogs, or citrons; on the afternoon of this day the pilgrims began to move the furniture from the booths, the obligation to dwell in them ceasing at that time. This, the great Hosanna day, was regarded as one of the four days whereon God judges the world. It seems altogether probable that it was on this day that Jesus uttered those memorable words, “If any man is thirsty, let him come to Me and drink” (John 7:37).

5. The eighth day of the feast, 22nd Tishri, was added as the close of the festival and was observed with sabbatic rest and holy convocation. It had only a simple sacrifice (similar to the first and tenth day of the seventh month; see table 9, “Sacrifices Offered During the Feast of Booths”). The people no longer dwelt in booths, the joyful procession for the drawing of water was discontinued, the illumination of the court of the women ceased, and the palms and willows were not used.

The ceremony of drawing the water was repeated every morning during the seven days of the festival but was discontinued on the eighth.

When the feast of Booths fell on a sabbatic year, the reading of portions of the law (Deut. 31:10–13) was afterward confined to one book of the Pentateuch, the number of synagogues in which the law was read every week rendering it less needful to read extensive portions in the Temple. A peculiarity of this festival was that on the first seven days all twenty-four divisions of the priests officiated, whereas at all the other festivals only those upon whom the lot fell served (cf. 1 Chron. 24:7–19). On the eighth day the twenty-four divisions were not all present; only those upon whom the lot fell. As the close of the first day of the feast was celebrated, the “joy of the pouring out of the water,” the worshipers descended to the court of the women, where great preparations had been made. Four golden candelabra were there, each with four golden bowls, a ladder resting against each candelabra and upon them standing four sons of the priests holding pitchers of oil with which they fed the lamps, while the cast-off breeches and girdles of the priests served for wicks. The light from these lamps illuminated the whole city, and around them danced men with lighted torches in their hands, singing hymns and songs of praise. The Levites, stationed on the fifteen steps that led into the court, corresponding to the fifteen psalms of degrees, i.e., steps (Pss. 120–134, “ascents”), accompanied the songs with harps, lyres, cymbals, and other musical instruments. The dancing, as well as the music, continued until daybreak. It is probable that Jesus referred to this custom when He spoke those well-known words “I am the light of the world” (John 8:12).

Since the Dispersion. Except for the adaptation of the rites to the altered condition of the nation, the Jews of the present day continue to celebrate the feast of Booths as in the days of the second Temple.

As soon as the Day of Atonement is over, every orthodox Jew begins to erect the booth in which he and his family are to take up their abode during the festival, and he also provides himself with a lulab (palm) and aethrog (citron). The festival commences on the eve of 14th Tishri (Preparation Day). All the Jews, attired in festive garments, resort to the synagogues, where, after the evening prayer, the hallowed nature of the festival is proclaimed by the cantor in the blessing pronounced over the wine. After the evening service every family goes to its booth, which is illuminated and adorned with leaves and fruit and in which the first festive meal is taken. Before this is eaten, the head of the family pronounces the sanctity of the festival over a cup of wine. Each member of the family washes his hands, pronouncing the prescribed benediction while drying them, and all begin to eat. Orthodox Jews sleep in the booths all night.

The following morning, the first day of the feast, they go to the synagogue, holding the palms and citrons in their hands, laying them down during the former part of the prayer, but taking them up after the eighteen benedictions, when about to recite the Hallel. Holding the palm in the right hand and the citron in the left, they recite the following prayer: “Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us with Thy commandments, and hast enjoined us to take the palm branch.” Then each turns his citron upside down and waves his palm branch three times toward each point of the compass, and the legate of the congregation pronounces the benediction; the Hallel is chanted; the lessons are read from the law (Lev. 22:26; 23:44; Num. 29:12–16) and from the prophets (Zech. 14:1–21). After this the Musaph prayer is recited; when the reader comes to the passage where the word priests occurs, the Aaronites and the Levites rise, and, after the latter have washed the hands of the former, the priests, with uplifted hands, pronounce the priestly benediction (Num. 6:24–27) upon the congregation, whose faces are veiled with the Talith. The elders then march around the ark, in the center of the synagogue, the legate carrying the scroll and the rest of the palm branches, repeating the Hosanna and waving the palms in memory of the procession around the altar. The morning service concluded, the people again go to their booths to partake of the festive meal with the poor and the stranger. About five or six o’clock they recite, in the synagogue, the Minchah prayer, answering to the daily evening sacrifice in the Temple.

The ritual and rites of the second evening and morning are similar to those of the first; the lesson from the prophets, however, is from 1 Kings 8:2–21. After the afternoon service of this day the middle days of the festival begin, which last four days, when the ritual is like that of ordinary days, a few prayers being inserted in the regular formula; lessons are read on each day, and the procession goes around the ark.

The seventh day, i.e., the Great Hosanna, is celebrated with peculiar solemnity, inasmuch as it is believed that on this day God decrees the rain for the future harvest. On the evening previous every Israelite supplies himself with a small bunch of willows tied with palm bark. Some pious Jews read all night from Deuteronomy, the Psalms, the Mishna, etc., and are immersed before the morning prayer. Candles are lighted at the time of morning service, and after the morning prayer (similar to those of the preceding days) seven scrolls are taken from the ark, from one of which the lesson is read. After prayer the procession, headed by the rabbi and the legate, with those carrying the scrolls, goes seven times around the ark or the reading desk, reciting the Hosannas and waving their palms. The palms are then laid down and the willows beaten.

On the evening of the seventh day the festival commences, which concludes the whole cycle of the feast. Being a day of holy convocation, the Kiddush (i.e., proclamation) of its sanctity is offered. On the following morning, in the synagogue, the prayers of the first two days are offered; the special lesson of the day is read; the Musaph, or additional prayer, is offered, and the priests pronounce the benediction. The people no longer take their meals in the booths on this day. On the evening of this day begins the festival called the Rejoicing of the Law. The eighteen benedictions are recited. All the scrolls are taken from the ark, into which a lighted candle is placed. A procession of distinguished members is headed by the legate; they hold the scrolls in their hands and go around the reading desk; the scrolls are then put back into the ark, except the one placed upon the desk, from which is read the last chapter of Deuteronomy. All persons in the synagogue are called to the reading, including children. The evening service over, the children leave the synagogue in procession, carrying banners with sundry Heb. inscriptions.

On the following morning the Jews resort again to the synagogue, recite the Hallel after the eighteen benedictions, empty the ark of all its scrolls, put a lighted candle into it, and with the scrolls go around the reading desk amid jubilant songs. The scrolls are returned to the ark, with the exception of two, from one of which is read Deut. 33. Four persons are at first called, then all the little children, and then again several adults. The first of these is known as the Bridegroom of the Law, and after the cantor has addressed him in a lengthy Heb. formula the last verses of the Pentateuch are read. Following the reading, all the people exclaim, "Be strong!" Genesis 1:1–2:3 is read, to which another is called who is known as the Bridegroom of Genesis, to whom is delivered a Heb. formula; the Maphtir (i.e., Num. 29:35–30:1) is read from another scroll; the Mustaph, or additional special prayer for the festival, is said; and the service is concluded. The rest of the day is spent in rejoicing and feasting.

The design of this festival is to celebrate the annual completion of the perusal of the Pentateuch, inasmuch as on this day the last section of the law is read. Hence the name of the festival, The Rejoicing of Finishing the Law.

Postexilic Festivals. To the yearly festivals instituted by the Mosaic law several were added after the Exile, of which two, Purim and the feast of Dedication, were as regularly kept as the Mosaic yearly feasts.

Purim (Heb. pûrîm, "lots," Esther 9:26, 31). This feast was instituted by Mordecai, at the suggestion of Esther, in memory of the extraordinary deliverance of the Jews of Persia from the murderous plot of Haman. It was generally adopted, though not at first without opposition.

Name and Significance. The name Purim, "lots," was given to this festival because of the casting of lots by Haman to decide when he should carry into effect the decree issued by the king for the extermination of the Jews (Esther 9:24). The name was probably given to the festival in irony.

Observance. The only directions given respecting the observance of the festival is that Mordecai ordered the 14th and 15th of Adar to be kept annually by the Jews; that these two days should be days of feasting and joy, of the interchange of presents, and of sending gifts to the poor; and that the Jews agreed to continue the observance of the festival as it was begun (Esther 9:17–24). No mention is made of any special sacrifice. At the present day the festival is kept as follows: the day preceding (13th Adar) is kept as a fast day (called “the Fast of Esther”), in accordance with the command of the queen (4:15–16). Sundry prayers, expressive of repentance, etc., are introduced into the ritual for the day. As on all fast days, Ex. 32:11–14 and 34:1–11 are read as the lesson from the law, and Isa. 55:6–56:8 as the Haphtarah. If 13th Adar falls on a Sabbath, the fast is kept on the previous Thursday. As soon as the stars appear the festival commences, candles are lighted, and all the Jews go to the synagogue, where, after the evening service, the benediction is pronounced, and the book of Esther is read by the prelector. As often as the name of Haman is mentioned in the reading, the congregation stamps on the floor, saying, “Let his name be blotted out. The name of the wicked shall rot!” while the children shake rattles. After the reading the congregation exclaims, “Cursed be Haman; blessed be Mordecai!” etc.; the benediction is said, and all go home and partake of milk and eggs. On the 14th, in the morning, the people go to the synagogue; several prayers are inserted into the regular ritual; Ex. 17:8–16 is read as the lesson from the law, and Esther, as on the previous evening. The rest of the festival is given up to rejoicing, exchanging of presents, games, etc. Rejoicing continues on the 15th, and the festival terminates on the evening of this day.

Dedication, Feast of (Heb. hanûkkâ). In 1 Macc. 4:52–59 it is called “the dedication of the altar,” and by Josephus (Ant. 12.7.7) “the feast of lights.” It was a popular and joyous festival commemorating the purifying of the Temple, the removal of the old polluted altar, and the restoration of the worship of Jehovah by Judas Maccabeus, 164 B.C.

This feast began on the 25th Chisleu (December) and lasted eight days but did not require attendance at Jerusalem. Assembled in the Temple or in the synagogues of the places where they resided, the Jews sang “Hallel,” carrying palm and other branches; and there was a grand illumination of the Temple and private houses. The origin of the illumination of the Temple is unknown, although tradition says that when the sacred “lampstands” of the restored Temple were to be lighted only one flagon of oil, sealed with the signet of the high priest, was found to feed the lamps. This was pure oil, but only sufficient for one day—when by a miracle the oil increased, and the flagon remained filled for eight days, in memory of which the Temple and private houses were ordered to be illuminated for the same period. No public mourning or fast was allowed on account of calamity or bereavement. The festival did not require anyone to abstain partially or completely from his ordinary occupation, and unlike some other celebrations it was not marked by a holy assembly at the beginning and the end. The celebration was always of a joyous, exuberant character which commemorated the restoration of the worship of the Temple (1 Macc. 4:41–49). The similarity between this festival and the “feast of Booths” would seem to indicate some intended connection between the two. Without doubt, our Lord attended this festival at Jerusalem (John 10:22). It is still observed by the Jews.

Festivals as Types. According to many Bible teachers, the seven feasts of the Lord (Lev. 23) constitute a prophecy and foreshadowing of future events, part of which have been fulfilled and part are yet to be fulfilled. They are “a mere shadow of what is to come,” of which Christ is the body or substance (Col. 2:16–17). The seven annual feasts may be divided into two sections of four and three. The first section includes the Passover, the feast of Unleavened Bread, the feast of First Fruits, and Pentecost. The second group, separated by a four-month period, includes the feast of Trumpets, the Day of Atonement, and the feast of Booths. The three great festivals were the Passover, Pentecost, and Booths. The first four feasts foreshadow truths concerning this present gospel age. The last three foreshadow blessings in store for Israel. The first four are historic; the last three, prophetic. Those who hold the typical view of the Hebrew feasts teach the significance of each as follows:

Passover. The Passover (Lev. 23:4–5) speaks of Calvary and of redemption by blood from Egypt, a type of the world; from Pharaoh, a type of Satan; and from Egyptian servitude, a type of sin. The festival speaks of our redemption from sin by the Lamb of God (1 Pet. 1:19), Christ being our Passover (1 Cor. 5:7).

Unleavened Bread. Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:6–8) typifies the holy walk of a believer after redemption (1 Cor. 5:8; 11:23–33; 2 Cor. 7:1; Gal. 5:7–9). The divine order is eloquent. First, redemption, followed by a holy walk. The eating of unleavened bread and the putting away of all leaven from the household portrays holiness, as leaven is a figure of “malice and wickedness” (1 Cor. 5:8) and is not befitting a believer’s walk.

First Fruits. First Fruits (Lev. 23:9–14) is typical of resurrection, first of Christ’s, then of “those who are Christ’s at His coming” (1 Cor. 15:23; 1 Thess. 4:13–18). When the priest on the day of Christ’s resurrection waved the sheaf of first fruits in the Temple, it was before a torn veil and was but an antiquated form, for the substance had come and the shadow had passed away. Joseph’s empty tomb proclaimed that the great first fruit sheaf had been reaped and waved in the heavenly Temple. This feast has been completely fulfilled in Christ. (See also the article First Fruits.)

Pentecost (Lev. 23:15–22). The type of the feast of Pentecost is the coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost to form the church, the Body of Christ. Because the church is not yet glorified and contains evil, leaven is present (Matt. 13:33). The two loaves are not a sheaf of separate stalks loosely tied together but a union of particles making loaves or a homogeneous body. At the Pentecost following Christ’s resurrection, the Holy Spirit, by His baptizing work, formed the separate disciples into one organism, the Body of Christ (cf. Acts 1:5 with 11:16 and 1 Cor. 12:13). The church had to begin on Pentecost because it was the first historical instance of the Spirit’s baptizing work (cf. Merrill F. Unger, The Baptizing Work of the Holy Spirit [1953], pp. 53–65). Although leaven was in the two loaves offered at Pentecost, typifying Jew and Gentile made one in Christ (cf. Eph. 3:1–10), yet the leaven was baked, that is, sin in those who are redeemed has been judged in Christ. The four-month period between Pentecost and Trumpets was occupied in gathering in the harvest, typical of the present church period before Christ restores Israel.

Trumpets. Trumpets (Lev. 23:23–25) speaks of the regathering of Israel to its homeland after the out-gathering of the church. Matthew 24:31 speaks of the Son of Man at His second advent sending His angels with a great sound of a trumpet to gather together His elect (of Israel) from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other.

Day of Atonement. The Day of Atonement (Lev. 23:26–32) envisions Israel’s national cleansing from sin (Rom. 11:25) and refers to the time when a “fountain will be opened for the house of David and for the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for impurity” (Zech. 13:1). It portrays their future conversion as a nation at the second advent of Christ (12:9–14).

Booths. The antitype of Booths (or Tabernacles; Lev. 23:33–43) has not yet appeared. Peter anticipated it, however, on the mount of transfiguration when he said, “Lord, it is good for us to be here; if You wish, I will make three tabernacles here, one for You, and one for Moses, and one for Elijah” (Matt. 17:4). What Peter desired, the dwelling of heavenly and earthly people on the earth, was not possible in that age but will be possible in the conditions of the mediatorial Davidic kingdom. Then the kingdom of the heavens will bring heaven and earth in closer union. The feast of Booths is thus prophetic of Israel’s millennial rest. The feast of Booths is a memorial to Israel, going back to Egypt and forward to millennial rest, as the Lord’s Supper now points back to a finished redemption until Christ appears. The eighth day following the Sabbath (Lev. 23:39) points to the new heaven and the new earth following the Millennium and to the dispensation of the fullness of time before the eternal state. M.F.U.

FES'TUS, POR'CIUS (fes'tus, pōr'shus). The successor of Felix as the Roman governor of Judea, appointed by the emperor Nero probably in the autumn of A.D. 60 (Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul). Three days after his arrival at Caesarea (the political metropolis) he went up to Jerusalem. Here he was met by the “chief priests and the leading men of the Jews,” who “brought charges against Paul.” They requested, as a favor, that he would allow Paul to be brought up to Jerusalem; the plea, doubtless, was that he should be tried before the Sanhedrin. The real purpose, however, was to kill him while on the way. Festus refused to comply and told them that they must meet the accused face to face at Caesarea. After eight or ten days Paul was summoned before Festus and asked whether he was willing to go to Jerusalem; but the apostle, knowing full well the danger that lurked in this proposal and conscious of the rights he possessed as a Roman citizen, refused to accede and replied boldly to Festus, concluding with, “I appeal to Caesar.” About this time Herod Agrippa, with his sister Bernice, came on a complimentary visit to Festus and was consulted by the governor. The result was an interview between the three and Paul, in which the latter delivered a famous discourse and was pronounced innocent. But because he had appealed to Caesar, Festus sent him to Rome (Acts 25–26). A few other facts are mentioned concerning Festus. Judea was in the same disturbed state that it had been in under the procuratorship of Felix. He took part with Agrippa against the priests, who built a wall to obstruct Agrippa's view of the Temple but allowed an appeal to Nero, who decided in favor of the Jews. He probably died in the summer of A.D. 62. See Paul.

FETTERS. An archaic term for shackles or chains used for binding prisoners either by the wrists or ankles (Judg. 16:21; 2 Kings 25:7; 2 Chron. 33:11; Mark 5:4). In the original several words are used; the NASB and NIV usually render “chains,” but sometimes the NASB has “fettters” (so 2 Kings 25:7).

The Egyptians enclosed the hands of their prisoners in an elongated shackle of wood, made of two opposite segments nailed together at each end.

FIDELITY (Gk. pistis). “That grace in the servant which shows him to be worthy of his Master's trust. Thus our Lord says, ‘Who then is that faithful and wise steward,’ etc. (Luke

NASB New American Standard Bible

NIV New International Version

12:42, KJV). Paul gives the description of the faithful servant as ‘showing all good fidelity’ (Titus 2:10, KJV). The same word which expresses our trust in God’s fidelity expresses his trust in ours. It is a grace which stands alone as having the epithet good, and it must pervade the whole of life. Here then are all the elements of our ethics: the Master commits a trust, and the trustworthy servant shows fidelity in all things. It may be that the very faith which trusts God is the strength of the faithfulness which God may trust. Fidelity extends to the whole of life, with special reference to our individual vocation. Nothing is excluded from the sphere of this duty. Fidelity, as the test applied to service, is guarded by threatenings and stimulated by the hope of reward” (Matt. 25:23, 26, 30; Pope, Compendium of Christian Theology, 3:220–23).

FIELD (Heb. śādeh, “smoothness”). This word does not exactly correspond to our “field.”

The two words agree in describing cultivated land but differ in point of extent, the śādeh being specifically applied to what is unenclosed, whereas field conveys the notion of enclosure. On the one hand śādeh is applied to any cultivated ground, whether pasture (Gen. 29:2; 31:4; 34:7; Ex. 9:3), tillage (Gen. 37:7; 47:24; Ruth 2:2–3; Job 24:6; Jer. 26:18; Mic. 3:12), forest (2 Sam. 14:25; Ps. 132:6, see marg.), or mountaintop (Judg. 9:32, 36; 1 Sam. 1:21). In some instances it is in marked opposition to the neighboring wilderness, as the field or land of Shechem (Gen. 33:19; NIV, “plot”), of Moab (36:35 [NIV, “country”]; Num. 21:20 [NIV, “valley”]; Ruth 1:1 [NIV, “country”]), and the valley of Siddim (Gen. 14:3, 8).

On the other hand, the śādeh is contrasted with what is enclosed, whether a vineyard (Ex. 22:5; Lev. 25:3–4), a city (Deut. 28:3, 16, see marg.), or unwalled villages ranking in the eyes of the law as fields (Lev. 25:31; NIV, “open country”). The term often implies a place remote from a house (Gen. 4:8; 24:63), a sense more fully expressed by “the open field” (Lev. 14:7, 53; 17:5; Num. 19:16) and naturally coupled with the idea of exposure and desertion (Jer. 9:22; Ezek. 16:5; 32:4; 33:27; 39:5).

Fields were marked off by stones, which could be easily removed (Deut. 19:14; 27:17; cf. Job 24:2; Prov. 22:28; 23:10). Being unfenced, fields were liable to damage from straying cattle (Ex. 22:5), hence the necessity of constantly watching flocks and herds. From the absence of enclosures cultivated land of any size might be termed a field, whether of limited area (Gen. 23:13, 17; Isa. 5:8), one’s entire inheritance (Lev. 27:16–24; Ruth 4:5 [NIV, “land”]; Jer. 32:9), or public land about a town (Gen. 41:48; Neh. 12:29; not applied, however, to the “suburbs” of Levitical cities immediately adjacent to the walls and considered part of the town; Josh. 21:11–12), and lastly the territory of a people (Gen. 14:7; Num. 21:20, NASB, “country,” “land,” etc.; NIV, “valley”).

Fields were occasionally named after remarkable events, such as Helkath-hazzurim, “the field of strong men” (2 Sam. 2:16), or the use to which they may have been put, such as “the fuller’s field” (2 Kings 18:17; NIV, “Washerman’s Field”) or “the Potter’s Field” (Matt. 27:7).

The expression “fruitful garden” (Isa. 10:18), “fruitful field” (16:10), and “fertile field” (Isa. 29:17; 32:15–16) are not connected with śādeh but with karmel (a “park” or well-kept wood), as distinct from a wilderness or forest (2 Kings 19:23; Isa. 37:24).

FILLET. An erroneous rendering in the KJV of ḥūshshāqîm (“joinings,” Ex. 27:17; 38:17, 28), the bands (so NASB and NIV) that joined together the tops of the pillars around the court of the Tabernacle (which see) and from which the curtain was suspended (Ex. 27:10–11; etc.); ḥût, “thread” (as elsewhere rendered), i.e., a measuring line (so NASB, marg., Jer. 52:21).

FILTH, FILTHY. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words meaning “foul matter” or “anything that soils or defiles.” In 2 Chron. 29:5 and Ezra 6:21 the filth or “uncleanness” and “impurity” from which the Jews were to cleanse the Temple and themselves was the abomination of idolatry. Filth is used as the equivalent of moral impurity (Ezek. 36:25; James 1:21; cf. 2 Cor. 7:1). In 1 Cor. 4:13 it is used to denote out-sweepings, that which is worthless, i.e., “the scum of the world.” The expression “and its filthiness may be melted in it” (Ezek. 24:11; NIV, “impurities”) seems to mean that the pot was to be placed empty upon the fire that the rust might be burned away by the heat. The filthiness of the pot was the rust on it.

FINE, FINES. (Heb. middâ). A term referring to something measured out (2 Kings 23:33; Ezra 4:20). The KJV renders the term “tribute.” The NIV has “levy” and “taxes” respectively. See Punishments.

FINE LINEN. See Dress; Linen; Vegetable Kingdom: Flax; Sheet.

FINERING. Refining. See Handicrafts: Metalworker.

FINGER.

Figurative. Denotes the special and immediate agency of anyone. The Egyptian magicians said of the plagues, “This is the finger of God,” i.e., done by God Himself (Ex. 8:19). The tablets of stone were said to have been “written by the finger of God” (31:18) under His personal direction. The heavens are said to be the work of God’s fingers, i.e., His power (Ps. 8:3); and Christ said, “If I cast out demons by the finger of God” (Luke 11:20).

“The pointing of the finger” (Isa. 58:9) signifies a scornful pointing with the fingers at humbler men and especially at such as are godly. “Four fingers” is the measure of thickness used by Jeremiah (52:21).

FINGER or Digit. A linear measure. See Metrology.

FINING POT. A crucible or refining pot (so NASB). See Handicrafts: Metalworker.

FINISHER (Gk. teleiōtēs, “completer”). Spoken of Jesus (Heb. 12:2, KJV) as one who in His own person raised faith to its perfection and so set before us the highest example of faith. The NASB and NIV give “perfecter.”

FINS. A distinctive mark of such fish as might be eaten under the Mosaic law (Lev. 11:9–10, 12; Deut. 14:9–10). See Food.

FIR. See Vegetable Kingdom: Cypress; Fir; Juniper.

FIRE. The discovery of fire antedates history and seems to be assumed in the first sacrifice of Cain and Abel (Gen. 4:3–4). No nation has yet been discovered that did not know the use of fire, but the way in which it was first procured is unknown. Entering so largely into the life of men it has naturally been the subject of many legends. The ancient Chaldeans looked upon Gibir (or Gibil), the lord of fire, as their most powerful auxiliary against the Annunaki, an order of inferior but malicious beings. Gibir is addressed as the one who lightens up the darkness, who melts the copper and tin, the gold and silver. According to Greek mythology Prometheus, when Zeus denied fire to mortals, stole it from Olympus and brought it to men in a hollow reed. For this he was punished by being chained on a rock in the wilds of Scythia.

The various uses of fire are given in the following sections:

Domestic. The preparation of food presupposes the use of fire, which the Israelites seem, at least in later times, to have produced by striking steel against flint (2 Macc. 10:3), although the oldest method known was that of rubbing two pieces of wood together. Besides for cooking purposes fire is often needed in Palestine for warmth (Jer. 36:22; Mark 14:54; John 18:18). Sometimes a hearth with a chimney was constructed, on which lighted wood or a pan of charcoal was placed. In Persia a hole made in the floor is sometimes filled with charcoal, on which a sort of table is set covered with a carpet. The company draws the carpet over their feet. Rooms are warmed in Egypt with pans of charcoal. The use of charcoal in reducing and fashioning metals was well known among the Hebrews. See Handicrafts: Metalworker.

Laws Regulating Fire. The law forbade any fire to be kindled on the Sabbath, even for culinary purposes (Ex. 35:3; Num. 15:32–36). This did not, probably, forbid the use of fire for warmth. The dryness of the land in the hot season made fires more likely to occur (Judg. 9:15), and the law ordered that anyone kindling a fire that caused damage to grain should make restitution (Ex. 22:6; cf. Judg. 15:4–5; 2 Sam. 14:30).

Religious. Fire was used to consume the burnt offerings and the incense offering, beginning with the sacrifice of Noah (Gen. 8:20) and continuing in the ever-burning fire on the altar. “In the sacrificial flame the essence of the animal was resolved into vapor; so that when a man presented a sacrifice in his own stead, his inmost being, his spirit, and his heart ascended to God in the vapor, and the sacrifice brought the feeling of his heart before God” (K. & D., Com.). This altar fire was miraculously sent from God (Lev. 6:9, 13; 9:24), like the fire of Jehovah that consumed the sacrifices of David and Solomon (1 Chron. 21:26; 2 Chron. 7:1). Keil and Delitzsch (Com., Lev. 9:24) say: “The miracle recorded in this verse did not consist in the fact that the sacrificial offerings placed upon the altar were burned by fire which proceeded from Jehovah, but in the fact that the sacrifices, which were already on fire, were suddenly consumed by it.” Fire was to be constantly burning upon the altar without going out, in order “that the burnt offering might never go out, because this was the divinely appointed symbol and visible sign of the uninterrupted worship of Jehovah, which the covenant nation could never suspend either day or night without being unfaithful to its calling” (K. & D., Com., Lev. 6:12). If by any calamity the sacred fire was extinguished, according to the Talmud it was only to be rekindled by friction. Fire for sacred purposes obtained elsewhere than from the altar was called “strange fire,” for the use of which Nadab and Abihu were punished with death by fire from God (Lev. 10:1–2; Num. 3:4; 26:61). When the Israelites returned with booty taken from the Midianites, Eleazer, whose duty it was to see that the laws of purification were properly observed, told them that “the statute of the law” was that all articles that could bear it were to be drawn through the fire and then sprinkled with the water of purification (31:21–23). The animals slain for sin offerings were afterward consumed by fire outside of the camp (Lev. 4:12, 21; 6:30; 16:27; Heb. 13:11). The Nazirite, on the day when the time of his consecration expired, shaved his head and put the hair into the altar fire under the peace offering that was burning, thus handing over and sacrificing to the Lord the hair that had been worn in honor of Him (Num. 6:18).

Penal. Capital punishment was sometimes aggravated by burning the body of the criminal after death (Lev. 20:14; 21:9; Josh. 7:25; 2 Kings 23:16). See Punishments; Warfare.

Figurative. Fire was a symbol of the Lord’s presence and the instrument of His power, either in the way of approval or of destruction (Ex. 14:19, 24; Num. 11:1, 3; etc.). Thus Jehovah appeared in the burning bush and on Mt. Sinai (Ex. 3:2; 19:18). In the midst of fire

He showed Himself to Isaiah, Ezekiel, and John (Isa. 6:4–5; Ezek. 1:4–5; Rev. 1:12–14) and will so appear at His second coming (2 Thess. 1:7). Jehovah guided the Israelites through the wilderness with the pillar of fire (Ex. 13:21). God is compared to fire, not only because of His glorious brightness but on account of His anger against sin, which consumes sinners as fire does stubble (Deut. 32:22; Isa. 10:17; Ezek. 21:31–32; Heb. 12:29). Fire is illustrative of the church's overcoming her enemies (Obad. 18); the Word of God (Jer. 5:14; 23:29); the Holy Spirit (Isa. 4:4; Acts 2:3–4); the zeal of saints (Pss. 39:3; 119:139) and of angels (104:4; Heb. 1:7); of lust (Prov. 6:27–29) and of wickedness (Isa. 9:18); of the tongue (Prov. 16:27; James 3:6); the hope of hypocrites (Isa. 50:11); persecution (Luke 12:49–53); and of judgment (Jer. 48:45; Lam. 1:13; Ezek. 39:6). Fire, in its symbolic use, is also spoken of as purifying—the emblem of a healing process effected upon the spiritual natures of persons in covenant with God (Isa. 4:5–6; Mal. 3:2–3).

FIREBRAND.

1. A “torch” used by Samson (Judg. 15:4), probably made of resinous wood or other material. His tying the foxes tail to tail was to prevent their running to their holes and to impede their progress for a more effectual execution. Similar conflagrations produced by animals, particularly foxes, were well known to Greeks and Romans.

2. The ends of wooden pokers (lit., “fire stirrers”), that would not blaze anymore but only continued smoking (Isa. 7:4; Amos 4:11). The NIV translates “smoldering stubs” and “burning stick” respectively.

FIREPAN. An ashpan or vessel used for taking away the coals from the fire on the altar (Ex. 27:3; Lev. 16:12; etc.). See also Snuffers.

FIRES (Heb. šûr). In Isa. 24:15 (KJV) we read, “Glorify ye the Lord in the fires,” but which is better rendered “east,” as in the NASB and NIV. The lands of the Asiatic East were called šûrîm, “the lands of light,” i.e., the sunrising, as opposed to the “west” (NASB and NIV; the KJV reads, “from the sea”).

FIRE WORSHIP, or Pyrolatry. As a symbol of purity, or of the divine presence and power, or as one of the constituent elements, or as typifying the destructive element in nature, fire has been from early times the object of worship by many peoples, e.g., the ancient Persians and Medes. The faith of the magi made the elements of nature the direct objects of worship. These were fire, water, earth, and air, of which the first was considered the most energetic and sublime. So the priest built an altar, and the sacred fire caught from heaven was kindled and always kept burning. The priest was the holy magus. No other might attend the altars or conduct the mystic rites. No breath of mortal might be blown upon the sacred flame without pollution; the burning of dead bodies was a horrid profanation, and of the sacrificial offerings only a fragment of fat was given to the flame. This worship among the Canaanites is frequently referred to in the Scriptures, and the people were warned against joining in its abominations (Lev. 18:21; Deut. 12:31; 1 Kings 11:7; 2 Chron. 28:3; Ezek. 16:20–21; etc.). In spite of these warnings, however, the people caused their children to pass through the fire to Molech. See Gods, False.

Fire worship was also practiced among the Carthaginians, Scythians, the ancient Germans, and the ancient inhabitants of Great Britain. Traces of it are also found in Mexican and Peruvian worship. The Mexican god of fire, Xiuhtecutli (the Lord of Fire), was an ancient deity. He is represented naked, with his chin blackened and with a headdress of green feathers, carrying on his back a kind of serpent with yellow feathers, thus combining the fire colors. Sacrifices were offered to him daily. In every house the first libation and the first morsel of bread were consecrated to him. And as an instance of the astounding resemblance between the religious development of the Old World and that of the New, the fire in Mexico, as in ancient Iran and other countries of Asia and Europe, must in every house be extinguished on a certain day every year. The priest of Xiuhtecutli kindled fire anew by friction before the statue of the god. “At set of sun” of this day “all who had prisoners of war or slaves to offer to the deity brought forward their victims, painted with the colors of the god, danced along by their side, and shut them up in a building attached to the teocalli of fire. At midnight each owner severed a lock of the hair of his slave or slaves, to be carefully preserved as a talisman. At daybreak they brought out the victims, the priests took them upon their shoulders and flung their human burden upon the fire” (Reville, Religions of Mexico and Peru, pp. 62ff., 83). Among the Peruvians, “fire, considered as derived from the sun, was the object of profound veneration. Strange as it may seem at first sight, the symbol of fire was stones. But ... stones were thought to be animated by the fire that was supposed to be shut up within them, since it could be made to issue forth by a sharp blow. A perpetual fire burned in the Temple of the Sun and in the abode of the Virgins of the Sun. It was supposed that fire became polluted and lost its divine nature by too long contact with men. The fire must be renewed from time to time, and this act was performed yearly by the chief priest of Peru, who kindled wood by means of a concave golden mirror” (ibid., pp. 162–63).

FIRMAMENT (Heb. rāqīa, “expanse,” Gen. 1:6, 14–15, 17, KJV; NASB and NIV render “expanse”). The pure and transparent expanse that envelops the globe. This was made by God on the second day of creation for the purpose of separating the sea from the clouds. As used in the record of creation, firmament includes not merely the lower heavens, or atmospheric sky, with its clouds and vapors, but the whole visible expanse up to the region of the stars; for it is said that on the fourth day God made in the firmament sun, moon, and stars. A controversy has arisen respecting the sense attached by the Hebrew writers to “firmament,” chiefly on account of the ancient translations given of it, and the poetic representations found of the upper regions of the visible heavens in some parts of Scripture. The LXX renders stereōma, meaning generally “some compact mass,” while the Vulg. has firmamentum, a “prop” or “support.” Hence it has been argued that the Hebrews understood by the word something solid, capable of bearing up the waters that accumulate in masses above, and even of having the heavenly bodies affixed to it as to a crystalline pavement. As proof of this view such passages are quoted as speak of the foundations of heaven shaking (2 Sam. 22:8), of its pillars trembling (Job 26:11), of the windows or doors of heaven (Ps. 78:23; Mal. 3:10), of the gates of the sky (Gen. 7:11), or of the sky’s being “strong as a molten mirror” (Job 37:18). But these expressions are manifestly of a figurative nature.

FIRST-BEGOTTEN. See Firstborn.

FIRSTBORN (several Heb. words from bākar, “to burst forth”; Gk. prōtotokos). Applied equally to animals and human beings. By the firstborn, in a religious point of view, we are to understand the first of a mother’s offspring (Ex. 12:12). See Inheritance.

Figurative. The expression “firstborn” stands for that which is most excellent. Thus Jesus Christ is head of the “church of the first-born” (Heb. 12:23). “The firstborn of the poor” (Isa. 14:30, KJV) means the poorest of the poor. “The first-born of death” (Job 18:13) is the disease that Bildad has in his mind as the one more terrible and dangerous than all others. Diseases are conceived of as the children of death.

FIRSTBORN, DESTRUCTION OF. See Plagues of Egypt.

FIRSTBORN IN ISRAEL. In memory of the death of Egypt's firstborn and the preservation of the firstborn of Israel, all the firstborn of Israel, both of man and beast, belonged to Jehovah (Ex. 13:2, 15; cf. 12:11–13).

Sanctification of the Firstborn of Man. This was closely connected with Israel's deliverance from Egypt, and the object of that deliverance was their sanctification. Because Jehovah had delivered the firstborn of Israel, they were to be sanctified to Him. The fundamental element upon which this sanctification rests is evidently the representative character of the firstborn, standing for the entire offspring. Moreover, the firstborn of newly married people were believed to represent the prime of human vigor (Gen. 49:3; Ps. 78:51). Then, too, all Israel were in outward standing and covenant relationship the Lord's firstborn, being the national representatives of a redeemed church, to be brought out of every kindred, tongue, and people, and as such they were a nation of priests (Ex. 4:22–23; 19:6).

Redemption. The firstborn was the priest of the whole family. The honor of exercising the priesthood was transferred, by the command of God through Moses, from the tribe of Reuben, to whom it belonged by right of primogeniture, to that of Levi (Num. 3:12–16; 8:18–19). In consequence of the fact that God had taken the Levites to serve Him as priests, the firstborn of the other tribes were redeemed. They were presented to the Lord when a month old and, according to the priest's estimation, were redeemed by a sum not exceeding five shekels (18:16). When the Levites were set apart Moses numbered the firstborn of Israel to exchange them for the Levites. The number of the firstborn of the twelve tribes amounted to 22,273 of a month old and upward. Of this number 22,000 were exchanged for the 22,000 Levites. This left 273 to be redeemed, whose redemption money (1,365 shekels) was to be paid to Aaron and his sons as compensation for the persons who properly belonged to Jehovah (Num. 3:40–51). The Jewish doctors held that if the child died before the expiration of thirty days the father was excused from payment; if the child was sickly, or appeared otherwise to be inferior to children generally, the priest could estimate it at less than five shekels; or, if he found the parents were poor, he might return the money after the ceremony. When the mother's days of purification were accomplished and she could appear in the Temple, she brought the child to the priest to be publicly presented to the Lord (Luke 2:22). The Jews still observe this law of redemption when the firstborn male is thirty days old, inviting to their house friends and a priest to a meal on the following day. The priest, having invoked the divine blessing upon the meal and offered some introductory prayers, etc., looks at the child and the redemption money placed before him and asks the father to choose between the money and the child. Upon the father's reply that he would rather pay the redemption money, the priest takes it, swings it around the head of the child, in token of his vicarious authority, saying, "This is for the firstborn; this is in lieu of it; this redeems it," etc. When the firstborn is thirteen years old he fasts the day before the feast of Passover, in commemoration of the sparing of the firstborn in Egypt.

Redemption of the Firstborn of Animals.

Of Clean Animals. The firstborn male animal was devoted to the Lord and, if a clean animal, was sacrificed to Him. It was to be brought to the sanctuary within a year, dating from the eighth day after birth, and there offered in sacrifice; the blood sprinkled upon the altar, the fat burned upon it, while all the remaining flesh (such as the breast and the right shoulder in the case of peace offerings) belonged to the priest (Num. 18:17–18; cf. Ex. 13:13; 22:30; 34:20; Neh. 10:36). If the animal had some severe blemish—happened to be blind or lame—it was eaten at home by the owner. Before the sacrifice the animal was not to be used for any work, as it belonged to the Lord (Deut. 15:19–21).

Of Unclean Animals. The firstborn of unclean animals were to be redeemed according to the valuation of the priest, with the addition of a fifth; and if this was not done it was to be sold at the estimated value. By this regulation the earlier law, which commanded that a donkey should either be redeemed with a lamb or put to death (Ex. 13:13; 34:20), was modified in favor of the revenues of the sanctuary and its servants. Nothing, however, that a man had devoted (banned) to the Lord of his property (man, beast, or field) was to be sold or redeemed, because it was most holy (Lev. 27:28–29). The same was true with regard to the produce of the soil—i.e., the products of agriculture—the first of which (i.e., the best of the firstlings) were sacred to the Lord (Ex. 23:19; Deut. 18:4). See First Fruit.

Birthright (Heb. bēkōrâ). The term applied to the peculiar advantages, privileges, and responsibilities of the firstborn among the Israelites. The firstborn was the object of special affection to his parents and inherited peculiar rights and privileges. Before these are given it will be proper to call attention to the fact that, in case a man married a widow with children by a former husband, the firstborn, as respected the second husband, was the eldest child by the second marriage. Attention is also called to the additional fact that, before the time of Moses, the father might transfer the right of primogeniture to a younger child; but the practice occasioned much contention (Gen. 25:31–32), and a law was enacted overruling it (Deut. 21:15–17). The rights and privileges of the firstborn were as follows:

1. The firstborn received a double portion of the estate, the other sons single and equal portions. For example, if there were five sons the property would be divided into six portions, of which the eldest son received two-sixths, each of the others one-sixth. Where there were two wives, one loved, the other hated, the father was not to prefer the later-born son of the favorite wife to the older firstborn of the hated one, but was to give the right of primogeniture (with two portions of the estate) to the beginning of his strength (Deut. 21:15–17). Jacob took away the right of primogeniture from Reuben because of Reuben's incestuous conduct (Gen. 49:3–4; cf. 35:22) and transferred it to Joseph by adopting his two sons (48:20–22; 1 Chron. 5:1).

2. The firstborn was the head of the whole family. Originally the priesthood belonged to the tribe of Reuben, as the firstborn, but was transferred to the tribe of Levi (Num. 3:12–16; 8:18). The firstborn enjoyed an authority over those who were younger similar to that possessed by a father (Gen. 35:23; 2 Chron. 21:3). As head of the family he had also, according to patriarchal custom, to provide food, clothing, and other necessities in his house for his mother till death, and his unmarried sisters till their marriages.

FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK. See Lord's Day, Sunday.

FIRST FRUIT (Heb. rēshît, "first"; bikkûr, "first ripe"; Gk. aparchē, "beginning"). Like the firstborn of man and beast, the first fruits were sacred to Jehovah, as Lord of the soil (Ex. 23:19; Deut. 18:4; etc.).

Character of. In general, first fruits included those in the raw state (grain and fruit); those prepared for use as food (wine, oil, flour, and dough), including wool (Ex. 22:29; 23:19; 34:26; Deut. 18:4; etc.). The firstling sheaf at the Passover (see Festivals) was presented by the congregation before the commencement of the grain harvest (Lev. 23:10–11). Josephus says that the sheaf was of barley and that until this ceremony had been performed, no harvest work was to be done (Ant. 3.10.5). The firstling loaf at Pentecost (see Festivals) was presented when the harvest was completed. Two of these loaves, made of the new flour (wheat) and leavened, like the sheaf above mentioned, were waved before the Lord (Lev. 23:17; Ex. 34:22; Num. 28:26).

Offering of First Fruits. Regarding the firstling see the discussion of Passover and Pentecost in the article Dress. No private offerings of first fruits were allowed before the public oblation of the two loaves (Lev. 23:15, 20). The law nowhere specifies the amount that was to be given in the shape of offerings of this kind but leaves it to each individual's discretion; it only provided that the choicest portions were always to be offered (Num. 18:12). Neither is it stated in the law what were to be the different products of the soil from which firstlings were to be offered, but that the whole produce of husbandry was meant is implied in the spirit of the law itself. Accordingly, in the time of Hezekiah, firstlings of grain, wine, oil, honey, and of the whole produce of the soil were offered (2 Chron. 31:5). This may further be inferred from the regulation to the effect that, of every tree bearing edible fruit that any Israelite might plant, the fruits of the fourth year, the earliest period at which they could be eaten, were to be sacred to the Lord; and, consequently, they must have been presented to Him as an offering (Lev. 19:23–25).

Manner of Offering. The first fruits were brought in a basket to the sanctuary and presented to the priest, who was to set the basket down before the altar. Then, the offerer recited the story of Jacob's going to Egypt and the deliverance of his posterity from there. He then acknowledged the blessings with which God had visited him (Deut. 26:2–11). It being found almost impracticable for every Israelite to go on this mission to Jerusalem, the following custom arose. The inhabitants of a district prepared a basket with seven kinds of ripe fruit arranged in the following order: barley in the bottom, then wheat, olives, dates, pomegranates, figs, and grapes. This basket was watched all night by a company of at least twenty-four persons, who stayed in the open marketplace, being afraid to go into a house lest the death of a resident should cause pollution. In the morning the company set out for Jerusalem. An ox (to be the peace offering) went before them with gilded horns and an olive crown upon its head, as the people sang, "I was glad when they said to me, 'Let us go to the house of the Lord'" (Ps. 122:1). Upon their approaching Jerusalem a messenger was sent to announce their arrival, and the first fruits were tastefully arranged. The officiating priest, the Levites, and the treasurers went out to meet them (the number of officials depending upon the size of the party) and accompanied them into the city, singing as they entered, "Our feet are standing within your gates, O Jerusalem" (122:2). The piper, who led the music of the party, continued to play until the procession came to the mount of the Temple. Here everyone, even the king, took his own basket upon his shoulders and went forward till they came to the court of the Temple, singing, "Praise the Lord! Praise God in His sanctuary," etc. (150:1). The Levites responded with "I will extol Thee, O Lord!" etc. Then pigeons, which were hung about the baskets, were taken for burnt offerings. With the baskets still upon their shoulders, everyone began the story of Jacob until he came to the words "My father was a wandering Aramaean" (see Deut. 26:3–5), when he let down his basket, holding it by the brim. The priest then put his hands under it and waved it, the offerer continuing to recite the story. When he reached 26:10, "And now behold, I have brought the first of the produce," he put the basket beside the altar and, having prostrated himself, departed. After passing the night in Jerusalem the pilgrims returned the following day to their homes.

Exemptions. Exemptions were made in the case of those who simply possessed the trees, without owning the land, for they could not say, "The ground which Thou, O Lord, hast given me." Those living beyond the Jordan could not bring first fruits in the proper sense of the libation, not being able to say the words of the service, from "a land flowing with milk and honey" (Deut. 26:10–15). A proselyte, though bringing the offering, was not to recite the service, being unable to say, "I have entered the land which the Lord swore to our fathers to give us" (26:3, italics added). Stewards, servants, slaves, women, sexless persons, and hermaphrodites were not allowed to recite the service, because they could not use the words

“I have brought the first of the produce of the ground which Thou, O Lord hast given me” (26:10, italics added), they having originally no share in the land.

Historical. After the time of Solomon the corruption of the nation led to neglect of these as well as of other legal enactments, and their restoration was among the reforms brought about by Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:5, 11). Nehemiah also, after the captivity, reorganized the offerings of first fruits of both kinds and appointed places to receive them (Neh. 10:35, 37; 12:44). An offering of first fruits, brought to Elisha, was miraculously increased so as to feed one hundred persons (2 Kings 4:42–44). First fruits were sent to Jerusalem by Jews living in foreign countries (Josephus Ant. 16.6.7).

Figurative. Of the Jewish nation it was said, “Israel was holiness unto the Lord, and the firstfruits of his increase” (Jer. 2:3, KJV, italics added). In the NT first fruits are emblematic of abundance and excellence and a sample of full harvest. Paul says that Christians have “the first fruits of the Spirit” (Rom. 8:23), i.e., the first manifestations of the Spirit in the gospel dispensation. Christ was “the first fruits of those who are asleep,” i.e., the first who rose from the dead (1 Cor. 15:20, 23; 16:15; cf. Rom. 11:16). Converts are called “firstfruits,” such as Epaphroditus (16:5, KJV).

FISH. See also Animal Kingdom.

Figurative. This term is used to signify the inhabitants of Egypt (Ezek. 29:4–5), the visible church (Matt. 13:48), and defenseless people taken by the Chaldeans (Hab. 1:14). In Christian symbolism the fish is of great significance. “It is among the earliest art forms, and pertains to a period of Church history which causes it to be among the most interesting and important objects in the whole range of Christian symbolism. It is generally thought to be the symbol of Christ. The word in Greek was made up of the initial letters of the words in the article of faith so dear to the early Church: I, Ἰησοῦς, Jesus; X, Χριστός, Christ; Θ, Θεοῦ, of God; Υ, Υἱός, Son; Σ, Σωτήρ, Savior—Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior. The fish is also used to represent Christ’s disciples. Probably, as suggested by Tertullian, the water and the rite of baptism were prominently in their thought, while secondary reference may have been had to the parable of the net or to the command of Christ to Peter and Andrew, ‘Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men’” (Matt. 4:18–19).

FISHER. In addition to the usual meaning, the Lord called His disciples “fishers of men” (Matt. 4:19; Mark 1:17). See Fishing.

FISH GATE (Heb. sha‘ar haddāgîm, “gate of the fishes”). The name (2 Chron. 33:14; Neh. 3:3; 12:39) of one of the gates of Jerusalem (which see). It probably took its name from the fact of fish being brought through it on the way to the city, or from the fish market being located near it. See also Gate.

FISHHOOK.

1. The prophet Amos (4:2), in denouncing the voluptuous grandees of Samaria, predicted that God “will take you away with meat hooks, and the last of you with fish hooks.” The reference is undoubtedly to the practice of Egyptians, Assyrians, and other ancient conquerors of putting fishhooks in the lips of captives (see 2 Chron. 33:11, RV marg.).

2. A ring placed in the mouth of fish and attached to a cord to keep them alive in the water (Job 41:1–2). See Fishing.

FISHING. This trade has always been an industry pursued by a large number of people in Palestine. They are exceedingly fond of fish and pay double to triple the price for it that they do for meat. Several methods of taking fish are mentioned in the Bible: (1) Angling with a hook, also called casting a line (Isa. 19:8; Hab. 1:15; Job 41:1; Amos 4:2). (2) Spearing (Job 41:7). In this passage the reference is to the crocodile, but it is included under the generic idea of fish as conceived by the Hebrew mind, i.e., a creature living more or less in the water. (3) Netting. They used the cast net (Ezek. 26:5, 14; 32:3; 47:10; Hab. 1:15, 17; Mic. 7:2; Eccles. 7:26; Matt. 4:18–21; Mark 1:16–19; etc.). This consists of a net with fine mesh and of a circular form, about fifteen feet in diameter. The margin is loaded with leaden sinkers. To the center of the net is attached a long piece of fishline. This is held in the left hand, while the net, which has been previously gathered up in the right, is cast by a broad sweep of the arm over an area of the shallow water close to the shore, where the fisherman has previously observed a school of fish. The center of the net is now drawn up by means of the cord, and the fisherman wades into the water and secures the catch. The seine is also used. Half of it is loaded into one boat and the other half in another, and the boats then separate, playing out the net as they go and enclosing a vast area of the water. When all the net has been played out the boats draw it toward the shore and land the ends of the net. The two crews then commence to draw in their respective ends, thus enclosing the fish and gradually landing them (Matt. 13:48). At other times the two boats enclose a circle in the water and draw the fish into the boats (Luke 5:4–9). The seine is also mentioned in the OT (Isa. 19:8; Hab. 1:15). Four of Christ's twelve disciples were fishermen. Christ promised them that they should become fishers of men (Mark 1:17; etc.). G.E.P.

FITCHES. A KJV term, replaced in the NASB and NIV by cummin (Heb. qeṣah, “black cummin”; Isa. 28:25, 27) and spelt (Heb. küssemet; Ezek. 4:9). See Vegetable Kingdom: Cummin; Spelt.

FLAG. See Standard.

FLAG. See Vegetable Kingdom: Reeds and Rushes.

FLAGONS. A KJV term rendered “jars” (Heb. nēbel; Isa. 22:24) or “raisin cakes” (Heb. āshîshâ; 2 Sam. 6:19; song of Sol. 2:5; Hos. 3:1) in the NASB and NIV.

FLAKE. See Folds.

FLAME. In Job 18:5 it is predicted that “the light of the wicked goes out, and the flame [Heb. shābîb, “flame”] of his fire gives no light.” Flame here probably refers to the lamp hanging in the tent (cf. 21:17; 29:3). See also Fire.

FLANK. The translation of two Heb. terms, yarqâ (Gen. 49:13; “border” in NIV) and kātēp (Ezek. 25:9), referring to the far or side border or boundary of a territory. Rarely, in the KJV, it is the term for the internal muscles of the loins near the kidneys (see Loins).

FLASK (Heb. pak, 2 Kings 9:1, 3; Gk. alabastron, Mark 14:3). Used for holding oil or perfumery. The KJV uses “box of oil” or “box of ointment,” whereas the NASB rendering is “flask of oil” or “vial of ... ointment,” and the NIV, “alabaster jar” (see Mark 14:3). First Sam. 10:1, KJV, uses “vial.”

FLAT NOSE. See Diseases: Disfigured Face.

FLAX. See articles Dress; Linen; Vegetable Kingdom: Flax.

FLEA. See Animal Kingdom.

FLEECE (Heb. gēz, “sheared,” Job. 31:20; cf. Deut. 18:4). The wool of a sheep, whether on the living animal, shorn off, or attached to the flayed skin. The miracle of Gideon's fleece (Judg. 6:37–40) consisted of the dew having fallen one time upon the fleece, without any on the floor, whereas at another time the fleece remained dry while the ground was wet with dew.

FLEET (Heb. šōnî, “conveyance”; 1 Kings 9:26–27; etc.). Solomon built the Hebrew navy (merchant marine) with the help of Hiram king of Tyre. See Ezion-geber; Ship. H.F.V.

FLESH. This word has various meanings, as follows: (1) In a general sense of the whole animal creation, man or beast (Gen. 6:13, 17, 19; 7:15–16, 21; 8:17; Matt. 24:22, marg.; 1 Pet. 1:24). (2) Of the flesh of the living body, both of men and beasts (Gen. 41:2, 19, marg.; Job 33:21; 1 Cor. 15:39); and as distinguished from other parts of the body, e.g., from bones (Luke 24:39). (3) In the sense of our word meat, i.e., the flesh of cattle used for food (Lev. 7:19; cf. Ex. 16:12; Num. 11:4, 13, marg.; see Food). (4) The body as distinguished from the spirit (Job 14:22, marg.; 19:26; John 6:52; 1 Cor. 5:5; 2 Cor. 4:11; 7:1; 1 Pet. 4:6); so also “flesh and blood” was used as a longer phrase for the whole animal nature or mankind (Heb. 2:14). (5) Human nature, mankind (Gen. 2:23; Matt. 19:5–6; 1 Cor. 6:16; Eph. 5:28–31); also of the incarnation of Christ (John 1:14; 6:51; Rom. 1:3; Eph. 2:15; Col. 1:22; Heb. 5:7; 10:20; etc.). (6) Natural or physical origin, generation, relationship (Gen. 29:14; 37:27; Judg. 9:2; 2 Sam. 5:1; 19:13; John 1:13; Rom. 9:8; Heb. 2:11–14; 12:9, marg.); of one’s countryman (Rom. 9:3; 11:14, marg.; Gal. 4:23); a fellowmortal (Isa. 58:7). (7) The sensuous nature of man, “the animal nature,” without any suggestion of depravity, sexual desire (John 1:13; NIV, “human decision”); with cravings that excite to sin (Matt. 26:41; Mark 14:38; NIV, “body”). (8) Mere human nature, the earthly nature of man apart from divine influence and therefore prone to sin and opposed to God; accordingly it includes in the soul whatever is weak, low, debased, tending to ungodliness and vice (see Rom. 8:3, 5–9; 2 Cor. 7:5; Gal. 5:16; Eph. 2:3). The NIV usually renders “the sinful nature” in such uses. (9) As a modest, general term for the secret parts (Gen. 17:11; Ex. 28:42; Lev. 15:2–3, 7, 16, 19, marg.; 2 Pet. 2:10; Jude 7). See Food.

FLESH AND BLOOD. An expression denoting man as fallible, liable to err (Matt. 16:17; Gal. 1:16; Eph. 6:12).

FLESHHOOK (Heb. mizlāgâ; Ex. 27:3; 38:3; Num. 4:14; 1 Chron. 28:17; 2 Chron. 4:16). An instrument used in sacrificial services; probably a fork (which see; so NASB and NIV), with its tines bent back to draw away the flesh. The implement in 1 Sam. 2:13–14 (Heb. mazlēg) is stated to be three-pronged and was apparently a fork used for sacrificial purposes.

FLOCK.

Figurative. In addition to the usual sense of sheep (see Animal Kingdom), taken collectively the term is applied both to Israel as a nation in covenant relation to Jehovah as well as to the NT church (Isa. 40:11; Matt. 26:31; Luke 12:32; 1 Pet. 5:2–3). “Flock doomed to slaughter” (Zech. 11:4) is an expression that may be applied either to a flock that is being slaughtered or to one that is destined to be slaughtered in the future. From v. 11 Israel is the flock referred to, not the human race. “Israel was given up by Jehovah into the hands of the nations or imperial powers to punish it for its sin. But as these nations abused the power intrusted to them and sought utterly to destroy the nation of God, which they ought only to have chastised, the Lord takes charge of his people as their shepherd” (K. & D., Com., ad loc.).

FLOOD, or Deluge. The account of this phenomenal world-engulfing event is recounted in Gen. 6–9. It comprehends the bulk of space given by divine revelation to the events in the early redemptive history of man, eclipsing even the space given to the creation and the Fall.

The Bible Account. The historical recital in Genesis pointedly sets forth the wickedness of man as the cause of the Flood (6:5–7, 11–13); Noah’s building of an ark in which he and his family were to be saved during the coming flood; the entrance of Noah, his family, and the animals into the ark; and God’s deliverance from the catastrophe because of Noah’s righteousness. Isaiah 54:9 refers to the Flood as “the waters of Noah.” Jesus put His sanction upon the historicity of the event (Matt. 24:37–39; Luke 17:26–27). Peter spoke of “the patience of God kept waiting in the days of Noah, during the construction of the ark, in which a few, that is, eight persons, were brought safely through the water” (1 Pet. 3:20) and cites it as an example of God’s righteous judgment (2 Pet. 2:5). The Flood events are outlined in table 10, “The Biblical Account of the Flood.”

The Biblical Account of the Flood

Event	Genesis
Noah, in his six hundredth year, enters the ark with his family and the animals	7:1–9
The rain begins on seventeenth of second month and lasts forty days	7:10–17
The rain ceases; the waters prevail	7:18–24
The ark rests on Ararat, seventeenth day of seventh month	8:1–4
Peaks of mountains visible, first day of tenth month	8:5
Raven and dove sent out	8:6–9
Dove sent out again seven days after and returns with olive branch	8:10–11
Dove sent out the third time, after seven days, and does not return	8:12
Ground becomes dry, six hundred and first year, first month and first day; covering of the ark removed	8:13
Noah leaves the ark, second month, twenty–seventh day	8:14–19

Primitive Tradition of a Flood. The tradition of the Flood was persistent among ancient oriental peoples. In lower Mesopotamia, the ancestral home of Abraham, the Flood was well remembered as a great catastrophe in human history and was preserved through oral tradition and upon cuneiform tablets. The Sumerian King List (see Thorkild Jacobsen, The Sumerian King List, Assyriological Studies, vol. 11 [1939]), after recording eight antediluvian kings, interrupts the sequence with the following significant statement before proceeding to the postdiluvian rulers: “[Then] the Flood swept over [the earth]. After the flood had swept over [the earth] and when kingship was lowered [again] from heaven kingship was [first] in Kish.”

(See A. Leo Oppenheim, in Ancient Near Eastern Texts [1950], p. 265.) In ancient times the Tigris-Euphrates valley was subject to frequent floods when these great rivers overflowed their banks. Evidence of a flood at Ur and at Kish has been construed as pointing to the biblical Deluge. But the flood at Ur dates to early in the fourth millennium B.C., the one at Kish about 2800 B.C. Moreover, a flood at Fara (halfway between Ur and Babylon) dated well before 3000 B.C.; and no evidence of a flood turned up at Obeid, four miles from Ur. According to the scriptural representations the Flood was a worldwide catastrophe.

The Sumerian Account of the Flood. The oldest version of the Flood is the Sumerian record on a cuneiform tablet from ancient Nippur in north central Babylonia dating before the second millennium B.C. The third column on the tablet introduces the Flood. The Flood hero is named Ziusudra, a king-priest. The next column portrays Ziusudra receiving a communication from the gods. In column five the deluge has broken upon the world, and the hero is riding in a huge boat:

When for seven days and seven nights
The flood had raged over the land
And the huge boat had been tossed on the great waters by the storms,
The sun god arose shedding light in heaven and on earth.
Ziusudra made an opening in the side of the great ship.
Before the sun god he bowed his face to the ground.
The king slaughtered an ox, sheep he sacrificed in great numbers.

(J. Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past [1946], p. 27.) In the last column Ziusudra is immortalized and conducted to a paradise called “the Mountain of Dilmun.”

The Babylonian Account of the Flood. This account constitutes the eleventh book of the Assyro-Babylonian epic of Gilgamesh. These tablets were unearthed at ancient Nineveh in 1853 by H. Rassam. Not until 1872 were they deciphered and recognized as a startling extrabiblical account of the Flood. The Flood account as contained in the Gilgamesh epic offers the most striking and detailed similarity to Gen. 6–8. Ziusudra, the Sumerian Noah, appears as Utnapishtim, “day of life.” Gilgamesh, a demi-god and king of Uruk (biblical Erech, 10:10), in search of the secret of immortality, finds the immortalized Flood hero Utnapishtim. In explaining the secret of his immortality, he recounts the cause of it as his passing through the experience of the Flood and being given eternal life as a result. In Utnapishtim’s account the gods determine to destroy the earth by a deluge. According to divine directions the Babylonian hero constructs an enormous boat in the form of a cube, pitching it with bitumen inside and out, and taking aboard gold, silver, his family, craftsmen, beasts of the field, and a boatman. The fierce storm is pictured as “gathering with the first glow of dawn.” Adad, the god of tempest and rain, roared. The Annunaki gods lifted up their torches, emblazoning the land with lightning flashes:

The gods were frightened by the deluge,
And shrinking back they ascended to the heavens of Anu.
The gods crouched like dogs. (11, lines 113–15)

At the terrible decimation of human life the gods wept. Six days and six nights the storm raged; on the seventh day the Flood ceased. The Babylonian hero looked out from the boat and surveyed the catastrophic scene:

I looked at the weather: stillness had set in,
And all mankind had turned to clay.
The landscape was as level as a flat roof.
I opened a hatch, and light fell upon my face.
Bowing low, I sat and wept,
Tears running down on my face. (lines 132–37)

The poem tells how the ship landed on Mt. Nisir, commonly identified with Pir Omar Gudrun in the mountain country E of ancient Assyria, a peak of about nine thousand feet. As Mt.

Nisir held the ship captive, the Babylonian hero sent out birds:

When the seventh day arrived,

I sent forth and set free a dove

The dove went forth, but came back;

There was no resting place and she turned round.

Then I sent forth and set free a swallow,

The swallow went forth, but came back;

There was no resting place for it and she turned round.

Then I sent forth and set free a raven.

The raven went forth and, seeing that the waters had diminished,

He eats, circles, caws, and turns not round.

Then I let out [all] to the four winds and offered a sacrifice. (lines 145–55)

When sacrifices were offered to the gods,

The gods smelled the savor,

The gods smelled the sweet savor,

The gods crowded like flies about the sacrificer. (lines 156–61)

The account ends with the gods engaged in altercation concerning the responsibility of the Flood and with Utnapishtim and his wife being immortalized.

Hitherto Utnapishtim has been but human.

Henceforth Utnapishtim and his wife shall be like unto us gods.

Utnapishtim shall reside far away, at the mouth of the rivers!

A Comparison of Biblical and Babylonian Accounts. Scholars have given much attention to the similarities and differences in the biblical and the Babylonian accounts of the Flood.

The Resemblances. The two accounts are similar on a number of points. (1) Both accounts represent the Flood as definitely planned: by the one true God in Genesis; by numerous quarreling deities in the Babylonian version, who childishly disclaim responsibility when they see the terrific havoc being wrought. (2) In each case the judgment is revealed to the Flood hero. (3) Both accounts set forth deflection in the human race as the cause. In the Genesis account it is the outrageous sin of the antediluvians and has no blurred moral element. In the Babylonian account the moral element is blurred as a consequence of a complete lack of sin or distinction between the righteous and unrighteous. (4) In each case the hero is delivered with his family and with animals, although the number surviving in the Babylonian account is larger than in the biblical account. (5) A huge boat appears in both cases, the Babylonian vessel having a displacement about five times that of Noah's ark. Both are pitched to make them watertight. (6) Both stories indicate physical causes of the catastrophe. Violent winds, rain, and electrical storms constitute the causes in the pagan account. In the Genesis account nothing short of a globe-encircling catastrophe is indicated. "All the fountains of the great deep burst open, and the floodgates of the sky were opened" (Gen. 7:11). This can only mean lowering the mountainous regions and raising of ocean beds in violent shiftings of the earth's crust. The openings of the "floodgates of the sky" seem to indicate a complete atmospheric change, signified by the rainbow (9:13). Prior to the Flood atmospheric rain is not recorded (cf. 2:5–6). The huge sources of water seemingly came from large subterranean springs and from the condensation of a huge vapor mist that covered the earth instead of clouds. Second Pet. 3:6 disputes any contention that the Bible presents the Flood as merely local, no matter what geological, astronomical, or other difficulties such a representation may offer. (7) The account of the duration of the Flood is given in both stories—a total of 371 days in the biblical account; only 6 days in the Babylonian. Both give similar striking details that are almost sensational. The sending out of the birds and the landing of the ship on a mountain are examples. The Bible account specifies “the mountains of Ararat” (Gen. 8:4). The name is identical with the Assyrian name Urartu, denoting the general mountainous territory of Armenia, N of Assyria (cf. 2 Kings 19:37; Isa. 37:38; Jer. 51:27). The landing of the Babylonian boat was on Mt. Nisir, E of Assyria. The biblical account of sending out of birds, with a raven sent out first and a dove released on three occasions, is much more reasonable than the sending out of a dove first, a swallow second, and finally a raven. The raven normally would be sent out first since it is a flesh-eating bird and can withstand inclement weather. (8) In both cases the hero worships after his deliverance. Utnapishtim offers sacrifice and pours out a libation, burning “sweet cane, cedar and myrtle.” Noah similarly offers burnt offerings. In both cases the deity “smelled” the soothing fragrance (Gen. 8:21). (9) Both heroes are recipients of special blessings after the catastrophe. Divinity and immortality are granted Utnapishtim and his wife. Noah is blessed with the power of multiplying and replenishing the earth and to exercise dominion over the animals, originally given at creation. He is given reassurance that there will never again be a flood of such proportions.

The Differences. Despite the startling similarity between the biblical and Babylonian accounts of the Flood, the underlying differences are much more significant and fundamental. (1) The two accounts are completely different in their theological concepts. The chaste monotheism of Genesis elevates every aspect of the Flood story. In contrast, the crass polytheism of the cuneiform accounts discredits the Babylonian story at every turn. Whereas the Genesis account attributes the Flood to the one infinitely powerful and holy God, the Babylonian tradition comprehends a crowd of quarreling, disagreeing, self-accusing deities who either crouch in fear “like dogs” or “swarm like flies” around the sacrifice offered by the Flood hero. (2) The two accounts are poles apart in their moral concepts. The ethical element in the cuneiform story is completely blurred with hazy views of sin. The cause of the Flood is entirely confused, and the justice of it compromised. The whole episode is more the result of the caprice of the gods than a necessary punishment for sin. As a result, the ethical and didactic value of these stories is greatly depreciated. In contrast, the solid morality of the biblical account gives the Genesis story the highest didactic and spiritual value. (3) The two accounts differ in their philosophic concepts. The Babylonian account hopelessly confuses spirit and matter and makes both eternal. The causation is attributed to a multitude of deities. Thunder is Adad, the god of storm and rain, in action. It is Ninurta, the god of winds and irrigation, that causes the dikes to give way. Lightning is the activity of the Annunaki, judges of the underworld, who “raise their torches,” illuminating the land. The picture of the one supreme God as Creator and Sustainer of all, who controls all the phenomena of His creation, is in striking contrast.

Explanation of the Similarities. The most widely accepted explanation is that the Hebrew borrowed from the Babylonian account. To the conservative student, this is incredible. The unsurpassed loftiness of the monotheistic account in the light of the utter crudity of the Babylonian tradition renders this view not only extremely unlikely but practically impossible, especially as the theory cannot be proved. It is also extremely unlikely that the Babylonians borrowed from the Hebrew, inasmuch as the earliest known tablets are considerably older than the book of Genesis, upon any consideration of the date of the latter. It is possible, however, that the Hebrew account may have been current in some form or other centuries before it assumed its present form. The likely explanation is that both the Hebrew and Babylonian accounts go back to a common source of fact, which originated in an actual occurrence. The Flood occurred sometime long before 4000 B.C. The memory of this great event persisted in tradition. The Babylonians received it in a completely corrupted and distorted form. Genesis portrays it as it actually occurred, and as the Spirit of God gave it to meet special needs in the history of redemption. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

FLOOR. A level, or open area, such as the place or square near the gates of oriental cities (1 Kings 22:10; 2 Chron. 18:9; KJV, “void place” in both passages). See House; Threshing Floor.

FLOUR. Ground grain used for making bread, the support of life in the ancient world. At first barley alone was ground, but afterward wheat, as only the poor used barley. As to the method of making flour, both mortars and mills were employed. See Bread; Mills. Fine flour was presented in connection with sacrifices in general, and by the poor as a sin offering (Lev. 5:11–13).

FLOWER, FLOWERS. Several Heb. terms are translated “flower” or “flowers” in the KJV, NIV, and NASB. The Heb. term applied to the floral ornaments on the golden lampstand (Ex. 25:31–36; 37:17–22) and to the artificial lily ornaments around the edge of the laver (“molten sea,” KJV) in Solomon’s Temple (1 Kings 7:26; 2 Chron. 4:5) is Heb. perah (lit., “blossom”). In the KJV of the passages mentioned, the Heb. term is rendered by “flowers” and “flowers of lilies.” In the NASB the rendering is “flowers” and “blossom,” as in “lily blossom.” In the NIV it is “lily blossom” in both places. The term is distinct from KJV “knop,” NASB, “bulb.” See Laver; Sea, Bronze; Tabernacle of Israel.

For the flower as a plant, see Vegetable Kingdom.

Figurative. Flowers, from their speedy decay, are representative of the shortness of human life (Job 14:2; Ps. 103:15; 1 Pet. 1:24); the speedy downfall of the kingdom of Israel (Isa. 28:1); and the sudden departure of the rich (James 1:10–11).

FLY. See Animal Kingdom.

FOAL. A donkey’s colt (Gen. 49:11; Zech. 9:9; Matt. 21:5). See Animal Kingdom: Donkey; Horse.

FODDER (Heb. mispô, “collected”; Gen. 42:27; 43:24; Judg. 19:19, 21; Isa. 30:24; “provender,” KJV). In the account of King Solomon’s stables (1 Kings 4:28) we read, “They also brought barley and straw for the horses and swift steeds,” etc. Barley seems to have been the ordinary food of cattle in Palestine and the southern lands, where oats are not cultivated. As they make little hay in these countries, they are careful with their straw, which they cut up fine and mix with barley and beans. Balls made of bean and barley meal, or of pounded kernels of dates, are fed. The “salted fodder” (“provender,” KJV) mentioned in Isa. 30:24 was a mash (composed of barley and vetches, or things of that kind) made more savory with salt and sour vegetables. According to Wetzstein, it is ripe barley mixed with salt or salt vegetables.

The original word properly signifies a mixture (Job 24:5; Isa. 30:24).

FOLDS. The dewlaps or flabby parts in the belly of the crocodile or “Leviathan” (Job 41:23), which are firmly attached to the body and do not hang loosely as on the ox. KJV renders “flake.”

FOLLOWER. See Imitator.

FOLLY. Silliness (see Prov. 5:23; etc.); emptiness (see Gen. 34:7, KJV; “disgraceful thing,” NIV); and many others (Job 24:12; Ps. 85:8; Eccles. 2:3; 2 Tim. 3:9). In Jer. 23:13, an “offensive thing” (NASB; “folly,” KJV; “repulsive thing,” NIV). As a word in common use, folly is a weak or absurd act, and foolishness is a want of wisdom or judgment.

FOOD. Represented in the original by several Heb. and Gk. words.

In Early Times. The articles of food used by men are determined largely by the products of the country that they inhabit and change with the growth of culture. At first men lived upon roots, vegetables, and the fruit of trees, all of which articles were known by the general name of food (Heb. lehem, Gen. 1:29; 2:16). It was not until after the Flood that God allowed man the use of the flesh of animals (9:3), but it is probable that the Cainite Jabal, “the father of those who dwell in tents and have livestock” (4:20), used not only the milk and wool obtained from the herd but also ate of the flesh of the cattle. That before the Flood the flesh of animals was converted into food may be inferred from the division of animals into clean and unclean (7:8), and after the Flood it is expressly mentioned that animals were slain for food (9:3–4).

In the Patriarchal Age. The flesh of animals, both tame and wild, was eaten. Leguminous food (i.e., beans, peas, etc.) was used, and a preparation of lentils (which see) seems to have been a common and favorite dish (Gen. 25:34). Use was also made of honey, spices, and nuts (43:11). As early as the time of Abraham the art of preparing bread was carried to some degree of perfection.

Among the Egyptians. The Egyptians had a great variety of foods, and their wall paintings reveal much concerning the manner of eating. Genesis 40 tells of an occasion when the king elevated his chief butler and baker. The plentiful foods served at a typical palace banquet included fowl, fish of all sorts, barley beer, and elaborate condiments. Huge jars of wine were brought in, and guests were given bent glass tubes that they dipped directly into the jars. Both men and women attended feasts. Male guests were clean shaven; they wore white banquet garments, and elaborate jewels around their necks. The women wore long white gowns of transparent fineness with exquisite jewelry. Paintings of the city of Akhetaton, built c. 1387–1366 B.C., show us the king and his wife Nofretete and his three young daughters feasting in their wide banqueting hall. Fragrant garlands hanging from pillars added to the festal scene. Slaves waved ivory-handled ostrich fans to cool the heated atmosphere of the Egyptian evening. The banqueting table was attractively arranged with bright cushioned chairs.

Among the Mesopotamians. The lower Mesopotamian region offered many species of legumes to choose from. Beans, lentils, peas, kidney beans, onions, cucumbers, eggplants, pumpkins, and wheat and barley were considered indigenous. The date palm and other fruit trees abounded. An early Babylonian domestic scene portrays a mother from Ur feeding a bunch of the famous Euphrates dates to her baby on her knee. One of the earliest banquet scenes that exists is recorded on a tiny lapis lazuli cylinder seal in the museum of the University of Pennsylvania. This interesting art object, executed c. 3000 B.C., depicts a banquet of the now-famous Queen Puabi. Fleece-skirted domestics dispense goblets of wine to guests seated on small stools. Other palace servants wave fans. A musician stands on one side performing on a harp (M. S. and J. Lane Miller, Encyclopedia of Bible Life [1944], pp. 229–319).

Among the Israelites. While in Egypt the Israelites shared in the abundance of that land, where they “sat by the pots of meat” and “ate bread to the full” (Ex. 16:3); and they recalled in the wilderness with regret and murmuring the fish, the cucumbers, the melons, the leeks, the onions, and the garlic (Num. 11:5).

Articles Prohibited. Animals as food was limited by the Mosaic law: (1) By the primeval distinction between clean and unclean, the following were forbidden to be used as food: quadrupeds that do not chew the cud or have cloven feet (Lev. 11:4–8; Deut. 14:7–8); fish without scales and fins, e.g., eels and all shellfish (Lev. 11:9–12); birds of prey and such as feed upon worms and rotting flesh (11:13–19); serpents and creeping insects; insects that sometimes fly and sometimes go upon their feet, with the exception of some of the locust kind (11:20–24, 42). (2) By the sacrificial ordinances was forbidden the eating of all blood of cattle and birds and bloody flesh (Lev. 3:17; 7:26; 17:10–14; Deut. 12:16, 23; cf. Gen. 9:4; 1 Sam. 14:32–34); the fatty portions that, in the sacrifice of oxen, sheep, and goats, were burned upon the altar (Lev. 3:17; 7:23, 25); also everything consecrated to idols (Ex. 34:15). (3) For sanitary reasons, doubtless, the following was forbidden as food: the flesh of cattle that had fallen down dead or had been torn by wild beasts (Ex. 22:31; Lev. 11:39–40; Deut. 14:21) as well as food prepared with water on which the dead body of an unclean insect had fallen (Lev. 11:31, 33–34); also all food and liquids remaining in an uncovered vessel in the tent or chamber of a dying or dead man (Num. 19:14–15). In addition, it was forbidden to “boil a kid in the milk of its mother” (Ex. 23:19; 34:26; Deut. 14:21). The reason for this is that the Canaanites may have employed such a practice in one of their sacred rituals. Besides these, according to ancient tradition, the Israelites, perhaps from a feeling of reverence, denied themselves the use of the sinew of the hip (Gen. 32:32).

Articles Allowed. These were partly vegetable and partly animal, with salt for seasoning. Grain formed the chief nourishment, especially wheat kernels roasted in the fire—still a favorite food in Palestine, Syria, and Egypt. It was also frequently baked into bread. Milk was an article of daily food—not only the milk of cows but also of sheep and goats (Deut. 32:14; Prov. 27:27), sometimes sweet, sometimes sour, thick, or curdled. The latter still forms, after bread, the chief food of the poorer classes in Arabia and Syria, and it appears on the tables of well-to-do persons. The Israelites, no doubt, prepared cheese of different kinds, and likely butter (30:33). Also used was the honey of bees; perhaps also grape honey (sweet grapes boiled to a syrup) and wood honey of wild bees (1 Sam. 14:25; Matt. 3:4), in which Palestine was rich; also raisins, dried figs (25:18), date cakes (2 Sam. 16:1), and various fresh fruits. Of vegetables those chiefly used were pulse, lentils, and beans, with onions, garlic, and cucumbers; also green herbs—sometimes raised in gardens (1 Kings 21:2), sometimes growing in the fields (Prov. 15:17). Animal food—the flesh of oxen, sheep, and goats—ranks first, although the flesh of calves, lambs, and kids was greatly prized; perhaps, also, that of pigeons and turtledoves. The rich had upon their tables deer, gazelle, roebuck, and various kinds of winged game (1 Kings 4:23; Neh. 5:18). Fish were supplied in great abundance from the lake of Gennesaret (John 21:11; cf. Matt. 14:17; 15:34), whereas in earlier times the Phoenicians brought fish to Jerusalem from the sea (Neh. 13:16). Locusts were eaten by the poorer people (Lev. 11:22; Matt. 3:4; Mark 1:6); sometimes salted and roasted (or fried), sometimes boiled in water and buttered.

Preparation of Food. Grain was eaten at first without any preparation, and the custom of eating it thus had not entirely disappeared in the time of Christ (Matt. 12:1). After the uses of fire were known, grain was parched. Later the introduction of the mortar and mill furnished flour, which was made into bread (which see). As to the preparation of vegetables and flesh, we learn that as early as the time of Isaac it was customary to prepare soup of lentils (Gen. 25:29, 34) and flesh (27:9, 14). Vegetables, pulse, and herbs were cooked in pots (2 Kings 4:38–39; cf. Num. 11:8; Judg. 6:19; 1 Sam. 2:14) and seasoned with oil. Roasting on a spit was perhaps the oldest way of cooking flesh but less common among the Israelites than boiling. Roast flesh was used only by the rich and better classes (2:15), as is still the case in the East. When cooked in pots (2:14; 2 Chron. 35:13), it was lifted out with a three-pronged fork and brought to the table with the broth (Judg. 6:19). All the flesh of the slain animal, owing to the difficulty of keeping it in warm climates, was cooked at once. The Israelites seem to have boiled the flesh of young animals in milk. Locusts were frequently roasted, as they still are in the East. "Their wings and feet are taken off and their intestines extracted; they are salted, fixed upon a sharp piece of wood, placed over the fire, and at length eaten. They are likewise prepared by boiling them. Sometimes they are salted and preserved in bottles and, as occasion requires, are cut in pieces and eaten" (Lev. 11:22; Matt. 3:4). Salt (which see) was anciently used (Num. 18:19; 2 Chron. 13:5). In most ancient times the animal was killed by the master of the house, and the cooking was done by his wife (Gen. 18:2-6) with the help of female slaves. In the houses of the upper classes there were also special cooks (1 Sam. 9:23-24) and in the larger cities bakers (Hos. 7:4).

Meals. Besides a simple breakfast the Israelites had two daily meals; at midday (Gen. 18:1-8; 43:16, 25; Ruth 2:14; 1 Kings 20:16) and their principal meal at about six or seven in the evening (Gen. 19:1-3; Ruth 3:7). They were accustomed to wash their hands both before and after eating (Matt. 15:2; Mark 7:2-3; Luke 11:38), because food was lifted to the mouth with the fingers (see Washing). Prayers were also offered (1 Sam. 9:13). In the older times it was the custom to sit at the table (Gen. 27:19; Judg. 19:6; 1 Sam. 20:5, 24; 1 Kings 13:19-20), but later it was usual to recline upon cushions or divans. The food was taken to the mouth with the right hand, a custom still prevalent in the East (Ruth 2:14; Prov. 26:15; John 13:26). See Banquet; Drink.

FOOL. Represented by a large number of Heb. and Gk. words. The word is used in Scripture with respect to moral more than to intellectual deficiencies. The "fool" is not so much one lacking in mental powers, as one who misuses them; not one who does not reason, but reasons wrongly. In Scripture the "fool" primarily is the person who casts off the fear of God and thinks and acts as if he could safely disregard the eternal principles of God's righteousness (Ps. 14:1; Prov. 14:9; Jer. 17:11; etc.). Yet in many passages, especially in Proverbs, the term has its ordinary use and denotes one who is rash, senseless, or unreasonable. The expression "you fool" (Matt. 5:22) is used in the moral sense, means "wicked," and seems to be equivalent to judging one as worthy of everlasting punishment. See Folly.

FOOLISHNESS. See Folly; Fool.

FOOT. The word feet is sometimes used in Scripture for the sake of delicacy, to express the parts and the acts that it was not allowed to name. Hence, "the hair of the feet," "to open the feet," etc. In the KJV "to cover the feet" (1 Sam 24:3; Judg. 3:24, see marg.) is a euphemism for performing the necessities of nature, as it is the custom in the East to cover the feet. The Jews neglected the feet and bared them in affliction (2 Sam. 15:30; 19:24; Ezek. 24:17); stamped them on the ground in extreme joy or grief (6:11; 25:6); showed respect by falling at the feet (1 Sam. 25:24; 2 Kings 4:37; Esther 8:3; Mark 5:22), showed reverence by kissing another's feet (Luke 7:38), showed subjection by licking the dust from the foot (Isa. 49:23); whereas the subjugation of enemies was expressed by placing the foot on their necks (Josh. 10:24; Ps. 110:1). The feet of enemies were sometimes cut off or maimed (Judg. 1:6-7; 2 Sam. 4:12). Uncovering the feet was a mark of adoration (Ex. 3:5).

Figurative. "To be at any one's feet" is used for being at the service of another, following him, or receiving his instruction (Judg. 4:10; Acts 22:3, see marg.). The last passage, in which Paul is described as being brought up "at the feet of Gamaliel" (KJV; NIV, "under Gamaliel") will appear still clearer if we understand that, as the Jewish writers allege, pupils actually did sit on the floor before, and, therefore, at the feet of, the doctors of the law, who themselves occupied an elevated seat. “He set my feet upon a rock” (Ps. 40:2) expresses the idea of stability. “Thou has set my feet in a large place” (31:8) denotes liberty. “Slipping” of the feet is figurative for yielding to temptation (Job 12:5; Pss. 17:5; 38:16; 94:18).

“Trampling” under foot (Isa. 26:6; Lam. 1:15) implies complete destruction. To “dip” or “bathe” one’s feet in oil or butter (Deut. 33:24; Job 29:6) is to possess abundance; to “shatter them in blood” (Ps. 68:23), of victory. To keep “the feet of His godly ones” (1 Sam. 2:9) is to preserve them from stumbling. To “set” one’s foot in a place signifies to take possession (Deut. 1:36; 11:24). “Water it with your foot” (11:10) refers to irrigation, which was effected by foot pumps and by turning the small streams of the garden with the foot. A striking phrase, borrowed from the feet, is used by Paul (Gal. 2:14): “When I saw that they were not straightforward”; literally, walking “with a straight foot.”

FOOTMAN. Employed in the KJV in two senses: (1) as a military term for the infantry in the army (which see), and (2) in the special sense of a runner (which see).

FOOTSTEPS. Footprints are held to be indicative of one’s character, their direction a proof of his tendencies. Therefore to watch one’s footsteps is to seek a cause for accusation (Ps. 17:5, 11, KJV).

FOOTSTOOL (Heb. kebesh, sometimes “trodden” upon). An article of furniture used to support the feet when sitting in state, as upon a throne (2 Chron. 9:18). The divine glory that resided symbolically between the cherubim above the Ark of the Covenant is supposed to use the Ark as a footstool (1 Chron. 28:2; Pss. 99:5; 132:7). The earth is called God’s footstool by the same expressive figure that represents heaven as His throne (110:1; Isa 66:1; Matt. 5:35).

FOOT WASHING. See Ablution.

FORBEARANCE (Gk. anochē, a “holding back, delaying,” Rom. 2:4; 3:25). “The forbearance of God and his long suffering—the two terms exhausting the one idea—denote the disposition of God, in accordance with which he indulgently tolerates sins and delays their punishment” (Meyer, Com., ad loc.). Philippians 4:5 mentions a “forbearing spirit” (Gk. epieikēs), elsewhere rendered “gentle.”

FORCED LABOR (Heb. mâs, a “consuming”). Spoken mostly of tribute to be paid in service (1 Kings 9:21), a condition of serfdom (Josh. 16:10; 17:13; Judg. 1:28). Thus we see that Adoram was appointed overseer over the tributary service in the time of Solomon (2 Sam. 20:24; 1 Kings 4:6). The KJV renders this concept as “tribute.”

FORCES (Heb., specially ḥayil, “strength”). In a military point of view it is applied to army, fortifications, etc. In Isa. 60:5, 11, KJV, the phrase “forces of the Gentiles” seems to be used in its widest sense to denote not only the subjugation of the heathen but also the consecration of their wealth (the NASB renders “wealth of the nations,” and the NIV, “riches of the nations”).

FORD. A shallow place in a river or other body of water that may be crossed on foot or by wading (Gen. 32:22; Josh. 2:7; Judg. 3:28; 12:5–6; Isa. 16:2). The fords of the Jordan are frequently mentioned. A little above the Dead Sea two fords cross the Jordan near Jericho, passable most of the year, connecting roads from the Judean hills with highways from Gilead and Moab. The passage from Samaria into Gilead was made easy by an extraordinary number of fords through the Jordan. The depth of the Jordan fords varies from three feet to as much as ten or twelve. Mention is also made of the ford of the Jabbok (Gen. 32:22) and of the Arnon (Isa. 16:2). The “fords” (Jer. 51:32) of the Euphrates “are not merely those over the main river, but also those over the canals cut from it to add strength, whether fords, ferries, or light wooden bridges, which must have existed alongside the one stone bridge over the river for purposes of intercourse” (Orelli, Com., ad loc.).

FOREHEAD (Heb. mēšah, to “shine”). The practice of veiling the face in public for women of the higher classes—especially married women—in the East, sufficiently stigmatizes with reproach the unveiled faces of women of bad character (Gen. 24:65; Jer. 3:3). Reference is made to this when Israel is called “stubborn” (lit., “of a hard forehead,” see marg.), whereas courage is promised to the prophet when Jehovah says, “I have made your face as hard as their faces” (Ezek. 3:7–8). The custom among many oriental nations both of coloring the face and of impressing on the body marks indicative of devotion to some special deity or religious sect is mentioned by various writers. In Ezekiel (9:4–6) we read that the Heb. letter ך (in early times made in the form of a cross) should be placed upon the forehead of those who mourned the abominations of Israel, that they might be spared (see Rev. 7:3; 9:4; 14:1; 22:4); in the opposite sense as servants of Satan (13:16–17; 14:9; etc.). The “jewels for the forehead,” mentioned in KJV (Gen. 24:22, marg.; Ezek. 16:12), were in all probability nose rings (Isa. 3:21) as the NIV translates.

FOREIGNER (Heb. nokrî “stranger,” Deut. 15:3; Obad. 11; tôshāb, cf. Ex. 12:45, “dweller,” as distinguished from a native, rendered “sojourner”; also Gk. paroikos, “dwelling near,” Eph. 2:19, rendered “aliens,” or [NIV] “foreigners”). One living in a country of which he is not a native, i.e., in the Jewish sense, a Gentile. The kingdom of God, temporarily limited to the people of Israel, still bore within it the germ of universality, of diffusion among all people. The covenant made with Abraham was from the beginning not exclusively confined to the natural posterity of Israel’s twelve sons. As a practical proof that the redemption that was to be prepared through him and his seed was intended to all races of the earth, Abraham was commanded to circumcise every male belonging to his house. Hereby his servants, who amounted to hundreds, were included in his house, made partakers of the covenant promises, and incorporated with the promised seed.

Privileges. When the Israelites went up out of Egypt a large, mixed multitude of foreigners accompanied them (Ex. 12:38; Num. 11:4; Josh. 8:35) and were not rejected by them. Among the Israelites there were at all times individuals of other (pagan) peoples. To such were granted toleration and several privileges, in return for which compliance with the following regulations was insisted upon. They were required, for example, not to blaspheme the name of Jehovah (Lev. 24:16); not to indulge in idolatrous worship (20:2); not to commit acts of indecency (18:26); not to do any work on the Sabbath (Ex. 20:10); not to eat leavened bread during the Passover (12:19); not to eat any manner of blood or flesh of animals that had died a natural death or had been torn by wild beasts (Lev. 17:10, 15). Under such circumstances the law accorded to foreigners not only protection and toleration but equal civil rights with the Israelites. They could even acquire fixed property, lands (25:47) and offer sacrifices to the Lord (Num. 15:15, 26, 29).

Citizenship. Should he desire to enjoy the full rights of citizenship a stranger submitted to circumcision, thus binding himself to observe the whole law, in return for which he was permitted to enjoy to the full the privileges and blessings of the people of the covenant (Rom. 9:4), with whom, in virtue of this right, he was now incorporated (Ex. 12:48). The parties excluded from this fellowship were the Edomites and Egyptians resident in Israel—only, however, till the third generation (Deut. 23:7–8); the seven Canaanitish nations doomed to destruction and excluded forever (Ex. 34:15–16; Deut. 7:1–4); the Ammonites and Moabites, “even to the tenth generation”—i.e., forever—because of their opposition to the Israelites entering Canaan (23:3).

Figurative. “Foreigners” in Eph. 2:19 (KJV and NIV) denotes those who, in their natural condition of sin, are without citizenship in God’s kingdom, as opposed to “fellow citizens.” In 1 Pet. 2:11 “aliens” are those who live as strangers on the earth, i.e., with their citizenship in heaven (cf. Phil. 3:20).

FOREIGN WOMEN. See article Harlot, Whore.

FOREKNOWLEDGE. See God, Attributes of.

FOREORDINATION. See Election.

FORERUNNER (Gk. prodromos). One who is sent before to take observations or act as a spy, a scout, a light-armed soldier. In Heb. 6:20 (KJV) it is used in the sense of one who comes in advance to a place where the rest are to follow, namely, Jesus Christ (cf. John 14:2).

FORESHIP. A KJV term appearing in Acts 27:30, 41. It refers to the bow of a ship (so NASB and NIV).

FORESKIN. The loose fold of skin on the distinctive member of the male sex, which was removed in circumcision (which see), leaving the glans penis artificially uncovered. Circumcision being a symbol of purification, the foreskin was a type of corruption; hence the phrase “foreskin of the heart” (KJV of Deut. 10:16, marg.; Jer. 4:4) to designate a carnal or heathenish state (Rom. 2:29). It was sometimes brought as a trophy of slain Gentiles (1 Sam. 18:25; 2 Sam. 3:14).

FORESKINS, HILL OF. See Gibeath-haaraloth.

FOREST. See Vegetable Kingdom.

Figurative. Forest is used symbolically to denote a city, kingdom, and the like (Ezek. 20:46–47, where “the south” denotes the kingdom of Judah). Kingdoms that God has threatened to destroy are represented under the figure of a forest destined to be burned (Isa. 10:17–19, 34, where the briars and thorns denote the common people, whereas “the glory of his forest” are the nobles and others of high rank. See also 32:19; 37:24; Jer. 21:14; 22:7; etc.). The forest is the image of unfruitfulness as contrasted with a cultivated field or vineyard (Isa. 29:17; 32:15; Jer. 26:18; Hos. 2:12).

FORGIVENESS. One of the most widely misunderstood doctrines of Scripture. It is not to be confused with human forgiveness that merely remits a penalty or charge. Divine forgiveness is one of the most complicated and costly undertakings, demanding complete satisfaction to meet the demands of God’s outraged holiness.

In the Old Testament. “The priest shall make atonement for them, and they shall be forgiven” (Lev. 4:20). However, OT sacrifices had only a typical significance and served as a covering (Heb. kāpar, “to cover, to aid,” Deut. 21:8; Gen. 50:17; etc.) from sin until the appointed time when God should deal finally with sin through the death of Christ. It is thus obvious that the transaction was to some extent incomplete on the divine side. Of necessity sin was let pass. However, the offender received full forgiveness (cf. Rom. 3:25; Acts 17:30).

For the Unsaved. Forgiveness under this consideration is never an isolated operation but is always connected as an integral part of the whole divine undertaking for man called “salvation.” Forgiveness is only one of the many transformations wrought by God in the unsaved in response to simple faith in Christ. Thus forgiveness of sin is not equivalent to salvation. It is merely negative. All else in the comprehensive term salvation is gloriously added (John 10:28; Rom. 5:17).

For the Believer Who Sins. The great foundational truth respecting the believer in relationship to his sins is the fact that his salvation comprehends the forgiveness of all his trespasses past, present, and future so far as condemnation is concerned (Rom. 8:1; Col. 2:13; John 3:18; 5:24). Since Christ has vicariously borne all sin and since the believer’s standing in Christ is complete, he is perfected forever in Christ. When a believer sins, he is subject to chastisement from the Father but never to condemnation with the world (1 Cor. 11:31–32). By confession the Christian is forgiven and restored to fellowship (1 John 1:9). It needs to be remembered that were it not for Christ’s finished work on the cross and His present intercession in heaven, the least sin would result in the sinner's banishment from God's presence and eternal ruin.

Sin unto Death. Persistent or scandalous sin in the believer in face of divine grace and his perfect standing in Christ may eventuate in a sin resulting in physical death. "If anyone sees his brother committing a sin not leading to death, he shall ask and God will for him give life to those who commit sin not leading to death. There is a sin leading to death; I do not say that he should make request for this" (1 John 5:16; cf. 1 Cor. 5:1–5). Both John 15:2 and 1 Cor. 11:30 point out that God reserves the right to cut off the physical life of a believer who has ceased to be a worthy witness in the world. Such a cutting off does not mean that the one who has died is lost. It merely signifies more drastic chastisement to the end that a believer might not be condemned with the world (11:31–32).

The Unpardonable Sin. This was a specific sin possible only during the earthly life of our Lord, when He was ministering in the power of the Holy Spirit. Under those unique conditions a person who attributed to Satan the power of the Holy Spirit, so visibly and openly manifested, was guilty of this peculiar sin. For this reason there could be no forgiveness in the age then present or in the age immediately following (Matt. 12:22–32; Mark 3:22–30). Since no such conditions exist in this age, the unpardonable sin is now impossible. An unpardonable sin and the gospel of "whosoever will" cannot coexist. Were such a sin possible today, every gospel invitation would specifically shut out those who had committed such a trespass.

As an Obligation Among Men. The believer who belongs to this age is exhorted to be kind to believers and unbelievers, tenderhearted and forgiving to one another "as God in Christ also has forgiven you" (Eph 4:32). The basis of the plea for such forgiveness is that one has been himself so graciously forgiven.

FORK. The translation of one Gk. and several Heb. terms.

1. Gk. ptuon (Matt. 3:12; Luke 3:17) and Heb. mizreh (Isa. 30:24; Jer. 15:7), a winnowing fork (which see), given in the KJV as a "winnowing fan."

2. Heb. mazlēg (1 Sam. 2:13–14), a fleshhook (so KJV; which see) for taking joints of meat out of the boiling pot.

3. Heb. mizlāgâ, other forks connected with the altar (Ex. 27:3; 38:3; Num. 4:14) and Temple (1 Chron. 28:17; 2 Chron. 4:16); the Heb. term is rendered fleshhook (which see) in the KJV.

4. Heb. shālōsh qillshôn, "three of prongs" (1 Sam. 13:21), a three-pronged fork, i.e., pitchfork, with which to handle hay, straw, etc.

FORM, LIKENESS. Terms used in several ways in the Bible.

1. An "appearance, shape, likeness" (Heb. t̄fmûnâ). Jehovah, upon the sedition of Aaron and Miriam, made this distinction between a prophet, as usually known, and Moses: "If there is a prophet among you, I, the Lord, shall make Myself known to him in a vision.... Not so, with My servant Moses, he is faithful in all My household; with him I speak mouth to mouth, even openly, and not in dark sayings, and he beholds the form ["similitude," KJV] of the Lord" (Num. 12:6–8, italics added; cf. Deut. 4:12, 15–16). The form of Jehovah was not the essential nature of God, His unveiled glory—for this no mortal man can see (Ex. 33:18–23)—but a form that manifested the invisible God in a clearly discernible mode, differing from the vision of God in the form of a man (Ezek. 1:26; Dan. 7:9, 13), or of the angel of Jehovah. "God talked with Moses without figure, in the clear distinctness of a spiritual communication, whereas to the prophets he only revealed himself through the medium of ecstasy or dream” (K. & D., Com. on Num. 12:6–8).

2. A “model,” a “pattern” (as in 2 Kings 16:10) of an altar; an image, something cast, as of oxen (2 Chron. 4:3; “similitude,” KJV; “figures,” NIV), a likeness (Gen. 1:26), “appearance” (Ezek. 1:16), Heb. dfmût. The verb dāmâ (to “liken” or “compare” is used in Hos. 12:10 (“similitude,” KJV) in the sense of employing parables. The Heb. tabnût is used in Ps. 106:20; 144:12 in the sense of likeness, though the term is translated “image” (“similitude,” KJV).

3. In the NT the Gk. is homoios (“similar”) and means that which is like, or similar (Rom. 5:14; Heb. 7:15; “similitude,” KJV), a likeness as of man to God (James 3:9; “similitude,” KJV; see dfmût, above).

FORNICATION (Gk. porneia). Used of illicit sexual intercourse in general (Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25; cf. 1 Cor. 5:1; 6:13, 18; 7:2; etc.). It is distinguished from “adultery” (Gk. moicheia, in Matt. 15:19; Mark 7:21). The NIV usually translates porneia as “sexual immorality” and moicheia as “adultery.” Jahn (Biblical Archaeology, sec. 158) thus distinguishes between adultery and fornication among nations where polygamy exists: “If a married man has criminal intercourse with a married woman, or with one promised in marriage, or with a widow expecting to be married with a brother-in-law, it is accounted adultery. If he is guilty of such intercourse with a woman who is unmarried it is considered fornication.” At the present time adultery is the term used of such an act when the person is married, fornication when unmarried; and fornication may be defined as lewdness of an unmarried person of either sex. Its prohibition rests on the ground that it discourages marriage, leaves the education and care of children insecure, depraves and defiles the mind more than any other vice, and thus makes one unfit for the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 6:9; etc.). Our Lord forbids the thoughts that lead to it (cf. Matt. 5:28).

Figurative. The close relationship between Jehovah and Israel is spoken of under the figure of marriage, Israel being the unfaithful wife of the Lord, now rejected but yet to be restored. The church of the NT is a pure virgin espoused to Christ (2 Cor. 11:2) and thus differentiated from the nation Israel (1 Cor. 10:32). The worship of idols is naturally mentioned as fornication (Rev. 14:8; 17:2, 4; 18:3; 19:2, KJV; NASB, “immorality”; NIV, “adulteries”); as also the defilement of idolatry, as incurred by eating the sacrifices offered to idols (Rev. 2:21, KJV; NASB, and NIV, “immorality”). See Idolatry.

FORT, FORTIFICATION, FORTRESS. The Hebrew people, never well equipped with arms or possessing military knowledge and surrounded by powerful neighbors, learned early that it was “better to take refuge in the Lord than to trust in princes” (Ps. 118:9). In the theocracy the divine ideal was that protection was in faith in the God of Israel. Such burning faith in God’s power protected Moses, Joshua, Deborah, Samson, Jonathan, David, and other national heroes; yet early in her history Israel had to fight to survive.

Pre-Israelite Fortification. When Joshua and Israel invaded Palestine, they faced formidable Canaanite defenses. Stoutly walled cities erected on mounds that seemed to reach to heaven dotted the “land flowing with milk and honey.” Canaanites were famous for their masonry and by 2000 B.C. had erected massive defenses. Such excavated sites as Jericho, Shechem, Taanach, Lachish, Gezer, and Bethshan have yielded plentiful information concerning the formidableness of Canaanite fortifications. The reports of the Mosaic spies were literally true. They did find great fortified strongholds. Even before the Phoenicians, their Amorite predecessors from c. 2500 B.C. had massive fortifications. Megiddo, the old Amorite fort overlooking Esdraelon, had an area of twenty acres. The recital of the Israelite struggle to control the strongholds of the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, and Jebusites is true to archaeological excavations. The impregnable walls of Jebusite Jerusalem, which David finally took, have been fully verified. At Ugarit in North Syria a cuneiform tablet was found that listed the military equipment kept in the royal Ugaritic arsenal. At Ras Shamra there was a lively trade in horses. Jericho's famous walls are featured in the biblical narrative as well as in their archaeological excavations. The taking of Jericho has been to a large extent verified by the archaeologist's spade. At Jericho, John Garstang located a series of walled cities, one above another: City A was dated at 3000 B.C., and City B was dated c. 2500 B.C. City C was larger than its predecessors and was surrounded by stout walls with a stone glacis and an outer moat. This city belonged to the Hyksos era and suffered destruction c. 1500 B.C. City D, taken by Joshua, was constructed c. 1500 B.C. The wall originally reached perhaps thirty feet. Like Jericho, Bethel was occupied almost constantly from 2000 B.C. or earlier and had well-constructed city walls. The stout fortifications of Bethel were consumed by a terrific fire.

Fortifications Under Monarchy. A good example of an early citadel of Israel is Saul's fortress in Gibeah (present Tell el-Ful), located in the hill country about four miles N of Jerusalem. It was excavated in 1922–23 by W. F. Albright. At the bottom of the mound, the first fortress showed traces of destruction by fire and is probably the one mentioned in Judg. 20:40 (cf. W. F. Albright, in Young's Analytical Concordance, 20th ed. [1946], p. 32). The second fortress, just above the first, is identified with Saul's stronghold. The structure is 170 feet by 155 feet and had casemated walls and separately bonded corner towers. The outer wall was about six feet thick and was defended by a sloping base. The castle comprised two stories and contained a massive stone staircase. Above Saul's structure is a third fortress characterized by a series of stone piers. This citadel suffered destruction by fire, perhaps in the Syro-Ephraimite wars. Egyptian art records two of the towers of the military architects at Gibeah. Together these "fenced" cities constituted a strong system of defense. The most notable link in the chain was Bethshan, guarding the eastern approaches to the famous battlefield of Esdraelon. In fact, Tell el-Husn, modern name of Bethshan, means "Mount of the Fortress." Clarence Fisher, Alan Rowe, and other excavators have unearthed fortress constructions at this important site. Megiddo was another fortified location (Josh. 12:21; Judg. 5:19; 2 Kings 23:29). It not only had a strong wall, gates, and towers but, during Solomon's era, was probably one of his chariot cities. Lachish in southeastern Palestine was another famous fort, excavated by J. L. Starkey and others.

Other Fortresses of Bible Times. Samaria, founded by Omri and made glorious by the Omri dynasty of the ninth century B.C., had a great bastion. Jeroboam II of the eighth century made it almost impregnable with high walls and formidable fortifications. Damascus was another ancient city whose NT walls are familiar from the experiences of Paul. From a house built on the city wall he escaped in a basket (Acts 9:25). The Greek city of Athens was also fortified, and the city walls connected the capital with her harbor at Piraeus. Corinth was another famous fortified site. Syracuse on the island of Sicily also had mighty fortifications in Bible times. This famous fortress stemmed the invasion of the Carthaginians for thirty-eight years, thus defending Hellenic culture in the mid-Mediterranean. Ancient Babylon, Nineveh and Ashur, Ur and other Mesopotamian cities were mighty fortresses from ancient times. The Babylon of Nebuchadnezzar II, as revealed by the records of Herodotus and the accounts of Robert Koldewey, possessed mammoth walls that stretched across the Tigris-Euphrates plain about the city. The incredible splendors of the city, including its "hanging gardens," its famous Ishtar Gate, ziggurat, and temples, were thus defended by a vast system of fortifications. The Ishtar Gate bore reliefs of bulls and dragons, symbolic of Chaldean prowess. This ornate, square-towered portal guarded the city's entrance to the north wall.

Assyrian kings such as Sargon II adorned and defended their palaces with massive gates. The Roman walls of Paul's time, which had already existed for centuries, were formidable but never as famous as those at Jerusalem. The remains of many ancient gates are to be found at Rome.

Figurative. As illustrative of divine protection to those who trust Him, the Lord is compared to a fortress (2 Sam. 22:2; Pss. 18:2; 31:3; 71:3; etc.). "The fortified city will disappear from Ephraim" (Isa. 17:3) is an expression signifying that she loses her fortified cities, or fortresses, that were once her defense. To overthrow one's fortress or fortification is to rob it of defense, i.e., to humiliate (25:12). Of the righteous man it is said, "His refuge will be the impregnable rock" (33:16), i.e., God's protection shall be to him as the impregnable walls of a fortress upon a rock. "I have set thee for a tower and a fortress among my people" (Jer. 6:27, KJV), is rendered by Orelli, Com., ad loc., "an assayer to my people, a piece of ore" (Heb. from bešer, "broken off"), "that thou mayest test their walk." The NIV translates, "I have made you a tester of metals and my people the ore, that you may observe and test their ways."

FORTIFIED CITY. The rendering of several Heb. words; sometimes translated "fortresses" (2 Chron. 11:11), "battle towers" (Isa. 29:3). The broad distinction between a city and a village in biblical language consisted in the possession of walls. The city had walls, the village was unwalled or had only a watchman's tower, to which the villagers resorted in times of danger. A threefold distinction is thus obtained: (1) cities, (2) unwalled villages, and (3) villages with castles or towers (1 Chron. 27:25). The district E of the Jordan, forming the kingdoms of Moab and Bashan, is said to have abounded from early times in castles and fortresses, besides unwalled towns, such as were built by Uzziah to protect the cattle and to repel the inroads of neighboring tribes (Deut. 3:5; 2 Chron. 26:10). When the Israelites entered Canaan they found many fortified cities (Num. 13:28; 32:17; Josh. 11:12–13; Judg. 1:27–33), some of which held out for a long period, e.g., Jerusalem was held by the Jebusites till the time of David (2 Sam. 5:6–7; 1 Chron. 11:5). See Cities.

FORTUNA TUS (for-tū-nā'tus; "fortunate"). A disciple of Corinth, of Roman birth or origin, as his name indicates, who visited Paul at Ephesus and returned, along with Stephanas and Achaicus, in charge of that apostle's first epistle to the Corinthian church (1 Cor. 16:17). "The household of Stephanas" is mentioned in 1:16 as having been baptized by Paul himself; perhaps Fortunatus and Achaicus were members of that household. There is a Fortunatus mentioned at the end of Clement's first epistle to the Corinthians who was possibly the same person.

FORUM APPII. See Appii Forum.

FOUNDATION. The lowest part of a building, and on which it rests.

Figurative. By foundation is sometimes understood the origin (Job 4:19), where men are represented as dwelling in clay houses, whose foundation, i.e., origin, was in the dust (cf. Gen. 2:7; 3:19). It is also used in the sense of beginning, as "the foundation of the world" (Matt. 13:35; 25:34; etc.). The expression is illustrative of Christ: "Behold, I am laying in Zion a stone, a tested stone," etc. (Isa. 28:16; 1 Cor. 3:11); of the doctrines of the apostles (Eph. 2:20); the first principles of the gospel (Heb. 6:1–2); the Christian religion (2 Tim. 2:19); of the righteous (Prov. 10:25). The wise man is one who lays his foundation upon a rock (Luke 6:48); the good minister, who builds on the true foundation—Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 3:10–11).

FOUNDER. See Handicrafts: Metalworker.

FOUNTAIN. A natural source of living water. The same word as “eye” in Heb., ayin (Deut. 8:7; 33:28), sometimes rendered “spring” (as in the NIV). It is also spoken of an inflow of the sea (Gen. 7:11; 8:2; NIV, “springs”). An artificial source of flowing water, such as a cistern or a reservoir, may be denoted by the Heb. word māgôr (Pss. 36:9; 68:26; Prov. 5:18; 13:14; 14:27; Jer. 2:13). The Gk. pēgē is rendered “fountain” in James 3:11 (“spring” in the NIV). In Gen. 16:7; Lev. 11:36; 1 Sam. 29:1; Prov. 8:28; Rev. 7:17; 14:7; 8:10; 21:6, KJV “fountain” is replaced in the NASB and NIV by spring (which see). M.F.U.

Figurative. Of God (Ps. 36:9; Jer. 17:13); of Christ (Zech. 13:1); of Israel, as the father of a numerous posterity (Deut. 33:28); of a good wife (Prov. 5:18); of spiritual wisdom (16:22; 18:4; both “well-spring” in the KJV). In Ps. 87:7; song of Sol. 4:12; Isa. 41:18; Joel 3:18, KJV “fountain” is replaced in the NASB and sometimes in the NIV by spring (which see). See Spring; Well; Eye.

FOURTH OF A SHEKEL. A unit of money. See Metrology.

FOWL. See the articles Food; Sacrifices; and Animal Kingdom: Bird.

FOWLER. See Trapper.

FOX. See also Animal Kingdom.

Figurative. The proverbially cunning character of the fox is alluded to in Scripture, as in Ezek. 13:4, where the prophets of Israel are said to be like foxes (NIV, “jackals”) among ruins; and in Luke 13:32, where our Lord calls Herod “that fox.” The fox’s fondness for grapes is alluded to in song of Sol. 2:15.

FRANKINCENSE. See Incense; Vegetable Kingdom: Galbanum.

FRAUD. See Law.

FRAY (Heb. hārad, to “frighten”; Deut. 28:26; Jer. 7:33; Zech. 1:21; all KJV only). The English term appearing in the KJV of the passages listed immediately above is not the modern fray but rather is an old word signifying to frighten or scare away. The NASB replaces KJV “fray” with “frighten” or “terrify,” and the Heb. term is given a variety of renderings throughout the NASB. The NIV uses “fray” in Job 39:21 as a translation of Heb. nesheq, rendered by the NASB as “weapons.”

FREEDMAN (Gk. apeleutheros, one “set free”). A person who has been freed (1 Cor. 7:22). In Gal. 4:22–23, 30, a strong distinction is drawn between the free woman and the bondwoman. See Freedom.

FREEDMEN, SYNAGOGUE OF THE (Lat., “freedmen”). This occurs only once in the NT: “But some men from what is called the Synagogue of the Freedmen” (Acts 6:9). The interpretation of this word has been various. Some believe these men (“Libertines,” as is rendered in the KJV) were released Roman slaves, who having embraced Judaism had their synagogue at Jerusalem. Others, owing to the geographical names given to other synagogues in the same verse, infer that this must have the same meaning and suppose that Jews dwelling in Liberatum (KJV, “Libertines”), a city or region in proconsular Africa, are meant. Others, with far greater probability, appeal to Philo and understand the word as denoting Jews who had been made captive by the Romans under Pompey but were afterward set free, and who, although they had fixed their abode at Rome, had built at their own expense a synagogue at Jerusalem, which they frequented when in that city.

FREEDOM (Heb. hūpshâ, “liberty”; Gk. politeia, “citizenship,” Acts 22:28).

Hebrew. Every Israelite (man or woman) who had become a slave might not only be redeemed at any time by his relatives but, if this did not take place, was bound to receive his freedom without payment in the seventh year, with a present of cattle and fruits (Ex. 21:2; Deut. 15:12–15). Indeed all slaves of Hebrew descent, with their children, obtained freedom without ransom in the Jubilee year (Lev. 25:39–41). If the man was single when he went into slavery, he was liberated alone; whereas the wife brought into slavery with her husband received her freedom at the same time with him (Ex. 21:2–4; Jer. 34:8–9). The emancipation of slaves among Greeks and Romans was tolerably common. The Greeks had no special legal form for the process and consequently no legal differences in the legal status of freedom. At Athens they took the position of resident aliens and were under certain obligations to their liberators as patrons.

Roman. Among the Romans emancipation was either formal or informal. Of formal emancipation there were three kinds: (1) The manumissio vindictā, in which the owner appeared before the magistrate with the slave. A Roman citizen laid a staff upon the slave's head and declared him free, whereupon the master, who was holding the slave with his hand, let him go as a symbol of liberation. (2) The manumissio censu, in which the master enrolled the slave's name in the list of citizens. (3) The manumissio testāmentō, or manumission by will, in which the master declared his slave free or bound his heir to emancipate him. Informal emancipation took place in virtue of an oral declaration on the part of the master in the presence of friends, or by letter, or by inviting the slave to the master's table. After formal emancipation they at once became Roman citizens but, not being freeborn, were not eligible to office and were excluded from military service. Informal emancipation conferred only practical freedom without civil rights (Seyffert, Dictionary of Classical Antiquity, s.v. manumissio testāmentō). Freedom is used (Acts 22:28; cf. 21:39) for citizenship (which see).

An Attribute of God. This is declared by the apostle Paul, in harmony with the unanimous testimony of the Scriptures, in the words "Who works all things after the counsel of His will" (Eph. 1:11). By this term theology expresses the fact that God is a self-determining agent, a free personal Being acting purely in accordance with His own perfections. The reason of the divine purpose and act is to be found only in God Himself. Inasmuch as God is eternally and unchangeably what He is, we must recognize in God, in a proper sense, an absolute necessity. But it is a necessity that not only does not conflict but is identical with His perfect freedom. The creation—the existence of all things that are not God—must be referred to the divine freedom. God could be under no necessity to create. But if He creates, His creation, the order and the laws He establishes among them, must reflect His wisdom and goodness and holiness—in a word, Himself. At this point the doctrine of the divine freedom reveals sharply its opposition to Pantheism, which asserts that all things, even sin (the sinfulness of which it denies), are but necessary manifestations or unfoldings of the Divine Being.

The freedom of God is exercised and illustrated in His government of His moral creatures. It has pleased God to create intelligences possessed of moral freedom and to make their ultimate destiny contingent upon the right use of their freedom. This is a necessary feature of the government that God has established over the world of moral beings He has seen fit to create. God has manifested His perfect freedom in creating such a world and adapting His methods to the demanding situations that arise in its history. This view of the divine freedom is to be maintained in opposition to the exaggerated and unscriptural view of the divine sovereignty that, despite all merely verbal qualifications, actually reduces the freedom of moral creatures to nothing and regards their destinies as unalterably fixed by an eternal, divine decree. See Sovereignty of God.

Human. In what has been said above, the freedom of man, as that of other moral intelligences, has been assumed. The doctrine of human freedom, or of free will, the subject of so much controversy, requires particular discussion.

Definition. By freedom of the will, in the proper sense, is meant the power of contrary choice, i.e., the power of the mind to choose in some other direction than that in which the choice is actually made. Theologically freedom refers especially to the power to choose between good and evil, righteousness and unrighteousness. On the one hand, by those who uphold this doctrine, it is asserted that man freely determines his own volitions; on the other, by necessitarians, it is held that these volitions are determined by conditions, influences, and circumstances with which they are connected as rigidly and powerfully as effects are connected with causes in the material world.

Parties to Controversy. Prominent among those who deny human freedom are materialists. This position is also the natural result of Dualism and Pantheism. That form of Theism that fails to recognize the divine freedom finds no freedom in man. The attitude of Calvinistic theology upon this subject has been the occasion of much dispute and probably of some misunderstanding. The extreme doctrines of foreordination, of unconditional election, and of reprobation, held by Calvinists, as well as some of the terms by which they describe man's actual condition, have been claimed by Arminians to be logically equivalent to a denial of man's freedom. And yet it may truly be said that Calvinism, generally speaking, has steadfastly proclaimed the responsibility of man as a free moral agent. On the whole, belief in the freedom of the will, properly interpreted, may be regarded as the unanimous, if not always coherently spoken, belief of the Christian church.

Theological Interpretation. The doctrine of human freedom relates not only to man's original condition before the Fall but also to his present fallen condition, as that of bondage to sin; and still further to the condition to which he is brought through redemption by Christ. (1) Man was created in the image of God and accordingly was endowed with perfect moral freedom. Sin resulted from the abuse of freedom (see Fall of Man; Sin). (2) In consequence of the sin of the first human pair mankind has inherited a depraved nature, so that while the natural freedom of man is not lost in respect to many things, yet with respect to meeting the requirements of the divine law, man is of himself in a state of complete moral inability (see Rom. 7:19–24). This is to be held in opposition to Pelagianism. (3) The actual condition of mankind as morally fallen is, however, greatly modified by the grace of God that has come to the race through redemption. Through regeneration and sanctification the bondage of sin is completely destroyed, and thus believers become "free indeed."

Arguments for Freedom. There are several arguments for freedom. (1) Appeal is made to universal consciousness. The common experience of men is that while choosing one way they feel that they might choose another. (2) Freedom is essential to all moral responsibility. And moral responsibility is one of the intuitions of the human mind. (3) The denial of freedom must logically lead to the denial of moral distinctions in human affairs. (4) In addition to the above, which are purely rational arguments, is the general force of Scripture teaching, which uniformly represents man as invested with the power of choosing between right and wrong and between sin and salvation.

FRIEND. A person with whom one has friendly communications (Gen. 38:12, 20; 2 Sam. 13:3; Job 2:11; 19:21; etc.); also a lover, one beloved of a woman (song of Sol. 5:16; Jer. 3:1, 20, NASB, KJV, and NIV, "lovers"); and in Judg. 14:20 it is used in the sense of "the friend of the bridegroom” (John 3:29), who asked the hand of the bride and rendered service at the marriage (which see).

The Gk. word hetairoi (Matt. 11:16, KJV, “fellow”; NIV, “others”) is used in kindly address (Matt. 20:13; 22:12; 26:50); one attached by affection (Gk. philos) is also frequently used in the NT, as in James 2:23 and 4:4.

FRONTAL (Heb. tōtāpā, to “bind,” only in Deut. 6:8; 11:18; rendered “phylacteries,” Ex. 13:16; KJV renders “frontlets,” NIV, “symbol”). “The expression in Deut. 6:8, ‘Thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes,’ does not point at all to the symbolizing of the divine commands by an outward sign to be worn upon the hand, or to bands with passages of the law inscribed upon them, to be worn on the forehead between the eyes.... The line of thought referred to merely expresses the idea that the Israelites were not only to retain the commands of God in their hearts, and to confess them with the mouth, but to fulfill them with the hand, or in act and deed” (K. & D., Com., ad loc.). But the Jews, after their return from captivity, construed the injunction literally and had portions of the law written out and worn as badges upon their persons. They are still worn by modern Jews and consist of strips of parchment on which are written four passages of Scripture (Ex. 13:2–10, 11–17; Deut. 6:4–9; 13:22). These are rolled up in a case of black calfskin, attached to a stiffer piece of leather having a thong one finger broad and one and a half cubits long. See Phylactery.

FRONTLETS. A KJV term; see Frontal.

FROST (Heb. kfpôr, so called from “covering” the ground, Job 38:29; “hoarfrost,” Ex.

16:14; Ps. 147:16; also qārah, “smooth,” as ice, rendered in Job 6:16; 38:29). Frozen dew. It appears in a still night, when there is no storm or tempest, and descends upon the earth as silently as if it were produced by mere breathing (Job 37:10, KJV).

FROWARDNESS. A KJV term referring to perverseness, deceit, or falsehood. The NASB and NIV replace the term with “perversity,” “perverseness” (Prov. 2:14; 6:14), or “perverted” (10:32). Froward and frowardly likewise have the meaning of perverted, crooked, or deceitful (cf. Prov. 4:24; 10:31; 17:20); a “turning away” from that which is right (Isa. 57:17).

FRUIT. See Garden; Vegetable Kingdom.

Figurative. The word fruit is often used figuratively in Scripture of offspring, children (Ps. 21:10, marg.; Hos. 9:16); also in such phrases as “fruit of the womb” (Gen. 30:2; Deut. 7:13; etc.); “fruit of his loins” (Acts 2:30, marg.); “fruit of your body” (Ps. 132:11; Mic. 6:7). Also in a variety of forms, such as, “They shall eat of the fruit of their own way,” i.e., experience the consequences (Prov. 1:31; Isa. 3:10; Jer. 6:19; 17:10, marg.); boasting is the “fruit of the arrogant heart” (Isa. 10:12); a man’s words are called the “fruit of his words,” or of his “mouth” or “lips” (Prov. 12:14; 18:20; Heb. 13:15); “fruit of lies” (Hos. 10:13); “the fruit of the righteous” (Prov. 11:30) is his counsel, example, etc.; the “fruit of the spirit” enumerated in Gal. 5:22–23 are those gracious habits that the Holy Spirit produces in the Christian, given more briefly as “goodness and righteousness and truth” (Eph. 5:9); the “fruit of righteousness” (Phil. 1:11) is such good work as springs from a gracious frame of heart. Fruit is also the name given to a charitable contribution (Rom. 15:28).

FRYING PAN. See Pan.

FUEL. In most Eastern countries there is a scarcity of wood and other materials for fuel. Consequently almost every kind of combustible matter is eagerly sought for, such as the withered stalks of herbs and flowers (Matt. 6:30), thorns (Ps. 58:9; Eccles. 7:6), and animal excrement (Ezek. 4:12–15). At the present time wood, charcoal, and electricity are employed in the towns of Syria and Egypt, although the people of Palestine use anthracite coal to some extent. See Coal.

FUGITIVE. The rendering of several Heb. words, meaning to “wander,” a “refugee,” “deserter,” etc. (Judg. 12:4; Isa. 15:5).

FULLER. See Handicrafts: Launderer.

FULLER’S FIELD. A spot near Jerusalem (2 Kings 18:17; Isa. 7:3; 36:2), so near the walls that one speaking there could be heard on them (2 Kings 18:17, 26). The NIV refers to it as the “Washerman’s Field.” The pool mentioned is probably the one now known as Birket-el-Mamilla, at the head of the Valley of Hinnom, a little W of the Yafa gate. The position of the fuller’s field is thus indicated.

FULLER’S SOAP.

Figurative. The powerful cleansing properties of bōrît, or soap, are employed by the prophet Malachi (3:2; NIV, “launderer’s soap”) to represent the prospective results of the Messiah’s coming (cf. Mark 9:3). See Handicrafts: Launderer.

FULNESS.

1. That portion of the corn and wine that was to be offered to Jehovah as a tithe or first fruits (Ex. 22:29; cf. Num. 18:27).

2. (Gk. plērōma, “that which has been filled”). This term has been variously used in Scripture. (a) The “fulness of time” is the time when Christ appeared—“When the fulness of the time came, God sent forth His Son” (Gal. 4:4). (b) The fulness of Christ is the superabundance with which He is filled (John 1:16; Col. 1:19; 2:9). In the last passage, “In Him all the fulness of Deity dwells in bodily form” means that the whole nature and attributes of God are in Christ. (c) The church, i.e., the body of believers, is called the fullness of Christ (Eph. 1:23), as it is the church that makes Him a complete and perfect head.

FUNERAL.

Egyptian. The body was buried either in the hills, there to be preserved by the sand, or, having been embalmed, it was placed in a sarcophagus of stone whose lid and trough, hermetically fastened with cement, prevented the penetration of any moisture. The soul was supposed to follow the body to the tomb and there to dwell, as in its eternal house, upon the confines of the visible and invisible world. Funeral sacrifices and the regular cultus of the dead originated in the practice of making provision for the sustenance of the “manes” after having secured their lasting existence by the mummification of their bodies. Unless supplied with food the soul (or double) was supposed to wander abroad at night in search of it. Therefore food and vessels of wine and beer were brought to the tomb, that they might enjoy that which was believed to be necessary for the maintenance of their bodies.

Among the Ancient Israelites. What form or ceremonies of obsequies were observed is to us almost unknown, except that the act of interment was performed by the relations (sons, brothers) with their own hands (Gen. 25:9; 35:29; Judg. 16:31; cf. Matt. 8:21–22). In later times the Jews left this office to others, and in Amos 5:16 wailers and professional mourners are mentioned. As soon as possible after death the body was washed (Acts 9:37), then wrapped in a large cloth (Matt. 27:59; Mark 15:46; Luke 23:53), or all its limbs wound with bands (John 11:44), between the folds of which, in cases of persons of distinction, aromatics were laid or sprinkled (19:39–40). At public funerals of princes elaborate shrouds were used, and there was a prodigious expense of perfumes and spices. The body was moved to the grave in a coffin (probably open) or on a bier (2 Sam. 3:31), borne by men (Luke 7:14; Acts 5:6, 10), with a retinue of relatives and friends (2 Sam. 3:31; Luke 7:12). The Talmud speaks of funeral processions with horns, in a long train (Job 21:33), with loud weeping and wailing (2 Sam. 3:32). Female mourners, hired for the purpose, prolonged the lamentation several days. The burial was followed by the funeral meal (2 Sam. 3:35; Jer. 16:5, 7; Ezek. 24:17, 22; Hos. 9:4).

FURLONG. See Mile in Metrology: Linear Measures.

FURNACE.

1. A smelting oven of limestone; kiln or oven for making bricks (Gen. 19:28; Ex. 19:18; cf. 9:8, 10; Amos 2:1).

2. A large crucible, apparently with an opening at the top for casting in materials (Dan. 3:22–23) and a door at the ground from which to take the metal (v. 26). The Persians used this device for inflicting capital punishment (cf. Jer. 29:22; Hos. 7:7; 2 Macc. 7:5).

3. A cylindrical fire pot such as is commonly used in dwelling houses in the East (Gen. 15:17, KJV; NASB, “oven”; NIV, “fire pot”). They are still in use among the Arabs. NT references to a furnace are found in Matt. 13:42, 50; Rev. 1:15; 9:2.

Figurative. A refining furnace is used figuratively to describe a state of trial (Deut. 4:20; Isa. 48:10). M.F.U.

FURNACES, THE TOWER OF (Neh. 3:11; 12:38). This was one of the towers of the middle or second wall of Jerusalem, at its NW angle, adjoining the “corner gate” and near the intersection of the present line of the Via Dolorosa with the street of St. Stephen. The NIV refers to it as the “Tower of the Ovens.” It may be the same as the “bakers’ street” (Jer. 37:21).

FURNITURE. A term used in several ways in the Bible.

1. The rendering in the KJV of the Heb. kar, “pad,” a camel’s litter or canopied saddle (so the NIV), in which females are accustomed to travel in the East at the present day (Gen. 31:34).

2. The name given to the sacred furnishings and their utensils used in the Tabernacle (Ex. 31:7–9; 35:14, “utensils,” NASB; “accessories,” NIV; 39:33, “furnishings,” NASB and NIV; NASB marg., “utensils”; all from Heb. klî, something “prepared”). In Nah. 2:9 the same Heb. word is used for ornamental vessels (“all the pleasant furniture,” KJV; “every kind of desirable object,” NASB; “the wealth from all its treasures,” NIV).

3. For domestic furniture, see House: Interior.

FURROW. A trench in the earth made by a plow (Ps. 65:10). In Hos. 10:10, KJV “two furrows” is replaced in the NASB by “double guilt,” and in the NIV by “double sin.”

FURY (Heb. ḥēmâ, “heat”; or ḥārôn, “burning”). In KJV refers to intense anger attributed to God metaphorically or speaking after the manner of men (Lev. 26:28; Job 20:23; Isa. 63:3; etc.). The NASB and NIV render “anger,” “wrath.” It is the spontaneous reaction of the divine holiness against sin treasured-up and ripe for judgment. See Anger.

FUTURE LIFE. See Life; Immortality.

G

GA´AL (gā´al; “loathing”). The son of Ebed (Judg. 9:26–49). He was probably a marauder and was welcomed to Shechem because the Shechemites hoped that he would be able to render them good service in their revolt from Abimelech. At the festival at which the Shechemites offered the first fruits of their vintage in the temple of Baal, Gaal strove to kindle their wrath against the absent Abimelech. His rebellious speech was reported to Abimelech by the town prefect, Zebul. On receiving this news, Abimelech rose up during the night with the people that were with him and placed four companies in ambush against Shechem. When Gaal went out in the morning upon some enterprise and stood before the city gate, Abimelech rose up with his army out of the ambush. Gaal fled into the city but was thrust out by Zebul, and we hear of him no more, c. 1108–1105 B.C.

GA´ASH (gā´ash; “quaking”). A mountain in the district of Mt. Ephraim. On the N side of the hill was Timnath-serah, the city given to Joshua (Josh. 24:30). Here Joshua was buried. The “brooks” or valleys of Gaash are mentioned in 2 Sam. 23:30 and 1 Chron. 11:32.

GAB´BAI (gab´a-ī; “tax gatherer”). A chief of the tribe of Benjamin who settled in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:8), before 445 B.C.

GAB´BATHA (gab´a-tha; Aram. gabbāṭā, “ridge, knoll, hill”). The place mentioned in John 19:13, where it is stated that Pilate, alarmed by the insinuation of the Jews (“If you release this Man, you are no friend of Caesar”), went into the praetorium again and brought Jesus out to them. He then pronounced formal sentence against Jesus, having taken his seat upon the tribunal in a place called “The Pavement” (Gk. lithostrōton, “stone strewn”), but in Heb., “Gabbatha.” It is probable that the Gk. name was given to the spot from the nature of its pavement, and the Heb. from its shape. For a long time the pavement in the basement of the Convent of the Sisters of Zion on the Via Dolorosa has been thought to have constituted the courtyard of the fortress Antonia, a garrison Herod the Great constructed on the NW corner of the Temple mount. Thus it was accepted as the place where Herod judged Jesus. In 1966 excavations it was shown, however, that the pavement was laid when the adjacent Hadrianic arch was built in the second century. Thus this pavement could have had nothing to do with Jesus’ passion. H.F.V.

GA´BRIEL (gā´bri-el; “man” or “hero of God”). The word used to designate the heavenly messenger sent to explain to Daniel the visions that he saw (Dan. 8:16; 9:21), who announced the birth of John the Baptist to his father, Zacharias (Luke 1:11–20), and who spoke of the Messiah to the virgin Mary (1:26–38). As to his relation to other angels and archangels, the Scriptures give no information; but in the book of Enoch “the four great archangels, Michael, Raphael, Gabriel, and Uriel,” are described as reporting the corrupt state of mankind to the Creator and receiving their several commissions. In the rabbinical writings Gabriel is represented as standing in front of the divine throne, near the standard of Judah. The Muslims regard Gabriel with profound reverence, affirming that to him was committed a complete copy of the Koran, which he imparted in successive portions to Muhammad. He is called in the Koran the Spirit of Truth and the Holy Spirit, and it is alleged that he will hold the scales in which the actions of men will be weighed in the last day.

GAD (gad; “fortune”). The name of David’s “seer” (see below); and of Jacob’s seventh son, the firstborn of Zilpah, Leah’s maid, and whole brother to Asher (Gen. 30:9–11; 46:16, 18), perhaps about 1850 B.C.

Personal History. Of the life of the individual Gad son of Jacob, nothing is preserved.

The Tribe of Gad. At the time of the descent into Egypt seven sons are ascribed to him (Gen. 46:16), remarkable from the fact that a majority of their names have plural terminations, as if those of families rather than persons (Smith). At the first census Gad had 45,650 adult males, ranking eighth; and at the second census 40,500, ranking tenth.

They were attached to the second division of the Israelite host, following the standard of Reuben and camping on the S of the Tabernacle, their chief being Eliasaph the son of Deuel, or Reuel (Num. 1:14; 2:10–16).

In common with Reuben, Gad requested Moses to give them their portion on the E of the Jordan, because they had “an exceedingly large number of livestock.” Upon being assured that they would assist their brethren in the conquest of Canaan, Moses granted them their request. The country allotted to Gad appears, speaking roughly, to have lain chiefly about the center of the land E of the Jordan. To Reuben and Gad was given the territory of Sihon, between the Arnon and the Jabbok and as far E as Jazer, the border of the Ammonites, but the division is hard to define (see Num. 32:33; Josh. 13:15–21). “The land is high, well suitable for flocks.... There is water in abundance, and therefore the vegetation is rich” (Harper, Bible and Mod. Dis., p. 262).

The Gadites were a warlike tribe, and they bravely aided their brethren in the conquest of Canaan (Josh. 4:12; 22:1–4). Surrounded by the Ammonites, Midianites, and many other hostile tribes, they nobly defended their country. One of their greatest victories was that gained over the descendants of Ishmael, the tribes of Jetur, Naphish, and Nodab, from whom they took enormous booty (1 Chron. 5:18–22). The seat of Ish-bosheth’s sovereignty was established in this territory, for Abner brought him to Mahanaim, where he reigned (2 Sam. 2:8) and was assassinated. Many, however, of the Gadite chiefs had joined David while in the stronghold (1 Chron. 12:8); and when, years later, he was obliged to flee across the Jordan, he found welcome and help (2 Sam. 17:24, 27–29). In the division of the kingdom, Gad fell to the northern state, and many of the wars between Syria and Israel must have ravaged its territory (2 Kings 10:33). At last, Tiglath-pileser carried the Gadites and the neighboring tribes away as captives into Assyria (15:29; 1 Chron. 5:26).

GAD (gad; “good fortune”). The “Seer,” or “David’s seer” (2 Sam. 24:11; 1 Chron. 21:9; 29:29; 2 Chron. 29:25), was a prophet who appears to have joined David when in “the stronghold” and who advised David to leave it for the forest of Hereth (1 Sam. 22:5), before 1000 B.C. We do not hear of him again until he reappears in connection with the punishment inflicted for the numbering of the people (2 Sam. 24:11–19; 1 Chron. 21:9–19). But he was evidently attached to the royal establishment at Jerusalem, for he wrote a book of the acts of David (29:29) and also assisted in settling the arrangements for the musical service of the “house of the Lord” (2 Chron. 29:25).

GAD (gad; “good fortune”). A Canaanite god of fortune, often appearing in Heb. compounds as “Baal-gad” (Josh. 11:17; “Migdal-gad,” Josh. 15:37). See Gods, False.

GAD´ARA (gad´a-ra). The capital of the Roman province of Peraea, E of the Jordan, about six miles from the Sea of Galilee and opposite Tiberias. Jesus healed the demoniac in Gadara.

The modern village Um-Keis is in the midst of ruins intimating the grandeur of the ancient Gadara. See Gadarenes.

GADARENES (gad-a-rēnz'). The inhabitants of Gadara (which see), mentioned in the account of the healing of the demoniacs (Matt. 8:28, NASB and NIV; but “Gergesenes,” KJV; Mark 5:1; Luke 8:26, 37; “Gerasenes” in the NASB and NIV but “Gadarenes” in the KJV).

GAD'DI (gad'i; “fortunate”). A son of Susi, of the tribe of Manasseh, sent by Moses to represent that tribe among the twelve “spies” on their exploring tour through Canaan (Num. 13:11), c. 1441 B.C.

GAD'DIEL (gad-i-el; “fortune of Gad”). A son of Sodi, of the tribe of Zebulun. One of the twelve “spies” sent by Moses to explore Canaan (Num. 13:10), c. 1441 B.C.

GA'DI (ga'di; a “Gadite”). The father of the usurper Menahem, who “went up from Tirzah and came to Samaria, and struck Shallum,” king of Israel (2 Kings 15:14), and reigned ten years over Israel (v. 17), about 741 B.C.

GAD'ITES (gad'its). The descendants of Gad (which see), the son of Jacob (Deut. 3:12, 16; 4:43; 29:8; etc.).

GA'HAM (ga'ham; “to burn”). One of the sons of Nahor (Abraham's brother) by his concubine Reumah (Gen. 22:24), about 2100 B.C.

GA'HAR (ga'har). One of the chiefs of the Temple servants whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel from the captivity to Jerusalem (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:49), before 536 B.C.

GA'IUS (ga'yus; Lat. Caius).

1. A Macedonian who accompanied Paul on some of his journeys and was seized by the populace at Ephesus (Acts 19:29), A.D. about 54.

2. A man of Derbe who accompanied Paul on his return from Macedonia into Asia, probably to Jerusalem (Acts 20:4).

3. An inhabitant of Corinth, the host of Paul, and in whose house the Christians were accustomed to assemble (Rom. 16:23). He was baptized by Paul (1 Cor. 1:14).

4. The person to whom John's third epistle is addressed (3 John 4). “He was probably a convert of St. John (v. 4), and a layman of wealth and distinction in some city near Ephesus, A.D. after 90. The epistle was written for the purpose of commending to the kindness and hospitality of Gaius some Christians who were strangers in the place where he lived.”

GA'LAL (gā'lal; “rolling”). The name of two Levites after the Exile.

1. One of those who dwelt in the villages of the Netophathites and served at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 9:15), about 536 B.C.

2. A descendant of Jeduthun, and father of Shemaiah, or Shammua (1 Chron. 9:16; Neh. 11:17), before 445 B.C.

GALA'TIA (ga-lā'sha). The Roman Galatia was the central region of the peninsula of Asia Minor, with the provinces of Asia on the W, Cappadocia on the E, Pamphylia and Cilicia on the S, and Bithynia and Pontus on the N (Acts 16:6; 18:23; 1 Cor. 16:1; Gal. 1:2; etc.). It would be difficult to define the exact limits; in fact they were frequently changing. At one time there is no doubt that this province contained Pisidia and Lycaonia, and therefore those towns of Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, which are conspicuous in the narrative of Paul's travels.

GALATIANS (gal-ā'shuns). They were called by the Romans Galli and were a stream from that torrent of barbarians that poured into Greece in the third century B.C., and that recoiled in confusion from the cliffs of Delphi. Crossing over into Asia Minor they lost no time in spreading over the peninsula with their arms and devastation, dividing nearly the whole of it among their three tribes. They levied tribute on cities and kings and hired themselves out as mercenary soldiers. It became a Roman province under Augustus, reaching from the borders of Asia and Bithynia to the neighborhood of Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, "cities of Lycaonia." Henceforth this territory was a part of the Roman Empire.

The Galatians had little religion of their own and easily adopted the superstitions and mythology of the Greeks. Paul introduced the gospel among them (Acts 16:6; 18:23; Gal. 1:6–12), visiting them in person. When detained by sickness he sent Crescens to them (2 Tim. 4:10). Soon after Paul left Galatia, missionaries of the Judaizing party came and taught the necessity of circumcision for the higher grade of Christian services, declaring that the apostle did, in effect, preach circumcision (Gal. 5:11), thus casting doubt upon Paul's sincerity. Such teaching caused defection among the converts to Christianity, and he wrote his epistle vindicating himself against the charges of the Judaizing party.

GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO. The letter of the apostle Paul containing his great defense of the gospel of grace against legalistic perversion or contamination.

Early Testimony. The early church gives unambiguous testimony to this document. Marcion put it at the head of his Apostolikon (A.D. 140). Athenagoras, Justin Martyr, and Melito quote it. Evidences of it appear in Ignatius and Polycarp. With the other Pauline epistles it appears in the oldest Lat., Syr., and Egyptian translations and in the Muratorian Canon of the second century. No trace of doubt as to the authority, integrity, or apostolic genuineness of the epistle comes from ancient times.

Destination and Date. Although the Pauline authorship of Galatians is well established, its destination, occasion, and date are surrounded by critical difficulties. It was addressed to "the churches of Galatia" (1:2). The Roman province of Galatia included not only Galatia proper, peopled largely by Celts from Gaul, but also portions of Lycaonia, Pisidia, and Phrygia, all situated on the S. The fact that Paul addressed the churches in the S part of Galatia is supported by the following. (1) He and Barnabas had visited the cities of Iconium, Lystra, Derbe, and Pisidian Antioch, all in S Galatia, and had established churches in the vicinity during the first missionary journey (Acts 13:4; 14:19–21). (2) Familiar reference to Barnabas (Gal. 2:1, 9, 13) would be unexplainable in a letter sent to northern Galatia, where Barnabas seems to have been unknown. (3) In the S Galatian cities there were Jews who might have caused the events mentioned in the letter (Acts 13:14–51; 14:1; 16:1–3). If the "South Galatian theory" is subscribed to, Galatians may have been written either at Antioch in Syria at the consummation of the first missionary journey (14:26–28) or at Ephesus in the course of the third missionary journey (19:10). The apostle's visit to Jerusalem (Gal. 2:1–10) is thought to be identical to that alluded to in Acts 11:30. If this is so, Galatians may have been sent from Antioch around A.D. 48, prior to Paul's third visit to Jerusalem to attend the apostolic gathering of chap. 15. According to this theory, Galatians would be the earliest of the apostle's letters. There are strong reasons, however, to support the hypothesis that Galatians was written at Ephesus (52 A.D.) during the same time as the other epistles.

The Occasion. Galatians has been called the "Magna Charta of Christian liberty" and the "Christian's Declaration of Independence." The difficulty that produced this important epistle was caused by Jewish believers who proclaimed a mixture of Judaism and Christianity. Paul had proclaimed the free grace of God for all men through the death of Christ. The legalizers contended that Christianity could only work within the sphere of the Mosaic law. Faith in Christ, involving the free gifts of the Holy Spirit, was not sufficient. Obedience to the Mosaic law (Gal. 2:16, 21; 3:2; 5:4; etc.), which requires observance of festal days and the Sabbath (4:10), was stressed. Had the Judaizers won, Christianity would merely have been a sect within Judaism. The situation called for all the skill and wisdom the great apostle could muster. With invincible logic he vindicated Christianity on the sole basis of man's acceptance of Christ. Men are justified by the finished work of the Redeemer and in no manner by forms and ceremonies. Galatians was an echo of the great truth of justification so masterfully set forth in Romans.

GALBANUM. See Vegetable Kingdom.

GAL'EED (gal'ē-ed; "heap of witness"). The name given by Jacob to a pile of stones erected by Jacob and Laban as a memorial of their covenant (Gen. 31:47–48). It is Heb., but the name given by Laban, Jegar-sahadutha, is Aram., known probably to Nahor's family, whereas Abraham and his descendants had learned the kindred Heb. dialect.

GALILE'AN (gal-i-lē'an). A native or inhabitant of Galilee (Matt. 26:69; John 4:45). The Galileans were generous and impulsive, of simple manners, earnest piety, and intense nationalism. They were also excitable, passionate, and violent. The Talmud accuses them of being quarrelsome but admits that they cared more for honor than for money. Their religious observances were simple, differing in several points from those of Judea. The people of Galilee were specially blamed for neglecting the study of their language, charged with errors in grammar, and especially with absurd mispronunciation, sometimes leading to ridiculous mistakes. Thus there was a general contempt in rabbinic circles for all that was Galilean. The Galileans were easily recognized by their dialect and tone, as is seen by the detection of Peter as one of Christ's disciples (Mark 14:70). The name was applied by way of reproach to the early Christians. Julian generally used this term when speaking of Christ or Christians and called Christ "the Galilean God." He also made a law requiring that Christians be called by no other name, hoping thereby to abolish the name Christian. It is said that he died fighting against the Christians and, as he caught the blood from a wound in his side, threw it toward heaven, saying, "Thou hast conquered, O Galilean!"

GAL'ILEE (gal'i-lē; Heb. gālīl, "circle or circuit"). Palestine (which see) was divided into three provinces—Judea, Samaria, and Galilee. Galilee occupied the upper part of the land, being the NW province. In the time of Christ it included more than one-third of western Palestine, extending from the base of Mt. Hermon on the N, to the ridges of Carmel and Gilboa on the S, and from the Jordan to the Mediterranean Sea, about fifty by twenty-five miles in extent. Solomon once offered the tract to Hiram, who declined it, after which Solomon colonized it. It embraced a large northern portion of the tribe of Naphtali and was called Galilee of the Gentiles. There are many Scripture references to it. The first three gospels are occupied largely with Christ's ministry in Galilee. Of His thirty-two parables, nineteen were spoken in Galilee, and twenty-five of His thirty-three great miracles were performed in Galilee. In this province the Sermon on the Mount was spoken. Here the Lord was transfigured.

GAL'ILEE, SEA OF. This is called by four different names in Scripture: the "Sea of Chinnereth," or "Chinneroth" (Heb. kinneret, "harp-shaped"; NIV is "Kinnereth"), the shape of the sea (Num. 34:11; Josh. 12:3; 13:27); the "lake of Gennesaret" (Luke 5:1), the name of the extended plain adjoining the lake; the "Sea of Tiberias" (John 6:1; 21:1), the name used by the natives at this time—Bahr Tarbariyeh; and "Galilee" (Matt. 4:18; 15:29). The lake is about sixty miles from Jerusalem and at one time was thirteen miles long and eight miles wide at its greatest extent, although land reclamation programs have since reduced its length. Its surface is about 700 feet below sea level, and it is about 150 feet deep at its lowest point. The Jordan River flows through it, providing much of its water supply, but that is augmented by springs in the lake floor. The fresh waters of the lake are clean, and they have always been well stocked with a variety of fish. Several towns dotted its shores in NT times, but almost all of them (Bethsaida, Capernaum, Tiberias, etc.) stood on its northern and western shores because the eastern slopes rise more precipitously from the water. The sea was the highway for considerable traffic between Damascus and the Mediterranean, and the customhouse duties from which Christ took Matthew were of no little import. Hot springs along the western shore, especially at Tiberias, brought multitudes to be cured. The high hills surrounding the below sea-level water combined with abrupt temperature changes contributed to sudden and violent storms on the lake, as various NT passages indicate (see, e.g., Mark 4:35–41; 6:45–52; John 6:16–21). It was on and about this lake that Jesus did many of His wonderful miracles. Eighteen of the thirty-three recorded miracles of Christ were probably done in the immediate neighborhood of the Sea of Galilee. In the city of Capernaum alone He performed ten of these. R.K.H.

GALL.

1. Bitter substance (Heb. mārā). The Heb. term denotes etymologically “that which is bitter”; see Job 13:26, “Thou dost write bitter things against me.” Hence the term is applied to the “bile” or “gall” from its intense bitterness (16:13; 20:25); it is also used of the “venom” of serpents (20:14), which the ancients erroneously believed was their gall.

2. Poisonous herb (Heb. rōsh), generally translated “gall” by the KJV, is in Hos. 10:4 rendered “hemlock” (“poisonous weeds,” NASB and NIV); in Deut. 32:33 and Job 20:16 rōsh denotes the “poison” or “venom” of serpents. From Deut. 29:8 and Lam. 3:19 (cf. Hos. 10:4), it is evident that the Heb. term denotes some bitter and perhaps poisonous plant. Other writers have supposed, and with some reason (from Deut. 32:32), that some berry-bearing plant must be intended. Gesenius understands this to be “poppies.” The capsules of the Papaveraceae may well give the name of rōsh (“head”) to the plant in question, just as we speak of poppy heads. The various species of this family spring up quickly in cornfields, and the juice is extremely bitter. A steeped solution of poppy heads may be “the water of gall” of Jer. 8:14 (“poisoned water,” NASB and NIV).

3. Bitter secretion (Gk. cholē, “greenish”[?]). It is recorded that just before His crucifixion the Roman soldiers offered the Lord “wine to drink mingled with gall” (Matt. 27:34) and “wine mixed with myrrh” (Mark 15:23). The Jews were in the habit of giving the criminal a stupefying drink before he was nailed to the cross, probably with the purpose of deadening pain. Much discussion has arisen both as to the nature of the drink presented to Jesus and its purpose. Perhaps the following is correct: “gall” is to be understood as expressing the bitter nature of the draught, and its purpose was to reduce the Lord’s pain during the trial of suffering before Him. See Vegetable Kingdom.

GALLERY. A term in architecture signifying projection of a story or portico, an offset, terrace (Ezek. 41:15, marg., “passageway”; 42:3, 5). Their exact form is a matter of conjecture.

GAMA'LIEL (ga-mā'li-el; "reward of God").

1. Son of Pedahzur, and the captain of the tribe of Manasseh (Num. 7:54; 10:23), who was appointed to assist Moses in numbering the people at Sinai (1:10; 2:20). He made an offering, as tribal leader, at the dedication of the altar (7:54) and was chief of his tribe when starting on the march through the wilderness (10:23), c. 1440 B.C.

2. The grandson of the great Hillel, and himself a Pharisee and celebrated doctor of the law. His learning was so eminent and his character so revered that he is one of the seven who, among Jewish doctors only, have been honored with the title of Rabban. He was called the "Beauty of the Law," and it is a saying of the Talmud that "since Rabban Gamaliel died the glory of the law has ceased." He was a Pharisee, but anecdotes told of him show that he was not confined by the narrow bigotry of the sect. He rose above the prejudices of his party. Candor and wisdom seem to have been the features of his character. That agrees with what we read of him in Acts, where he was "respected by all the people" (W. J. Coneybeare and J. S. Howson, Life and Epistles of Paul). When the apostles were brought before the Sanhedrin and enraged the council by their courage and steadfastness, the latter sought to slay them. But this rash proposal was checked by Gamaliel, who, having directed the apostles to withdraw, thus addressed the council: "Men of Israel, take care what you propose to do with these men ... stay away from these men and let them alone, for if this plan or action should be of men, it will be overthrown; but if it is of God, you will not be able to overthrow them" (Acts 5:34–39). His counsel prevailed, and the apostles were dismissed with a beating. We learn from 22:3 that he was the teacher of the apostle Paul. Ecclesiastical tradition makes him converted and baptized by Peter and Paul, together with his son Gamaliel and with Nicodemus. The Clementine Recognitions (1:65) state that he was secretly a Christian at this time. But these notices are altogether irreconcilable with the esteem and respect in which he was held even in after times by the Jewish rabbis. The interference of Gamaliel on behalf of the apostles does not prove that he secretly approved of their doctrine. He was a dispassionate judge and reasoned in that affair with the tact of worldly wisdom and experience, urging that religious opinions usually gain strength by opposition and persecution (5:35–37). If not noticed, they are sure not to leave any lasting impression on the minds of the people if devoid of truth (v. 38), and it is vain to contend against them if true (v. 39).

GAME (Heb. ṣayid, the "chase"; ṣûda, Gen. 27:3; "venison," KJV). Meat taken in hunting (25:28; 27:5–33).

GAMES. This word occurs but once in Scripture (1 Cor. 9:25, NIV), though frequent reference is made to the things signified by it.

In Bible Lands. A taste for social games in oriental lands goes back to ancient times. Sir Leonard Woolley recovered a fine Sumerian game board from Ur in lower Mesopotamia dating from before 2500 B.C. Dice from nearly every locality of the ancient East have been recovered in ivory, pottery, and numerous other substances. Gaming boards from the Eighteenth Egyptian Dynasty from c. 1560–1350 B.C. have been recovered in large numbers. A gaming board with men of clay going back to almost 5000 B.C. has been discovered in Egypt. In the University Museum at Philadelphia there is a pink alabaster game board from Abydos dated c. 2900 B.C. Ivory strips with one side painted black were used in the place of dice. Marbles go back to early times and were popular in Eighteenth Dynasty Egypt. At Tell Beit Mirsim (Kirijath-sepher) in Palestine a complete set of gaming pieces has been recovered from a royal palace. The Hyksos horsemen who invaded Egypt played at draughts for diversion. They had a square ivory board and used pyramidlike dice. On the pavement in the basement of the Convent of the Sisters of Zion in Jerusalem a second-century gaming board has been discovered. Similar games may be seen cut into the stone of the Egnatian Way in Philippi where it passes through the agora and in the Basilica Julia in the Roman Forum. A gaming board from Crete from a royal recreation room is indescribably magnificent in silver, gold, ivory, and crystal. The board is more than one yard long; its ivory framework is set with gold plate trimmed with mosaic of rock crystal and blue enamel. Around its rim are clustered marguerites with crystal centers set in blue enamel. The top of the board is incised with nautilus shells, descriptive of the Minoan islanders. Toys abound from ancient Bible times. Miniature houses, animals, and everyday scenes are depicted. Children of the well-to-do were well supplied with diversion. There are dolls with movable joints and lifelike hair. Toys from Tell Beit Mirsim include whistles, rattles, and dolls. In Egypt, elite social groups had hunting parties in the marshes. Carved sticks and wooden boomerangs were used. Harpoons, fishing spears, and bronze fishhooks have been found.

Hebrew. With regard to juvenile games, the notices are few. The only recorded sports are keeping tame birds (Job 41:5) and imitating the proceedings of marriages or funerals (Matt. 11:16–17). Physically demanding games were not much followed by the Hebrews; the natural earnestness of their character and the influence of the climate alike indisposed them to exertion. The chief amusement of the men appears to have consisted in conversation and joking (Jer. 15:17; Prov. 26:19). Some type of sport involving young men is alluded to in 2 Sam. 2:14 (see marg.). The public games of the Hebrews seem to have been exclusively connected with military sports and exercises; and it is probable that in this way the Jewish youth were instructed in the use of the bow and sling (1 Sam. 20:20; 35:40; Judg. 20:16; 1 Chron. 12:2). In Jerome's day the usual sport consisted in lifting weights as a trial of strength, as was also practiced in Egypt. Dice are mentioned by the Talmudists, probably introduced from Egypt. Public games were altogether foreign to the spirit of Hebrew institutions; the great religious festivals supplied the pleasurable excitement and the feelings of national union that rendered the games of Greece so popular, and at the same time inspired the persuasion that such gatherings should be exclusively connected with religious duties. Accordingly the erection of a gymnasium by Jason was looked upon as a heathenish proceeding (1 Macc. 1:14; 2 Macc. 4:12–14). The entire absence of verbal or historical reference to this subject in the gospels shows how little it entered into Jewish life.

Grecian. The more celebrated of the Grecian games were four in number: the Isthmian, which took place on the Isthmus of Corinth in a grove sacred to Poseidon, from 589 B.C., and was held in the first month of spring, in the second and fourth years of each Olympiad (the games to which Paul referred in 1 Cor. 9:24–27); the Nemean, celebrated in the valley of Nemea in honor of Zeus; the Olympian, celebrated in honor of Zeus at Olympia; and the Pythian, held from 586 B.C. on the Crissaeian plain, below Delphi, once in four years, in the third year of each Olympiad. The Olympic games were by far the most celebrated, and in describing these we describe the others, with certain differences. They were celebrated once every four years, from 776 B.C., and hence a period of four years was termed an Olympiad, by which period the Greeks reckoned their time. Seyffert reports: "The festival consisted of two parts: 1. The presentation of offerings, chiefly to Zeus, but also to the other gods and heroes, on the part of the Eleans, the sacred embassies, and other visitors to the feast; and 2. The contests. These consisted at first of a simple match in the stadium (1 Cor. 9:24–27), the race being run in heats of four, the winners in each heat competing together, the first in the final heat being proclaimed victor; later the runners had to make a circuit of the goal and return to the starting point; then came the long race, where the distance of the stadium had to be covered six, seven, eight, twelve, twenty, or twenty-nine times; the fivefold contest, consisting of leaping, running, quoit, spear throwing [discus and javelin throwing today] and wrestling; boxing; chariot racing in the hippodrome; pancratation (a combination of wrestling and boxing); racing in armor, and competitions between heralds and trumpeters. Originally only men took part in the contests, but after 632 B.C. boys also shared in them. At first the contests were only open to freemen of pure Hellenic descent, but they were afterward opened to Romans. Permission to view the games was given to barbarians and slaves, while it was refused to women. All competitors were obliged to take an oath that they had spent at least ten months in preparation for the games and that they would not resort to any unfair tricks in the contests. Judges, varying in number from one to twelve, but after 348 B.C. always ten, kept guard over the strict observance of all regulations and maintained order. Transgressions of the laws of the games and unfairness on the part of competitors were punished by forfeiture of the prize or by fines of money, which went to the revenue of the temple. The name of the victor, as well as his home, were proclaimed aloud by the herald and a palm branch presented him by the judges. The actual prize he only received on the last day of the festival. This was originally some article of value, but at the command of the Delphic oracle this custom was dropped, and the victors were graced by a wreath of the leaves of the sacred wild olive, said to have been originally planted by Neracles. Brilliant distinctions awaited the victor on his return home, for his victory was deemed to have reflected honor on his native land at large. He was accorded a triumph, and at Athens received 500 drachmae, the right to a place of honor at all public games, and board in the prytaneum for the rest of his life” (Dict. Class. Antiq.). These games were often held in the Hellenic towns of Palestine, being introduced by Herod into Caesarea and Jerusalem. In the former town he built a stone theater and a large amphitheater. Paul’s epistles abound with allusions to the Greek contests (see 1 Cor. 4:9; 9:24–27; 15:32; Phil. 3:14; Col. 2:18; 2 Tim. 2:5; 4:7–8; Heb. 10:33; 12:1). A direct reference to the Roman beast-fights (Gk. ethēriomachēsa) is made by Paul when he says, “If from human motives I fought with wild beasts at Ephesus” (1 Cor. 15:32). Paul takes for granted that his readers were acquainted with what he describes in such strong language, and that they would take it figuratively, since they knew that his citizenship would exclude him from condemnation to such punishment. It is here a significant figurative description of the fight with strong and exasperated enemies.

GAMMAD. See Gammadim.

GAM’MADIM (gam’a-dim). Mentioned as defenders of the towers of Tyre (Ezek. 27:11). Various explanations have been given of the meaning of the term, but the most probable is “warriors,” “brave men,” used as an epithet applied to the native troops of Tyre (marg., “valorous ones”). The RV and NIV render “Men of Gamad.” Perhaps Kumidi in northern Syria is meant, mentioned in the Amarna Letters.

GA'MUL (ga'mul; "rewarded"). The chief of the twenty-second division of priests, among whom the services of the sanctuary were distributed by lot in the time of David (1 Chron. 24:17), after 1000 B.C.

GANGRENE. See Diseases.

GAP (Heb. peres, "breach"). An opening in a wall, "breaches" (Ezek. 13:5; Amos 4:3). Such a break was dangerous in the time of siege.

Figurative. The corruption was so great in Israel that Ezekiel (22:30) declares that not a man could be found who should enter into the gap as a righteous man or avert the judgment of destruction by his intercession.

GARDEN. An enclosed plot of ground carefully cultivated. The term (Heb. gan; Gk. kēpos) applies to flower gardens (song of Sol. 6:2), spice plantations (4:16), orchards (6:11), vegetable gardens (Deut. 11:10), and probably parks (2 Kings 9:27; 21:18, 26). Bible lands have been for the most part denuded of their forests. Even groves of non-fruit-bearing trees are rare, except in the neighborhoods of cities and villages. The mountaintops are generally bare. The same is true of the tablelands of the interior. The grainfields and pastures are usually at a distance from the villages, not surrounded by fences or hedges but extending unbroken for miles in every direction, often without a single tree to diversify their surface. On the other hand the vegetable gardens, fruit orchards, mulberry groves, and trees that are cultivated for timber, such as the poplar, are grouped in and around the villages and towns, where they are accessible to the people, can be easily guarded from poachers, and above all where they can be irrigated from the water supply that is the life of the place.

The western landscape exhibits fields and pastures, divided by fences, walls, and hedgerows, interspersed with groves or scattered trees, and dotted with picturesque cottages, with here and there a village or town. The outskirts of the towns are usually more or less waste or barren. On the other hand the eastern landscape consists usually of broad areas sown with uniform crops of cotton or cereals, or terraced hillsides planted with vines, mulberries, or figs, or bleak mountaintops, often with scarcely a shrub to clothe the gray rocks. Not infrequently one may take in at a glance these varied features of the scenery without seeing a single human habitation. Suddenly, on rising above a knoll in the plains or turning an angle in the valleys, one comes upon a scene of ravishing beauty. A village, perched on the top of a rounded hill or clinging to the mountainside, or a city in a broad plain, surrounded and interspersed with luxuriant gardens, orchards, and groves of shade and timber trees, among which wind silvery streams, and over which is a haze that transforms all into a dream. As one enters this paradise the voice of the nightingale, the goldfinch, and the thrush, and the odors and bright colors of innumerable flowers and fruits please the senses. Such a scene greeted Muhammad as he looked from the barren chalk hills of Anti-Lebanon over the oasis of Damascus, and he feared to enter lest he should no longer care for paradise.

An Eastern garden is wholly unlike a Western. It is generally surrounded by a high wall of mud or stone (Prov. 24:31) or hedges or fences (Isa. 5:5), usually composed of a tangle of brambles, thorns, or canes to prevent intrusion. The door has a wooden bolt lock, by the side of which is a hole for the hand to be put through from the outside to reach the lock, which is fastened on the inner face (meshach Sol. 5:4–5). Over the gate or inside the garden is a booth or hut of boughs (Isa. 1:8), or a room, often in the shape of a tower (Mark 12:1), for the watchman. On the trees are scarecrows (Gk. probaskanion). These consist of the figure of a man perched on a limb, or of rags tied to the branches, or of the body of a bird. These gardens are not laid out with the precision of the West, with paths and beds. The vegetables, however, are planted in rows by the shallow ditches or furrows through which the water is conveyed to them (Ps. 1:3; Eccles. 2:6). This water is turned from one furrow to another either by a hoe or by moving the earthen bank that separates them by a shove of the foot (Deut. 11:10). Sometimes the vegetables are planted in a sunken parallelogram surrounded by a low, earthen wall, in which an opening is made by the foot until the space is filled with water, and then the earth is shoved back in the same way and retains the water. This process is repeated over the whole plantation. Many gardens have fountains or wells (Song of Sol. 4:15). To this allusion is made in the name En-gannim, “Fountain of Gardens,” the modern Jennîn. In the orchards and gardens were planted vines, olives (Ex. 23:11), figs, pomegranates, walnuts (Song of Sol. 6:11), flowers (6:2), henna, spikenard, saffron, calamus, cinnamon, frankincense, myrrh, aloes, and various spices (4:13–14), and a great variety of vegetables and fruits. The gardens and parks of Solomon (Eccles. 2:5–6) are supposed to have been in Wadi ’Urtâs, and the “ponds” (v. 6) are still in good preservation. The “king’s garden” (2 Kings 25:4; etc.) was near the pool of Siloam, at Bîr Ayyûb, which is probably En-rogel. G.E.P.

Figurative. A “watered garden” (Isa. 58:11; Jer. 31:12) was an emblem of fertility. A “tree planted by the water” (Jer. 17:8; cf. Ps. 1:3) was the emblem of the righteous. A waterless garden (Isa. 1:30) was a desert.

GARDEN HOUSE. The rendering in the NASB and KJV (2 Kings 9:27) of Heb. bêt haggân, in the reference to Ahaziah’s fleeing “by the way of the garden house,” although the NIV retains “Beth Haggan.” “The ‘garden house’ cannot have formed a portion of the royal gardens, but must have stood at some distance from the city of Jezreel, as Ahaziah went by the road thither, and was not wounded till he reached the height of Gur, near Jibleam” (Keil, Com.). Some think that a place is designated. In Song of Sol. 1:16–17 the bride looks with delight upon the summer house shaded with verdure and containing a couch, inviting luxurious rest.

GARDENER. A class of workmen alluded to in Job 27:18 and mentioned in John 20:15. See Agriculture; Garden; Handicrafts: Gardener.

GA’REB (gā’reb; “scabby”).

1. An Ithrite, i.e., a descendant of Jethro, or Jether, and one of David’s mighty men (2 Sam. 23:38; 1 Chron. 11:40), about 1000 B.C.

2. A hill near Jerusalem, apparently NW (Jer. 31:39).

GARLAND (Gk. stemma). In heathen sacrifices it was customary to adorn the animals with fillets and garlands and also to put garlands on the head of the idol before sacrifice. These garlands were generally composed of such trees or plants as were esteemed most agreeable to the god who was to be worshiped. It is recorded (Acts 14:13) that the priest at Lystra came out to meet Paul and Barnabas with “oxen and garlands,” but whether to adorn the oxen or the apostles is uncertain.

GARLIC, GARLICK. See Vegetable Kingdom.

GARMENTS. When the people proclaimed Jehu king they took their garments and put them under him on the stairs (2 Kings 9:13, KJV; NASB, “garment”; NIV “cloaks”), probably thus making an improvised throne for him. The spreading of garments in the streets before persons to whom it was intended to show particular honor was an ancient and general custom. Thus the people spread their garments in the way before Jesus (Matt. 21:8), while some strewed branches. The simple and uniform shape of garments encouraged the practice of gathering a large number together (Job 27:16; James 5:1–2; cf. Matt. 22:11–12) and of keeping them on hand to present to those whom it was desired to honor (Gen. 35:2; 2 Kings 5:5, “clothes”; 2 Chron. 9:24). See Dress.

GAR'MITE (gar'mīt). An epithet of Keilah (which see) in the obscure genealogy (1 Chron. 4:19) of Mered (which see).

GARNER. A place for storing away anything, especially a granary (Ps. 144:13). See also Storehouse.

GARRISON (from Heb. nāṣab, to “stand” firm). A military or fortified post (1 Sam. 13:23; 14:1, 6; etc.; 2 Sam. 23:14). In Ezek. 26:11, the KJV rendering, “garrisons,” from Heb. maṣṣēbôt, is translated “pillars” in the NASB and NIV; the reference is to pillars dedicated to Baal, two of which are mentioned by Herodotus (2.44) as standing in the temple of Hercules at Tyre, one of gold, the other of emerald.

GASH'MU (gash'mū). A prolonged form (Neh. 6:6) of the name Geshem (which see).

GA'TAM (gā'tam; “puny”). The fourth named of the sons of Eliphaz the son of Esau, and founder of an Edomite tribe (Gen. 36:11, 16; 1 Chron. 1:36), about 1800 B.C.

GATE (generally the rendering of Heb. sha'ar, “opening,” and Gk. pulē, from pelō, “to turn”). The entrance to enclosed grounds, buildings, cities, etc.

Various Names. In the Scriptures we find mentioned: (1) gates of cities, as the “Water Gate,” “Gate of Benjamin,” etc. (Neh. 1:3; 8:3; Jer. 37:13); the gate of Sodom (Gen. 19:1), of Gaza (Judg. 16:13); (2) gates of fortresses (Neh. 2:8); (3) gates of the Temple (which see); (4) gates of tombs (Matt. 27:60, NASB, “entrance”); (5) gates of prisons (Acts 12:10); (6) gates of camps (Ex. 32:26–27; see Heb. 13:11–12).

Material. We are not informed as to what materials the Israelites used for the enclosures and gates of their temporary camps. In Egyptian monuments such enclosures are indicated by lines of upright shields, with gates apparently of wicker, defended by a strong guard. Gates of bronze (Ps. 107:16; cf. Isa. 45:2) and of iron (Acts 12:10) were probably only sheeted with plates of these metals. Gates of crystal and of pearls are mentioned in Isa. 54:12; Rev. 21:21 and are supposed to refer to such doors, cut out of a single slab, as are occasionally found in ancient countries. Gates of wood were probably used in Gaza (Judg. 16:3). The doors themselves of the larger gates mentioned in Scripture were two-leaved, plated with metal, closed with locks, and fastened with metal bars (Deut. 3:5; Ps. 107:16; Isa. 45:1–2). Gates not defended by iron were of course liable to be set on fire by an enemy (Judg. 9:52). The gateways of royal palaces and even of private houses were often richly ornamented. Sentences from the law were inscribed on and above the gates (Deut. 6:9). In later Egyptian times the gates of the temples seem to have been intended as places of defense, if not the principal fortifications. The gateways of Assyrian cities were arched or square-headed, sometimes flanked by towers. The entrance to their own royal mansions was a simple passage between two colossal human-headed bulls or lions.

Purposes. The gate was the place for great assemblies of the people (Prov. 1:21), as they passed into and out of the city. This naturally led to the custom of using gates as places for public deliberation; reading the law and proclamations (2 Chron. 32:6; Neh. 8:1, 3); holding court (2 Sam. 15:2; cf. Deut. 16:18; 17:8; Ruth 4:11, marg.; etc.); gathering news (Gen. 19:1) and gossip (Ps. 69:12); attracting the attention of the sovereign or dignitary at his going out or coming in (Esther 2:19, 21; 3:2). The priests and prophets seem to have delivered their discourses, admonitions, and prophecies at the gates (Isa. 29:21; Amos 5:10; Jer. 17:19–20; 26:10). Criminals were punished outside the gates (1 Kings 21:10, 13; Acts 7:58; Heb. 13:12); Pashhur smote Jeremiah and put him in the stocks at the high gate of Benjamin (Jer.

20:2). In heathen cities the open spaces near the gates appear to have been sometimes used as places for sacrifice (Acts 14:13; cf. 2 Kings 23:8). Being positions of great importance, the gates of cities were carefully guarded and closed at nightfall (Deut. 3:5; Josh. 2:5, 7; Judg. 9:40, 44).

Figurative. Gates are thus sometimes taken as representing the city itself (Gen. 22:17; 24:60; Deut. 12:12; Judg. 5:8; Ruth 4:10, marg.; Pss. 87:2; 122:2). “The gates of righteousness” (118:19) are thought to mean the Temple gates. “The gates of death” (Job 38:17; Ps. 9:13) occur as symbols of power and empire. In Matt. 16:18 by the “gates of Hades” must be understood as all aggressions by the empire upon the Christian church.

GATEKEEPER (Heb. shôc̄ēr, from sha-ar, a “gate”; Gk. thurōros; “porter,” KJV). As used in the KJV, porter has always the sense of doorkeeper, or gatekeeper, the term used in the NASB and NIV. In the later books of the OT, written after the building of the Temple, the term is applied to the Levites who had charge of the various entrances (1 Chron. 9:17; 15:18; 2 Chron. 23:19). In 1 Chron. 15:23–24, the KJV and NIV render “doorkeeper” (“gatekeeper,” NASB) and in John 18:17 there is reference to the “slave girl ... who kept the door.” In 2 Sam. 18:26; 2 Kings 7:10–11, we meet the keeper of the city gates (cf. Acts 17:13); and a gatekeeper seems to have been usually stationed at the doors of sheepfolds. The gatekeepers of the Temple, who were guards as well, numbered 4,000 in David’s time (1 Chron. 23:5), were divided into divisions (26:1–19), and had their posts assigned them by lot (v. 13). They entered upon their service on the Sabbath day and remained a week (2 Kings 11:5–7; those mentioned in vv. 4, 10–11 are probably the king’s bodyguard). See also Watch.

GATEWAY. See Gate.

GATH (gath; “winepress”). One of the cities of the Philistine pentapolis. The site is uncertain, for the city disappeared mysteriously by some unexplained disaster hinted at in Amos 6:2. Tell es-Safi, ten miles E of Ashdod and ten miles SE of Ekron, is favored as its site. This was a famous Crusader location, from which Richard the Lionhearted made his raids on caravans near Beersheba. Araq-’el-Menshiyeh, six miles W of Beit Jibrin, has also been defended as the location of Gath. Wherever the ancient city was, it was the nearest of the large Philistine towns to Hebrew territory. It had a reputation for huge men such as Goliath (1 Sam. 17:4). Achish was king at the time of David and befriended him during Saul’s persecution, giving him the town of Ziklag. Subsequently David captured Gath (1 Chron. 18:1). Rehoboam, Solomon’s son and successor, fortified it (2 Chron. 11:8). The Aramaean king, Hazael of Damascus, captured Gath in his advance on Jerusalem (2 Kings 12:17). M.F.U.

GATH’-HE’PHER (gath-he’fer; “winepress of digging”; Josh. 19:13). A town of Zebulun, in lower Galilee, three miles from Nazareth. It was Jonah’s birthplace (2 Kings 14:25), whose reputed tomb is shown at the village of Meshed, at the top of the hill, as Neby-Yûnas. Meshed dates only to Roman times, but Gath-hepher is thought to have stood nearby.

GATH-RIM’MON (gath-ri’mon; “winepress of Rimmon or pomegranate”).

1. A Levitical city in the tribe of Dan. It was situated near Joppa, in the plain of Philistia (Josh. 19:45; 21:24; 1 Chron. 6:69). The Gath-rimmon of Josh. 21:25 is evidently a copyist’s error, occasioned by the wandering of the eye to the previous verse.

2. Also a city of the same name in the half tribe of Manasseh, called in 1 Chron. 6:70 Bileam.

GAULANI'TIS (gō-la-nī'tis). A province ruled by Herod Antipas, E of the Lake of Galilee. The name is derived from "Golan," one of the cities of refuge in the territory of Manasseh (Josh. 20:8; 21:27; Deut. 4:43). See Golan.

GAY. The term in the KJV simply means "magnificent" or "sumptuous."

GA'ZA (ga'za; "stronghold"). Like Damascus, one of the most ancient cities of the world, being a border Canaanite city before Abraham. Its Heb. name is Azzah (KJV, Deut. 2:23; 1 Kings 4:24; Jer. 25:20). It was the capital of the Philistines. Its earliest inhabitants were the Avvim, who were conquered by a Philistine tribe called the Capthorim (cf. Josh. 13:2–3). It was the scene of Samson's prowess and humiliation (Judg. 16:1–3); also of Philip's Christian service (Acts 8:26). Modern Gaza (Ghuzzeh) serves as the administrative center of the Gaza Strip, which is crowded with Arab refugees. Ancient Gaza was for long identified with Tell El-Ajjul, four miles SW of modern Gaza; but that mound is now tentatively identified with Beth-Eglaim, and ancient Gaza is thought by some to have stood within the confines of the modern city. GA'ZATHITES. See Gazites.

GAZELLE. See Animal Kingdom.

GA'ZER. See Gezer.

GA'ZEZ (ga'zez; "shearer").

1. A "son" of Caleb (son of Hezron, son of Judah) by his concubine Ephah (1 Chron. 2:46).

2. A grandson of the same Caleb, through his son Haran (1 Chron. 2:46).

GA'ZITES (ga'zīts). The designation of the inhabitants of Gaza (Josh. 13:3; Judg. 16:2).

GAZ'ZAM (gaz'am). The progenitor of one of the families of the Temple servants that returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:48; Neh. 7:51), before 536 B.C.

GE'BA (gē'ba; "hill"). A Levitical city of Benjamin (Josh. 21:17; cf. 1 Kings 15:22; 1 Sam. 13:3, 16), situated N of Jerusalem. The Philistines were struck down from "Geba as far as Gezer" by David (2 Sam. 5:25), and Gaza was rebuilt by Asa (1 Kings 15:22; 2 Chron. 16:6). "From Geba to Beersheba" expressed the whole extent of the kingdom of Judah (2 Kings 23:8). It is identified with Jeba, near Michmash.

GEBAL (gē'bal).

1. An ancient Phoenician trading city on the Mediterranean, present-day Gebeil, twenty-five miles N of Beirut (Josh. 13:5, "the land of the Gebalite"; Ezek. 27:9). The Greeks called the city Byblos, meaning "book," because here "paper" was made from imported Egyptian papyrus reeds. On this ancient writing material expense accounts, state correspondence, religious texts, and important documents were inscribed. The Phoenicians of Gebal were expert masons, especially in stonecutting (1 Kings 5:18). Gebalites were also famous for their shipbuilding and caulking (Ezek. 27:9). These famous ships of antiquity were known as "Byblos travelers" and ran between Phoenicia and Egypt. Their cargo consisted of cedar for mummy cases, oils for mummification, fancy woods, etc., returning with gold, metalwares, perfumes, and papyrus reeds. Ships of Byblos sailed the Mediterranean, as did those of Tyre and Sidon. One of the features of the Amarna Letters is the correspondence of Rib-addi with the Egyptian pharaoh; Wenamon tells of his visit to Byblos around 1100 B.C. Near Byblos the voluptuous Adonis rites in honor of Astarte were notorious. Excavations at Gebal were undertaken by Pierre Montet from 1921 to 1924 and continued by Maurice Dunand from 1925 almost until the Lebanese troubles began in 1975. A cross section of Phoenician development from about 5000 B.C. to the Roman period was obtained from the excavation of this single site. The city had an important period of development during the third millennium B.C., when it was surrounded by a massive wall encompassing an area of about twelve acres. Important temples that have come to light are one to Baalat Gebal (lady of Gebal, dating about 2800 B.C.), the “L-shaped temple” (dating a century or more later), and the “obelisk temple” (dating c. 1800 B.C.). Another significant discovery was the royal necropolis, with nine tombs of kings of Byblos. Most ornate was the sarcophagus of Ahiiram with its early alphabetic inscription dating about 1000 B.C.

2. NE Edom, known also as Teman (Ps. 83:7), allied itself with Moabites and Arabians against Israel. H.F.V.

GE'BER (gē'ber; “warrior”). The son of Uri and one of Solomon's deputies, having jurisdiction over Gilead (1 Kings 4:19). His son (probably) had charge of Ramoth-gilead (v. 13), after 1000 B.C.

GE'BIM (ge'bim; “cisterns,” Jer. 14:3; in Isa. 33:4, “locusts”). A city of Benjamin, between Anathoth and Nob, mentioned only in Isa. 10:31 and identified by various scholars with Khirbet ed-Duweir. Others suggest Bath el-Battash.

GECK'O. See Animal Kingdom.

GEDALIAH (ged-a-lī'a; “made great by Jehovah”).

1. The son of Jeduthun and his second assistant in the Levitical choir selected by David for the Temple service (1 Chron. 25:3, 9), before 960 B.C.

2. A descendant of Jeshua, and one of the priests who divorced their Gentile wives after the Babylonian captivity (Ezra 10:18), 456 B.C.

3. The son of Pashhur, and one of the Jewish officials who, hearing a prophecy of Jeremiah, conspired to accuse and imprison the prophet (Jer. 38:1, 4), 589 B.C.

4. The son of Ahikam (Jeremiah's protector, Jer. 26:24) and grandson of Shaphan. After the destruction of the Temple (587 B.C.), Nebuchadnezzar departed from Judea, leaving Gedaliah as governor. He was stationed, with a Chaldean guard, at Mizpah. Gedaliah had inherited his father's respect for Jeremiah (Jer. 40:5) and was, moreover, enjoined by Nebuzaradan to look after his safety and welfare (39:11–14). Having established his government at Mizpah, the inhabitants, who had fled at the advance of the Chaldean armies when the troops of Zedekiah were dispersed in the plains of Jericho, quitting their retreats, began to gather around him. Gedaliah advised submission and quietness, promising them, on this condition, the undisturbed enjoyment of their possessions. The labors of the field were resumed, and they “gathered in wine and summer fruit in great abundance” (40:12). Jeremiah joined Gedaliah, and Mizpah became the resort of Jews from various quarters (40:6, 12), many of whom, as might be expected at the end of a long war, were in a demoralized state, unrestrained by religion, patriotism, or prudence. The wise, gentle, and prosperous reign of Gedaliah did not secure him from the foreign jealousy of Baalis, king of Ammon, and the domestic ambition of Ishmael, a member of the royal family of Judah (Josephus Ant. 10.9.3). The latter came to Mizpah with a secret purpose of destroying Gedaliah. Gedaliah, generously refusing to believe a friendly warning that he received of the intended treachery, was murdered with his Jewish and Chaldean followers, two months after his appointment. After his death the Jews, anticipating the resentment of the king of Babylon, gave way to despair. Many, forcing Jeremiah to accompany them, fled to Egypt under Johanan (2 Kings 25:22–26; Jer. 40:13; 41:18).

GE'DER (ge'der; “walled”). A city of the Canaanites taken by Joshua (Josh. 12:13); identical probably with Gedor (which see).

GEDE'RAH (ge-de'ra; "sheepcote"). A city of Judah with a Phoenician title. It is the feminine form of Geder (Josh. 12:13), and its plural is Gederoth (15:41). Identified with Jedireh about twelve miles SW of Lod.

GED'ERATHITE (ged'e-ra-thīt). An epithet of Jozabad, one of David's famous warriors at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:4), so called from being a native of Gedor or Gederah.

GED'ERITE (ged'e-rīt). An epithet of Baal-hanan, David's overseer of olive and sycamore groves in the low plains of Judah (1 Chron. 27:28), probably so called from being a native of Geder or Gederah.

GED'EROTH (ged'e-rōth; "fortresses"). A town in the "valley" of Judah (Josh. 15:41) captured by the Philistines from Ahaz (2 Chron. 28:18). Possibly modern Qatra, about eleven miles SW of Lod.

GEDEROTHA'IM (ged'e-rō-tha'im; "double wall"). Named (Josh. 15:36) among the valley towns of Judah.

GE'DOR (ge'dor; "a wall").

1. A leader of the Benjamites resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:31; 9:37), before 536 B.C.

2. An ancient city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:58), some of whose inhabitants joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:7). It was probably to this town that Jozabad the Gederathite belonged (12:4). Some identify it with Geder. The village is now called Jedûr and is located about seven miles N of Hebron.

3. It is said in 1 Chron. 4:39, "They went to the entrance of Gedor, even to the east side of the valley," etc. It is impossible to determine exactly the location of this Gedor, but it is not to be identified with no. 2.

GE HARASHIM, GE-HAR'ASHIM, (gē-har'-ashim; "craftsmen"). The NASB and NIV render "Joab the father of Ge-harashim" (1 Chron. 4:14). The term refers to the "valley of craftsmen" (cf. 4:14, marg.; Neh. 11:35), not far from Jerusalem. The KJV renders "Charashim."

GEHA'ZI (ge-hā'zī). The servant of Elisha. The first mention of him is his reminding his master of the best mode of rewarding the kindness of the Shunammite woman (2 Kings 4:12–17). He was present when she told the prophet of her son's death and was sent by Elisha to lay his staff upon the face of the child, which he did without effect (4:25–36). The most remarkable incident in his career is that which caused his ruin. When Elisha declined the rich gifts of Naaman, Gehazi coveted at least a portion of them. He therefore ran after the retiring chariots and requested, in his master's name, a portion of the gifts, on the pretense that visitors had arrived for whom he was unable to provide. He asked for a talent of silver and two garments, and the grateful Syrian made him take two talents instead of one. Having hid the spoil, he appeared before Elisha, who asked him where he had been. Upon his answering, "Your servant went nowhere," the prophet denounced his crime and told him that the leprosy of Naaman should cleave to him and to his seed forever. "So he went out from his presence a leper as white as snow" (5:20–27). We afterward find Gehazi recounting to King Joram the great deeds of Elisha, and, in the providence of God, it happened that while he was speaking of the restoration of the child of the Shunammite woman, she appeared with her son before the king to claim her house and lands, of which she had been despoiled during the recent famine. Struck by the coincidence, the king immediately granted her request (8:1–6).

GEHEN'NA (ge-hen'a; Gk. geenna, for the Heb. hinnōm, the "Valley of Hinnom"). A deep, narrow glen to the S of Jerusalem where the Jews offered their children to Molech. The OT renders "valley of the son of Hinnom," or "Ben Hinnom" (2 Kings 23:10; Jer. 7:31; 19:2– 6). In later times it served as a receptacle of all sorts of putrefying matter and all that defiled the holy city, and so became the representative or image of the place of everlasting punishment, especially on account of its ever-burning fires; and to this fact the words of Christ refer when He mentions “the unquenchable fire.” “The passages of the New Testament show plainly that the word ‘gehenna’ was a popular expression for ‘hell’ of which Jesus and his apostles made use, but it would be erroneous to infer that Jesus and his apostles merely accommodated themselves to the popular expression, without believing in the actual state of the lost.” In the NT the word gehenna (“hell”) falls many times from the lips of Christ in most awesome warning of the consequences of sin (Matt. 5:22, 29–30; 10:28; 18:9; 23:15, 33; Mark 9:43, 45, 47; Luke 12:5). He describes it as a place where their “worm” never dies and their “fire” is never to be quenched. Gehenna is identical in meaning with the “lake of fire” (Rev. 19:20; 20:10, 14–15). Moreover, the “second death” and “the lake of fire” are identical terms (20:14). These latter scriptural expressions describe the eternal state of the wicked as forever separated from God and consigned to the special abode of unrepentant angels and people in the eternal state. The term second is employed relating to the preceding physical death of the wicked in unbelief and rejection of God (John 8:21–24). That the “second death” (“lake of fire” or gehenna) is not annihilation is shown clearly by Rev. 19:20 and 20:10. After 1,000 years in the lake of fire the Beast and false prophet still exist there undestroyed. The phrase “forever and ever” (“to the ages of the ages”), describing the destiny of the lost in Heb. 1:8, also applies to the duration of the throne of God as eternal in the sense of being unending. Thus is represented the punishment of the wicked. Gehenna, moreover, is not to be confused with Hades or Sheol (which see), which describe the intermediate state of the wicked previous to the judgment and the eternal state. See Hades; Lake of Fire; Hell; Hinnom. M.F.U.

GEL'LOTH (gel'i-lōth; “circles”). A place on the boundary of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 18:17) and probably another form of Gilgal (15:7).

GEM. See Jewel, Jewelry.

GEMAL'LI (ge-mal'i; “camel driver”). The father of Ammiel, the Danite representative among those who explored the land of Canaan (Num. 13:12), c. 1440 B.C.

GEMARI'AH (gem-a-rī'a; “Jehovah has perfected”).

1. The son of Hilkiyah who, with Elasah son of Shaphan, was sent to Babylon as ambassador by King Zedekiah. They also took charge of a letter from Jeremiah to the Jewish captives at Babylon, advising them to settle peaceably in the land of captivity, promising deliverance after seventy years and warning them against false prophets (Jer. 29:3), about 597 B.C.

2. The son of Shaphan, one of the nobles of Judah, and a scribe of the Temple in the time of Jehoiakim. Baruch read aloud the prophecies of Jeremiah to the people at the official chamber of Gemariah (or from a window in it), which was attached to the new gate of the Temple built by King Jotham (Jer. 36:10; cf. 2 Kings 15:35). Gemariah's son Micaiah having reported this to his father, Baruch was invited to repeat the reading at the scribe's chamber in the palace before Gemariah and others, who gave an account of the matter to the king (Jer. 36:11–20). He, with the others, heard the divine message with fear. Gemariah and two others entreated the king not to destroy the roll (36:21–25), about 608 B.C.

GENEALOGY (Gk. genealogia; Heb. sēper tōl □ dōt, “the book of the generations”).

Accounts or family registers tracing the descent and ancestral relationships of tribes and families. The older histories being usually drawn up on a genealogical basis, “genealogy” is often extended to the whole history, as “the book of the genealogy of Jesus Christ” includes the whole history contained in that gospel (Matt. 1:1; cf. Gen. 2:4; etc.). This genealogical form of history was not peculiar to the Hebrew or the Semitic races, for the earliest Greek histories were also genealogies.

The Redemptive Purpose of God. God's redemptive purpose took from the first a specific family direction, and it was important that at least the more prominent links in the successive generations of those more closely connected with the development of that purpose should be preserved to future times. It is the genealogy of mankind in its bearing on redemption—reaching through the line of Seth to Noah, then from Noah through the line of Shem to Abraham, then again through the lines of Isaac, Jacob, Judah, and David to Christ—over which the providence of God most carefully watched and which has been most fully exhibited in the historical records of Scripture. The promise of the land of Canaan to the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob successively, and the separation of the Israelites from the Gentile world; the expectation of the Messiah to spring from the tribe of Judah; the exclusively hereditary priesthood of Aaron with its dignity and emoluments; the long succession of kings in the line of David; and the whole division and occupation of the land upon genealogical principles by the tribes, families, and houses of fathers, gave a deeper importance to the science of genealogy among the Jews than perhaps any other nation.

Different Genealogies. “In Gen. 35:22–26 we have a formal account of the sons of Jacob, the patriarchs of the nation, repeated in Ex. 1:1–5. In Gen. 46 we have an exact genealogical census of the house of Israel at the time of Jacob's going down to Egypt. When the Israelites were in the wilderness of Sinai their number was taken by divine command ‘after their families, by the house of their fathers.’ According to these genealogical divisions they pitched their tents, and marched, and offered their gifts and offerings, chose the spies, and the whole land of Canaan was parceled out among them.”

David, in establishing the Temple services, divided the priests and Levites into divisions and companies, each under the family leader. When Hezekiah reopened the Temple and restored the Temple services, he reckoned the whole nation by genealogies. Zerubbabel's first care seems to have been to take a census of those who had returned from Babylon and to settle them according to their genealogies (see 1 Chron. 9:1–3). In like manner Nehemiah gathered together “the nobles, the officials, and the people to be enrolled by genealogies” (Neh. 7:5). That this system was continued in later times, at least as far as the priests and Levites were concerned, we learn from 12:22; and we have incidental evidence from the apocryphal books (1 Macc. 2:1–5; 8:17; 14:29) of the continued care of the Jews later still to preserve their genealogies. Another proof is the existence of our Lord's genealogy in two forms, as given by Matthew and Luke. The mention of Zacharias as “of the division of Abija,” of Elizabeth as “from the daughters of Aaron,” and of Anna the daughter of Phanuel as “of the tribe of Asher” are further indications of the same thing (Luke 1:5; 2:36). From all this it is abundantly manifest that the Jewish genealogical records continued to be kept till near the destruction of Jerusalem; there can be little doubt that the registers of the Jewish tribes and families perished at the destruction of Jerusalem, and not before.

“The Jewish genealogies have two forms, one giving the generations in a descending, the other in an ascending scale. Examples of the descending form may be seen in Ruth 4:18–22, or 1 Chron. 3; of the ascending 1 Chron. 6:33–43, KJV; Ezra 7:1–5. Females are named in genealogies when there is anything remarkable about them, or when any right or property is transmitted through them (see Gen. 11:29; 22:23; 25:1–4; 35:22–26; Ex. 6:23; Num. 26:33; 1 Chron. 2:4, 19, 35, 50, etc.)” (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

Abbreviated Genealogies. B. B. Warfield showed more than a half-century ago that the Bible genealogies contained gaps (“The Antiquity and Unity of the Human Race,” Studies in Theology [1932], pp. 235–58). The genealogies in Ex. 6:16–24, Ezra 7:1–5, and Matt. 1:1–17 contain omissions. This is most certainly the case also in the genealogies of Gen. 5 and 11. To use these genealogical lists in Genesis to calculate the creation of man (c. 4004 B.C.), as Archbishop Ussher has done, is not only unwarranted from a comparative study of scriptural genealogies, but incontestably disproved by the well-attested facts of modern archaeology. The total length of the period from the creation of man to the Flood and from the Flood to Abraham is not specified in Scripture. That the genealogies of Gen. 5 and 11 are most assuredly drastically abbreviated and have names that are highly selective is suggested by the fact that each list contains only ten names, ten from Adam to Noah and ten from Shem to Abraham. It is quite evident that symmetry was the goal in constructing these genealogical lists rather than a setting forth of unbroken descent from father to son, in contrast to modern registers of pedigree. Such symmetry with the omission of certain names is obvious from the genealogy of Matt. 1:1–17. This fact is further corroborated by the evident latitude used in ancient Semitic languages in the expressions “begat,” “bare,” “father,” and “son.” This usage is completely contrary to English idiom. Thus to “beget” a “son” may mean to beget an actual child or a grandchild or a great-grandchild, or even distant descendants. Usage extends to tribes or countries (Gen. 10:2–22) and even to nonblood relationship. Jehu, the usurper and founder of a new dynasty in Israel and with no blood connection whatever to the house of Omri, is nevertheless called “son of Omri” by Shalmaneser III of Assyria (Daniel David Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, vol. 1, sec. 590). Nebuchadnezzar is called the “father” of Belshazzar, who was actually the son of Nabonidus, a usurper (Dan. 5:2). Accordingly, as J. H. Raven says in the regular recurring formula “A lived ... years and begat B, and A lived after he begat B ... years and begat sons and daughters, and B lived ... years and begat C,” B may not be the literal son of A but a distant descendant. If so, the age of A is his age at the birth of the child from whom B is descended. Between A and B, accordingly, many centuries may intervene. The Genesis genealogical lists are not intended to divulge the antiquity of man upon the earth but to set forth in outstanding representative names the line of the promised Redeemer (Gen. 3:15) from Adam to Abraham and to show the effects of sin and the altered conditions brought about by the Flood upon human vitality and longevity. Added evidence that the genealogies of chaps. 5 and 11 contain extensive breaks is demonstrated by the fact that they allow only about 4,000 years from the creation of Adam to Christ. On the other hand, modern archaeology clearly traces sedentary pottery cultures such as that from Tell Halaf well before 4000 B.C.

GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST. See Chronology, New Testament; Jesus.

GENERATION. The word generation in the Scriptures is used in at least three shades of meaning that are closely related and grow out of each other. (1) The basic meaning is that of the production of offspring, in which sense it is applied to the offspring of an individual or successions of offspring noted in a genealogical table and called a “book of the generations,” or (NIV) “written account” (Gen. 5:1; 37:2; Matt. 1:17), i.e., lists of successive lines of descent from father to son. (2) A period of time. Differing as the intervals do in this respect, generation could never be intended to mark a definite period and must be understood with considerable latitude. The term is used in the sense of time or successive divisions of time. For generation in the sense of a definite period of time, see Gen. 15:16 and Deut. 23:2–3, 8. As an indefinite period of time: for time past, see 32:7; Isa. 58:12, KJV; for time future, see Pss. 45:17; 72:5. (3) The word is also taken to denote the persons actually constituting a specific generation, as exponents of its state or character, as in “this generation” (Matt. 11:16), “an evil and adulterous generation” (12:39), “unbelieving and perverted generation” (17:17), “crooked and perverse generation” (Phil. 2:15). Delitzsch (Com., on Isa. 53:8) thus defines generation: “We must adhere to the ordinary usage, according to which dôr signifies an age, or the men living in a particular age; also, in an ethical sense, the entire body of those who are connected together by similarity of disposition (Ps. 14:5).”

GENESIS (jen'e-sis; the book of origins; Gk. genesis, “origin”). Traditionally the introductory book of the entire body of Hebrew sacred literature and of revealed truth in general.

Name. The book takes its name from the title given to it in the LXX version, which is derived from the heading of its ten parts hē biblos geneseōs (2:4; 5:1; 6:9; 10:1; 11:10; 11:27; 25:12; 25:19; 36:1; 37:2). The Hebrews call the book brēshît, meaning “in the beginning.” The recurring phrase “these are the tôl□dôt of” completes the various sections and points to immediately preceding material. It does not serve as a section heading and is comparable to the colophon that ended ancient Babylonian tablets.

Design. As the book of beginnings Genesis recounts the beginning of the physical creation of all plant, animal, and human life, as well as human institutions and social relationships. The book illustrates (as does the entire Bible) the principle of selection. Those events necessary to introduce the drama of human redemption are narrated: the creation, the Fall, the Flood, the call of Abraham, and mention of the promised Redeemer (3:15–16; 12:1–3; 49:10).

Outline.

- I. The primeval history of mankind (1:1–11:26)
 - The creation (1:1–2:25)
 - From the Fall to the Flood (3:1–5:32)
 - The Flood (6:1–9:29)
 - From the Flood to Abraham (10:1–11:26)
- II. The patriarchal history of Israel (11:27–50:26)
 - Abraham (11:27–25:10)
 - Isaac (25:11–28:9)
 - Jacob (28:10–36:43)
 - Jacob’s sons, particularly Joseph (37:1–50:26)

Literary Scheme. The narrative of Genesis is hung upon a genealogical skeleton marked by the phrase that occurs ten times: “These are the generations [tôlfdôt, “histories,” “family histories,” “narratives”] of.”

Critical View. Critics partition the book of Genesis and view it as composed of composite sources pieced together by a late exilic or postexilic editor. J, the Jehovist, possibly wrote about 850 B.C., in the S (Judah), employing the name Jehovah. E, the Elohist, is said to have used the name Elohim, writing about 750 B.C., in the N (Ephraim). The narrative sections J and E were allegedly fitted into the scriptural history of the origin of the Jewish nation, called the Priestly Code (P), about 500 B.C. This documentary theory, which was subtly developed, highly plausible, and universally popular, is a highly traditional product of modern rationalistic skepticism and is based on false literary criteria, unsound philosophic presuppositions, and a manifest enmity against the miraculous and the prophetic elements that constitute the foundation of the Pentateuch. (See R. K. Harrison, Introduction to the Old Testament [1969], pp. 542–65.)

Chronology. Genesis leaves both the date of the creation of the world and of man an unsettled question. According to Gen. 1:1 the earth was created in the dateless past. The appearance of man upon the earth is described as accomplished by a direct act of God that occurred at least more than 4,000 years B.C. and perhaps as early as 7,000–10,000 B.C. However, any considerably earlier date for the creation of man such as the evolutionists' greatly expanded ages is out of focus with the Genesis narratives. For detailed discussion of chronology as it relates to the book of Genesis, see Abbreviated Genealogies, under Genealogy.

GENITALS. See Flesh.

GENNES'ARET (ge-nes'a-ret; "garden of riches"). The earliest use of the name in 1 Macc. 11:67, Genesar. The Targums identify the name with Chinnereth (Deut. 3:17; Josh. 19:35), which is applied both to the lake and the town.

1. The town stood on the W shore of the lake, called in the OT Chinnereth (which see), or Kinnereth.

2. The district was a small region of Galilee, on the W shore of the lake, visited by Jesus on His way S to Capernaum (Matt. 14:34).

3. The lake was called in Luke 5:1 the Sea of Galilee (which see).

GENTILE.

Old Testament. The Heb. gôyim signified the nations, the surrounding nations, foreigners as opposed to Israel (Neh. 5:8).

New Testament. (1) The Gk. ethnos in the singular means a people or nation (Matt. 24:7; Acts 2:5; etc.), and even the Jewish people (Luke 7:5; 23:2; etc.). It is only in the plural that it is used for heathen (Gentiles). (2) Hellē, lit., Greek (John 7:35; Rom. 3:9). The KJV is not consistent in its treatment of this word, sometimes rendering it "Greek" (Acts 14:1; 17:4; Rom. 1:16; 10:12), sometimes "Gentile" (2:9–10; 3:9; 1 Cor. 10:32). The latter use of the word seems to have arisen from the almost universal adoption of the Gk. language.

Relation to Israel. What rendered the Jews a distinct and honored class was simply their election by God to the place of His peculiar people, by which they became the recognized depositories of His truth and the consecrated channels of His working among men. The distinction between Israel and other nations, as was shown in the covenant with Abraham, was to be only for a time; and believing Gentiles in no age were excluded from sharing in the benefits conferred upon the Jews when they showed themselves willing to enter into the bond of the covenant.

Hedged in by a multitude of special institutions and taught to consider nonobservance of these customs as uncleanness, as well as blinded by an intense national pride, the Jews seemed often to regard the heathen as only existing for the purpose of punishing the apostasy of Israel (Deut. 28:49–50; 1 Kings 8:33; etc.) or of undergoing vengeance for their enmity toward her (Isa. 63:6).

“Considering the wall of strict separation which, as regards matters of religion the Jews had erected between themselves and the Gentiles, it would not readily occur to one that these latter were also permitted to take part in the worship at Jerusalem. It may be accounted for, however, by reflecting how formal and superficial the connection often is between faith and worship. To present a sacrifice in some famous sanctuary was often no more than an expression, on the part of the offerer, of a cosmopolitan piety, and not intended to be an expression of the man’s creed. This might take place at Jerusalem, for there was no reason why the Jewish people and their priests should discountenance an act intended to do honor to their God, even though it were purely an act of politeness. Accordingly we find the Old Testament itself proceeding on the assumption that a sacrifice might be legitimately offered even by a Gentile” (Lev. 22:25; Schürer, History of the Jewish People in the Time of Christ, div. 2, 1:299ff.; also 2:311).

The form that the adhesion of Gentiles to Judaism assumed, and the extent to which they observed the ceremonial laws of the Jews, were of a varied character. Tertullian speaks of Gentiles who, while observing several Jewish ordinances, continued notwithstanding to worship their own deities. On the other hand, those who submitted to circumcision thereby bound themselves to observe the whole law to its fullest extent. Between these two extremes there would be a manifold series of gradations. The “God-fearing” Gentiles mentioned (Acts 10:2, 22; 13:16, 26, 43; 17:17) were probably those who adopted the Jewish mode of worship and attended the synagogues but restricted themselves to certain leading points of the ceremonial law, and so were regarded as outside the fellowship of Jewish communities (Schürer, 2:311ff.). See Heathen.

In Prophecy. In the prophetic Word there is a clear distinction between “Jews ... Greeks or ... the church of God” (1 Cor. 10:32). In this present age all the saved are members of “the church of God.” Unsaved people are either Jews, who are nationally set aside in the present age, or Gentiles. The Word of God clearly outlines the future of the Gentiles. Having their origin in Adam they consequently also have their natural headship in him as do unsaved Jews. Having partaken of the Fall, they are nevertheless the subjects of prophecy that foretells that some of them will yet share as a subordinate people with Israel in her coming kingdom glory (Isa. 2:4; 60:3, 5, 12; 62:2; Acts 15:17). Their condition from Adam to Christ rests upon a fivefold indictment: “separate from Christ, excluded from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenants of promise, having no hope and without God in the world” (Eph. 2:12). Consequent upon the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, and the advent of the Spirit, admission to gospel privilege was accorded to Gentiles (Acts 10:45; 11:17–18). In the present age from Pentecost to the out-taking of the Body of Christ, God is calling out an elect company from among the Gentiles (15:14) to form the church. The salvation of this age is not a question of sharing Israel’s earthly covenants, which even Israel is not now enjoying, but rather the grace brought by Jesus Christ in being privileged to partake of a heavenly citizenship. Prophecy reveals, too, that the mass of Gentiles will not in the present age enter by faith into those blessings. Consequently, Gentiles move on as “the nations” to the end of their stewardship as earth rulers. The termination of this period will be the end of the “times of the Gentiles” (Luke 21:24; cf. Dan. 2:36–44). The nations will thus pass through the Tribulation judgments and will be judged as nations at the second coming of Christ (Matt. 25:31–46). The basis of the judgment will be the treatment of the Jew—“these brothers of Mine.” The sheep will enter into the millennial kingdom; the goats, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels (25:41). “And these will go away into eternal punishment, but the righteous into eternal life” (25:46). The Gentile is also distinctly revealed in the eternal state. After the creation of the new heavens and the new earth, when the New Jerusalem comes down from God out of heaven (Rev. 3:12; 21:2, 10), “the nations shall walk by its light, and the kings of the earth shall bring their glory into it ... and they shall bring the glory and the honor of the nations into it" (21:24–26). Gentiles thus always remain distinct from the nation Israel; therefore, there is no defensible reason for misapplying this great body of Scripture bearing on the Gentiles either to the Jew or to the church of God. See Jews; Heathen.

GENTILES, COURT OF THE. See Temple.

GENTLENESS (Heb. ǎnāwâ, "condescension," Ps. 18:35; Gk. epieikeia, "clemency," 2 Cor. 10:1). "All God's going back from the strictness of his rights as against men, all his allowing of their imperfect righteousness and giving a value to that which, rigidly estimated, would have none; all his refusal to exact extreme penalties; all his remembering whereof we are made and measuring his dealings with us thereby" (Trench, Synonyms of the N.T.); giving all this, God demands the same spirit of gentleness from us toward others (Matt. 18:23–35). It is the helping grace of God, that practical hearkening on the part of God when called upon for help, and which was manifested in the bettered condition of the psalmist (2 Sam. 22:36; Ps. 18:35). The Gk. words rendered "gentle" or "gentleness," carrying the underlying meaning of affable, kindly, and humble (Gal 6:1; 2 Tim. 2:25; Titus 3:2).

GENU'BATH (ge-nu'bath; "theft"). The son of Hadad, of the royal Edomite family, by the sister of Tahpenes, the queen of Egypt, and reared in Pharaoh's household (1 Kings 11:20). He was born in the palace of Pharaoh, was weaned by the queen herself, and was on the same footing as the sons of the king.

GE'RA (ge'ra). The name of at least three Benjamites, perhaps from gēr (Heb. "sojourner").

1. The son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:3); probably the same as the one mentioned (with some confusion) in vv. 5, 7, unless one of these is identical with no. 2. In Gen. 46:21 he is given as the son of Benjamin and appears there among the descendants of Jacob at the time of his removal to Egypt, about 1871 B.C. In 1 Chron. 7:7, Uzzi occupies the same position as Gera does elsewhere in the genealogy.

2. The father (or ancestor) of Ehud the judge (Judg. 3:15), before 1295 B.C.

3. The father of Shimei, who cursed David when he fled from Absalom (2 Sam. 16:5; 19:16, 18–23; 1 Kings 2:8), before 966 B.C.

GERAH. The smallest weight and coin among the Hebrews. See Metrology.

GE'RAR (ge'rar). A Philistine city figuring prominently in the patriarchal narratives of Abraham (Gen. 20:1–2) and of Isaac (chap. 26). Both of these patriarchs had somewhat similar experiences with their wives and Abimelech (of Gerar). Tell el-Jemmeh (eight miles S of Gaza), partly excavated by the great Egyptian archaeologist Sir Flinders Petrie, used to be identified with Gerar. There is a tendency now to accept Abu Hureira, eleven miles SE of Gaza, as the site of Gerar. D. Alon excavated there in 1956 and found that it was inhabited continually through every period from Chalcolithic times to the Iron Age and was prosperous during the Middle Bronze Age (the patriarchal period). GER'ASA (ger'a-sa). There is a diversity of opinion concerning the location of the place where Jesus healed the demoniac. Kersa, apparently formerly Gergesa, on the eastern shore of the Galilean Sea across from Magdala seems to be the most likely location. It has a topography fitting the details of the narrative (Luke 8:33). There was a Gadara (Muqeis) some half-dozen miles SE of the S end of the Sea of Galilee, but this does not suit Mark 5:13. Thus Christ's miracle of healing is sometimes still identified with Gerasa, the splendid Nabataean city of Jerash, some forty miles SE of the Sea of Galilee in Transjordan, but this seems extremely unlikely in view of the great distance from the scene of Christ's Perea ministry. However, our Lord may have been in this magnificent city. Certainly some to whom He ministered lived in this city, and the result of His ministry certainly extended there (Mark 5:20). Jerash was called the "Pompeii of the East." It is the best-preserved Palestinian city from the Roman era. The British School of Archaeology in Jerusalem, The American Schools of Oriental Research and Yale University have cooperated in the excavations at Jerash during the years 1925 to 1940. In the 1970s restorations were carried out at the south theater. As one approaches the city from the S, he first sees the great triumphal arch of the emperor Hadrian, who visited the city in 129. To the left of the arch sprawls the hippodrome. Beyond that the south gate leads directly into the circular forum, unique in the Greco-Roman world. From the forum, on the left, a great flight of steps led up to the temple of Zeus, begun in A.D. 22. Next to it stood the first-century south theater with seating for some 5,000 people. From the forum northward led the main street of the city, just over a mile long. It was flanked by 260 Ionic and Corinthian columns on each side. All the principal buildings and the best shops had their entrances from this street. To the left on the highest point in town rose the second-century temple of Artemis, patron goddess of the municipality, with its forty-five-foot Corinthian columns. What is especially interesting to the Bible student is that at Jerash the decline of paganism can be traced in masonry, as the form and fabric of pagan temples were incorporated in Christian churches, such as St. Theodore's and the Cathedral. Jerash was rivaled in size by Palmyra and in cultic importance by Syrian Baalbek. See Gadara. H.F.V. BIBLIOGRAPHY: C. H. Kraeling, ed., Gerasa, City of the Decapolis (1938); D. Kirkbride, Bulletin of the Archaeological Institute, London 1 (1958): 9–20; M. Several manuscripts read Gerasēnōn, instead of Gergesēnōn, in Matt. 8:28 ("Gadarenes").

GERGESENE' (gur'ge-sēnz). The reading in the KJV in the account of the expulsion of the swine from the demoniac by Jesus (Matt. 8:28), instead of Gerasene (Mark 5:1; Luke 8:26).

GER'IZIM (ger'i-zim). The mountain of the Gerizzites, situated opposite Mt. Ebal and over the valley of Shechem, which was about three miles in length and not wider than will allow the hearing of a voice across. Gerizim is 2,849 feet above the Mediterranean and today is called Jebel el-Tor. From its summit much of Palestine can be seen. It was the scene of the parable of the trees and brambles (Judg. 9:7–15). Tradition attempts to locate here Abraham's altar built for the sacrifice of Isaac and also his interview with Melchizedek. After the captivity Manasseh, by permission of Alexander the Great, built a temple on Gerizim, and the Samaritans joined together the worship of idols and the true God (2 Kings 17:33). This temple was destroyed by John Hyrcanus c. 128 B.C. To this day the sect offers annual Paschal sacrifice on the top of the mount according to the prescriptions of Ex. 12. Moses commanded (Deut. 11:29; 27:12–13) that from Mt. Gerizim the blessings of the law should be proclaimed, while its curses should proceed from Mt. Ebal (cf. Josh. 8:33).

Robert J. Bull of Drew University excavated at Tell er-Ras, a spur on the N slope of Mt. Gerizim, in 1964. There he found remains of a temple of Zeus built in the days of the Roman emperor Hadrian during the second century A.D. Under that were remains of a Hellenistic structure sixty-eight by sixty-five feet, which may have been the Samaritan temple destroyed by Hyrcanus. H.F.V.

GER'SHOM (gur-shom; "sojourner," Ex. 2:22; cf. Arab. jarash, "bell").

1. The elder of the two sons of Moses, born to him in the land of Midian by Zipporah (Ex. 2:22; 18:3), before 1441 B.C. He, with his brother, Eliezer, held no other rank than that of simple Levites, while the sons of their uncle Aaron enjoyed all the privileges of the priesthood (1 Chron. 23:15–16), a proof of the rare disinterestedness of Moses. Shebuel, one of his descendants, was appointed ruler of the treasury under David (1 Chron. 26:24).

2. The oldest son of Levi (1 Chron. 6:16–17, 20, 43, 62, 71; 15:7), elsewhere written Gershon (which see), as in the NIV.

3. The son of one Manasseh (according to the text), and father of Jonathan, who acted as priest to the Danites who captured Laish (Judg. 18:30); but, according to a more correct reading, he is not different from the son of Moses. The Talmud explains the substitution of “Manasseh” for “Moses” in the text by asserting that Jonathan did the works of Manasseh and was therefore reckoned in his family.

4. A descendant of Phinehas, who went up with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:2), 457 B.C. GER'SHON (gur-shon; “expulsion”). The eldest of the three sons of Levi, apparently born before the migration of Jacob’s family into Egypt (Gen. 46:11; Ex. 6:16), c. 1871 B.C. But though the eldest born, the families of Gershon were outstripped in fame by the descendants of Kohath, from whom sprang Moses and the priestly line of Aaron (1 Chron. 6:2–15). At the census in the wilderness the Gershonites numbered 7,500 males (Num. 3:22), the number of efficient men being 2,630 (4:40). The sons of Gershon had charge of the fabrics of the Tabernacle—the coverings, screen, hangings, and cords (3:25–26; 4:25–26). In the encampment their station was behind the Tabernacle, on the W side (3:23). When on the march, they went with the Merarites, in the rear of the first body of three tribes—Judah, Issachar, Zebulun—with Reuben behind them. In the apportionment of the Levitical cities thirteen fell to the lot of the Gershonites—two in Manasseh beyond the Jordan, four in Issachar, four in Asher, and three in Naphtali. In the time of David the family was represented by Asaph “the seer” (1 Chron. 6:39–43). It is not easy to see what special duties fell to the lot of the Gershonites in the service of the Tabernacle after its erection at Jerusalem, or in the Temple. They were appointed to “prophesy”—i.e., probably, to utter or sing inspired words, perhaps after the special prompting of David himself (24:1–2). Others of the Gershonites, sons of Ladan, had charge of the “treasures of the house of God, and of the treasures of the dedicated gifts” (26:20–22), among which precious stones are specially named (29:8). In Chronicles the name is, with two exceptions (6:1; 23:6), given in the slightly different form of “Gershom.”

GER'SHONITES (gur'shon-its). The descendants of Gershon, one of the sons of Levi (Num. 3:21; 4:24, 27; Josh. 21:33; etc.). As to the office and duties of the Gershonites, see Levites.

GERUTH KIMHAM (ge-rūth' kim'ham). A lodging place near Bethlehem where Johanan and his companions stayed en route to Egypt, where they were fleeing lest they be implicated in and punished for the murder of Gedaliah (Jer. 41:17). See Gedaliah.

GE'SHAN (ge'shan). The third son of Jahdai, among the descendants of Caleb (1 Chron. 2:47; “Gesham,” KJV), after 1440 B.C.

GE'SHEM (ge'shem; “shower”). An Arab (Neh. 2:19; 6:1), and one of the enemies of the Jews on the return from the Exile, especially in the plots against the life of Nehemiah (6:2), 445 B.C. Geshem, we may conclude, was an inhabitant of Arabia Petraea, or of the Arabian Desert, and probably the chief of a tribe that, like most of the tribes on the eastern frontier of Palestine, was, in the time of the captivity and the subsequent period, allied with the Persians, or with any peoples threatening the Jewish nation; for the wandering inhabitants of the frontier, doubtless, availed themselves largely, in their predatory excursions, of the distracted state of Palestine, and dreaded the reestablishment of the kingdom. The Arabians, Ammonites, and Ashdodites are recorded as having “conspired together to come and fight against Jerusalem” and to hinder its repairing (Neh. 4:8). The name is identical with Gashmu (which see), being the Hebraized form with the dropping of the nominative ending “u” and gashm resolving into geshem.

GE'SHUR (ge'shur; “bridge”). A principality in Syria on the E of Jordan, adjoining the N border of the Hebrew territory and lying between Mt. Hermon, Maachah, and Bashan (Deut. 3:13–14; Josh. 12:5). This Aramaean principality was ruled over by Talmai, whose daughter David married (2 Sam. 3:3). It was the possession of Manasseh, although its original inhabitants were not expelled (Josh. 13:13). It was there Absalom fled after killing Amnon (2 Sam. 13:37–38), and from which Joab returned him to Jerusalem (14:23). It is stated (1 Chron. 2:23) that “Geshur and Aram took the towns of Jair ... even sixty cities.”

GESH'URITES (gesh'u-rīts; Deut. 3:14; Josh. 12:5; 13:2, 11, 13; 1 Sam. 27:8). The inhabitants of Geshur (which see), bordering on Aram, to the E of the Jordan.

GE'THER (ge'ther; derivation uncertain). The name of the third son of Aram (Gen. 10:23). He is mentioned in 1 Chron. 1:17 as one of the sons of Shem, probably meaning “grandson of.” It is uncertain where his posterity settled.

GETHSEM'ANE (geth-sem'a-ni; Gk. from Aram. “oil press”). The olive grove at the foot of the Mount of Olives, to which Jesus was accustomed to retire (Luke 22:39) with His disciples and which was the scene of His agony (Mark 14:32; Luke 22:39–40; John 18:1). There are two traditional places called Gethsemane. One is the possession of the Latin church, and it consists of a triangular spot, some seventy paces in circumference. It is enclosed by a fence and contains some large and old olive trees, in addition to a flower garden. Adjacent to it stands the Church of All Nations, which encloses a “rock of agony.” The Greeks have set up another traditional Gethsemane, located farther up Mount Olivet. Thomson (Land and Book, 2:483) says that he inclines to think both are wrong, and he would place the garden in a secluded spot several hundred yards NE of the other traditional sites.

GEU'EL (ge-ū'el; “majesty of God”). The son of Machi, of the tribe of Gad, and one of the men sent by Moses to search the land of Canaan (Num. 13:15), 1440 B.C.

GEZ'ER (gez'er; 2 Sam. 5:25; 1 Chron. 14:16; etc.). An ancient city on the Shephelah above the Maritime Plain, eighteen miles NW of Jerusalem and seventeen miles SE of Jaffa (2 Sam. 5:25; 1 Chron. 14:16, KJV). The site was strategic since it guarded one of the few roads of access from Jaffa to Jerusalem. Tell Jezer is the name of the thirty-three acre mound. Joshua could not conquer the city at the time of the Hebrew conquest, and it remained relatively independent until a pharaoh in Solomon's time gave it to Solomon as dowry when he married the pharaoh's daughter (1 Kings 9:15–17). It then became one of Solomon's chariot cities.

Excavations at Gezer began with the work of R. A. S. Macalister under the sponsorship of the Palestine Exploration Fund, from 1902 to 1909. A. Rowe excavated there for the fund in 1934. Then in 1964 a ten-year project was conducted at Gezer by the Hebrew Union College's Jerusalem School and Harvard. G. Ernest Wright and William C. Dever directed the work. Excavations have shown that Gezer was first occupied in the thirty-third century B.C. and continued with intermissions to be inhabited until the late first century B.C.

The city had a high point of development between 1600 and 1460 B.C. Prosperity and massive building projects were characteristic of this period. A stone wall ten feet thick and reinforced with square towers surrounded the city. The great high place with its row of ten huge sacred pillars came into being early in this period. The water system used to be thought to date near the end of this period, but Dever suggests the possibility that it dated to the Early Iron II period and was contemporary with the great water systems at Megiddo, Hazor, and Gibeon. This water system consisted of a vertical shaft 27 feet deep, which could be entered from just inside the city's S gate. At the bottom of the shaft was a tunnel that extended 132 feet to a 28- by 80-foot cave of unknown depth.

Thutmose III of Egypt destroyed Gezer about 1468, and it lay in ruins for decades thereafter. Then it revived but was destroyed again late in the thirteenth century by the Egyptian pharaoh Merneptah. Abandoned for a time again, it was occupied peacefully by the Philistines during the twelfth and eleventh centuries. Then about 950 an Egyptian pharaoh captured it and presented it to Solomon, after which the city entered another period of prosperity. A casemated wall and a Solomonic gate like that of Megiddo were found at Gezer.

The excavators found traces of the destruction by Pharaoh Shishak in 926 B.C., the Assyrians in the eighth century, and Nebuchadnezzar in the sixth century. The city became important again during the Hellenistic period, and it was a major base of operations against the Maccabean revolt. The town virtually ceased to exist by NT times.

The Gezer calendar, a tenth-century B.C. Heb. inscription citing the annual cycle of agricultural activities, was found there. Albright translated it as follows.

His (or, a man's) two months are (olive) harvest;

His two months are grain planting;

His two months are planting;

His month is hoeing up of flax;

His month is barley harvest;

His month is harvest and festival;

His two months are vine tending;

His month is summer fruit.

GEZ' RITES. See Girzites.

GHOST. The archaic English form of the German Geist, “spirit,” and the translation in the KJV of several Heb. and Gk. words signifying “breath, life, spirit”; Job 11:20; Jer. 15:9; Matt. 27:50; John 19:30). In the NT it frequently occurs as the designation of the third Person in the Trinity—the Holy Ghost or Holy Spirit (which see). The KJV expression “gave up the ghost” (Gen. 25:17; Lam. 1:19; and elsewhere) simply means “to die” (cf. NASB and NIV readings). See Holy Spirit; Spirit.

GIAH (gī'ah). A place near the hill of Ammah, close to Gibeon, where Joab and Abishai overtook Abner as he fled from the contest at the pool of Gibeon (2 Sam. 2:24).

GIANT. An abnormally tall and powerful human being of ancient Bible lands; the rendering of several Heb. words.

Nephilim (nef'i-lim; Heb. npīlīm; Num. 13:13). The form of the Heb. word denotes a plural verbal adjective or noun of passive signification, certainly from nāpal, “to fall,” so that the connotation is “the fallen ones,” clearly meaning the unnatural offspring that were on the earth in the years before the Flood, “and also afterward, when the sons of God came in to the daughters of men, and they bore children to them” (Gen. 6:4). The mention of the great stature of the Nephilim, the sons of Anak, in the evil report that the ten spies brought of the land of Canaan (Num. 13:33) together with the LXX rendering, gigantes, suggested the translation giants. They were exceedingly wicked and violent so that “every intent” of the thoughts of men’s hearts “was only evil continually” (Gen. 6:5). See Merrill F. Unger, Biblical Demonology, pp. 45–52.

Rephaim (ref´a-im; Heb. rpāîm, “shades, ghosts”). The aboriginal giants who inhabited Canaan, Edom, Moab, and Ammon. In Abraham’s time, c. 1950 B.C., Chedorlaomer defeated them. At the period of the conquest, c. 1440 B.C., Og, king of Bashan, is said to have alone remained of this race (Deut. 3:11; Josh. 12:4; 13:12). His huge bedstead of iron is mentioned in particular.

Anakim (an´a-kim; Heb. ānāqîm, “sons of Anak”). In Num. 13:33 the Anakim are classified with the Nephilim on account of their gigantic size.

Emim (em´im), a race that inhabited the country of the Moabites (Gen. 14:5) and that is pictured as “great, numerous, and tall as the Anakim” (Deut. 2:10).

Zamzummim (zam´zum-im), a giant race inhabiting the land of Ammon (Deut. 2:20).

Other References. From a remnant of the Anakim in Philistine Gath came the famous Goliath (1 Sam. 17:4). Two of the Philistine giants are mentioned in 2 Sam. 21:16–22. The tradition of a giant race persisted in the ancient Near East and goes back in the Genesis account to intercourse between fallen angels and mortal women. Although this so-called angel hypothesis of Gen. 6:1–4 is disclaimed by many Bible students, it is a clear implication of the original. Says W. F. Albright, “Yahweh was believed to have created astral as well as terrestrial beings and the former were popularly called, ‘the host of heaven’ or ‘the sons of God’. In Gen. 6:1ff., for example, ... the (astral) gods had intercourse with mortal women who gave birth to heroes (literally, meteors, nephilim), an idea that may often be illustrated from Babylonian and Greek mythology. But the Israelite who had this section recited, unquestionably thought of intercourse between angels and women (like later Jews and Christians)” (From the Stone Age to Christianity [1940], p. 226).

GIB´BAR (gib´ar; “mighty man,” a “hero”). An Israelite whose descendants, to the number of ninety-five, returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra 2:20), before 536 B.C. This is probably an error for the remnants of the natives of Gibeon (Neh. 7:25).

GIB´BETHON (gib´e-thon; “mound,” a “height”). A Philistine city (Josh. 19:44; 21:23), within the bounds of the tribe of Dan, assigned to the Kohathites (21:23). Nadab, king of Israel, was slain under its walls (1 Kings 15:27; 16:15–16). Possibly to be located at Tell el-Melat, about three miles E of Gezer.

GIB´EA (gib´ē-a; “hill”). One of the sons of Sheva, who was also the father of Machbena (1 Chron. 2:49). The KJV rendering indicates that Gibeah was not a person but a place built or occupied in connection with Machbena.

GIB´EAH (gib´ē-a; Heb. gibāʿā). A “hill,” as the word is sometimes rendered.

1. Gibeah of Judah, situated in the mountains of that tribe (Josh. 15:57), where the prophet Habakkuk is said to have been buried. It lay seven miles SW of Bethlehem and is identified with Jeba.

2. Gibeah of Benjamin (Judg. 19:14; 1 Sam. 13:15; 2 Sam. 23:29), known also as “Gibeah of Saul” (1 Sam. 11:4; Isa. 10:29), the scene of the inhumane crime recorded in Judg. 19:12–30, for which the Benjamites were nearly exterminated. It was Saul’s birthplace and continued to be his residence after he became king (1 Sam. 10:26; 11:4; etc.), and here the Gibeonites hanged his descendants (2 Sam. 21:6). Saul’s Gibeah has been excavated by W. F. Albright. The modern site is Tell el-Fûl, meaning “hill of beans.” The site revealed twelve levels of history. An Israelite town, apparently referred to in Judg. 19 and 20, was destroyed by fire. Saul’s rustic stronghold with its sturdy polygonal masonry was erected c. 1015 B.C.

The outer citadel walls, 170 by 155 feet, were 8 to 10 feet thick. The citadel is composed of two stories with a stone staircase. The casemented walls and separately bonded towers are peculiar to this period. In the audience chamber David played his harp to soothe the demon-possessed Saul (1 Sam. 16:23). Among the interesting objects found were grinding stones, spinning whorls, cooking pots, burnished ware, and a gaming board. Storage bins for oil, wine, and grain, still holding their contents when excavated, were also found in the royal palace. M.F.U.

3. Gibeah of Phinehas (Josh. 24:33), in the hill country of Ephraim, where Eleazar was buried. It has been identified with Khirbet Jibia, five miles N of Guphria, toward Shechem.

4. Gibeah is rendered "hill" in the following passages: "hill of Moreh" (Judg. 7:1); "hill of God" (1 Sam. 10:5; NIV, "Gibeah of God"); "hill of Hachilah" (23:19; 26:1); "hill of Ammah" (2 Sam. 2:24); "hill Gareb" (Jer. 31:39). It has also been translated "hill" in 2 Sam. 6:3–4 and is the place at Kiriath-jearim where the Ark remained from the time the Philistines returned it until it was taken to Jerusalem (cf. 1 Sam. 7:1–2).

GIB'EATH-HAAR'ALOTH ("the hill of foreskins," Josh. 5:3, see marg.). So rendered because the foreskins of the Israelites were buried there when the nation was circumcised.

GIB'EATHITE (gib'ē-a-thīt). A native of Gibeah (1 Chron. 12:3), Shemaah by name, who was the father of two Benjamites who joined David.

GIB'EON (gib'ē-on; "hill city"). One of the Hivite cities that, through deception, effected a league with Joshua (Josh. 9:3–17), thus escaping the fate of Ai and Jericho. It was afterward allotted to Benjamin and was made a Levitical town (18:25; 21:17). After the destruction of Nob by Saul, the Tabernacle was set up here and remained until the building of the Temple (1 Kings 3:4–5; 1 Chron. 16:39; 2 Chron. 1:3, 13). When the Amorite kings besieged Gibeon, Joshua hastened to its relief, and a great battle followed (see Joshua). From Jer. 41:16 it would seem that after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, Gibeon again became the seat of government. It produced prophets in the days of Jeremiah (28:1). "The sons of Gibeon" returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:25). Gibeon is located about eight miles NW of Jerusalem on the route to Joppa. Other events in the history of Gibeon include the battle between Ish-bosheth and David (2 Sam. 2:8–17; 3:30) and the execution of the seven sons of Saul (21:1–9). Gibeon was an important place of worship in Solomon's time (1 Kings 3:4; 2 Sam. 20:8). There he had his famous dream. On the Karnak Relief of Pharaoh Shishak, Gibeon is mentioned as one of the trophies of his invasion of Palestine (1 Kings 14:25, "in the fifth year of King Rehoboam"). Shishak's carved reliefs also show captives taken in his Palestinian invasion. (See Leon Legrain, Les Temples de Karnak.) Gibeon is identified with el-Jib, about six miles NW of Jerusalem. James B. Pritchard excavated there on behalf of the University of Pennsylvania Museum from 1956 to 1962. The most dramatic find there was the "pool" of Gibeon. Measuring thirty-seven feet in diameter and thirty-five feet in depth, this cylindrical cutting had a circular staircase that led to a stepped tunnel that continued downward another forty-five feet below the pool's floor to a water chamber. Excavations demonstrated that the city was founded about 3000 B.C. Magnificent tomb discoveries documented the Middle Bronze and Late Bronze periods (2000–1200 B.C.). Iron Age I (1200–900 B.C.) apparently was the city's golden age. Near the beginning of the period, a wall about five feet thick and more than a half mile in circumference enclosed the sixteen-acre town. H.F.V.

GIB'EONITES (gib'ē-on-īts). The people of Gibeon and perhaps also of the three cities associated with Gibeon (Josh. 9:17). Upon the victorious advance of the Israelites, the inhabitants of Gibeon attempted to anticipate the danger that threatened them by means of a clever scheme, and to enter into a friendly alliance with Israel. A delegation waited upon Joshua at Gilgal, representing themselves as ambassadors from a far country, desirous of making a league with him. They made this appear probable by taking “worn-out sacks on their donkeys, and wineskins, worn-out and torn and mended, and worn-out and patched sandals on their feet, and worn-out clothes on themselves; and all the bread of their provision was dry and had become crumbled” (9:4–5). They declared that all these tokens of age and wear had come to them upon their journey. Because of these representations they were received as friends and an alliance was made with them. Upon the discovery of the scheme by which they had obtained the protection of the Israelites, they were condemned to be perpetual bondmen, “hewers of wood and drawers of water” for the congregation, and for the house of God and altar of Jehovah (9:23, 27). Saul appears to have broken this covenant and in a fit of enthusiasm or patriotism to have killed some and devised a general massacre of the rest (2 Sam. 21:1–2, 5). This was expiated many years after by giving up seven men of Saul's descendants to the Gibeonites, who hanged them “before the Lord”—as a kind of sacrifice—in Gibeah, Saul's own town (vv. 4, 6, 8–9). From this time there is no mention of the Gibeonites as a distinct people, but many writers include them among the Temple servants, who were appointed for the service of the Temple (1 Chron. 9:2).

GIDDAL'TI (gi-dal'ti; “I have made great”). The ninth son of Heman, and head of the twenty-second division of Levitical musicians in the Tabernacle under David (1 Chron. 25:4, 29), after 1000 B.C. The office of these brothers was to sound the horn in the Levitical orchestra (v. 5, marg.).

GID'DEL (gid'el).

The name of two men whose descendants returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel.

1. One of the Temple servants (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:49), before 536 B.C.

2. One of “Solomon's servants,” i.e., perhaps of the Canaanite tribes enslaved by Solomon (Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:58; cf. 1 Kings 9:21), before 536 B.C.

GID'EON (Heb. gīd-ôn, “tree feller,” i.e., “warrior”). The son of Joash the Abi-ezrite, of the tribe of Manasseh; resided at Ophrah in Gilead, beyond the Jordan.

Condition of Israel. Another relapse into evil brought Israel under the oppression of the Midianites for seven years. With Midian were allied Amalek and “the sons of the east” (of Jordan). Their power pressed so severely upon the Israelites that they “made for themselves the dens which were in the mountains and the caves and the strongholds.” The allies encamped in their territory, destroyed the crops “as far as Gaza,” and left “no sustenance in Israel as well as no sheep, ox, or donkey,” so that Israel was greatly impoverished (Judg. 6:1–6). But before helping them the Lord sent an unnamed prophet to reprove them for their disobedience and bring them to repentance.

Call of Gideon. In such a time of distress Gideon was threshing wheat in the winepress to conceal it from the Midianites. While thus engaged the angel of the Lord appeared to him and addressed him in these words: “The Lord is with you, O valiant warrior.” To this Gideon made the despondent reply, “If the Lord is with us, why then has all this happened to us?” Then Jehovah (revealing Himself) said, “Go in this your strength and deliver Israel from the hand of Midian. Have I not sent you?” Doubtful of the means by which he might accomplish so great a work, he requested a sign from heaven. This was granted to him; for when he presented his offering of a kid and unleavened cakes, the angel touched it, and it was consumed by fire. Recognizing Jehovah, he was filled with fear; but being comforted he built an altar and called it “The Lord is Peace” (Judg. 6:11–24).

Destroys an Altar of Baal. The first thing for Gideon to do was to purify his father’s house from idolatry and sanctify himself by sacrificing a burnt offering. That night God commanded him to tear down the altar of Baal belonging to his father and cut down the grove near it. Then he was to build an altar to the Lord and offer on it a seven-year-old bull of his father’s. Assisted by ten servants, Gideon obeyed the vision probably during the following night, through fear of those around. Gideon, being identified as the perpetrator of the act, was in danger of being stoned; but his father took the part of his son and told the people to allow Baal to plead for himself. From this circumstance Gideon received the name of Jerubbaal, i.e., “let Baal contend” (Judg. 6:25–32). See Baal.

The Sign of the Fleece. When the Midianites and their allies once more invaded the land of Israel, the Spirit of the Lord came upon Gideon, and he gathered together an army from the tribes of Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali. Before going into battle he asked for a sign from God of the success of his undertaking. He asked that the dew should fall on a fleece spread upon the threshing floor, while the ground all around should be dry. In the morning the fleece was so wet that Gideon wrung out of it a bowl of water. The next night the wonder was reversed, the soil being wet and the fleece perfectly dry (Judg. 6:36–40). “The sign itself was to manifest the strength of divine assistance to his weakness of faith. Dew, in the Scriptures, is a symbol of the beneficent power of God, which quickens, revives, and invigorates the objects of nature when they have been parched by the burning heat of the sun’s rays” (K. & D., Com.).

Midianites Defeated. Assured by this double sign, Gideon advanced against the enemy and encamped near the brook Harod, in the valley of Jezreel. (See Esdraelon, Plain of.) The army of the Midianites and their allies numbered about 135,000 (Judg. 8:10), whereas the Israelites mustered only 32,000. Nevertheless, “The Lord said to Gideon, ‘The people who are with you are too many for Me to give Midian into their hands, lest Israel become boastful, saying, “My own power has delivered me” ’” (7:2). Gideon, therefore, made the usual proclamation (Deut. 20:8), that all the fainthearted might withdraw; and 22,000 availed themselves of this opportunity. Even this number the Lord regarded as too great, and Gideon was commanded to test them in the matter of drinking. Those who knelt to drink were rejected, and only those were chosen who lapped the water with the tongue, “as a dog laps,” i.e., to take the water from the brook with the hollow of their hand and lap it into the mouth with their tongues as a dog does. This test reduced the number to 300 men. These took the provision from the people, and the war trumpets, so that every one of the 300 had a trumpet and (as the provisions were probably kept in vessels) a pitcher as well. That night Gideon overheard a man telling of a dream he had had, which was of a cake of barley bread overthrowing a tent. Regarding this dream as indicating divine cooperation, Gideon began the attack without delay. He divided his 300 men into three companies and gave them all trumpets and empty pitchers, with torches in their hands. The pitchers were to hide the burning torches during the advance and to increase the noise at the time of the attack by dashing them to pieces. The noise and sudden lighting up of the burning torches would naturally deceive the enemy as to the numbers of Gideon’s army. His clever strategy was eminently successful, and the enemy, thrown into complete confusion, “fled as far as Beth-shittah toward Zererah, as far as the edge of Abel-meholah, by Tabbath” (Judg. 7:1–23).

The Ephraimites. In order to cut off the enemy’s retreat at the Jordan, Gideon sent notice to the Ephraimites to “take the waters before them, as far as Beth-barah and the Jordan.” The Ephraimites responded, took possession of the waters mentioned, captured the two princes, Oreb and Zeeb, put them to death, and brought their heads to Gideon. This latter act amounted to an acknowledgment of Gideon's leadership, but they were greatly annoyed because he had made war upon and defeated the enemy without first summoning them to the field. Serious consequences were avoided by the tact of Gideon in speaking in a lowly spirit of his doings in comparison with theirs (Judg. 7:24–8:3). The “gleaning of the grapes of Ephraim” is the victory over the Midianites and the capture of the two princes—the “vintage of Abiezer,” Gideon's victory with his 300 men.

Destroys Succoth. Passing over the Jordan in pursuit of the Midianites, he was refused assistance by the people of Succoth and Penuel. Upon his return he destroyed both places (Judg. 8:4–17).

Avenges His Brethren. Gideon inquired of the two captive kings of Midian (Zebah and Zalmunna), “What kind of men were they whom you killed at Tabor?” And they answered, “They were like you, each one resembling the son of a king.” He then told them that these persons were his brothers and commanded Jether, his firstborn, to slay them. But because Jether feared to do so, Gideon killed them “and took the crescent ornaments which were on their camels' necks” (Judg. 8:18–21).

Refuses the Crown. Gideon, having so gloriously delivered Israel from the severe and long oppression of the Midianites, was offered by the Israelites a hereditary crown. “The men of Israel” were probably only the northern tribes already mentioned in 6:35, who had suffered most severely from the Midianite oppression and had rallied about Gideon. The temptation to accept the government of Israel was resisted by Gideon, probably because he thought the government of Jehovah in Israel amply sufficient and did not consider himself or his sons called to found an earthly monarchy (Judg. 8:22–23).

Remaining Acts and Death. Gideon made the request that the people should give him the golden earrings taken with the spoil, which they willingly consented to do. They brought him earrings weighing 1,700 shekels (about 50 pounds). With it he made a golden ephod and put it in his own city, Ophrah. This was probably not an image but a magnificent coat made of the gold and purple (see Ephod). It proved a snare to Israel, to himself, and to his house: to Israel, because they made it an object of worship; to Gideon and his house, because he invaded the prerogative of the Aaronic priesthood and gave an impetus to the worship of Baal after his death. The evil consequences of this false step in religion was realized in the miserable sequel of Gideon's family. The history of Gideon is concluded in Judg. 8:28–32. The Midianites had been so humiliated that “they did not lift up their heads anymore. And the land was undisturbed for forty years in the days of Gideon.” A few other notices are given respecting his family to prepare the way for the history of his sons after his death. “Then Jerubbaal the son of Joash went and lived in his own house,” retiring into private life. In addition to the seventy sons born of his many wives, he had a son by his concubine who lived in Shechem, and to this son he gave the name of Abimelech. Gideon died at a “ripe old age” and was buried in his father's tomb at Ophrah, about 1215–1190 B.C.

GIDEO'NI (gid-ē-ō'ni; “warlike”). A Benjamite whose son, Abidan, was a prominent man of his tribe and was employed in numbering the people (Num. 1:11; 2:22; 7:60, 65; 10:24), about 1400 B.C.

GI'DOM (gid-om; “cutting,” i.e., “desolation”). A place E of Gibeah, toward the wilderness (of Bethel), where the fleeing Benjamites turned to escape to the rock Rimmon (Judg. 20:45).

GIFT. The giving and receiving of presents has in all ages been not only a more frequent, but also a more formal and significant proceeding in the East than among ourselves. We cannot offer a more remarkable proof of the important part that presents play in the social life of the East than the fact that the Heb. language possesses no less than fifteen different expressions for the one idea. Several of these have a distinct and specific meaning, indicative of the relation of giver and receiver or of the motive and object of the presentation.

1. From the Heb. root nātan, “to give,” we have several words meaning a gratuity (Prov. 19:6); to secure favor (18:16; 21:14), in religious thankfulness (Num. 18:11), or in dowry (Gen. 34:12), in inheritance (25:6; 2 Chron. 21:3; Ezek. 46:16–17), or as a bribe (KJV, Prov. 15:27; Eccles. 7:7; etc.; NASB and NIV render “bribe”).

2. From the Heb. nāšā, to “raise,” we have words signifying pecuniary assistance (Esther 2:18) and a present in token of respect (2 Sam. 19:42, KJV). Perhaps the inherent idea of these terms is that of oblation to a superior, a dish of honor for special guests (2 Sam. 11:8, “present”), the collection or “levy” for the sanctuary (2 Chron. 24:6, 9).

3. More distinctly in the sense of a votive offering is Heb. minḥâ, an oblation or propitiatory gift (2 Sam. 8:2, 6; 1 Chron. 18:2, 6; etc.), and in several other passages where the word has the idea of tribute.

4. Other words are mercenary in character. Thus Heb. shōḥad is a gift for the purpose of escaping punishment, presented either as a bribe to a judge (Ex. 23:8; Deut. 10:17) or a present to a conqueror (2 Kings 16:8).

5. In Gk. the usual terms are generally derived from didōmi, to “give,” and have a wide meaning, as did the Heb.

“It is clear that the term ‘gift’ is frequently used where we should substitute ‘tribute’ or ‘fee.’ The tribute of subject states was paid not in a fixed sum of money, but in kind, each nation presenting its particular product; and hence the expression ‘to bring presents’—to own submission (Pss. 68:29; 76:11; Isa. 18:7). Friends brought presents to friends on any joyful occasion (Esther 9:19, 22), those who asked for information or advice to those who gave it (2 Kings 8:8), the needy to the wealthy from whom any assistance was expected (Gen. 43:11; 2 Kings 15:19; 16:8); on the occasion of a marriage, the bridegroom not only paid the parents for his bride (KJV, ‘dowry’) but also gave the bride certain presents (Gen. 34:12; cf. 24:22). The nature of the presents was as various as were the occasions. The mode of presentation was with as much parade as possible. The refusal of a present was regarded as a high indignity. No less an insult was it not to bring a present when the position of the parties demanded it (1 Sam. 10:27)” (Smith, Bib. Dict., s.v.).

GIFT OF TONGUES. See Tongues, Speaking in.

GIFTS, SPIRITUAL (Gk. charismata, “gifts of grace”). Outside of the Pauline epistles this term is used only once in the NT, namely, 1 Pet. 4:10, where it is rendered “special gift,” i.e., a gift of divine grace. The expression “Each man has his own gift” (1 Cor. 7:7) seems to imply continence or some other gracious endowment in its place. In 2 Cor. 1:11 the “favor” or gift was deliverance from great peril to life. Paul calls that which he intends to communicate to the Romans through his personal presence among them a “spiritual gift” (Rom. 1:11), “because in his apprehension all such instruction, comfort, joy, strengthening, etc., as are produced by his labors, are regarded not as procured by his own human individuality, but as a result which the Holy Spirit works by means of him—the gracious working of the Spirit, whose organ he is” (Meyer, Com., ad loc.).

The “free gift,” or “gift by the grace” (5:15–16), is the economy of divine grace, by which the pardon of sin and eternal salvation are appointed to sinners in consideration of the merits of Christ laid hold of by faith (cf. 6:23); plural of the several blessings of the Christian salvation (11:29).

In the technical Pauline sense “gifts” denote extraordinary powers distinguishing certain Christians and enabling them to serve the church of Christ, the reception of which is due to the power of divine grace operating in their souls by the Holy Spirit (12:6; 1 Cor. 1:7; 12:4, 31; 1 Pet. 4:10); specially the sum of those powers requisite for the discharge of the office of an evangelist (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim 1:6). The fullest list of these charismata, or spiritual gifts, is given in 1 Cor. 12.

Concerning spiritual gifts Cremer says: “Their number is as various as the needs of the Church, and neither the enumeration of 1 Cor. 12, nor of Eph. 4, nor Rom. 12 can be regarded as exhaustive. But those are permanent which are necessary for the government of the Church, and those temporary which had a miraculous element, as the miraculous gifts of the apostles. But among the latter is not to be included the ‘gift of proclaiming the Gospel so as to produce faith’ (Weiss). The apostolic charismata bear the same relation to those of the ministry that the apostolic office does to the pastoral office, and consist in the power to lay the foundations of the Church. They are therefore not repeated, as the Irvingites hold, for there are no circumstances calling for their repetition” (art. in Schaff-Herzog).

GI'HON (gi'hon; “a gushing fountain”).

1. One of the four rivers of Eden (Gen. 2:13). The Gihon and also the Pishon are presumably canals (called rivers in Babylonia) that connected the Tigris and Euphrates as ancient riverbeds. Biblical notices place the Garden of Eden somewhere in the Tigris-Euphrates valley, evidently at the easternmost third of the Fertile Crescent. Shifting riverbeds and the accumulation of enormous deposits of river silt make the task of locating the site of the Pishon or the Gihon virtually impossible, but the other two rivers, Euphrates and Tigris, are well known.

2. The intermittent spring that constituted Jerusalem's most ancient water supply, situated in the Kidron Valley just below the eastern hill (Ophel). This abundant source of water was entirely covered over and concealed from outside the walls and was conducted by a specially built conduit to a pool within the walls where a besieged city could get all the water it needed. “Why should the kings of Assyria come and find abundant water?” the people queried in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 32:2–4). Hezekiah's Tunnel, 1,777 feet long, hewn out of the solid rock and comparable to the tunnels at Megiddo and Gezer, conducted the water to a reservoir within the city. From the top of Ophel the ancient Jebusites (c. 2000 B.C.) had cut a passage through the rock where waterpots could be let down a 40-foot shaft to receive the water in the pool 50 feet back from the Gihon. Early excavations at Jerusalem by the Palestine Exploration Fund under the direction of Sir Charles Warren (1867) resulted in finding the 40-foot rock-cut shaft. It is now known as Warren's Shaft. Conrad Shick in 1891 discovered an ancient surface canal that conveyed water from the Gihon Spring to the old pool of Siloam, located just within the SE extremity of the ancient city. Isaiah seems to have alluded to the softly flowing waters of this gentle brook when he spoke poetically of “the gently flowing waters of Shiloah” (Isa. 8:6). M.F.U.

GIL'ALAI (gil'a-li; perhaps "[The Lord] has rolled away"). One of the priests appointed by Nehemiah to aid Zechariah in the musical services under Ezra at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:36), 445 B.C.

GILBO'A (gil-bō'a). Its name was probably suggested by the spring or fountain about half a mile E of the city of Jezreel, which stood on the western extremity of the mount. Parallel and six miles N of this range is another, called the "hill of Moreh," but called by travelers "Little Hermon." The beautiful valley of Jezreel lies between the two. It was at Gilboa that Saul and his three sons were slain in the battle with the Philistines (1 Sam. 28:4; 31:1, 8; 1 Chron. 10:1). When David heard of the disaster he incorporated in his beautiful ode all the conditions—geographical, military, and social (2 Sam. 1:19–27).

GIL'EAD (gil'i-ad; cf. Arab. jala'ad, "to be rough").

1. The mountain region E of the Jordan, called "the hill country of Gilead" (Gen. 31:25), extending from the Sea of Galilee to the upper end of the Dead Sea, about sixty miles long and twenty wide, bounded on the N by Bashan and on the S by Moab and Ammon (31:21; Deut. 3:12–17), now called Jebel Jelâd or Jelûd. Upon it is the site of the ancient city of Ramoth-gilead, now identified by Nelson Glueck with Tell Ramith in the northern part of the country. Its scenery is beautiful; the hills are fertile and crowned with forests. Scripture names oak trees and herds of cattle as being found there (Gen. 37:25; Num. 32:1). Reuben and Gad desired to possess this territory because of their need of pasture for their herds (Deut. 3:12–17). The name Gilead is seldom used in the Bible beyond OT history.

2. A city "of wrongdoers," etc. (Hos. 6:8). "Hosea calls Gilead (district) a city of evil-doers, as being a rendezvous for wicked men, to express the thought that the whole land was as full of evil-doers as a city is of men" (K. & D., Com.).

3. The son of Machir and grandson of Manasseh; his descendants bore his name as a patronymic (Num. 26:29–30).

4. Father of Jephthah the judge, and descendant of the above (Judg. 11:1–2).

5. Son of Michael and father of Jaroah, of the tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:14).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. Ottosen, Gilead: Tradition and History (1969).

GIL'EADITES, THE (Num. 26:29; Judg. 12:4–5). A branch of the tribe of Manasseh, descended from Gilead. There appears to have been a long-standing feud between them and the Ephraimites, who taunted them with being deserters. See Judg. 12:4, "And the men of Gilead defeated Ephraim, because they said, 'You are fugitives of Ephraim, O Gileadites, in the midst of Ephraim and in the midst of Manasseh.'" "The meaning of these obscure words is probably the following: 'Ye are an obscure set of men, men of no name, dwelling in the midst of two most noble and illustrious tribes.'"

GIL'GAL (gil'gal; "rolling").

1. A place in the Jordan Valley not far from Jericho, called Geliloth (Josh. 18:17). Here the Israelites first encamped after they crossed the Jordan, and here the twelve stones were set up as a memorial (4:19–20). Samuel judged here (1 Sam. 7:16); Agag was slain here (15:33).

2. Gilgal of Elijah and Elisha (2 Kings 2:1; 4:38), a locality probably four miles distant from Bethel and Shiloh.

3. In Josh. 12:23 reference is made to "the king of Goim in Gilgal." Parker says the word Goim probably means the nomad people who had been driven away by Joshua.

GI'LOH (gī'lō). In the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:51), the birthplace and the scene of the suicide of the traitor Ahithophel (2 Sam. 15:12; 17:23). Probably the present Khirbet Jala, five miles NNW of Hebron. Giloh stands probably for the original Gilon (cf. 2 Sam. 15:12; 23:34). See Gilonite.

GI'LONITE (gī'lon-īt). An epithet of the traitor Ahithophel (which see), doubtless from his city, Giloh (2 Sam. 15:12; 23:34).

GIM'EL (ג) (gim'el; "camel"). Gimel is the third letter of the Heb. alphabet, pronounced like English "g" and corresponding to Gk. gamma. It stands at the head of the third section of Ps. 119, in which each verse commences with this letter in the Heb.

GIM'ZO (gim'zō; a "place abounding in sycamores"). A town in the low country of Judah (2 Chron. 28:18). Now Jimzu, three miles SE of Lod.

GIN. See Snare.

GI'NATH (gi'nath). The father of Tibni (which see), king of the northern tribes of Israel (1 Kings 16:21–22).

GIN'NETHOI (gin'e-thō). A corrupt reading (Neh. 12:4) for the name Ginnethon (which see).

GIN'NETHON (gin'e-thon; "gardener"). One of the "heads" of the priests who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:4, where the reading is "Ginnethoi") and subscribed to the covenant with Nehemiah (10:6). His son, Meshullam, is mentioned as a contemporary with the high priest Joiakim (12:16), 536–410 B.C.

GIRDLE. As an article of clothing, see Dress; Priests, Clothing of.

Figurative. To "gird [or girdle] up the loins" is a common expression in the KJV for putting one's self in readiness for any service that might be required (Luke 12:35); also to "gird your minds for action" (1 Pet. 1:13). The girdle was a symbol of strength, activity, and power (Job 12:18; Isa 23:10, marg.; 45:5; 1 Kings 20:11). Righteousness and faithfulness are called the "girdle" of the Messiah (Isa. 11:5, KJV; NASB and NIV, "belt"), and the perfect adherence of the people of God to His service is spoken of as the "cleaving of the girdle to a man's loins" (Jer. 13:11, KJV). See Armor, Arms.

GIR'GASHITES (ger'ga-shīts). One of the seven Canaanite nations whose land was given to Israel. Joshua 24:11 seems to place them W of the Jordan. In Gen. 10:16 and 1 Chron. 1:14 the Girgashite is descended from Canaan. The Girgashites are enumerated among the Canaanite nations only in Gen. 15:21; Deut. 7:1; Josh. 3:10; 24:11; Neh. 9:8.

GIRL (Heb. yaldâ, "one born female"). The female counterpart of "boy" (yeled). Yaldâ is often used of female children (Joel 3:3; Zech. 8:5) but occasionally of a girl of marriageable age, i.e., in her early teens (Gen. 34:4). In Lev. 12:5 a female child was described technically as n□qēbâ, and this is similar in meaning to na'ārâ (2 Kings 5:2, 4; etc.).

GIR'ZITES (Ger'zītes). The name given in 1 Sam. 27:8 to a tribe associated with the Amalekites and Geshurites, "for they were the inhabitants of the land from ancient times, as you come to Shur even as far as the land of Egypt." The three were attacked, plundered, and exterminated by David during his stay in the land of the Philistines. This is all that is known of the tribe, and even the name is in doubt. Girzite (Heb. haggizrî) is the rendering of the qere of 1 Sam. 27:8, which may be Girzite, Gerizite, or Gerazzite. The Alexandrian manuscript of the LXX has ton Gezraion; Vulg. Gerzi and Gezri. The KJV renders Gezrites, which would naturally mean inhabitants of Gezer, but Gezer lies fifty miles distant in the territory of Ephraim and seems too far to have been reached by David on this raid. W.H.

GISH'PA (gīsh'pa). One of the two overseers of the Temple servants in Ophel, at Jerusalem, after the captivity (Neh. 11:21); but whether he was himself also of that class is not stated, although this is probable from the fact that his associate, Ziha, was (Ezra 2:43), 445 B.C.

GIT'TAH-HE'PHER. See Gath-hepher.

GIT'TAIM (git'a-im; "two winepresses"). The place to which the Beerothites fled (2 Sam. 4:3), perhaps through fear of vengeance for the murder of Ish-bosheth. It is mentioned (Neh. 11:33) in the list of cities inhabited by the Benjamites after the captivity, identified with Gamteti of the Amarna Letters, and located at or near Ramleh.

GIT'TITE (gīt'īt). An inhabitant, or properly native, of the Philistine city of Gath (Josh. 13:3), 600 of whom attached themselves to David and became part of his bodyguard (2 Sam. 15:18–19). Obed-edom (which see), in whose house the Ark was placed for a time (6:10), is called a Gittite, probably from his birthplace, the Levitical city of Gath-rimmon in the tribe of Dan (Josh. 19:45; 21:24).

GIT'TITH (git'ith). A musical term in the titles of Pss. 8, 81, and 84. It may refer to a musical instrument characteristic of Gath.

GI'ZONITE (gī'zo-nīt). An inhabitant of Gizoh, Hashem by name, who was the ancestor of two of David's warriors (1 Chron. 11:34). Gizonite seems to be a corruption of Gunite (see Rahlfs's LXX); cf. Num. 26:48.

GLASS.

Egyptian. The discovery of glass was made early by the Egyptians and the Phoenicians. The opaque variety was known by the Nile-dwellers as far back as the end of the third millennium B.C. Perfume bottles, bracelets, tear bottles, and beads were manufactured of Egyptian glass from the time of the New Empire on (c. 1500 B.C.). Exquisite shades of blue, yellow, and red, seen today in tomb jewelry, were common among the wealthy. Animals, as well as strings of beads, were made of glass at the time of Thutmose III (c. 1450 B.C.). King Tutankhamen's tomb (fourteenth century B.C.) yielded colorful glass vases and cups.

Phoenician. Phoenicians at an early period produced glass and exquisite jewelry. Pliny recounts how one day a vessel put into the Byblos harbor near the Belus River and landed with blocks of niter; the sailors used this substance to support cooking utensils on the sandy shore. They were amazed, so the account goes, to find the fires melted salt and sand in a flow of glass. However true this story is, the sand of the Belus River was long famous as an ingredient of fine glass, and some would give Phoenician craftsmen in glass priority over the Egyptian. Sidon was famous for glassware at an early age. In the Byblos district of Lebanon, a new find of Phoenician glassware was made in 1942 in the course of the construction of the Haifa to Tripoli railroad.

Roman. Transparent glass came later as a luxury in the Roman Age. It was a distinct artistic improvement over the opaque variety of ancient Egyptians and Phoenicians. In the NT period after the discovery of transparent Roman glass, Alexandria in Egypt became world-famous as a center of the production of beautiful glassware. This reputation was maintained for a long period. Fine beakers, bowls, flasks and goblets, and bottles both for perfume and wine were costly wares exported throughout the entire Mediterranean world and even as far as Britain. Corinth, after the Pauline period, also developed a reputation for the production of fine Roman glass of varied colors.

Biblical. In the light of transparent Roman glass, the Patmos seer's references become much more comprehensible when he speaks of "a sea of glass mixed with fire" (Rev. 15:2) and when he refers to the New Jerusalem with its street of "pure gold, like transparent glass" (21:21). We also find in the Apocalypse the expression "like clear glass" (21:18). In both passages "glass" is the rendering of the Gk. hualos. In the reference of 4:6 and 15:2 the adjectival form of this Gk. word is used, meaning "of glass, transparent." Caution must be exercised, however, in translation references to glass. The familiar KJV passages, "And now we see through a glass, darkly" (1 Cor. 13:12; NIV renders "poor reflection"), and, "Like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass" (James 1:23), allude to a "mirror" (Gk. esoptron), as is rendered in NASB. Probably one of the highly polished metal mirrors such as were in vogue in Egypt, Pompeii, and throughout the Roman world is meant. Among the numerous articles used by fashionable Jewish women in Isaiah's time were "hand mirrors" used for "well-set hair" (Isa. 3:23-24). Evidently these worldly daughters of Zion carried vanity cases as women do today, and a polished bronze mirror is apparently implied (Heb., gilyōnîn, "polished metal plates"). When Job said, "Can you, with Him, spread out the skies, strong as a molten mirror?" (Job. 37:18), he had in mind the metal type of "looking glass." M.F.U.

GLASSES. A KJV expression replaced in the NASB by "hand mirrors."

GLASS WORKER. See Glass.

GLAZE. The NIV translation of the Heb. phrase otherwise rendered "of silver dross" (Prov. 26:23 and marg.). Glaze was a hard, shiny patina spread over a clay vessel. See Glass.

GLEAN. Moses provided a liberal treatment of the poor at the harvest season. In reaping the field the owner was not to "reap to the very corners," etc. (Lev. 19:9-10); i.e., he was not to reap the field to the extreme edge, or gather together the ears left upon the field in the reaping. In the vineyard and olive plantation the fallen fruit was to be left for the distressed and the foreigner (cf. Deut. 24:20-22), hence the proverb of Gideon (Judg. 8:2). See Agriculture.

GLEDE. See Animal Kingdom.

GLOOM.

1. (Heb. apēl, "dusk"). In Isa. 29:18 this word is rendered "gloom and darkness," as out of which the blind shall see. The KJV renders "obscurity."

2. (Heb. hōshek, "darkness, destruction, ignorance"). In Isa. 58:10, 59:9, "gloom" ("obscurity," KJV; "darkness," NIV) is again used in connection with darkness and lack of sight.

GLORIFY.

1. To make glorious or honorable, or to cause to appear so (John 12:28; 13:31–32; Acts 3:13; etc.); especially of the resurrection of Christ and His ascension (John 7:39; 12:16).

2. The bringing of Christians to a heavenly condition and dignity (Rom. 8:30).

3. To glorify God (1 Cor. 6:20) is to declare His praise by obedience to His law. Thus the “heavens are telling of the glory of God” (Ps. 19:1) in obedience to the law of creation, and much more do men glorify Him by willing obedience to the moral law (1 Cor. 10:31; John 17:5).

GLORY. Usually represents the Heb. kābōd, “weight,” and Gk. doxa, although a number of other words in the original are thus rendered.

In the applications of the word glory in Scripture it is easy to trace the fundamental idea involved in it. Properly, it is the exercise and display of what constitutes the distinctive excellence of the subject to which it is spoken; thus, in respect to God, His glory is the manifestation of His divine attributes and perfections, or such a visible splendor as indicates the possession and presence of these (Ex. 33:18–22; 16:7, 10; John 1:14; 2:11; 2 Pet. 1:17; etc.). God’s “glory is the correlative of his holiness ... is that in which holiness comes to expression. Glory is the expression of holiness, as beauty is the expression of health.” In respect to man, His glory is found in the things that reveal His honorable state and character, such as wisdom, righteousness, superiority to passion, or that outward magnificence that is expressive of what, in the lower sphere, bespeaks the high position of its possessor.

“By a very natural extension, the term glory is used for the property or possession itself, which tends to throw around its subject a halo of glory, or in some respect to crown it with honor; as when the glory of man is identified with his soul; the glory of Lebanon with its trees (Isa. 60:13); the glory of herbs with the beauty of their flower (40:6); the glory of God with his infinite perfections, and especially with his pure and unchanging righteousness (3:8; 42:8). In this last sense God is the glory of his people (Jer. 2:11; Zech. 2:5), because he is the living root and spring of all that distinguishes them for good; and they are his glory in the outer sense (Jer. 13:11; 33:9), inasmuch as it is through their holy and blessed state, through the wonderful things done for them and by them, that his own glorious perfections are manifested before the eyes of men. There are no applications of the word in Scripture but what may without difficulty be reduced to the one or the other of those now indicated” (Imp. Dict., s.v.).

GLOWING METAL (Heb. ḥashmal; LXX ēlektron, only in Ezek. 1:4, 27; 8:2, marg., “electrum”). In all these cases it is used, in the attempted description of the visions of the divine glory, in close connection with “brightness” and “the appearance of fire.” The Gk. word had a twofold sense—the fossil resin known to us as amber (and so rendered in KJV), and an alloy of gold and silver, now called electrum by mineralogists. It is uncertain whether amber proper was known to the Hebrews; but the idea meant to be conveyed in these passages is plainly that of a brilliant glowing yellow, like amber, or like some highly polished metallic alloy, like brass or electrum. The same idea is clearly brought out in Rev. 1:15 and suggested in Ezra 8:27: “fine shiny bronze, precious as gold.”

GLUTTON (Heb. from zālal, to “shake,” hence to “be loose” morally). A debauchee (Deut. 21:20; Prov. 23:21); “gluttonous” (23:20; 28:7), meaning a free liver, one who is unrestrained (Matt. 11:19; Luke 7:34).

GNASH (Heb. ḥāraq). To grate the teeth; “He has gnashed at me with His teeth,” and “gnash their teeth.” Expressions denoting rage or sorrow (Job 16:9; Lam. 2:16).

GNAT. See Animal Kingdom.

GNAWING LOCUST. See Animal Kingdom: Locust.

GNOSTICISM. See Incarnation.

GOAD. An instrument for guiding oxen, the long handle of which might be used as a formidable weapon (Judg. 3:31, “oxgoad,” NASB and NIV). The instrument, still used in southern Europe and western Asia, consists of a rod about eight feet long, brought to a sharp point and sometimes cased with iron at the bigger end, to clear the plow of clay.

Figurative. “To kick against the pricks” (Acts 9:5, KJV; not in the NASB; NIV, “goads”) or goads was a proverbial expression for unavailing resistance to superior power.

GO´AH (gō´ah). A place near Jerusalem, mentioned by Jeremiah (Jer. 31:39) in his prophecy of the city’s restoration. The site is unknown, but probably W of the city.

GOAT. See Animal Kingdom: Goat; Wild Goat; Food; Gods, False: Shaggy Goat; Scapegoat.

GOB (gōb; “a pit,” 2 Sam. 21:18–19; called “Gezer,” 1 Chron. 20:4). The place where the brother of Goliath of Gath defied Israel but was slain by Jonathan the son of Shimea. In the Syri. version Gob is “Gath,” and the Heb. text is uncertain.

GOBLET (Heb. aggān). A trough for washing garments; thus any laver, basin, bowls (Song of Sol. 7:2; cf. Ex. 24:6, “basins”; Isa. 22:24, “bowls”). In form and material the goblet was probably like those found in Egyptian ruins, of silver, gold, bronze, porcelain, and even of wood. See Cup.

GOD.

Names of God. The two essential and personal names of God in the Heb. Scriptures are Elohim and Jehovah (more correctly Yahweh); the former calling attention to the fullness of divine power, the latter meaning “He who is” and thus declaring the divine self-existence. These terms are varied or combined with others to bring out or emphasize certain attributes of the Godhead, such variations or combinations being rendered in our English version “God Almighty,” “the Living God,” “the Most High,” “the Lord,” or “the God of Hosts.” The English word God is identical with the Anglo-Saxon word for “good,” and therefore it is believed that the name God refers to the divine goodness. (See Oehler’s Theol. of Old Test.; Strong’s and Young’s concordances.)

Doctrine Defined. The scriptural or Christian doctrine of God must be distinguished not only from antitheistic theories but also from other theories more or less approximating that doctrine. God as revealed through the Scriptures is the one infinite and eternal Being. He is purely spiritual, the supreme personal Intelligence, the Creator and Preserver of all things, the perfect Moral Ruler of the universe; He is the only proper object of worship; He is tri-personal—the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit constituting one Godhead (Gen. 1:1; Ex. 34:14; Pss. 90:1–2; 139:7–12; Job 26; Jer. 23:2–4; Matt. 3:16–17; 28:19; John 4:24; 1 John 4:16; etc.). The above does not present fully, as we shall see later, the contents of revelation concerning God. But it is sufficient for the purpose of making the distinctions named.

Theism. Theism, as the term is most commonly used, is equivalent to monotheism, particularly in the sense of recognizing the one God as distinct from the world, the personal Creator and Governor of all things. Accordingly, the following are specified as: (a) atheism, avowed opposition to a belief in one supreme God; (b) polytheism, holding a multiplicity of gods; (c) pantheism, identifying God with the universe; (d) materialism, recognizing no existence save that of matter; (e) agnosticism, denying all knowledge of God and all possibility of knowing Him, thus being in practical effect equivalent to atheism.

Deism. Deism and theism are etymologically equivalent terms, yet a distinction is found in their application. Deism has appeared in various forms, but in general it has been distinct from theism in that, though holding to the existence of a personal God who has created the world, it has regarded God as holding Himself aloof from the world and leaving it to the government of natural laws.

Theism and Christian doctrine. Theism lies at the basis of all Christian doctrine, and yet is not to be regarded as comprehending that doctrine in all its fullness. This must appear most plainly in the consideration of the attributes of God and the mode of the divine Existence.

The Knowledge of God. As to man's knowledge of God two questions have been the subjects of much controversy: the first relating to the possibility of true knowledge of the divine Being, the second the source or method of such knowledge.

First. Can God be known? The Scriptures declare that God is incomprehensible (see Job 11:7; 21:14; 36:26; Ps. 77:19; Rom. 11:33). Perfect or complete knowledge of God is not attainable by man upon the earth. But equally true is that the Scriptures represent God as revealing Himself to man and that a sufficient though limited measure of true knowledge of God is put within the reach of human beings. The important distinction to be maintained at this point is that between partial and perfect knowledge. We cannot comprehend God, and yet we can truly know Him. Our blessedness, our eternal life even, is in such knowledge (see Matt. 11:27; John 17:3; Rom. 1:19–20; Eph. 1:17; Col. 1:10; 1 John 5:20).

The prevailing faith of the Christian church in all ages has been in accord with these teachings of Scripture. Both theological and philosophical speculation, however, have often diverged from this view, and in both directions. For example, defenders of the Arian heresy in the fourth century held that God could be fully known. They thus sought to meet the appeals of their opponents to the unsearchableness of God. The mystics of the Middle Ages also claimed the possibility of perfect knowledge of God. Through the life of love in God, they held that the soul could contemplate Him immediately and clearly and thus arrive at complete knowledge. In modern times the tendency is to err in the opposite direction. The incomprehensibility of God and His unknowableness are conceived in such a one-sided or exaggerated form as to shut out the possibility of any measure of real knowledge.

Agnosticism is an extreme illustration. The doctrine of Mansel in his Limits of Religious Thought betrays the same tendency.

Second. As to the source or method of the knowledge of God, it is held by many theologians that the idea, and consequently some knowledge of God, is innate. By this is meant, however, only that all men have naturally a conviction that there is a Being upon whom they are dependent and to whom they are responsible. The arguments for and against this view are too minute and extended to be presented here. Van Oosterzee's statement is weighty: "Belief in God is by no means the necessary product of abstract reasoning, but has its firm basis in the whole nature and being of man." It is also said with much force that the Scriptures do not seek to prove the existence of God but simply assume or assert the fact as one that men ought to be prepared to recognize. The rational proofs of the existence of the divine Being are not, however, to be regarded otherwise than of great value. They are mainly drawn from nature, from history, and from humanity. It is sometimes rashly asserted that arguments built upon these foundations are antiquated or useless. Nevertheless, they remain in all essential respects, whatever may be their changes of form, valid and of great use in confirming and explaining the belief in God that is in some sense natural to every person. It is also to be observed that nature, man, and history bring to us a general revelation from God—a fact recognized throughout Scripture (see Ps. 19:1–3; Acts 14:17; 17:26–27; Rom. 1:19–20; 2:15).

Accordingly, study in these directions yields not only evidences of the existence of the divine Being but also some knowledge of His character.

Special revelation, for which the Holy Scriptures are the appointed vehicle, affords us the necessary and sufficient knowledge of God. The Scriptures throughout are harmonious in their teachings. The God of the OT is also the God of the NT. And yet the Scriptures exhibit a progress in the revelation.

The NT doctrine of God is distinguished from that of the OT, first, in that it presents with peculiar distinctness and fullness the divine fatherhood. Second, it declares likewise the divine sonship of Jesus Christ, God “revealed in the flesh.” The God-man is the fullest disclosure of the divine nature and is the Redeemer and Savior of mankind. Third, the distinct divine personality and peculiar office of the Holy Spirit are brought most clearly into view. And thus comes what at most was but intimated in the OT, the doctrine of the Trinity. See Trinity.

The Attributes of God. From the Scriptures is derived in the largest measure our knowledge of the attributes of God. By the word attributes in this connection is meant the properties or qualities of the divine Being, and particularly those that are made known to us through the revelation that He has given of Himself. They are not to be regarded as mere human conceptions but as true representations of the divine nature. Nor are they to be thought of as otherwise than absolutely inseparable from that nature. They blend harmoniously with each other in the unity of the one Being, God.

Theologians differ to some extent in their statements of the essential truth of Scripture at this point, varying in their use of terms as well as in classification and arrangement. But they generally agree in recognizing the following as the revealed attributes of God, namely: spirituality, infinity, eternity, immutability, self-sufficiency, perfection, freedom, omnipotence, omnipresence, omniscience, justice, truth, love, mercy, and grace.

For discussion of attributes see separate heads.

GOD, UNKNOWN. Paul, in his address on Mars’ Hill, said that he had seen in Athens “an altar with this inscription, ‘To an unknown God’” (Acts 17:22–23). That there actually stood at Athens such an altar appears historically certain since Paul appeals to his own observation and does so in the presence of the Athenians themselves. But there are corroborating external proofs, since Lucian, Pausanias, and Philostratus mention altars at Athens consecrated “to the unknown gods.” The question naturally arises, What definite god is meant? Different answers have been given, but the following is probably correct. On important occasions, when the reference to a god known by name was wanting, as in public calamities to which no definite god could be assigned as the author, in order to honor or pacify the god concerned by sacrifice and without lighting upon the wrong one, altars were erected that were destined and designated agnōstō theō (to the unknown god).

GODDESS. See Gods, False.

GODHEAD. As used in theology the term means: (1) The divine notice; deity; (2) the supreme Being, especially as comprehending all His attributes; (3) divinity; a heathen god or goddess. The scriptural term Godhead (KJV) is rendered “divine nature” or “deity” in NASB and NIV. “For since the creation of the world His invisible attributes, His eternal power and divine nature, have been clearly seen, being understood through what has been made” (Rom. 1:20; Gk. theiotēs); “For in Him all the fulness of Deity dwells in bodily form” (Col. 2:9; Gk. theotēs). In Acts 17:29 the Gk. theion is used: “Being then the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Divine Nature is like gold or silver or stone, an image formed by the art and thought of man.”

GODLINESS. The rendering of Gk. eusebeia, “reverence,” in Scripture meaning piety toward God (Acts 3:12, “piety”; 1 Tim. 2:2; 4:7–8; 6:3, 5–6, 11). It is the sum of religious virtues and duties, bringing to its possessor blessedness “for the present life and also for the life to come” (4:8). “The mystery of godliness” (3:16) is the mystery that is held by godliness and nourishes it. Once (1 Tim 2:10) godliness is the rendering of theosebeia, “reverence toward God,” or (NIV) “profess to worship God.”

GODLY ONES (Heb. ḥasîd, “pious, just”; “saints,” KJV and NIV). Used of pious Israelites, and so of the godly in general (1 Sam. 2:9; 2 Chron. 6:41; Pss. 30:4; 31:23; 37:28; 50:5; 52:9; 79:2; 85:8; 97:10; 116:15; 132:9, 16; 145:10; 148:14; 149:1, 5, 9).

GODS (Heb. ʾēlōhîm). This term for deity is used in a threefold connotation in the OT: (1) In a singular sense of the one true God in a plural of majesty or excellence. It is construed with a singular verb or adjective (Gen. 1:1; 2 Kings 19:4, 16; Pss. 7:10; 57:3; 78:56) but with a plural verb only in certain phrases. (2) All gods or deities in general, “the gods of Egypt” (Ex. 12:12); “foreign gods” (Gen. 35:2, 4; cf. Deut. 29:18); “new gods” (32:17). (3) Of judges or prophets as “to whom the word of God came” (John 10:35; Ps. 82:6), and whom God consequently dignified with authority to bear His own name (Ex. 21:6, see marg.; 22:8, “judges”). The medium of Endor said to Saul concerning the spirit she brought up at the seance, “I see a divine being [ʾēlōhîm] coming up out of the earth” (1 Sam. 28:13; the NIV has “spirit”). The expression is difficult and unusual in that it is the same word for “God” or “gods,” but that this particular reference is not to Jehovah or to heathen deities or demons is evident from Saul’s immediate query, “What is his form?” (v. 14); “What form is he of?”

KJV. It is apparent that this is another case where ʾēlōhîm is employed of a judge or prophet. The designation was plainly apropos of Samuel, the last and greatest of the judges and the first of the prophets. This usage of ʾēlōhîm as referring to God’s earthly representatives is denied by some critics, and the RSV renders “God” in Ex. 21:6; 22:8; such a rendering is manifestly unsustainable by the context and by a general comparison of Scripture.

GODS, FALSE. Under the heading of idolatry (which see) will be discussed the general subject of the evil that proved to be so attractive and fatal to the Israelites, namely, the worship of false gods. In this article we only present the gods named in Scripture, whether worshiped by Israel or other nations. They are given in alphabetical order.

Adram melech (a-dram’e-lek; “Adar is king”). This deity was worshiped in NW Mesopotamia under the name of Adad-Milki, which is a form of the Syrian god Hadad. In honor of Adrammelech the colonists of Samaria, who had been brought from Sepharvaim, burned their children (2 Kings 17:31). The deity is associated with Anammelech. Some have identified the two as being a double god, but this is hypothetical. M.F.U.

Amon (“the hidden one”). Originally he was merely a local god of Thebes (biblical No-amon, the capital of Upper Egypt; Nah. 3:8; Jer. 46:25, RV). With the rapid ascendancy of this city during the strong New Middle Kingdom under the Eighteenth Egyptian Dynasty (c. 1580–1085 B.C.), the god Amon (Amun) assumed national prominence and was often designated Amon-Re, the sun-god. A great temple was erected in his honor at Karnak, and it was against the influential priesthood of this deity that the youthful reformer Akhenaton (Akhnaton) revolted when he built a new capital at Amarna (which see) where the famous Amarna Tablets were recovered in 1887.

Anam´melech (a-nam´e-lek; “Anu is king”). Anu was the Babylonian god of the sky and one of the gods revered by the people of the Babylonian city Sepharvaim (2 Kings 17:31). When these Sepharvites were transported to Samaria they honored this repugnant deity by burning their children, worshiping him in the fashion of Molech, the god worshiped particularly by the sons of Ammon (1 Kings 11:7). See Adrammelech.

‘Anat (Anath; a-nat). ‘Anat was the patroness of sex and war, the paramour of Aliyan Baal. She is to be identified with the “queen of heaven” to whom Jews offered incense in Jeremiah’s day (Jer. 44:19). Lewd figurines of the nude goddess have been dug from Palestinian sites at levels dating from the second and first millennia B.C. It was against the degrading religion of the Canaanites that Moses and Joshua issued such stern warnings to Israel, realizing the utterly debilitating effect of Canaanite cults upon the chaste morality and high spirituality demanded by the worship of Jehovah. See also Asherah; Ashtoreth. M.F.U.

Ar´temis (ar´te-mis). A goddess known among the Greeks as Artemis and among the Romans as Diana. Like Apollo she was armed with bow and arrow, which she used against monsters and giants, but she was also a beneficent and helpful deity. As Apollo was the luminous god of day, she with her torch was a goddess of light by night, and in time became identified with all possible goddesses of moon and night. Her proper domain is that of nature, being a mighty huntress, sometimes chasing wild animals, sometimes dancing, playing, or bathing with her companions. To her all beasts of the field were sacred, but her favorite animal in all Greece was held to be the hind. As goddess of the chase she also had influence in war, and the Spartans sought her favor by the gift of a goat before going into battle.

Artemis (Diana) was also a protectress of youth, especially those of her own sex. Young girls revered the virgin goddess as the guardian of their maiden years and before marriage offered her a lock of their hair, their girdle, and their maiden garment. She was supposed to assist at childbirth. In early times human sacrifices had been offered to Artemis. A relic of this was the yearly custom, observed at Sparta, of flogging the boys till they bled at the altar of a deity known as Artemis Orthia.

“Artemis of the Ephesians” was not a Greek divinity, but Asiatic. This is shown by the fact that eunuchs were employed in her worship—a practice quite foreign to Greek ideas. She was not regarded as a virgin but as mother and foster-mother, as is clearly shown by the multitude of breasts in the rude effigy. She was undoubtedly a representative of the same power presiding over conception and birth that was adored in Palestine under the name Ashtoreth. Her worship, frantic and fanatical after the manner of Asia, was traced back to the Amazons. Her temple at Ephesus was one of the wonders of the world, but its great glory was the “image which fell down from heaven” (Acts 19:35). Images claiming so lofty an origin were to be found in cities other than Ephesus. Once in the year there was a public festival in honor of the goddess at Ephesus, to which all the Ionians who could do so came with their wives and children, bringing costly offerings to Artemis and rich presents for the priests. Great gain came to the silversmiths in making and selling small images of the goddess (cf. 19:23–40).

Ashe´rah (a-she´ra). Plural, Asherim, a pagan goddess who is found in the Ras Shamra epic religious texts discovered at Ugarit in N Syria (1929–37) as Asherat, “Lady of the Sea,” and consort of El. She was the chief goddess of Tyre in the fifteenth century B.C. with the appellation Qudshu, “holiness.” In the OT Asherah appears as a goddess by the side of Baal, whose consort she evidently came to be, at least among the Canaanites of the south. However, most biblical references to the name point clearly to some cult object of wood, which might be worshiped or cut down and burned and which was certainly the goddess’ image (1 Kings 15:13; 2 Kings 21:7). Her prophets are mentioned (1 Kings 18:19) and the vessels used in her service are referred to (2 Kings 23:4). Her cult object, whatever it was, was utterly detestable to faithful worshipers of Yahweh (1 Kings 15:13) and was set up on the high places beside the “altars of incense” (ḥammānîm) and the “stone pillars” (maṣṣēbôt). Indeed, the “stone pillars” seem to have represented the male god Baal (cf. Judg. 6:28), while the cult object of Asherah, probably a tree or pole, constituted a symbol of this goddess (see W. L. Reed, The Asherah in the Old Testament). But Asherah was only one manifestation of a chief goddess of western Asia, regarded now as the wife, then as the sister, of the principal Canaanite god El. Other names of this deity were Ashtoreth (Astarte) and Anath. Frequently represented as a nude woman bestride a lion, with a lily in one hand and a serpent in the other, and called Qudshu “the Holiness,” that is, “the Holy One” in a perverted moral sense, she was a divine courtesan. In the same sense the male prostitutes consecrated to the cult of the Qudshu and prostituting themselves to her honor were called qdēshîm, “sodomites” (Deut. 23:18, marg.; 1 Kings 14:24; 15:12; 22:46). Characteristically Canaanite, the lily symbolizes grace and sex appeal and the serpent fertility (W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel [1942], pp. 68–94). At Byblos (biblical Gebal) on the Mediterranean, N of Sidon, a center dedicated to this goddess has been excavated. She and her colleagues specialized in sex and war, and her shrines were temples of legalized vice. Her degraded cult offered a perpetual danger of pollution to Israel and must have sunk to sordid depths as lust and murder were glamorized in Canaanite religion. On a fragment of the Baal Epic, Anath (‘Anat) appears in an incredibly bloody orgy of destruction. For some unknown reason she fiendishly butchers mankind, young as well as old, in a most horrible and wholesale fashion, wading ecstatically in human gore up to her knees—even up to her throat—all the while exulting sadistically. In Canaan there was a tendency to employ the plural forms of deities Ashtoreth (Ashtoroth), Asherah (Asherim), and Anath (Anathoth) to summarize all the various manifestations of this deity. In like fashion the Canaanite plural Elohim (“gods”) was adopted by the Hebrews to express the excellencies and attributes of the one true God. See also Ashtoreth. M.F.U.

Ash’ima (ash’ima). The god of Hamath, introduced by the colonists settled in Samaria by Shalmaneser (2 Kings 17:30).

Ash’toreth (ash’tō-reth). Astarte, a Canaanite goddess. In S Arabia the name is found as ‘Athtar (apparently from athara, “to be fertile, to irrigate”), a god identified with the planet Venus. The name is cognate with Babylonian Ishtar, the goddess of sensual love, maternity, and fertility. Licentious worship was conducted in honor of her. As Asherah and Anat of Ras Shamra, she was the patroness of war as well as sex and is sometimes identified with these goddesses. The Amarna Letters present Ashtoreth as Ashtartu. In the Ras Shamra Tablets are found both the masculine form ‘Athtar and the feminine ‘Athtart. Ashtoreth worship was entrenched early at Sidon (1 Kings 11:5, 33; 2 Kings 23:13). Her cult even presented a danger of pollution to early Israel (Judg. 2:13; 10:6); Solomon succumbed to her voluptuous worship (1 Kings 11:5; 2 Kings 23:13). The peculiar vocalization Ashtoreth, instead of the more primitive Ashtaroth, is evidently a deliberate alteration by the Hebrews to express their abhorrence for her cult by giving her the vowels of their word for “shame” (bōshet). See also Anat; Asherah; Diana. M.F.U.

Astaroth. See Asherah; Ashtoreth.

Astar’te. The Greek name for Ashtoreth (which see).

Atar’gatis (a-tar’ga-tis; from Gk. atargatis from the Aram. Atar or Attar (Astarte) plus Atah. Probably the same form of the Phrygian Atis, a god of vegetation). A Syrian divinity, the great goddess of fertility among the Aramaeans. The worship of this goddess is not alluded to in the OT, but 2 Macc. 12:26 mentions her temple at Carnion in Gilead. She was also worshipped at Ashkelon, and the concomitants of her cult were those of the mother goddess of the Semites. M.F.U.

Ba'al (bā'al). The common Canaanite word for “master lord.” Baal was one of the chief male deities of the Canaanite pantheon, now well known from the religious epic literature discovered at Ras Shamra (ancient Ugarit of the Amarna Letters) from 1929 to 1937. Baal was the son of El, the father of the gods and the head of the Canaanite pantheon, according to the tablets from Ugarit. He is also designated as “the son of Dagon” (Heb. dāgān, “grain”), an ancient Canaanite and Mesopotamian deity associated with agriculture. Baal was thus the farm god who gave increase to family and field, flocks and herds. He was likewise identified with the storm god Hadad, whose voice could be heard in the reverberating thunder that accompanied rain, so necessary for the success of the crops.

Canaanite Worship. The inhabitants of Canaan were addicted to Baal worship, which was conducted by priests in temples and in good weather outdoors in fields and particularly on hilltops called “high places.” The cult included animal sacrifice, ritualistic meals, and licentious dances. Near the rock altar was a sacred pillar, or maṣṣēbâ, and close by was the symbol of the ʾāshērâ, both of which apparently symbolized human fertility. High places had chambers for sacred prostitution by male prostitutes (qdēshîm) and sacred harlots (qḏēshôt) (1 Kings 14:23–24; 2 Kings 23:7). The gaiety and licentious character of Baal worship always had a subtle attraction for the austere Hebrews bound to serve a holy God under a rigorous moral code.

Baal Names. In times of lapse Hebrews compounded the names of their children with Baal—for example, Jerubbaal (Judg. 7:1); Eshbaal (1 Chron. 8:33; 9:39). Merib-baal (8:34; 9:40), which in times of revival and return to Jehovistic worship were altered, the baal element being replaced by “bosheth,” meaning “shame.” Thus pious Israelites expressed their horror of Baal worship; examples are Jerubbesheth (for Jerubbaal, 2 Sam. 11:21), Ish-bosheth (for Ishbaal, 2:8), Mephibosheth (for Merib-baal; 4:4; 9:6, 10). Numerous place names also occur, such as Baal-gad (“lord of good fortune,” Josh. 11:17), Baal-hamon (“lord of wealth,” Song of Sol. 8:11), Baal-hazor (“Baal’s village,” 2 Sam. 13:23), Baal-meon (“lord of the dwelling,” Num. 32:38), Baal-peor (“lord of the opening,” Deut. 4:3), Baal-tamar (“lord of the palm tree,” Judg. 20:33), and others.

Ba'al-berith' (bā'al-be-rîth; “lord of the covenant”). Under this title the great NW Semitic weather god Baal was worshipped at Shechem after the death of Gideon (Judg. 8:33; 9:4). Occasionally he was spoken of as El-berith, “the god of covenant” (9:46). The Canaanites were brought into the Israelite fold by treaty, conquest, or gradual absorption. The Bene Hamor (“sons of the ass”) of Shechem were incorporated in such a way. This is indicated from various early references to them and to their god Baal-berith. The sacrifice of an ass was an essential feature of a treaty among the Amorites of the Mari Period (c. 1700 B.C.). (Cf. W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity [1940], p. 231.) M.F.U.

Ba'alim (bā'al-im; Heb. plural of Baal). This is a general term including not images of Baal but various concepts of the god. There were numerous Baalim, such as Baal-shamem (lord of heaven) of the Phoenicians and Palmyraeans, Baal-Melkart of the Tyrians, and Baal-Saphon of the Canaanites of Ugarit. There is a distinction, too, between the Baalim, such as Baal-berith, Baal-peor, and Baal-zebul. M.F.U.

Ba'al-pe'or (bā'al-pē-or; “Baal of Peor”). A Moabite deity worshipped on the summit of Mt. Peor with immoral rites. The name is probably another form of Chemosh (which see).

The Israelites were seduced into the immorality of this licentious worship in the plains of Moab (Num. 25:1–9; Ps. 106:28; Hos. 9:10). M.F.U.

Ba'al-ze'ubub (bā'al-ze'ubub). The form of the name of Baal as worshiped at the Philistine city of Ekron. Baal, under this aspect of worship, was viewed as the producer of flies and hence able to control this pest so common in the East. He was consulted by Ahaziah of Israel, c. 849 B.C. (2 Kings 1:2–16). A NT rendering of the name is Beelzebul, (Beelzebub, KJV) meaning “lord of the (heavenly) habitation.” Pharisees called Beelzebub (Beelzebul) the “ruler of the demons” (Matt. 12:24). Our Lord denied that He expelled demons by the power of Beelzebul (Luke 11:19–23). It is a matter of divine revelation that demonism is the dynamic of idolatry. (1 Cor. 10:20, “No, but I say that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons, and not to God; and I do not want you to become sharers in demons”). Many of the Jews from the period of the restoration and down through NT times believed that heathen deities were demons. The heathen deities were, of course, nothing, but behind them were evil spirits or demons energizing their worship (cf. Merrill F. Unger, Biblical Demonology, pp. 58–61).

Bel (bāl; Akkad. Bēlû, cognate of Heb. ba'al, “lord”). The patron god of Babylon (Jer. 51:44) identified with Marduk, head of the Babylonian pantheon. The Hebrews called him Merodach. As a sun-god his festival was celebrated in the spring at the beginning of the year, since the sun’s rays were then most potent in reviving nature. The Babylonians paid him supreme tribute and exalted him to the headship of their pantheon shortly after 2000 B.C. According to Enuma elish, the Babylonian account of creation, Marduk was elevated to this superior position because of his slaying Tiamat, the goddess of chaos. He was worshiped in Esagila, the great temple at Babylon. M.F.U.

Be'arith. See Baal-berith.

Calf Worship.

1. An image was made of gold earrings and other ornaments by the Hebrews and worshiped under the direction of Aaron (Ex. 32:1–6; Deut. 9:16). This was evidently a representation of Jehovah as the God of their deliverance from Egypt. It seems scarcely possible that this incident represents bull worship as witnessed in Egypt, for there the bull was a living animal (Apis). Among many Eastern nations there is evidence of the worship of the bull as the emblem of strength and the symbol of generative power. The winged bull was common among the Assyrians. In Egypt the term bull was a favorite title applied to a king or a god.

2. Jeroboam I, after the division of the monarchy, set up two golden calves at Bethel in the south of his country and Dan in the north, to offset interest in the Temple at Jerusalem (1 Kings 12:28–29). This was evidently an accommodation to Canaanite bull cults and certainly cannot mean that the people worshiped the image itself but rather they thought of Jehovah enthroned invisibly above the calf. Among Israel’s immediate neighbors—Canaanites, Aramaeans, and Hittites—“deities were nearly always represented as standing on the back of an animal or as on a throne borne by animals, but never as themselves in animal form” (W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity [1940], p. 229). The storm god of Mesopotamia, for example, is depicted on second millennium B.C. seal cylinders in the form of a lightning bolt set upright on a bull’s back (ibid.). Although conceptionally there is little difference between representing the invisible Deity as enthroned above the cherubim (1 Sam. 4:4; 2 Kings 19:15), or as standing on a bull, except that the former represent beings of the realm of the supernatural that defend the holiness (Gen. 3:24) and throne of God (Isa. 37:16; Rev. 4:6–9), nevertheless Jeroboam’s innovation was extremely dangerous. The bull affiliations of Baal, “lord of heaven,” were too closely connected with the more degrading aspects of pagan cults to be safe. The Northern Kingdom, consequently, fell to the peril of idolatrous pollution as a result. M.F.U.

Cas'tor (kas'tor) and Pol'lux (pol'ux; Gk. dioskouroi, "sons of Jupiter"). Castor was a horse tamer and Pollux master of the art of boxing. Castor became mortal, having fallen in a contest with Idas and Lynceus, sons of their paternal uncle Aphareus. Pollux, the immortal son of Zeus, prayed to his father to let him die, too. Zeus permitted him to spend one day among the gods, his peers, the other in the lower world with his beloved brother. According to another story, Zeus, in reward for their brotherly love, set them in the sky as the constellation of the Twins, or the morning and evening star. They are the ideal types of bravery and dexterity in fight.

The ancient symbol of the twin gods at Lacedaemon was two parallel beams, joined by crosspieces, which the Spartans took with them into war. They were worshiped at Sparta and Olympia with Hercules and other heroes. As gods of the sea they were worshiped especially in Ostia, the harbor town of Rome. The only mention of them in Scripture is that the ship in which Paul sailed from Malta bore the sign of "Castor and Pollux" (Acts 28:11, KJV; "Twin Brothers," NASB, see marg.).

Che'mosh (ke-mosh). The national deity of the Moabites, honored with horribly cruel rites like those of Molech, to whom children were sacrificed in the fire. It is interesting archaeologically to note that the anger of Chemosh is said in the famous Moabite Stone to be the reason for Israel's subjugation of Moab (cf. Judg. 11:24). Solomon made a fatal mistake, whatever his reason might have been, of rearing an altar to Chemosh in Jerusalem (1 Kings 11:7). This abomination was not destroyed until Josiah's purge almost three centuries later (2 Kings 23:13). So infatuated were the Moabites with Chemosh that they were known as the "people of Chemosh" (Num. 21:29). M.F.U.

Chi'un. See Kiyyun, below; and also article Kiyyun in the general listing.

Da'gon (dā'gon; Heb. dāgān, "corn," evidently a diminutive of dag, "fish"). An ancient Mesopotamian deity, transported early to the west. Dagon is generally represented as having the body or trunk of a fish, with a human head and hands, and as being the symbol of water and all the vivifying natural powers that take effect in warm countries through water. The Babylonian-Assyrian, and later Canaanite, Dagon is described by Philo of Byblos as the god of grain. This has been abundantly verified by the N Syrian religious texts from Ras Shamra. There Dagon is associated with agriculture and is described as the father of the great god Baal. Dagon was revered among the early Phoenicians. He had importance as the national god of the Philistines, who set up temples in his honor at Ashdod, Gaza, and elsewhere. Numerous towns were named after him, such as Beth-dagon (Josh. 15:41). His temple has been found at Ugarit near that of Baal, with features found in later Hebrew architecture. Instances connected with the temple of Dagon are the scene of Samson's death (Judg. 16:23–30), the experiences connected with the Hebrew Ark at Ashdod (1 Sam. 5:1–7), and the fastening of Saul's head in the temple of Dagon at Bethshan, which has been excavated at this famous fortress site guarding the eastern approaches of Jezreel. M.F.U.

Diana. See Artemis.

Gad. A Canaanite deity rendered "Fortune" (Isa. 65:11, see marg.); the god of good fortune, supposed to be the glorified planet Jupiter. This star is called by the Arabs "the greater luck" as the star of good fortune.

Her'mes (her'mîz). The Greek god who served as messenger for the other gods, identical with Mercury, the Roman god of commerce and protector of the grain trade. Hermes was the son of Zeus and the Naiad, daughter of Atlas. He wore winged sandals and wings on his hat as well. He was inventor of the lyre, herald of the gods, and guide of the dead into the underworld. He was also the god of mining, of crops, and of roads, as well as the patron of trade, and even of theft. He is mentioned in Acts 14:12, where it is stated that the people of Lystra took Paul to be “Hermes, because he was the chief speaker.”

Jupiter. See Zeus.

Kiyyun (ki´un). The name of this deity should in all likelihood be vocalized Kaiwan or Kewan as representing Akkad. Kaiwānu, the name of Ninib or Saturn. The unusual spelling in the MT is evidently the result of the intentional pointing for the vowels of shiqqûš, meaning “a detestable thing.” Accordingly, the NIV renders it “shrine.” The word occurs only once in the Heb. Bible in Amos 5:26, “Kiyyun, your images, the star of your gods.” The KJV renders “Chiun.”

Mal´cham, or Malcam (mal´kam). The national god of the Ammonites equated sometimes with Molech or Moloch (which see); rendered “Milcom.”

Mercury. See Hermes. See Milcom.

Me´ni (me´ni; Heb. mnî, “destiny” or “fate”). Name of the god of destiny or fortune worshiped by the ancient Hebrews in time of apostasy: “But you who forsake the Lord, who forget My holy mountain, who set a table for Fortune, and who fill cups with mixed wine for Destiny” (Isa. 65:11; see marg.).

Mero´dach (me-rōˋdak; the Heb. name for the Akkad. Marduk). See Bel; Baal. Merodach (Marduk) was the head god of the Babylonian pantheon and the patron god of the city. Merodach’s exaltation as head of the Babylonian pantheon is featured in the Babylonian story of creation, Enuma elish. He was worshiped by Nebuchadnezzar, the Assyrians, and notably by Cyrus the Great. Cyrus lauds Merodach as a “righteous prince.” Jeremiah 51:44 and Isa. 46:1 mention this deity (rendered “Bel”); also Jer. 50:2, where it is rendered “Marduk” (see marg.). Merodach’s name appears compounded with many prominent personages both in and outside of Scripture, and in Bible history in such names as Merodach-baladan and Evil-merodach. M.F.U.

Mil´com (mil´cum; “their king”). Another form of Malcham (which see), the national god of the Ammonites, called (1 Kings 11:5; 2 Kings 23:13) “the abomination of the sons of Ammon.” He was worshiped by Solomon and extirpated by Josiah.

Mo´lech (mōˋlek; Heb. melek, “king”). A Semitic deity honored by the sacrifice of children, in which they were caused to pass through or into the fire. Palestinian excavations have uncovered evidences of infant skeletons in burial places around heathen shrines. Ammonites revered Molech as a protecting father. Worship of Molech was stringently prohibited by Hebrew law (Lev. 18:21; 20:1–5). Solomon built an altar to Molech at Topheth in the valley of Hinnom. Manasseh (c. 696–642 B.C.), in his idolatrous orgy, also honored this deity. Josiah desecrated the Hinnom valley altar, but Jehoiakim revived the cult. The prophets sternly denounced this form of heathen worship (Jer. 7:29–34; Ezek. 16:20–22; 23:37–39; Amos 5:26, marg.). No form of ancient Semitic idolatry was more abhorrent than Molech worship. M.F.U.

Mo´loch (mōˋlok). Another English form (Amos 5:26, marg.; Acts 7:43) of Molech (which see).

Ne´bo (ne´bo; Akkad. Nābû). A Babylonian deity (Isa. 46:1), the god of wisdom and literature. Borsippa near Babylon was the special center of his worship. The last great Assyrian emperor, Ashurbanipal (669–633 B.C.), the Osnappar (which see) of the OT (Ezra 4:10), acted in the interests of Nebo and was a patron of learning and education. An inscription of Ashurbanipal reads thus: "I, Ashurbanipal, learn the wisdom of Nabu, the entire art of writing on clay tablets." In the Nabunaid Chronicle, at the time of the rule of Nabunaid's son Belshazzar, Nabu, together with Bel, was prominent. Speaking of Nabonidus (Akkad. Nabunaid), the Chronicle says: "The king for the month Nisan did not come to Babylon; Nabu did not come to Babylon; Bel did not go forth (from Esagila); the New Year's festival was not celebrated" (Jack Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past [1946], p. 190). M.F.U.

Nehush'tan (ne-hush'tan; a "brazen" or copper "thing"). A contemptuous epithet applied to the bronze serpent (which see), which the Israelites had turned into an object of worship (2 Kings 18:4). Among the first acts of Hezekiah was the destruction of all traces of the idolatrous rites that had gained a hold upon the people. Among other objects of superstitious reverence and worship was this serpent, which, in the course of a thousand years, had become invested with a mysterious sanctity that easily degenerated into idolatry.

Ner'gal (ner'gal). The Babylonian sun-god (2 Kings 17:30). The center of his cult was Cuthah, from which Babylonian city, among others, colonists were brought to Samaria after the deportation of the ten tribes (17:24–30). Its site is at Tell Ibrahim, NE of Babylon. Nergal was also the god of pestilence and war and had charge of the netherworld. The name occurs as a formative element in the name of one of Nebuchadnezzar's princes, Nergal-sar-ezer, who held the office of Rab-mag (Jer. 39:3, 13). M.F.U.

Nib'haz (nib'haz). An idol worshiped by the Avvites, displaced persons from the Assyrian Empire brought to colonize Samaria after the captivity of the Northern Kingdom (2 Kings 17:31). This deity is identified by Hommel with Ibna-haza, an Elamite god. M.F.U.

Nis'roch (nis'rok). A god with a temple at Nineveh and worshiped by Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.). It was while at worship in the house of this god that Sennacherib was assassinated (2 Kings 19:36–37). This divinity has not as yet been clearly identified. Some construe it as an intentional perversion of the name of Marduk or as a composite containing Ashur; others equate him with Assyrian Nusku. M.F.U.

Re'phan. See Rompha.

Rim'mon (rim'un; "pomegranate"). A Syrian deity worshiped at Damascus, where there was a temple or "house of Rimmon" (2 Kings 5:18). It is probably a contracted form for Hadad-Rimmon, since Hadad was the supreme deity or sun-god of the Syrians. Hadad, with the modification expressed by Rimmon, would be the sun-god of the late summer, who ripens the pomegranate and other fruits. In this sense he has been thought to be the personification of the power of generation, since the pomegranate, with its abundance of seeds, is used in the symbolism of both oriental and Greek mythology, along with the phallus, as a symbol of the generative power, and is also found upon Assyrian monuments.

Rom'pha (rom'fa). A deity said to have been worshiped by the Israelites in the desert (Acts 7:43, "the star of the god Rompha"). The quotation in Acts is from a corrupted translation of Kaiwan (Akkad. Kaimanu), the name of Saturn, and was understood to be the god Kiyyun (Amos 5:26). The KJV renders "Remphan," and the NIV, "Rephan." See Kiyyun; Sikkuth.

Sat'yr. See Shaggy Goat.

Shaggy Goat (Heb. śā'îr, "shaggy, hairy"). The reference is clearly to demonic creatures that would dance among the ruins of Babylon (Isa. 13:21, see marg.) and among the remains of Edomite cities (Isa. 34:14). "He goat" or "hairy goat" is what the name commonly refers to, but in Lev. 17:7 ("goat demons") and 2 Chron. 11:15 ("satyrs") the reference is clearly to some object of idolatrous reverence. It either refers to idols (thus NIV "goat idols") having the appearance of goats or, more likely, to the demon agencies energizing the idol in question. The demonic reference is clearly indicated by Rev. 18:2 where the language is quoted from the LXX and the word demons is used. Thus the prophet has in mind evil spirits. In Greek and Roman mythology a satyr was a sylvan god, Bacchus's companion. As a goatlike creature he had a brutal and lustful nature. The connection between Greek gods and the Hebrew representations is that of the idol and the demon power behind it.

Sic'cuth. See Sikkuth.

Sik'kuth (si'kuth). Apparently the proper name of a star deity (Amos 5:26), rendered by ERV, RSV "Sakkuth," but in the KJV and ASV translated "tabernacle" and in the NIV "shrine"; that is, Heb. "Succoth." Interpreted as a proper name, it corresponds to Sakkut, the Babylonian designation of the planet Saturn. The Babylonians also called the planet Saturn Kaimanu, in modernized form Kaiwanu or Kiyyun (which see; 5:26). As in the case of Heb. Kiyyun, the vocalization of the Heb. word for "a detestable thing" (shiggûs) was given to it, resulting in Sikkuth. See Remphan.

Suc'coth-be'noth (suc'oth-be'noth). An idol set up in Samaria (2 Kings 17:30) by displaced Babylonians. This deity has been identified with Zarpanitum, the consort of Marduk, the patron god of Babylon (Rawlinson and Schrader). Others have connected him with the Akkad. expression sakkut binuti, the supreme judge of the world. This is construed as a title of Marduk and the form Succoth-benoth represents a Hebraization of it (Delitzsch). M.F.U.

Tam'muz (tam-uz). Ezekiel refers to the worship of this Babylonian deity in a vision of his apostate brethren who were enamored of this cult. The prophet saw the women weeping for this god at the North Gate of the Jerusalem Temple (Ezek. 8:14). Tammuz was known by the Babylonians as Dumuzi, god of pasture and flocks, of subterranean water, and of vegetation. He was the husband-brother of Ishtar (Asherah, fertility goddess). Tammuz supposedly died every autumn when he departed to the underworld; from there he was recovered by the disconsolate Ishtar. His reappearance marked the bursting forth of life in the springtime. The fourth Babylonian month, July, was named in honor of Tammuz, which name was applied in later postbiblical times by Jews to their fourth month, June-July. Tammuz is equated with the Greek Adonis and the Egyptian Osiris. Allusions to the worship of Tammuz cults seem to be referred to in Jer. 22:18 and Amos 8:10. The worship of this god was widespread throughout the Fertile Crescent from Babylonia-Assyria to Palestine-Syria. The rites of Tammuz included a divine marriage of the king annually to the fertility goddess in the person of a temple priestess. Tammuz worship was especially notorious at Byblos (biblical Gebal) on the Mediterranean. M.F.U.

Tar'tak (tar'tak). A heathen deity mentioned with Nibhaz (which see) as introduced into Samaria by the Avvite settlers (2 Kings 17:31).

Zeus (zūs). In Greek mythology, king of the gods and of men. He is identical with the Roman Jupiter, not only in nature but also in name, for Jupiter is compounded of Iōvis and pater. As in the course of time the Roman god Jupiter became identified with the Greek, he was regarded as a son of Saturn and of Ops, corresponding with the Greek Uranus and Rhea respectively. From Zeus came all that appears in the heavens; he was the bringer of light, the cause of the dawn as well as of the full moon. He controlled all weather, sent the lightning and rain, was the giver of victory, watched over justice and truth, and was therefore the most ancient and important god of oaths.

Zeus is mentioned in Acts 14:11-12, where it is recorded that the people cried: "The gods have become like men and have come down to us." And they began calling Barnabas, Zeus, and Paul, Hermes, because he was the chief speaker." Barnabas was probably identified with Zeus because of his majestic appearance; Paul with Hermes because of his eloquence.

The temple of Zeus is said to have been “just outside the city” (v. 13), as was frequently the custom.

GOG (gog).

1. Son of Shemaiah and father of Shimei, and one of the descendants of Reuben (1 Chron. 5:4).

2. The prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal (“the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal,” KJV), who, Ezekiel said, would invade the restored land of Israel from the far distant northern land by the appointment of God in the last times, with a powerful army of numerous nations (Ezek. 38:1–9) and with the intention of plundering Israel, now dwelling in security (vv. 10–16). When Gog shall fall upon Israel, he is to be destroyed by a wrathful judgment from the Lord, that the nations may know that God is the Lord (vv. 17–23). On the mountains of Israel Gog, with all his hosts and nations, will succumb to the judgment of God (39:1–8).

Ezekiel 38–39, which deal with Gog, the prince, and Magog, his land, describe the actual invasion of Palestine by a great northern confederacy, ostensibly headed by Russia. The scene depicts a gigantic outburst of anti-Semitism and a colossal attempt to overrun Palestine and annihilate the Jews. Russia and the northern powers have been persecutors of dispersed Israel, and it is consonant with the covenants and promises of Israel, which are yet to be fulfilled (cf. Gen. 15:18–21; Deut. 33), that divine destruction should be precipitated at the climax of the last attempt to destroy the remnant of Israel in Jerusalem and Palestine. The entire prophecy belongs to the “Day of the Lord” (cf. Isa. 2:10–22; Rev. 19:11–21) and evidently precedes the actual battle of Armageddon by a number of years. The prophetic perspective concerning Gog, however, includes the final revolt of the nations at the close of the mediatorial messianic kingdom (20:6–9). M.F.U.

GOIIM (gōy'im). A Heb. word for “nations,” or “peoples,” rendered by the NASB and NIV as a proper noun in Gen. 14:1, 9.

GO'LAN (gō'lan). One of the three cities of refuge on the E of the Jordan, the others being Bezer and Ramoth (Deut. 4:43; cf. Josh. 20:8; 21:27; 1 Chron. 6:71). It became the head of the province of Gaulanitis, one of the four provinces into which Bashan was divided after the Babylonian captivity, and possibly identical with modern Sahem el-Jolan, about seventeen miles E of the Sea of Galilee, in western Hauran.

GOLD. A unit of money and a mineral. See Metrology; Mineral Kingdom.

GOLDEN CITY (Heb. madhēbâ). A term applied in the KJV to Babylon (Isa. 14:4; NASB and NIV, see marg.) and occurring nowhere else. "Not one of the early translators ever thought of deriving this word from the Aramaean dehab (gold), but translated the word as if it were marhebah (haughty, violent treatment). We understand it, according to madmenah (dunghill) in chap. 25:10, as denoting the place where they were reduced to pining away, i.e., as applied to Babylon as the house of servitude where Israel had been wearied to death" (Delitzsch, Com., ad loc.). The NASB and NIV render "fury."

GOLDSMITH. See Handicrafts.

GOL'GOTHA (gol'go-tha; "place of a skull"). The gospels and tradition disagree as to its locality. John 19:41–42 locates the place by saying that "in the place where He was crucified there was a garden; and in the garden a new tomb, in which no one had yet been laid." Here Jesus was laid, for it was close by, and it was the Jews' preparation day. The Scripture references place the spot outside the city, and from Matt. 27:33 and Mark 15:29 it is to be concluded that the place of crucifixion was on the public road. The traditional site of Calvary, within the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, is now within the city walls, which were built by the Turkish ruler Suleiman the Magnificent in the sixteenth century. But the area of the church was evidently outside the walls in Jesus' day. See Calvary. H.F.V.

GOLI'ATH (go-li'ath). Goliath, although repeatedly called a Philistine, was probably descended from the old Rephaim, of whom a scattered remnant took refuge with the Philistines after their dispersion by the Ammonites (Deut. 2:20–21; 2 Sam. 21:22).

The only mention made of Goliath is his appearance as the champion of the Philistines, and his death at the hands of David (1 Sam. 17), c. 1010 B.C. The Philistines had ventured upon another inroad into the country and had taken up a firm position on the slope of a mountain, Ephes-dammim, between Socoh and Azekah, in western Judah. Israel encamped over against them on the slope of a second mountain, at a place called the valley of the Terebinth, and between the two camps lay a deep, narrow valley, which seemed destined as a field on which the warriors of either side might exercise their valor. From the Philistine camp there advanced a champion, Goliath of Gath, six cubits and a span high (which, taking the cubit at 18 inches, would make him 9½ feet tall), with a bronze helmet, clothed in a coat of mail the weight of which was 5,000 shekels, and with a spear like the shaft of a weaver's beam. For forty days he terrified the people by challenging, morning and evening, to single combat any of Israel's warriors. David had been sent to his brothers with provisions and, hearing the challenge of Goliath, inquired its meaning. Upon being told, he offered to become Israel's champion and went forward armed with a sling and five smooth stones. He answered the scornful taunt of the giant with, "This day the Lord will deliver you up into my hands." He struck Goliath in the forehead and, slaying the fallen champion, cut off his head. "When the Philistines saw that their champion was dead, they fled” and were pursued by the Israelites, who slaughtered them.

Skeletons recovered in Palestine attest to the fact that men as tall as Goliath once lived in that general region. Critics commonly reject the historical reliability of the David-Goliath narrative, adducing contradictions in the account. An alleged contradiction is 2 Sam. 21:19, which reports that “Elhanan . . . killed Goliath the Gittite,” whereas 1 Sam. 17:50–51 (cf. 19:5; 21:9; 22:10, 13) asserts that David did so. Moreover, 1 Chron. 20:5 reports that “Elhanan the son of Jair killed Lahmi the brother of Goliath the Gittite.” If this glaring error was in the original the final redactors of Samuel were guilty of a most obvious and stupid blunder and must be considered as incredibly incompetent. Rather, the explanation of the apparent discrepancy is that the passage in 2 Samuel has suffered corruption in the course of transmission. A careful study of the original suggests that the reading both in Samuel and Chronicles originally was either, “And Elhanan the son of Jair killed Lahmi and the brother of Goliath,” or, “Elhanan the son of Jair the Bethlehemite killed the brother of Goliath.” In the original it is obvious that both passages substantiate that David killed Goliath and Elhanan killed “the brother of Goliath.”

GO'MER (gō'mer).

1. The eldest son of Japheth and father of Ashkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah (Gen. 10:2–3). The name afterward occurs as that of a tribe (see Ezek. 38:6), probably the Cimmerians, who dwelt, according to Herodotus, on the Maeotis, in the Taurian Chersonesus (K. & D., Com.).

2. The name of the daughter of Diblaim, a harlot who became the wife or concubine (according to some, in vision only) of the prophet Hosea (Hos. 1:3), about 785 B.C.

GOMOR'RAH (go-mor'ra; apparently meaning “submersion”; cf. Arab. ghamara, to “overflow, inundate”). The city in the Jordan Valley (Gen. 10:19; 13:10) that, with Sodom, became a type of intolerable wickedness and was destroyed by fire (19:24–28). Like Sodom, its ruler was vanquished by a Mesopotamian confederacy that invaded the Jordan Valley in the time of Abraham (14:8–11). The biblical notices point out that the district of the Jordan where Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim, and Zoar were located was exceedingly productive and well populated around 2054 B.C., but that not long afterward it was abandoned. This circumstance is in full agreement with archaeological findings. (See W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine and the Bible, pp. 133ff.). These cities were located in the valley of Siddim (14:3). Probably this was the area at the southern end of the Dead Sea, now covered with water. Somewhere in the vicinity of 2050 B.C. this region was overwhelmed by a great conflagration. The country was said to have been “full of tar pits” (14:10). Bitumen deposits are still to be found in that area. Being on the fault-line forming the Jordan Valley, the Dead Sea, and the Arabah, this region has been the scene of earthquakes throughout history. The biblical account sets forth the miraculous elements, but geological activity was doubtless a factor. The salt and free sulfur of this area, now a burned-out region of oil and asphalt, were mingled by an earthquake to form a violent explosion. Evidently salt and sulfur were blasted red-hot into the sky so that literally it rained fire and brimstone over the whole plain (19:24, 28). Lot's wife being turned into a pillar of salt is reminiscent of “the Mount of Sodom” known to the Arabs as Jebel Usdum, a five-mile-long salt mass stretching N and S at the southeastern end of the Dead Sea. Somewhere under the slowly rising water of the southern part of the lake the five cities of the plain are to be found. According to Tacitus's History 5.7 and Josephus's Wars 4.8.4, their ruins were still visible in classical and NT times, not yet being covered with water. M.F.U.

GOODLY TREES. See Beautiful Trees.

GOODMAN. In the NT, a KJV term from Gk. oikodespotēs referring to a “landowner” (so NASB, Matt. 13:27;), the “head of the house” (so NASB, Matt. 10:25; 24:43; Luke 13:25; 14:21), or the “owner of the house” (so NASB, Mark 14:14; Luke 22:11). The NIV translates “owner” (Matt. 13:27; 24:43; Luke 13:25; 14:21; 22:11), “landowner” (Matt. 20:1, 11; 21:33), “head of the house” (Matt. 10:25), and “owner of the house” (Mark 14:14). In the KJV oikodespotēs is also rendered “master of the house” and “householder.” The OT appearance of “goodman” (Prov. 7:19, KJV) is the rendering of Heb. ʾîsh, “man,” i.e., husband. The NASB gives “the man,” and the NIV, “husband.”

GOODNESS. In some places kindness seems more especially meant; e.g., “the earth is full of the goodness [NASB, lovingkindness; NIV, “unfailing love”] of the Lord” (Ps. 33:5, KJV). In others it expresses the supreme benevolence, holiness, and excellence of the divine character, the sum of all God’s attributes. “I Myself will make all My goodness pass before you” (Ex. 33:19). In common use goodness is the opposite of badness, the quality of character that makes its possessor lovable; excellence more particularly of a religious kind, virtue, righteousness.

GOPHER WOOD. See Vegetable Kingdom.

GO'SHEN (gō'shen).

1. A northeastern section of the Egyptian Delta region usually called “the land of Goshen,” “country of Goshen” (Gen. 45:10; Josh. 10:41), or simply “Goshen” (Gen. 47:27) and “the land of Rameses” (47:11; cf. Ex. 12:37). In this region the Israelites under Jacob settled during the time Joseph was prime minister (Gen. 46:28–34). This was a fertile section of Egypt, excellent for grazing and certain types of agriculture, but apparently not particularly inviting to the pharaohs because of its distance from the Nile irrigation canals. It extends thirty or forty miles in length, centering in Wadi Tumilat, and reaches from Lake Timsa to the Nile. It was connected with the name of Rameses because Rameses II (c. 1290–1224 B.C.) built extensively in this location at Pithom (Tell el Retabah) and Rameses (Tell ed-dab'a).

Tanis was called the House of Rameses (c. 1300–1100 B.C.). Therefore, the term Raamses in Ex. 1:11 must be construed as being a modernization of an archaic place name and as having reference to an earlier city Zoan-Tanis, where the Israelites labored centuries earlier. M.F.U.

2. A district of southern Palestine lying between Gaza and Gibeon, its name probably being given in remembrance of Egypt (Josh. 10:41; 11:16). In the latter passage the maritime plain of Judah, the Shephelah, is expressly mentioned, and if Goshen was any part of that rich plain, its fertility may have suggested its name.

3. A town mentioned in company with Debir, Socoh, and others, as being in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:51), in the group on the SW part of the hills.

GOSPEL (Anglo-Saxon, godspel, “good story”). Good news, and employed as the equivalent of the Gk. euaggelion. This word in the earlier Gk. language signified “a present given to one who brought good tidings,” or “a sacrifice offered in thanksgiving for such good tidings having come.” In later Gk. it was employed for the good tidings themselves. It is used to signify:

1. The good news of the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ as provided by our Lord and preached by His disciples (1 Cor. 15:1–4). The gospel then is full and free deliverance from sin on the basis of simple faith in Jesus Christ, the vicarious sin-Bearer (Eph. 2:8–10). In this aspect the gospel has two phases: one, to the unsaved—Christ died for me (John 3:16; Acts 16:30–31); second, to the saved—I died in Christ (Rom. 6:2–10), with a key to the experiential realization of this fact in the life furnished by Rom. 6:11.

2. Forms of the gospel to be differentiated. Many Bible teachers make a distinction in the following: (1) The Gospel of the Kingdom. The good news that God’s purpose is to establish an earthly mediatorial kingdom in fulfillment of the Davidic covenant (2 Sam. 7:16). Two proclamations of the gospel of the kingdom are mentioned, one already past, beginning with the ministry of John the Baptist, carried on by our Lord and His disciples, and ending with the Jewish rejection of the Messiah. The other preaching is yet future (Matt. 24:14), during the Great Tribulation, and heralding the second advent of the King. Closely connected, although perhaps not identical in its emphasis with the gospel of the kingdom, is the everlasting gospel (Rev. 14:6) preached to those on earth during the latter part of the Tribulation. (2) The Gospel of God’s Grace (see no. 1 above). Paul calls this gospel of the grace of God “my gospel” (Rom. 2:16) because the full doctrinal content based upon the gospel of the grace of God embraces the revelation of the result in the outcalling of the church, her relationship, position, privileges, and responsibility. This distinctive Pauline truth, honeycombing Ephesians and Colossians, is interwoven in all of the Pauline writings.

3. “A different gospel” (Gal. 1:6; 2 Cor. 11:4) “which you have not accepted.” This consists of any denial or perversion of the gospel of the grace of God. Its essential stamp is that it denies the full efficacy of God’s grace alone to save, keep, and perfect, and introduces some sort of human merit. In Galatia it was legalism. Its teachers are under God’s terrible anathema. The relation of the gospel to the law of Moses has been a source of much confusion. Under grace the Ten Commandments are all presented, except that involving the observance of the seventh day. However, they are to be operative not to find favor with God but because the redeemed one has already found favor and eternal life and possesses the indwelling Spirit to work them out in daily conduct.

4. The four stories of our Lord’s life published by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. The writers are called evangelists. These accounts are “gospels” because they recite the events in the life, death, resurrection, and ascension of the Lord and predicted bestowment of the Spirit, making possible “the gospel.” M.F.U.

GOSPELS. See Bible, Books of.

GOSPELS, THE FOUR. The term gospel stems directly from the Anglo-Saxon godspel, meaning “god-message.” Ultimately, however, the earlier form of the expression went back to god-spel, signifying “a good message,” a phrase apparently invented to reflect exactly the Gk. euaggelion. The gospels find no parallel in world literature. Negatively they are not romances or folk tales, since they catalog historical events. Neither are they biographies in any strict sense, nor memoirs. They are not even in the strict sense of the word literary works. None of the evangelists, not even Luke, is dominated by literary aspirations. Perhaps the gospels can be best described as portraits of Jesus, the promised Messiah.

Matthew delineates the prophesied coming One as a King; Mark presents Him as a Servant; Luke, as a Man; John, as God. They thus give a fourfold portraiture of One who is in His person and work set forth as the Savior and Redeemer.

The gospels are thus written in a unique literary genre developed to present the divine message of salvation. In these four portraits of the Savior are immortalized the church’s memory and testimony concerning Jesus. All four are concerned with what Jesus was and said and did. Each evangelist has his peculiar style and his contribution is indispensable to the picture of the Christ that we get from the fourfold presentation.

Written in the simple, compelling language of the common people, the four gospels inimitably present Jesus as no biography, history, or other similar type of literary form could make Him known. Table 11, "The Life of the Lord Jesus," summarizes the events in Christ's life and gives the relevant Scripture passages in the four gospels.

The term gospel as used of these four pictures of Jesus is of later development. Nowhere in the NT is it employed of the books we now know as gospels. It is rather applied to the message of free and gracious salvation offered to sinners through the finished work of Jesus Christ (Rom. 1:1). Justin Martyr apparently first used the term memoirs to describe these books. However, beginning with the second half of the second century the title, later universally used, may be distinctly traced.

He was also seen by Paul when he was converted near Damascus (1 Cor. 15:8), and by Stephen when he saw “the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God” (Acts 7:56), and by the apostle John again in the apocalyptic vision (Rev. 1:9–16)

Writers of the Gospels. The authors of the four gospels were Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John (see under specific names). They were not all fishermen, as is often supposed, but were from different secular occupations and from various parts of the country.

Patristic testimony regarding both the authors and the order of the several gospels is conclusive. Matthew wrote at Jerusalem, before starting out to evangelize the nations; Mark wrote at Rome, before starting out to establish the faith in Egypt; Luke wrote in Greece, or while sharing Paul's imprisonment at Caesarea; John wrote at Ephesus after his exile at Patmos. Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 150) affirms that Matthew continued his stay at Jerusalem with the other apostles, busy with his own countrymen for a period of twelve years after the crucifixion (Strōmateis 6.5.53). Eusebius says, "The Holy Apostles and disciples of our Savior, being scattered over the whole world, Thomas, according to tradition, received Parthia as his allotted region; Andrew received Scythia, and John Asia, where, after continuing for some time, he died at Ephesus. Peter appears to have preached through Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Asia, to the Jews that were scattered abroad; who also, finally coming to Rome, was crucified with his head downward, having requested of himself to suffer in this way" (Ecclesiastical History 3.1).

Matthew. Theodore of Mopsuestia says, "For a good while the apostles preached chiefly to Jews in Judea. Afterward Providence made way for conducting them to remote countries. Peter went to Rome; the rest elsewhere; John, in particular, took up his abode in Ephesus. About this time the other evangelists, Matthew, Mark, and Luke, published their gospels, which were soon spread abroad all over the world" (cited by Lardner, 5:299). The author of the Imperfect Work (about A.D. 560) wrote, "The occasion of Matthew's writing is said to be this: There was a great persecution in Palestine, so that there was danger lest all the faithful should be dispersed. That they might not be without teaching, though they should have no teachers, they requested Matthew to write for them a history of all Christ's words and works, that wherever they should be, they should have with them the ground of their faith" (Lardner, 5:300). Exactly when Matthew's gospel was written is at present indeterminate. Ancient writers differ in dates. Theophylact, of the eleventh century, and Euthymius, of the twelfth, state that it was produced "eight years after the ascension," which would be about A.D. 41 or 42 of our current chronology. But more ancient writers give a later date. The Paschal Chronicle of the seventh century says it was written "about fifteen years after our Lord's ascension," with which Nicephorus Callisti, of the fourteenth century, agrees. This would be about A.D. 48. But Irenaeus, Bishop of Lyons, in the second century, says, "Matthew indeed produced a gospel written among the Hebrews in their own dialect, whilst Peter and Paul proclaimed the gospel and founded the church at Rome. After the departure [death] of these, Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, also transmitted to us in writing that which had been preached by Peter. And Luke, the companion of Paul, committed to writing the gospel preached by him [Paul]. Afterward John, the disciple of our Lord, the same that lay in his bosom, also published the gospel while he was yet in Ephesus, in Asia" (Eusebius E. H. 5.8). In no case could this have been earlier, but probably was later, than A.D. 61, the year Paul arrived at Rome a prisoner. Epiphanius, Bishop of Cyprus in A.D. 367, who is accounted high authority in these matters, says that Matthew wrote first (of the four evangelists) and Mark soon after, being a companion of Peter at Rome; that Mark and Luke were both of the seventy disciples sent out to the Gentiles; that both were offended at Christ's words recorded in John 6:44; that Peter recovered Mark, and Paul recovered Luke to the Christian faith afterward; that Mark wrote the second gospel and Luke the third, and John wrote the fourth and last gospel (see Lardner, 4:187–88).

By whom the gospel of Matthew was given in our present Gk. form is unknown, but it was probably by himself. The consensus of critical scholars is that it is not a mere translation but an original composition. Socrates, the historian, states that Matthew went to Ethiopia, where he is said to have died a natural death. Eusebius says that Pantaenus, the philosopher, who afterward became a Christian and was placed at the celebrated school at Alexandria, penetrated as far as the Indies, and "there found his own arrival anticipated by some who there were acquainted with the gospel of Matthew, to whom Bartholomew, one of the apostles, had preached, and left them the gospel of Matthew in Hebrew, which was also preserved until this time” (see Eusebius E. H. 5.10).

Mark. Mark is the evangelist who wrote the second gospel. Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis in the first half of the second century, furnished the earliest notice of this gospel. He says, “Mark, having been the interpreter of Peter, wrote down accurately whatever he remembered, without however recording in order what was either said or done by Christ. For neither did he hear the Lord, nor did he follow him (as did the Twelve). . . . So, then Mark committed no error in thus writing down such details as he remembered; for he made it his own forethought not to omit or misrepresent any details that he heard [from Peter]” (Eusebius E. H. 3.39). Jerome observes of Mark that “taking his gospel which himself had composed, he went to Egypt and at Alexandria founded a church of great note”; and in his Book of Illustrious Men says, “Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, at the desire of the brethren at Rome, wrote a short gospel according to what he had heard related by Peter, which, when Peter knew it, he approved it and authorized it to be read in the churches” (see Lardner, 5:334). Universal testimony agrees that Mark wrote down in his gospel as best he could the substance of Peter’s preaching; and the gospel itself confirms by internal evidence the testimony of the Fathers in many respects. For while it details in a graphic manner important facts, it is at once the briefest and least complete of the four gospels. Nevertheless, it represents fairly the impulsive and energetic Peter, and the very omissions and additions indicate the style of the apostle. Justin Martyr, who wrote about A.D. 140–50 and was born before the death of the apostle John, cites from the Memoirs of Peter the names given to James and John by Jesus, who called them “Boanerges,” or sons of thunder; a circumstance mentioned only in Mark’s gospel (3:17). Jerome, after mentioning Mark as having composed his gospel and gone to Egypt, founding a notable church at Alexandria, states that this evangelist “died in the eighth year of the reign of Nero.” As Nero ruled the empire A.D. 54–68, this would place the death of Mark in the year 62 (Lardner, 5:331).

Three things are made evident as related to Mark’s gospel by these patristic citations: (1) that Mark composed his gospel of the substance preached by Peter; (2) that Peter “knew” of the fact, and both approved and authorized his gospel to be read in the several churches; (3) that all this was accomplished before the death of Peter at Rome.

Luke. By common consent, Luke is regarded as the writer of the third gospel and of Acts. Even such writers as the Frenchman Renan, known as hostile to Christianity, concede this fact as incontestable. The third gospel is derived from different sources, but all legitimate authorities, as it is confessedly due to those apostles who “from the beginning were eyewitnesses and servants of the word” (prologue of chap. 1). Nevertheless, it is the most complete gospel of them all, and the only one that observes a strictly historical method, the first three gospels being biographical sketches or, as designated by Justin Martyr “Memoirs of the Apostles.” It is to be remarked that both Luke’s gospel and Acts are dedicated to one Theophilus (friend of God), which was a custom in those days, obligating those thus receiving a copy as a gift to exert themselves to give the work circulation (Lee).

John. John is the author of the fourth gospel. After extraordinary research and testing, the criticism of the best scholarship of the age ascribes this work to that apostle “whom Jesus loved.” No classic writing of equal antiquity is so well attested by both external and internal evidence as John’s gospel. It has been said, so peculiar and marked is this writing, that if we did not know who its author was, we should have to imagine a personage of such character for its authorship.

Designations of the Writers. The terms evangelist and synoptist are associated with the gospel writers.

Evangelists. In organizing the workers for the kingdom of Christ, “He gave some as apostles, and some as prophets, and some as evangelists ... for the equipping of the saints” (Eph. 4:11–12). Evangelists appear to have been appointed to a certain work, rather than to be a specific order in the apostolic church. They were afterward known as evangelistai, “evangelists,” whose function was that of missionary preachers, about whom Eusebius says, “leaving their country they performed the office of evangelists to those who proclaim Christ; they also delivered to them the books of the holy gospels. The Holy Ghost also wrought many wonders through them, so that as soon as the gospel was heard men voluntarily gathered in crowds and eagerly embraced the true faith with their whole minds.” The evangelists were “bringers of good tidings given to the heralds of salvation through Christ, who are not apostles” (Thayer). In the time of Chrysostom the term was applied to “the writers of the gospels” (Cremer).

Synoptists. The writers of the first three gospels are known as synoptists in distinction from the fourth gospel; and the first three gospels are called the synoptic gospels; from sun, “together,” and opsis, “view.” The reference is to the parallel narratives in the facts recorded and the statements made by Matthew, Mark, and Luke. John’s gospel is different in character, being intentionally supplementary to the accounts given by the synoptists. Clement of Alexandria says, “The three gospels previously written, having been distributed among all, and also handed down to him [i.e., John], they say that he admitted them, giving his testimony to their truth; but that there was only wanting in the narrative the account of the things done by Christ, among the first of his deeds, and at the commencement of the gospel.... For it is evident that the other three evangelists only wrote the deeds of our Lord for one year after the imprisonment of John the Baptist, and intimated this in the very beginning of their history.... [The] Apostle John, it is said, being entreated to undertake it, wrote the account of the time not recorded by the former evangelists, and the deeds done by our Savior, which they have passed by (for these were the events that occurred before the imprisonment of John), and this very fact is intimated by him when he says [2:11]: ‘This beginning of miracles Jesus made’” (Eusebius E. H. 3.24). Clement elsewhere says, “But John, last of all, perceiving that what had reference to the body in the gospel of our Savior was sufficiently detailed, and being encouraged by his familiar friends and urged by the Spirit, wrote a spiritual gospel” (Eusebius E. H. 6.14).

The Synoptic Gospels. Matthew, Mark, and Luke are termed the “synoptic” gospels because, in marked contrast to John, they present a “common view” of the facts about Jesus implied in the Gk. word sunopsis, “a blended view.” Critics maintain that Matthew and Luke contain substantial additions to material common to all three synoptics, and in these additions differ considerably from each other. Yet comparison shows that the framework regarding time and place is common to all three. In addition, many events and some teachings are related in all. More striking is the similarity of language employed. These likenesses are so well recognized and so numerous that the idea prevails that the first three gospels are not three independent compositions. This is the practically unanimous critical opinion. In addition to the agreements, remarkable disagreements also occur. The resulting “Synoptic Problem” has occupied unflagging critical labors for more than a century and a half. Scholars spend their energies attempting to discover a hypothesis that will plausibly explain the phenomena. The principal solutions offered are (1) an oral gospel underlying all three; (2) mutual dependence one upon another; (3) the hypothesis of a written source or sources.

Hypothesis of Oral Tradition. This hypothesis assumes that the evangelists wrote independently of one another, each describing the circumstances of his gospel from oral narratives of the words and deeds of Jesus rather than from written documents. It is held that this oral tradition as a result of repetition had come to have a relatively fixed form. This is asserted to be sufficient reason to account for the similarities and dissimilarities of the synoptic gospels. Beginning with Gieseler in 1818 this oral hypothesis, with variation, has had advocates to the present.

Mutual-Hypothesis Theory. This theory, as held by Augustine, maintains the use of one of the gospels by one of the other two. Numerous variations of the theory have been presented. The hypothesis of sources has been held by numerous scholars in the twentieth century. At the beginning of the century there was critical consensus of opinion that behind Matthew's and Luke's gospels lay two written sources. First, the gospel of Mark and a document commonly designated "Q," consisting principally of the logia of Jesus. Under this so-called Two-Document Theory, "Q" is discovered first upon examination of the material not contained in Mark's gospel that is common to Matthew and Luke. The suggestion that each center of Christianity had a different version of "Q," and that the writer of Matthew had one form and the writer of Luke another, has not won general support.

Proto-Luke Theory. B. H. Streeter (The Four Gospels, 4th ed. rev. [1930]) and V. Taylor (Behind the Third Gospel [1926]) have proposed this theory. It holds that someone, perhaps Luke, collected into one document previously unwritten teachings and events, particularly parables. This document was called "L." Luke then combined "L" with "Q." The result was Proto-Luke. Subsequently Luke inserted large portions of Mark into Proto-Luke to form a third gospel.

Four-Document Theory. Streeter later held that a Jewish Christian document "M" underlies Matthew, whose sources would thus be Mark, "Q," and "M." This resulted in the Four-Document Theory, which maintains that underlying Matthew and Luke, besides minor oral and written sources, were four documents, namely, Mark, "Q," "M," and "L," embodying traditions of various Christian centers: Mark reflecting Rome; "Q," Antioch; "M," Jerusalem; and "L," Caesarea. This theory had wide acceptance for a time.

M. S. Enslin (Christian Beginnings [1938]) and others, however, have vigorously challenged this theory. Enslin rejects even "Q" and maintains that the writer of Luke used Matthew as one source. A number of scholars have held that a primitive gospel or Grundschrift underlies our gospel, such as B. W. Bacon (The Gospel of Mark: Its Composition and Date [1925]), W. Bussmann (Synoptische Studien, 3 vols. [1925–31]), F. C. Grant (The Growth of the Gospels [1933]).

Multiple Source Theory. This theory has been espoused by some scholars in views somewhat similar to Streeter's hypothesis. Like the higher criticism of the OT, higher criticism of the gospels forms an intellectually titillating occupation for scholars with changing fads and fancies but does not provide a final solution.

Floyd V. Filson says, "The following statements seem warranted: The writers of Matthew and Luke used Mark; they used at least one other written source; we cannot determine conclusively the exact number and extent of such written sources; each writer, in using his sources, felt free to conform his style and wording somewhat to his own literary habits; possibly short written sources lay behind Mark" (Schaff-Herzog Ency. of Religious Knowledge [1955], pp. 470–71. Cf. also Filson, Origins of the Gospels [1938]).

The Relation of the Gospel of John to the Synoptics. Critical difficulties of the book of John relate mainly to the book taken by itself. However, its unlikeness to the synoptic gospels is so great that it is not unusual that some critics have thought that to accept its authenticity is to deny that of the synoptics. But careful study of many of the superficial difficulties causes them to lose their apparent significance, such as the mention of three Passovers in John and but one in the other gospels. This circumstance does not imply discrepancy in the length of Jesus' public ministry. The fragmentary character of the gospel reports is adequate explanation that the other Passover feasts were not mentioned or included. The process of harmonizing the order of events between John and the synoptics is now less easy and certain than was formerly thought because of the fragmentary character of all reports. On the other hand, the same fragmentariness makes it less easy to assert with confidence that the gospel of John and the synoptic gospels are contradictory or even inconsistent.

Grouping of the Four Gospels. Luke's prologue gives plain indication that there were in existence at that time various narratives concerning Jesus that apparently had gained some currency. The apocryphal gospels are certainly much later, but apparently the so-called "gospel of the Hebrews" and "gospel of Peter" found considerable acceptance for some time. Gradually these and other narratives were set aside in favor of what we now know as the four gospels. By the middle of the second century Tatian's Diatessaron, which is a single narrative formed by combining the four gospels that we now have, shows that the order was by that time established. It seems clear that it was so established for quite some time in Asia Minor. Perhaps at Ephesus, where the first three gospels had been taken and where the fourth was written, the present grouping of narratives that we now have was made. According to Papias, long before the middle of the second century this process was taking place, if not already consummated. The accepted group of the gospels has always consisted of the same four books. Their order, however, varies greatly in the various manuscripts. Almost every possible arrangement can be found. The order Matthew, John, Luke, Mark is found only less often than the order that finally prevailed.

Possible Aramaic Originals of the Gospels. The fact that the mother tongue of Jesus and the apostles was Aram. but that the gospels were written in Gk. has led some recent scholars to defend Aram. originals of the four gospels. Papias's testimony in the first half of the second century is to the effect that Matthew composed the "logia" in the Heb., or as the word may connote, "Aramaic." Jerome, around A.D. 400, was acquainted with a gospel in the language of the Jews. Are scholars sound in giving credence to these traditional clues, and will internal evidence support the theses of Aram. originals? The vague references of the church Fathers are of little significance. What about the character of the Gk. of the gospels? As early as the nineteenth century, scholars such as Marshall and Wellhausen had argued that one or more of the Gk. gospels was originally translated from an Aram. work.

C. F. Burney in 1922 set forth the thesis that John's gospel was penned at Syrian Antioch in Aram. around A.D. 75 (The Aramaic Origin of the Fourth Gospel [1922]). C. C. Torrey had previously claimed an Aram. origin for the gospels. His views were aired in a series of studies and essays (The Four Gospels [1933], 2d ed. [1947]; Our Translated Gospels [1936]; Documents of the Primitive Church [1941]). The embarrassing impediment to this view, however, is that no Aram. originals are extant. Argument proceeds on the contention that the style is Semitic and that the Gk. employs idioms that parallel Aram. idioms, which in passages cited are contended to make no clear sense. Especially, the passages that are alleged to make no clear sense in Gk. may be understood as mistranslations of the original Aram. The view, however, is plagued by vagueness concerning which precise passages contain mistranslations. A. T. Olmstead held the view that a comprehensive Aram. gospel underlies our present gospels, but he did not maintain that they were translations of Aram. originals ("Could an Aramaic Gospel Be Written?" Journal of Near Eastern Studies 1 [1942]: 41-75). M. Black has more recently outlined the case. His collocation of linguistic evidence is cautious and careful (An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts [1946], 2d ed. [1952]).

Approaching the view of Aram. originals for the gospels, a number of scholars such as E. J. Goodspeed (New Chapters in N.T. Study [1937]); D. W. Riddle (The Gospels: Their Origin and Growth [1939]); E. C. Colwell (The Greek of the Fourth Gospel [1931]) have attacked C. C. Torrey and his followers. It is pointed out that numerous idioms supposed to be Semitic are paralleled in Gk. literature. Alleged mistranslations turn out to be passable Gk. More important still, the fact is adduced that no Aram. gospels are extant. It is quite obvious that the critical notion of Aram. originals behind the gospels has not presented an approved case. It is possible that Aram. sources were used in the composition of our present gospels, but evidently they were composed originally in Gk. However, their linguistic traits demonstrate an early Semitic tradition stemming from Palestine.

The Synoptic Gospels and Form Criticism. The twentieth century has witnessed a growth in what has been called form criticism. Form criticism has been especially applied to the analysis of the synoptic gospels. The German term is Formgeschichte, denoting “history of form.” This literary method analyzes literary forms that contain earlier traditions. It maintains that the earlier oral tradition produced a number of literary forms that appear in the finished written record. In other words, it holds that the earlier oral tradition shaped the final literary product. It devotes itself to the analysis of these forms. This method of criticism maintains that the synoptic gospels are composed of numerous separate units whose form in the final written records was affected by later editorial arranging. The resultant product does not catalog actual events in Jesus’ ministry in sequential order. Form criticism classifies the separate units of tradition in accordance with their varying forms. It speaks frequently of Sitz im Leben, or “life situation.” By analysis of form it is believed that the particular situation in the church that formed this unit of tradition can be traced. It thus becomes evident, it is asserted, that the synoptic gospels have only limited value in telling us who Jesus was or what He said or did. They rather furnish information about the thinking and reactions of the early church. The form criticism method has appeared in the works of M. Dibelius (Formgeschichte des Evangeliums [1919]) and R. Bultmann (Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition [1921], 2d ed. [1931]). Also in the works of K. L. Schmidt (Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu [1919]) the form critical method has been given clear-cut expression. The question may be asked as to whether the form critics allow that the gospels give us a true portrayal of the historical Jesus. To this question it may be said that most of them would assert that they rather give us first of all testimony to the life and teaching of the early church. The gospels are of value, under this view, in preserving tradition as it developed by use in instruction, worship, and other activities of the early church.

Is Form Criticism Sound? Conservative scholars have pointed out the inability of form criticism to deal adequately with the historical background of the gospels as well as the intelligence and integrity of the disciples of Jesus. In its recognition of the topical arrangement of much of the gospel material it overreaches itself in casting aspersion upon the general framework of Jesus’ life and ministry. In addition, it fails to account for the glowing faith in the face of stubborn doubt that transfigured the early disciples after the resurrection. It fails to see how important the qualification and conviction of an eye-witness are in shaping the early tradition.

There is a sense in which form criticism is correct in stressing the importance of the early oral period, but it comes short of attaching proper significance to the fact that within two decades or so the composition of the written gospels began. Such a comparatively short period of early tradition does not allow for the assumptions form criticism normally makes concerning the lack of reliability and historicity of the gospel narratives. This school of criticism has been signally unable to assign all the gospel material to plausible forms. It lists types of gospel tradition such as the passion story, stories about Jesus, miracle tales, parables, and sayings, and what V. Taylor has termed “The pronouncement story.” This latter, however, is held to begin with a difficulty, a dispute, or a miracle, and to eventuate in a word or pronouncement of Jesus.

Form Criticism of the Gospel of John. The fourth gospel has not come under the influence of form criticism as have the synoptics. Because it is obviously the work of one writer, it can scarcely be regarded as a product of oral tradition. Acts has been subject to the form critical method, but here the success of this critical method has been meager.

When the Gospels Were Written. A precise dating of the gospels has always been a difficult matter and, despite progress of twentieth-century research, still remains uncertain. Perhaps the greatest strides have been made in dating the gospel of John. The discovery of the Rylands Papyrus Fragment of the gospel of John, dating around A.D. 130, has made more untenable a middle second-century date for the fourth gospel. The Qumran Literature of the Dead Sea Scrolls is rendering great service to NT criticism. Its evidence is disposing of radical late-dating of John that separated it from the authentic apostolic tradition. This used to be done on the basis of the alleged Gnostic influence upon the gospel. Heretical Gnosticism of the second to fourth centuries featured God as Light and Life. Since this terminology is typical of the gospel of John, critics used to assert plausibly that the fourth gospel was penned by a later writer who was not himself a Gnostic but used Gnostic terminology in opposing Gnostic error. New archaeological finds at Chenoboskion in Upper Egypt, consisting of forty Gnostic treatises written in the Coptic language and dating from the third and fourth centuries A.D., have shown that Gnosticism is much later than the gospel of John, although the Gnostics based much of their teachings on the gospel. The Dead Sea Scrolls themselves prove that the alleged Gnosticism in John is in reality a dualism (light against darkness). This dualism is prominent in the literature from Qumran and was popular in pre-Christian Palestine. Archaeology clearly demonstrates the Palestinian background and authentic origins of the fourth gospel. Perusal of the Qumran scrolls and the gospel of John can lead only to the conclusion that both authors lived in the same age and environment. There is now no necessity for dating the gospel of John any later than the last decade of the first century. See Merrill F. Unger, The Dead Sea Scrolls (1957), pp. 41–46; J. A. T. Robinson, Redating the New Testament (1976).

Although the synoptic gospels cannot be dated precisely, numerous scholars date Mark A.D. 65–75, Luke A.D. 85, Matthew A.D. 85 or 90; and John A.D. 90 or somewhat later. C. C. Torrey dates Mark A.D. 40, Matthew only slightly later, and Luke and John not beyond A.D. 60. This extreme early dating has not found wide acceptance, however. More scholars follow A. Harnack's view (cf. The Sayings of Jesus [1908]; The Date of the Acts and the Synoptic Gospels [1911]), that Luke is to be dated before A.D. 60 and Mark somewhat earlier.

The tendency today is to date the Synoptic Gospels before the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and the gospel of John in the last decade or two of the century. An indication of what has been happening in the field is seen in the work of John A. T. Robinson, lecturer in theology at Trinity College, Cambridge. Though a liberal theologian, he concluded in his Redating the New Testament and his Can We Trust the New Testament? (both produced in the late 1970s) that all the NT books were written between about A.D. 47 and 70. He thinks Mark may date as early as 45, Luke within ten or fifteen years after that, and Matthew at least by 70. Then he pleads for not separating John from the other gospels and for dating its composition prior to the fall of Jerusalem. Admittedly Robinson has not brought about a revolutionary redating of the gospels, but he has been part of the scholarly trend to earlier dating of them.

Are the Gospels Myth? Prominent in twentieth-century biblical criticism has been the concept of myth. The rationalism and deism of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries discounted the biblical stories as myth. In the NT itself myths are contrasted with truth (2 Tim. 4:4; Titus 1:14) and with history (2 Pet. 1:16). They are denounced as incompatible with true religion and God's revelation (1 Tim. 1:4; 4:7). Although commentators are in disagreement as to what constitutes the NT concept of myth, whether fanciful elaboration of the OT stories by rabbinical teachers, allegorical exegesis of the Philo type or pre-Gnostic

Jewish speculations, it is quite certain that according to NT revelation myths are human inventions as contrasted to the Word of God.

In recent times numerous critics have insisted on the demythologization of the NT, particularly the gospels. Rudolf Bultmann of Germany in 1941 published a widely circulated article, "Neues Testament und Mythologie." Barth and Brunner had spoken of "Christian myth" in contrast to pagan myth, but Bultmann's radical and original concept of myth stirred up a critical hornet's nest. Bultmann insisted that the gospel records are historically unreliable and inquired what relevancy they had for our present-day life and faith. Persuaded that form criticism had demonstrated that the historical nucleus was completely vitiated by the religious interpretation that the early church gave to the life and work of Jesus, Bultmann not only branded the miracle stories as mythological but declared that the gospels in their entirety were myths, out of line with modern man's scientific tradition. The whole account of Jesus was a Christological myth, as well as eschatological beliefs in heaven or hell, the return of Christ, etc.

Bultmann advocated a demythologizing of the gospels, contending that the true objective of the gospel stories was never to describe supernatural events taking place in space and time. Rather, their purpose was to announce God's coming to a human soul, or self, and the conversion taking place thereby. Thus Bultmann was not willing to give up Christianity altogether. This demythologizing criticism spearheaded by Bultmann has had a wide influence in contemporary study of the gospels. However, it fails completely to meet the requirements the NT lays down for Christianity: namely, faith in the revealed person and work of Jesus of the gospels. According to the gospel definitions of faith and the Pauline and Petrine interpretations of the life and work of the Messiah, Bultmann's advice can only be categorized as thoroughgoing rejection of historical Christianity. His rationalism fails completely to explain the historical fact that immediately after Jesus' death primitive Christians should have given such an interpretation to Christ's life unless His life, death, resurrection, and ascension had given them incontrovertible evidence that He was the Messiah, the Son of God, promised in the OT. No rationalization of Barth, Brunner, or Bultmann can explain the faith of the early Christians, nor the phenomenon of the NT, nor the efficacy of the Christian gospel. Bultmann's view strikes at the essence of the Christian message of God's becoming man and dying for the sins of the world. This criticism ignores the particular emphasis all NT writers put upon the necessity of a Redeemer who is human as well as divine. Bultmann's disdain of eschatology demonstrates the spiritual bankruptcy of his views (cf. Gustave Staehlin, "Mythos," in Kittel's Theologisches Woerterbuch zum Neuen Testament 4:769ff.). M.F.U.

GOURDS (Heb. pqā'îm, paqqūōt). Ornamentation shaped like gourds is referred to in the description of the decoration of the Temple (1 Kings 6:18) and the bronze sea (7:24). See Laver; Sea, Bronze; Tabernacle.

Wild gourds were among the ingredients of Elisha's poisonous stew (2 Kings 4:38). See Vegetable Kingdom: Castor Oil Plant; Gourds, Wild.

GOVERNMENT OF GOD. See Theocracy; Israel.

GOVERNMENT OF ISRAEL. See Israel.

GOVERNOR. One who rules by authority delegated from a supreme ruler to whom he is responsible. Gedaliah was "appointed over" and therefore governor for Nebuchadnezzar II in Palestine after the fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. (Jer. 40:5; 41:2). Persian governors had administration over the Jews after the captivity. Zerubbabel and Nehemiah, although Jews by birth, were Persian administrators (Neh. 5:14, 18; Hag. 1:14). At the time of our Lord, although Pontius Pilate's Roman title was procurator, he was actually the governor of Judea at the time of the crucifixion and is so named (Matt. 28:14). See also Ruler.

GOYIM (gō'yim). The name of a place in Gilgal defeated by Joshua and the Israelites in the conquest (Josh. 12:23, NIV; the NASB renders "Goiim").

GO'ZAN (gō'zan). A northeastern Mesopotamian city located on the Habor River, a tributary of the Euphrates. It lay E of the important patriarchal city of Haran and NW of the great Assyrian metropolis of Nineveh. The Assyrians deported the Israelites to Gozan after the capture of the capital of Samaria (2 Kings 17:6; 18:11; 19:12; 1 Chron. 5:26). The Assyrians called Gozan "Guzanu." It is the Gauzanitis of Ptolomey. Baron von Oppenheim discovered a new culture at Tell Halaf, ancient Gozan, in 1911 and 1913. Halafian pottery, now proverbial for its beauty, dates from c. 4000 B.C. M.F.U.

GRACE. "Grace is what God may be free to do, and indeed what he does, accordingly, for the lost after Christ has died on behalf of them" (Lewis Sperry Chafer, Systematic Theology, 7:178). It is thus apparent that God's grace is to be distinguished from His mercy and love (Eph. 2:4–5), "But God, being rich in mercy, because of His great love with which He loved us, even when we were dead in our transgressions, made us alive together with Christ (by grace you have been saved)." Mercy is therefore the compassion of God that moved Him to provide a Savior for the unsaved. Had God been able to save even one soul on the ground of His sovereign mercy alone, He could have saved every person on that basis, as Lewis Sperry Chafer points out, and the death of Christ would not have been a necessity. Divine love on the other hand is the motivating plan behind all that God does in saving a soul. But since God is holy and righteous, and sin is a complete offense to Him, His love or His mercy cannot operate in grace until there is provided a sufficient satisfaction for sin. This satisfaction makes possible the exercise of God's grace. Grace thus rules out all human merit. It requires only faith in the Savior. Any intermixture of human merit violates grace. God's grace thus provides not only salvation but safety and preservation for the one saved, despite his imperfections. Grace perfects forever the saved one in the sight of God because of the saved one's position "in Christ." Grace bestows Christ's merit and Christ's standing forever (Rom.

5:1–2; 8:1; Col. 2:9–10); “for in Him all the fulness of Deity dwells in bodily form, and in Him you have been made complete.” Grace thus obviates any obligation to gain merit, and the law as a merit system is no longer applicable to a believer, since he is no longer “under law, but under grace” (Rom. 6:14). The problem of a holy life is met in the gospel of grace by the fact that the saved one has an entirely new position in grace instead of in Adam (5:12–20). And being baptized “into Christ” (6:1–11), he is “dead to sin, but alive to God.” Knowledge of and faith in this glorious in-Christ position (6:11) is the key that makes it actual in the believer’s everyday experience. Rewards for faithfulness and practical holiness of life are to be dispensed, but this is a truth not to be confused with an unforfeitable and unmerited salvation.

GRACE AT MEALS. A short prayer at mealtime, returning thanks to God for food provided and asking the divine blessing upon it. The propriety of such an act is evident from the injunction (Rom. 14:6; 1 Cor. 10:31; 1 Tim. 4:4) and from the example of our Lord (Mark 8:6–7; Luke 24:30). Among the Jews “grace” was said both before and after meals, and also by women, slaves, and children. Regulations were made down to the pettiest detail, namely, what form was to be used for the fruits of the trees; what for wine; what for the fruits of the ground; for bread; for vegetables; for vinegar; for unripe fallen fruit; for locusts, milk, cheese, eggs; and scholars contended as to when this and that form was suitable. When such restriction was laid upon prayer by the legal formula, it could not but be chilled into an external performance (Schürer, History of the Jewish People, div. 2, 2:117ff.).

GRAFT (Gk. egkentrizō, to “prick in”). Grafting is the process in horticulture by which a portion of a plant is made to unite with another plant, whether of the same kind or of another variety or species. The plant upon which the operation is performed is called the stock; the portion inserted or joined with it, the scion or graft. The usual process is to take shoots or buds from approved trees and to insert them into others where, with proper care, they continue to grow. Thus fruit is kept from degenerating, for the grafts receive nourishment from the stocks, but always produce fruit of the same sort as the tree from which they were taken.

The apostle Paul makes use (Rom. 11:17–24) of this figure in a striking manner: he compares the Jewish theocracy to a good olive tree, the Gentiles to a wild one, of which a branch is grafted upon the former, and which by that means it acquires fruitfulness.

GRAIN (Heb. šqrōr, “packed,” i.e., “kernel”; Gk. kokkos, “kernel”). Used (Amos 9:9; 1 Cor. 15:37; etc.) in the singular and not as we do in a collective sense. See also Vegetable Kingdom: Corn.

GRATING. A bronze network, movable by a bronze ring at each corner and placed below the top of the great altar (Ex. 27:4; 35:16; 38:4–5, 30; 39:39). See Altar.

GRAVE.

Egyptian. The Egyptians were distinguished above other peoples of the ancient biblical world for their attention to burial and the afterlife. Believing in a future existence that was a higher form of their earthly life, they interred all sorts of physical comforts with the deceased. Besides food and drink, household pets were embalmed and placed in the tomb, and often happy scenes from the life of the deceased were painted on the sarcophagi or on the tomb walls. (See John Garstang, Burial Customs of Ancient Egypt, and Steindorff and Seele, When Egypt Ruled the East.) The poor were simply interred without clothing and uncoffined beneath the sand, but even in this extremity food and water were placed alongside the deceased. People of wealth were buried in a mastaba during the early dynasties. This was a development from the simple trench into which the body had been lowered and a pile of dirt heaped upon it. The mastaba consisted of a rectangular structure of brick or stone placed over the grave. In the vicinity of the great pyramids at Gizeh and at Saqqarah numberless mastabas of the nobility have been uncovered. In the case of royalty the pyramid was used, as the Great Step Pyramid at Saqqarah, belonging to the Third Dynasty. This and other pyramids developed from the mastaba when several of these structures were placed one on top of another. Still further developments were the colossal pyramids at Gizeh. King Zoser of the Third Dynasty was interred in the Step Pyramid at Saqqarah. Khufu, Khafre, and Menkaure were honored by the great Gizeh pyramids. The pyramids at the other eight pyramid fields were much smaller. In the splendid New Kingdom, when Egypt ruled the East, the mastaba and pyramid had become outmoded. The style for rock-cut tombs was in vogue. Examples of these are the tombs of Rameses VI and Amenhotep II. The story of the sumptuous tomb of tutankhamen (which see) reads like a fairy tale. Reliefs were carved on the walls; paintings made in bright colors depicted happy scenes from the earthly life of the deceased in the case of the queens and nobles. But the kings, who were supposed to be divine, were pictured in the company of the gods or in transit from this life to the next.

Mesopotamian and Persian. Much is now known of graves from the Royal Tombs at Ur. Sumerian royalty, like the Egyptians, desired creature comforts to follow them in death, so courtiers and horses and servants were drugged and buried alive or poisoned before burial. This is indicated by the tomb of Queen Puabi (see articles Burial; Grave) and others and her husband at Ur. She was buried in great splendor with twenty-five servants and a great variety of belongings. Babylonians at a considerably later date practiced cremation like the Romans, placing the ashes of the deceased in artistic glazed crematory urns. The great kings of Persia—Darius, Xerxes, and Artaxerxes—cut their tombs out of solid rock near Persepolis. Those of Darius I and Artaxerxes I have a column-adorned facade. Darius is pictured worshipping Ahura Mazda in front of a fire altar. The tomb of Cyrus the Great was built near Parsargadae, NE of Persepolis.

Greek. Early pre-Hellenic Greek tombs of the Mycenaean period were shaped like beehives. Later, lavish tombs such as that of King Mausolus of Caria (c. 350 B.C.) became the prototype of succeeding mausoleums. Greek sarcophagi were also handsomely executed. Tomb reliefs are in the highest tradition of Hellenic art. At Marathon, the so-called Soros, is an artificial mound thrown up little by little to mark the spot where almost 200 Athenians fell in 490 B.C., heroically defending their democratic land against the invasion of Persia. This constitutes the unique “community tomb.”

Roman. Early Romans practiced cremation, placing the ashes of the deceased in columbaria (“pigeon lodgings”). Such columbaria were found near Virgil’s tomb at Naples, at Rome’s seaport of Ostia, at Pompeii, in many Roman cities of the Middle East, and even at Masada. Many of these were artistically carved. Well-known cities of first-century Rome had a “Street of the Sepulchres.” When Paul came into Rome over the Appian Way, he passed hundreds of tombs of wealthy Romans of the Imperial Period, some consisting of flat slabs, others standing pillars, mausoleums, and some towers. Burial in the catacombs was common in Rome of the early Christian era. Compartments in the rock received the bodies and were shut with panels inscribed with the name of the deceased along with an emblem of the sacred monogram, the fish, the shepherd, or a praying man.

Hebrew. Among the Jews, graves were sometimes mere cavities dug out of the earth (Gen. 35:8; 1 Sam. 31:13); natural caves or grottoes (23:17); artificial tombs hewn out of the rock, provided with galleries and chambers, preference being given to places outside cities (Luke 7:12; John 11:30). Only kings and prophets (1 Kings 2:10; 16:6; 1 Sam. 25:1; 28:3) were buried in cities. The rich had, no doubt, family burying places (Gen. 23:20; Judg. 8:32; 2 Sam. 2:32; 1 Kings 3:22), while the poorer classes doubtless had their public ones (Jer. 26:23; 2 Kings 23:6; cf. Matt. 27:7). Graves hewn in the rock or laid out in natural caves were closed with large flat stones (27:60; 28:2; John 11:38). Monuments were set up in early times on or over graves (Gen. 35:20; cf. 2 Sam. 18:18; Job 21:32), which afterward took the form of magnificent mausoleums with pyramids and many kinds of emblems (1 Macc. 13:27–30).

Probably there were burying places attached to each village in ancient times, as we find in the case of Nain, where the graveyard remains to this day.

In postexilic times it was sought to restore and adorn the graves of the prophets and other holy persons, and this was particularly affected by the Pharisees to testify their reverence for the prophets (cf. Matt. 23:30–32).

Flat stones laid upon graves had upon them a marking to warn passersby lest they should contract uncleanness by touching the grave. For this end also the tombs were whitewashed every year on the 15th of Adar.

There are scriptural traces of the popular idea that graves were the residence of demons (cf. 8:28), who were, perhaps, connected with soothsaying (Acts 16:16); while others refer such allusions to the supernatural notions respecting offering to the souls of the departed. See Tomb. M.F.U.

GRAVECLOTHES (Gk. keiria, “winding sheet”). From early times the body was washed (Acts 9:37), then wrapped in a linen cloth (Matt. 27:59), or the limbs separately wound with strips of linen (John 11:44).

GREECE. Properly that country in Europe inhabited by the Greeks (1 Macc. 1:1), but in Acts 20:2 apparently designating only that part of it S of the Roman province of Macedonia (which see). Greece is sometimes described as a country containing the four regions of Macedonia, Epirus, Achaia (or Hellas), and Peloponnesus, but more commonly only the latter two are to be understood as comprised in it. There seems to have been little contact between Greece and the Hebrews until the Macedonian conquest of the East; hence the few references in the OT. Greece is mentioned in Gen. 10:2, 4 under the name Javan (which see); the Jews and Greeks are said to have met in the slave market (Joel 3:6); and Greece is spoken of as “the shaggy goat” by Daniel (Dan. 8:21).

At the beginning of the Christian era those territories that now form the Republic of Greece formed the Roman province of Achaia, with the proconsuls residing at Corinth, Macedonia, and Thrace. As a place of learning, however, Athens held the first rank, and study there was held indispensable to a Roman youth wishing to distinguish himself. Her schools of grammar, rhetoric, dialectics, and philosophy were crowded.

Christianity was first planted in Greece by Paul, who visited Philippi (Acts 16:12), then Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, and Corinth (chaps. 17–18). Dionysius the Areopagite, who was converted through the apostle’s address on Mar’s Hill, is said to have become the Bishop of Athens. See Greeks; Paul.

GREEK. An inhabitant of Greece.

GREEKS. In the OT, inhabitants of Greece and the coastlands and islands belonging to the Greek race; in the NT, Hellenists, or Greek-speaking Jews.

In the OT Javan (Heb. yāwān) is translated “Greece” (cf. Dan. 10:20; 11:2, marg.); in Joel 3:6, ywānîm is translated “Greeks” (marg., “Sons of Javan”). In the NT the versions distinguish between Hellēnes, “Greeks” by birth, as opposed to Ioudaioi, “Jews,” whence Hellēnes is sometimes applied to Gentiles in general; and Hellēnistai, “Grecians,” i.e., Greek-speaking Jews, as opposed to Hebraiai, home Jews dwelling in Palestine (cf. Acts 6:1; 9:29). The differences among the Scripture versions in Acts 11:20 and 17:17 results from a difference in the Gk. texts that they followed.

In NT times, Greeks or Hellenists were foreign Jews who spoke Gk., which the conquests of Alexander had made the language of the educated throughout the Near East, and also the language of the masses in the great centers of commerce. Some would include under the name Hellenists, proselytes of Greek birth.

There are legends of early Jewish settlements in Arabia, Ethiopia, and Abyssinia. Indeed, the natural overflow of a vigorous people inheriting the business energy of their father Jacob would have united with the varying fortunes of war to carry numbers of Jews far beyond the limits of Palestine at a remote period. Of the influence of the Jews who were scattered abroad in these early ages it is impossible to form an estimate. Theirs was not professedly a missionary religion; but wherever the faithful Jew went he carried the knowledge of the true God, as did Naomi (Ruth 1:15–16; 2:12), or, indirectly, Naaman’s maid (2 Kings 5:3–4); and, as far as his influence extended, he carried that combination of religion and lawful commerce that the great missionary explorer Livingstone thought so desirable.

But the Dispersion, as a distinct element influencing the entire character of the Jews, dates from the Babylonian Exile. Its limits had been extended by the Greek conquests in Asia, by the colonizing policy of some of the successors of Alexander the Great, and by the persecutions of Antiochus, so that at the beginning of the Christian era the Dispersion was divided into three great sections—the Babylonian, the Syrian, and the Egyptian.

From Babylon the Jews spread throughout Persia, Media, and Parthia; but the settlements in China belong to a modern date. Nisibis, in NE Mesopotamia, became a colonizing center. In Armenia the Jews arrived at the greatest dignities.

We find them throughout Asia Minor even to its western coast. They were numerous in Cyprus and were important enough in Delos and in Cos to receive religious recognition from the Romans. The Jews of the Syrian provinces gradually formed a closer connection with their new homes, and together with the Gk. language adopted in many respects Greek ideas. Hence arose Hellenism.

This Hellenizing tendency, however, found its most free development at Alexandria (which see). The Jewish settlements established there by Alexander and Ptolemy I became the source of the African dispersion, which spread over the N coast of Africa and perhaps inland to Abyssinia. At Cyrene and Berenice (Tripoli) they formed a considerable portion of the population. It was Jason of Cyrene who wrote “‘in five books’ a history of the Jewish war of liberation, which supplied the chief materials for the second book of the Maccabees.”

The Jewish settlements in Rome either resulted from “the occupation of Jerusalem by Pompey, 63 B.C. or were largely increased by that event. Under the favor of the early emperors they increased, until in the time of Claudius they had become formidable on account of their numbers and dissensions, and were banished from the city” (cf. Acts 18:2 and Suetonius Claudius 25, “Judoeos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit”). But they soon flowed back and were quite numerous (28:17, 23–25, 29–30) and conspicuous (Martial Epigrams 11.94; Juvenal Satire 3.14).

Thus at the Day of Pentecost there were at Jerusalem devout Jews out of every nation under heaven (Acts 2:5), for although scattered throughout so many remote lands, the Dispersion was still bound together in itself and to its mother country by religious ties. The Temple was the acknowledged center of Judaism, and the faithful Jew everywhere contributed the half shekel toward its maintenance. But, while the fires of patriotism burned unquenched and unquenchable throughout the Jewish world, it was impossible to maintain pharisaic strictness and rigor in these remote lands. Egypt, for example, was beyond the reach of the beacon fires that signaled the time of appearance of the new moon, and beyond the Sabbath reading of the Heb. Scriptures. The influence of the Dispersion on the rapid proclamation of Christianity can scarcely be overrated. The course of the apostolic teaching followed in regular progress the line of Jewish settlements. This we can see by following the travels of Paul in the Acts. Throughout the apostolic journeys the Jews were the class to whom “it was necessary that the word of God should be spoken ... first” (13:46); and they in turn were united with the mass of the population by the intermediate body of “the devout,” which had recognized in various degrees the faith of the God of Israel.

The Hellenistic system was so widely diffused as to form an excellent preparation for a world religion. It was strong enough to give the new faith a good start, yet too weak to restrain its growth or to smother its free spirit in a mass of Judaic details and reduce it to the position of an advanced Judaism. The steadfast adherence of the Hellenistic system to the historic faith, with its comparative freedom from pharisaic narrowness, well qualified it to be the nurse of a new religion that was to be an expanded but not enfeebled development of the old. The purely outward elements of the national life were laid aside with a facility of which history offers few examples, while the inner character of the people remained unchanged.

The LXX version of the OT had given the Hellenists a Bible in the universal language of the NT world. In the fullness of time, when the great message came, a language was prepared to receive it; and thus the dialect of the NT forms a great lesson in the true philosophy of history, becoming in itself a monument of the providential government of mankind. GREETING. See Salutations.

GREYHOUND. See Animal Kingdom.

GRIND. See Mill.

Figurative. To oppress the poor by exaction (Isa. 3:15, “grinding the face of the poor”).

The expression “May my wife grind for another” (Job 31:10) means, “Let her become another’s menial” (cf. Ex. 11:5; Isa. 47:2).

GROVE. Mentioned in Judg. 15:5 in connection with torches being tied to the tails of foxes, which Samson released into the Philistines’ “standing grain ... thus burning up both the shocks and the standing grain, along with the vineyards and groves.”

In the KJV grove is the incorrect rendering of two Heb. words: (1) ashērâ, the Canaanite goddess, a wooden idol generally set up beside the altars of Baal; (2) ēshel (Gen. 21:33), actually the tamarisk tree (which see, Vegetable Kingdom).

GUARANTEE (Gk. egguos). In the highest sense the term is applied to Christ, who, in His character as mediator, is represented as “the guarantee of a better covenant” (Heb. 7:22), having made Himself responsible for all that in this covenant was required to be accomplished for the salvation of those who were to share in its provisions.

GUARD.

1. Heb. word for a “cook” (tabbāh); as butchering fell to the lot of the cook in Eastern countries it gained the secondary sense of “executioner” and is applied to the guard of the king of Babylon (2 Kings 25:8); also rendered “bodyguard” (Gen. 37:36; Jer. 39:9; 41:10; Dan. 2:14).

2. Heb. word for a “runner” (rāṣ), the ordinary term employed for the attendants of the Jewish kings, whose office it was to run before the chariot (2 Sam. 15:1; 1 Kings 1:5) and to form a military guard (1 Sam. 22:17; 2 Kings 10:25; 11:6; 2 Chron. 12:10; see marg., NASB, where the literal meaning of “guard” is given as “runners”).

3. The Heb. words for “watch” (mishmeret, mishmār), express properly the act of watching but are occasionally transferred to the persons who kept watch (Neh. 4:9, 22; 7:3; Job 7:12; the NIV renders “guard” in all these passages).

GUARDIAN ANGELS. See Angels.

GUDGO'DAH (gud-gō'da; “cutting, cleft”). The fortieth station of the Israelites, between Mt. Hor and Jotbathah (Deut. 10:7). The name appears to be preserved in the present Wadi Ghudhagidh. Same as Hor-haggidgad (Num. 33:32).

GUEST. See Hospitality.

GUEST ROOM (Gk. kataluma, to “break up,” i.e., a “journey”). Any room used for the entertainment of guests (Mark 14:14; Luke 22:11); rendered “inn” in 2:7. See House.

GUILT. See Sin.

GULF. See Chasm.

GULL. See Animal Kingdom: Sea Gull.

GU'NI (gū'ni; “colored, dyed”).

1. One of the sons of Naphtali, perhaps about 1870 B.C., but not necessarily born before the migration to Egypt (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:48; 1 Chron. 7:13). His descendants are called Gunites (Num. 26:48).

2. Father of Abdiel and grandfather of Ahi, who was head of the Gileadite Gadites (1 Chron. 5:15).

GU'NITE (gū'nīt). A general name of the descendants of Guni (which see), of the tribe of Naphtali (Num. 26:48).

GUR (gur; a “whelp” as “abiding” in the lair). An ascent near Ibleam, on the road from Jezreel to Beth-haggan, where the servants of Jehu overtook and slew Ahaziah the king (2 Kings 9:27). It has not been identified.

GUR-BA'AL (gur-bā'al; “sojourn of Baal”). A place in Arabia captured by Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:7); not identified.

GUTTER (Heb. ṣinnôr). Drinking troughs (thus NIV, Ex. 2:16), into which Jacob placed peeled rods when the sheep came to drink (Gen. 30:38, 41). For the use of the term gutter in the KJV of 2 Sam. 5:8, see Water Tunnel. The NIV translates “Water shaft.”

H

HAAHASH'TARI (hā-a-hash'ta-ri). The last mentioned of the four sons of Naarah, the second wife of Ashhur, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:6).

HABA'IAH (hab'ā-ya); also Hoba'iah (ho-bā'ya; "Jehovah has hidden"). A priest whose descendants returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel but were removed from the priesthood, not being able to trace their genealogy (Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:63), about 536 B.C.

HABAK'KUK (ha-bak'ūk; "embrace," or perhaps the name of a plant, cf. Akkad.

hambakuku). The eighth in order of the twelve minor prophets. Nothing certain is known as to the circumstances of Habakkuk's life, as we have only apocryphal and conflicting accounts. In the headings to his book (1:1; 3:1) Habakkuk is simply described as a man who held the office of prophet. From the conclusion to the psalm in chap. 3, "For the choir director, on my stringed instruments" (v. 19), we learn that he was officially qualified to take part in the liturgical singing of the Temple and therefore belonged to one of the Levitical families who were charged with the maintenance of the Temple music, and, like the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel, who sprang from priestly households, belonged to the tribe of Levi. This is supported by the superscription of the apocryphon of Bel and the Dragon, "Habakkuk the son of Joshua of the tribe of Levi" (K. & D., Com.).

HABAK'KUK, BOOK OF. The prophecy is named from its evident author (1:1), of whom practically nothing is known. From the reference "For the choir director on my stringed instruments" (3:19), combined with the reference to Habakkuk as "the son of Jesus of the tribe of Levi" in the apocryphal legend of Bel and the Dragon, some scholars such as S. Mowinckel have come to the conclusion that the prophet was a Levitical member of the Temple choir.

Time of Composition. The book is evidently to be placed in the general period of the rise of the neo-Babylonian Empire around 620 B.C., since allusion is made to the Chaldean invasion (1:5–6). The preferred date of many critics is in the latter portion of Josiah's reign (c. 625–608 B.C.) or in the reign of Jehoiakim (608–597 B.C.). B. Duhm, E. Sellin, and C. C. Torrey unwarrantedly change Kasdim, that is, Chaldeans, in 1:6 to Kittim (Cypriotes), declaring that the prophecy was aimed at Alexander the Great, and date the book that late.

Criticism. Literary critics have handled the book of Habakkuk harshly. Karl Marti leaves only seven verses of the entire book intact. B. Duhm, who is scarcely to be called conservative, says that Marti treats the book as cruelly as Yahweh is said to treat the house of the ungodly (3:13): "Thou didst strike the head of the house of the evil to lay him open from thigh to neck." Critics differ considerably with regard to the unity of chaps. 1–2. Chapter 3 is more commonly derived from chaps. 1–2 and dated in the fourth or third century B.C. (Pfeiffer). However, the theme of both is the same, and both contain linguistic likenesses. Chapter 3 is specifically called a prayer of Habakkuk (v. 1). The technical musical terms contained in it need not be relegated to a postexilic period, for they were evidently in use in preexilic times in the psalter.

Content.

I. Prophet's twofold complaint (1:1–2:20)

A. The first complaint (1:1–11)

Israel's sin and God's silence (1:2–4)

God's reply: the Chaldean invasion (1:5–11)

B. The second complaint (1:12–2:20)

Chaldean cruelty and God's silence (1:12–2:1)

God's response: Israel's salvation; woes upon the Chaldeans (2:2–20)

II. Prayer of the prophet (3:1–19)

A. Title (3:1)

B. Initial request (3:2)

C. A theophany (3:3–15)

D. An unperturbable faith (3:16–19)

Canonicity. The book is quoted prominently in the NT, and the references there give Habakkuk significance theologically (cf. Acts 13:41 with Hab. 1:5; Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11; and Heb. 10:38 with Hab. 2:4). Both Jewish and Christian thought have accorded the book canonical authority. From the Qumran caves came a commentary on the first two chapters of Habakkuk that interpreted the prophecy in terms of the history of the Qumran community.

HABAZZINI'AH (hab-a-zî-ni'a). The father of one Jeremiah and grandfather of the chief Rechabite, Jaazaniah (whom the prophet Jeremiah tested with the offer of wine in the Temple; Jer. 35:3), about 607 B.C.

HABITATION. In the KJV, the rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words, and used in the general sense of a place to dwell in (Pss. 69:25; 104:12; Acts 1:20; etc). The NASB and NIV often render "dwelling" or "dwelling place."

Figurative. In the NASB God is called "a rock of habitation" (Ps. 71:3; "refuge" in the NIV); and in 132:13 He is said to have "chosen Zion ... for His habitation" ("dwelling," NIV). In the KJV God is called the habitation of His people (Ps. 91:9). Justice and judgment are the habitations of His throne (89:14), since all His acts are founded on them (117:2). God is said to "inhabit the praises of Israel" (22:3), i.e., Jehovah is the object of and graciously receives the praises of His people. Eternity is represented as His habitation (Isa. 57:15), i.e., the eternally dwelling One, whose life lasts forever and is always the same. See House; Tent.

HA'BOR (hā'bor; "joining together"). A river of Mesopotamia, identified with the modern Khabur. It flows S through Gozan and after a course of 190 miles meets the E branch of the Euphrates. Deported Israelites from Samaria were settled on its banks by Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria (745–727 B.C.; 1 Chron. 5:26) and by Sargon II (721–705 B.C.; 2 Kings 17:6; 18:11).

NIV New International Version

HACALI'AH, HACHALI'AH (hak-a-lî'a). The father of Nehemiah, the governor after the captivity (Neh. 1:1; 10:1; "Hachaliah," KJV), before 446 B.C.

HACHI'LAH, or Hakilah (ha-ki'la; "dark"). A hiding place of David at the time the Ziphites proposed betraying him to Saul (1 Sam. 23:19; 26:1, 3). Hachilah appears to have been the long ridge, now called El Kôlah, where there is a high hill with a ruin, called Yûkîn.

HACH'MONI (hak'mō-ni; "wise, skillful"). A man known only as the father (or ancestor, cf. 1 Chron. 27:2) of Jashobeam, the chief of David's warriors (11:11, where son of Hachmoni is rendered "Hachmonite"; the parallel passage in 2 Sam. 23:8 has "Tahchemonite"), and also of Jehiel, the companion of the princes in the royal household (1 Chron. 27:32), considerably before 1000 B.C. Hachmon or Hachmoni was, no doubt, the founder of a family to which these belonged. The actual father of Jashobeam was Zabdiel (27:2), who belonged to the Korahites (12:6); possibly the Levites descended from Korah (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia).

HACHMONITE (hak'mo-nīt). See Hachmoni; Jashobeam.

HA'DAD (hā'dad; "sharp, fierce"). Probably an official title, like Pharaoh, and the names of several men. It is found occasionally in the altered form, Hadar.

1. One of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; "Hadar," KJV; 1 Chron. 1:30), after c. 1900 B.C.

2. The son of Bedad and king of Edom. He gained an important victory over the Midianites on the field of Moab. He was the successor of Husham and established his court at Avith (Gen. 36:35; 1 Chron. 1:46).

3. Another king of Edom, successor of Baal-hanan. The name of his city was Pai (Pau), and his wife's name Mehetabel (1 Chron. 1:50). He is called Hadar in Gen. 36:39 (see NIV marg.), where his death is not mentioned.

4. An Aramaean deity identified with the weather god Rammon (Heb. Rimmon). Adad (Hadad) was an ancient Mesopotamian deity, god of the storm and thunder. The name Hadad occurs in many compound names of Aramaeans, such as Hadadezer and Ben-Hadad ("son of Hadad").

5. A prince of the royal house of Edom. In his childhood he escaped the massacre under Joab and fled with some followers into Egypt. Pharaoh treated him kindly and gave him his sister-in-law in marriage. By her he had a son, Genubath, who was brought up in the palace with the sons of Pharaoh. After David's death Hadad resolved to recover his dominion. Pharaoh opposing him, he left Egypt and returned to his own country (1 Kings 11:14–25). It does not appear from the text, as it now stands, what the result of this attempt was, other than that he was one of the troublers of Solomon's reign (v. 14). Our version makes v. 25 refer to Rezon, but the LXX has, "This is the evil which Adar did." The meaning then will be, This same kind of mischief (incursions in the land of Israel like those of Rezon) was also wrought by Hadad.

HADADE'ZER (hā-dad-ē'zer; "Adad his help"). Son of Rehob, and king of the Aramaean state of Zobah. His name is sometimes given as Hadarezer in the KJV (2 Sam. 10:16, 19; 1 Chron. 18:3; 19:16, 19). While on his way to establish his dominion (about 984 B.C.) he was defeated in the neighborhood of the Euphrates (2 Sam. 8:3). From 10:7, we learn that Joab commanded the forces of Israel. Hadadezer made preparations for the campaign of the following year on a far larger scale. When David heard that Hadadezer was gathering great armies on the Euphrates, he determined to anticipate his attack. He marched in person with his troops over the Jordan to the NE, and at Helam, a place unknown to us, a decisive battle was fought. The Aramaeans from both sides of the Euphrates were completely routed (8:4; 10:18), and Hadadezer's power was so thoroughly broken that all the small tributary princes seized the opportunity of throwing off his yoke.

HADADRIM MON (hā-dad-rim'on; two Syrian deities). A place in the plain of Megiddo (Zech. 12:11). The lamentation on account of the death of the good king Josiah, who lost his life in battle here, was so great as to pass into a proverb (2 Chron. 35:22–25).

HA DAR (hā'dar; perhaps "chamber").

1. In the KJV, one of the "sons of Ishmael" (Gen. 25:15), given in 1 Chron. 1:30 as Hadad (which see).

2. An Edomite king who succeeded Baal-hanan (Gen. 36:39). The name of his city and the name and genealogy of his wife are given. In the parallel list in 1 Chron. 1:50–51, he appears as Hadad. We know from another source (1 Kings 11:14) that Hadad was one of the names of the royal family of Edom. See Hadad, no. 3.

HADARE ZER. See Hadadezer.

HAD ASHAH (had'a-sha; "new"). A city in the valley of Judah (Josh. 15:37), between the hilly region and the Philistine border.

HADAS SAH (ha-das'sa; "myrtle"). The earlier Jewish name of Esther (Esther 2:7). See Esther.

HADATTAH. See Hazar-hadattah.

HA DES (Gk. hadēs, "unseen"). This word occurs several times in the original and in the NASB and NIV, although KJV renders "hell" (Matt. 11:23; 16:18; Luke 10:15; 16:23; Acts 2:27, 31; Rev. 1:18; 6:8; 20:13–14; hadēs is behind KJV "grave" in 1 Cor. 15:55, but the true reading is thanatos, "death," which the NASB and NIV follow).

The ancient Greek view of Hades, and the Roman view of Orcus, or Inferna, is that of a place for all the dead in the depth of the earth; dark, dreary, cheerless, shut up, inaccessible to prayers and sacrifices, ruled over by Pluto. This presiding god was the enemy of all life, heartless, inexorable, and hated accordingly by gods and men.

The Heb. Sheol (which see) is the equivalent for Hades and is likewise the subterranean abode of all the dead until the judgment. It was divided into two departments, paradise or Abraham's bosom for the good, and Gehenna or hell for the bad.

In the NT, as will be seen above, the term Hades is of comparatively rare occurrence; in our Lord's own discourses it is found only three times, and on two of the occasions by way of contrast to the region of life and blessing. From a consideration of the various passages the following may be a just conclusion: "It seems as if in the progress of God's dispensations a separation had come to be made between elements that originally were mingled together, so that Hades was henceforth appropriated, both in the name and in the reality, to those who were reserved in darkness and misery to the great day; and other names, with other and brighter ideas, were employed to designate the intermediate resting place of the redeemed. These latter pass immediately upon death into the presence of their Lord (John 14:2–3; Phil. 1:23). Such being the nature of the scriptural representation on the subject, one must condemn the fables that sprung up amid the Dark Ages about the limbus, or antechamber of hell, and the purgatorial fires, in which it was supposed even redeemed souls had to complete their ripening for glory” (Imp. Dict., s.v.).

Luke 16:19–31, which sets forth the account of the rich man and Lazarus (and which, strictly speaking, is not a parable), indicates a difference in Hades after the ascension of Christ. Before this far-reaching event it seems clear that Hades was in two compartments, the residence respectively of saved and unsaved spirits. “Paradise” and “Abraham’s bosom,” both common Jewish terms of the day, were adopted by Christ in Luke 16:22 and 23:43 to designate the condition of the righteous in the intermediate state. The blessed dead, being with Abraham, were conscious and “comforted” (16:25). The dying thief was on that very day to be with Christ in “Paradise.” The unsaved were separated from the saved by a “great chasm fixed” (16:26). The rich man, who is evidently still in Hades, is a representative case and describes the unjudged condition in the intermediate state of the wicked. As to his spirit, he was alive, fully conscious, in exercise of his mental faculties, and also tormented. It is thus apparent that insofar as the unsaved dead are concerned, no change in their abode or state is revealed in connection with the ascension of Christ. At the sinners’ judgment of the great white throne, Hades will surrender the wicked. They will be judged and cast into the lake of fire (Rev. 20:13–14; see Lake of Fire). However, with regard to the state of the righteous and the location of paradise, Christ’s ascension has evidently worked a drastic change. The apostle Paul was “caught up to the third heaven ... into Paradise” (2 Cor. 12:1–4). Paradise, therefore, now denotes the immediate presence of God. When Christ “ascended on high” He “led captive a host of captives” (Eph. 4:8–10). Since it is immediately added that He “descended into the lower parts of the earth,” evidently the paradise division of hades, He set free the saved spirit denizens of the underworld. Thus during the present church age, the redeemed who die are “absent from the body ... at home with the Lord.” The wicked, by contrast, are in hades. Both are awaiting resurrection: one the resurrection to life and the other the resurrection to condemnation. See Intermediate State; Gehenna; Lake of Fire. M.F.U.

HA'DID (ha'did; “sharp, pointed”). A place in Benjamin, 725 of whose inhabitants returned from captivity (Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37, where some copies read 721; 11:34). Located at Haditheh, three miles ENE of Lydda.

HAD'LAI (had'li; “ceasing, resting”). The father of Amasa, which latter was one of the Ephraimites who opposed the captives of Judah in the civil war between Pekah and Ahaz (2 Chron. 28:12), about 735 B.C.

HADO'RAM (ha-dō'ram).

1. The fifth of the thirteen sons of Joktan (Gen. 10:27; 1 Chron. 1:21), and supposed to be progenitor of a tribe in Arabia Felix. It is impossible to identify the tribe in question.

2. The son of Toi (Tou), king of Hamath, sent by his father (with valuable presents of gold, silver, and bronze) to congratulate David on his victory over their common enemy, Hadadezer, king of Syria (1 Chron. 18:10), about 984 B.C. In the parallel narrative of 2 Sam. 8:9–10, the name is given as Joram. This, being a contraction of Jehoram, which contains the name of Jehovah, is peculiarly an Israelite appellation (Smith, s.v.).

3. Chief officer of the tribute in the time of Rehoboam, son of Solomon. He was stoned to death by the people of the northern tribes when sent by the king to collect the usual taxes (2 Chron. 10:18), about 934 B.C. Probably the same person as Adoniram (thus NIV in 2 Chron. 10:8) in 1 Kings 4:6 and 5:14.

HA'DRACH (hā'drak). The name of a country mentioned by Zechariah (9:1). It occurs in the late Assyrian monuments as Hatarrika and is identified with Tell Afis, about twenty-eight miles SW of Aleppo.

HA'ELEPH (ha'e-lef; "ox"). One of the towns allotted to Benjamin and mentioned in the second group of fourteen towns (Josh. 18:28; "Eleph," KJV). "Robinson (ii, p. 139), is, no doubt, correct in supposing it to be the present Neby Samvil (i.e., prophet Samuel), two hours NW of Jerusalem" (K. & D., Com.).

HAFT. A handle, as of a dagger (so NASB, Judg. 3:22).

HA'GAB (ha'gab; "a locust"). One of the Temple servants whose descendants returned from Babylon under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:46), before 536 B.C.

HAG'ABA (hag'a-ba; "a locust"). One of the Temple servants whose descendants returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:48), before 536 B.C.

HAG'ABAH (hag'a-ba; Ezra 2:45). Another form of the preceding.

HA'GAR (hā'gar; derivation uncertain). A native of Egypt, servant of Abraham (Gen. 21:9–10), and handmaid of Sarah (16:1).

Sarah, continuing childless for so long a time, determined to become a mother by proxy (not uncommon in the East) through her maid, whom she gave to Abraham as a secondary wife (Gen. 16), c. 2050 B.C. No sooner did Hagar find herself likely to become the mother of her master's heir than she openly triumphed over her less favored mistress; "her mistress was despised in her sight." Sarah, deeply wounded, complained to Abraham, who gave her power to act as she thought best toward Hagar.

Sarah made Hagar feel her power by treating her "harshly," and Hagar fled, doubtless intending to return to Egypt by a road used from time immemorial running from Hebron past Beersheba "on the way to Shur." There the angel of the Lord found her by a spring and directed her to return to her mistress and submit to her, promising her the birth of a son and numerous descendants.

Obedient to the heavenly visitor and having distinguished the place by the name of Beerlahai-roi, Hagar returned again to the tent of Abraham, where in due time she had a son. Abraham called him, as directed by the angel (v. 11), Ishmael, "God hears." About fourteen years later Isaac was born, and when he was weaned, two or three years later, Ishmael greatly offended Sarah by mocking her son. Sarah insisted upon his expulsion from the family, together with Hagar (21:1–10).

Abraham, though displeased, consented, being divinely instructed to follow Sarah's advice. Hagar and her son were sent away. In the desert the strength of Ishmael gave way and, having no more water, Hagar laid him down under one of the stunted shrubs of that region. She withdrew about a bow shot's distance, unwilling to see his suffering, and wept. The angel of the Lord appeared with a comforting promise of her son's increasing greatness and directed her to a well, from which she filled the bottle and gave her son to drink (21:11–19). We have no account of Hagar's subsequent history beyond what is involved in that of Ishmael, who established himself in the wilderness of Paran, in the neighborhood of Sinai, and was married to an Egyptian woman (vv. 20–21). In Gal. 4:24 the apostle Paul, in an allegory, makes Hagar represent the Jewish Dispensation, which was in bondage to the ceremonial law. Sarah represents the true church of Christ, which was free from this bondage.

HAG´GAI (hag´gai; “festal”). The tenth in order of the twelve minor prophets, and the first of the three who, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian Exile, prophesied in Palestine. Of the place and year of his birth and of his descent nothing is known. He commenced to prophesy in the second year of Darius Hystaspes (Hag. 1:1). Together with Zechariah he urged the renewal of the building of the Temple, which had been suspended after the reign of Cyrus, and obtained the permission and assistance of the king (Ezra 5:1; 6:14). Animated by the high courage of these devoted men, the people went about their work with vigor, and the Temple was completed and dedicated in the sixth year of Darius, 516 B.C.

HAGGAI, BOOK OF. Haggai lived at the same time as Zechariah and, as an older man, labored with the younger man to encourage the returned Babylonian exiles to finish rebuilding the Temple. Work on this structure had been started in the second year of Cyrus, late in 536 B.C., but had been abandoned because of difficulties and opposition.

Occasion. In the second year of the Persian monarch Darius (520 B.C.), Haggai (Heb. “festal”) preached his four prophetic messages. Excerpts of these sermons compose the canonical book. The first prophetic utterance (1:1–15) was preached in August–September 520 B.C., the second (2:1–9) in September–October 520 B.C., the third (2:10–19) in November–December 520 B.C., and the fourth (2:20–23) in November–December.

Outline.

- I. Plea to finish the Temple (1:1–15)
- II. Prophecies of the millennial Temple (2:1–9)
- III. Promise of present blessing upon finishing the Temple (2:10–19)
- IV. Prophecy of the future destruction of Gentile world power (2:20–23)

Authorship. Since the addresses of the prophet, as we now possess them, are severely curtailed resumé, and since the prophet is always spoken of in the third person, critics such as Oesterly and Robinson deny that the book as it now stands is from Haggai’s hand. They claim that it is to be attributed, in all probability, to a contemporary who wrote down the salient points of the prophet’s sermons. The arguments of brevity and use of the third person, however, are not convincing reasons that the entire book may not have been written by Haggai himself. If Haggai wrote under inspiration, there is no reason why he might not have used short excerpts from his larger discourses or have employed the third person.

HAGGEDO´LIM (hag-ge-do´lim). The father of Zabdiel, the chief officer of the priests who were chosen by lot to live in Jerusalem following Nehemiah’s appointment as governor of Judah (Neh. 11:14).

HAG´GERI. See Hagri.

HAG´GI (hag´i; “festive”). The second of the seven sons of the patriarch Gad (Gen. 46:16) and progenitor of the family of Haggites (Num. 26:15).

HAGGI'AH (hag-gi'a; "festival of Jehovah"). A Levite of the family of Merari, apparently the son of Shimea and the father of Asaiah, which last seems to have been contemporary with David (1 Chron. 6:30).

HAG'GITES (hag'its). The family title of the descendants of Haggi (which see), the son of Gad (Num. 26:15).

HAG'GITH (hag'gith; "festive"). A wife of David, known only as the mother of Adonijah (2 Sam. 3:4; 1 Kings 1:5, 11; 2:13; 1 Chron. 3:2). She was probably married to David after his accession to the throne, 1000 B.C.

HAGIOG'RAPHA (hag-i-og'ra-fa; "holy writings"). A name sometimes applied to the third division of the Scriptures, called "The Writings" by the Jews and consisting of the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Ruth, Esther, Chronicles, Song of Solomon, Lamentations, and Ecclesiastes. This division was so arbitrary that it was never accepted as proper by the church.

HA'GRI (ha'gri; a "Hagrite"). "Mibhar the son of Hagri" was one of the mighty men of David's guard, according to 1 Chron. 11:38 ("Haggeri," KJV). The parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:36) has "Bani the Gadite," though the NIV reads "the son of Hagri."

HA'GRITES (ha'grits; often rendered "Hagarenes" or "Hagarites" in other versions). A nation living E of Palestine which was dispossessed by Reuben, Gad, and eastern Manasseh, in the days of Saul. First Chron. 5:10 refers to this time. Verses 18–22 seem at first sight to refer to the days of Jotham and Jeroboam II, but we are inclined to think that v. 18 is a resumption of the narrative of v. 10, which is interrupted by the genealogy of Gad (vv. 11–17); the more because Pekah, in whose reign the first captivity took place (2 Kings 15:29), was contemporary with Jotham (15:32), so that little time would be left for the occupation by Israel (1 Chron. 5:20–22).

The power of the Hagrites is shown by the force sent against them (1 Chron. 5:18) and their wealth in flocks and herds by the spoil (v. 21). Their subsequent hostility appears from Ps. 83:6, where they are mentioned next to Moab. The NIV, however, reads "descendants of Hagar" rather than "Hagrites." In 1 Chron. 27:31, Jaziz the Hagrite keeps the flocks of David, likely in his ancestral regions. In 11:38 Mibhar "the son of Hagi" may equally well mean "son of a Hagrite." We need find no discrepancy between this and 2 Sam. 23:36, "Bani the Gadite," since the two accounts are connected with different periods of David's life, about thirty years apart, and it is not likely that the persons about him were exactly the same.

It is generally supposed that the Hagrites were the descendants of Hagar. This is favored by the fact that of the three names, Jetur, Naphish, and Nodab, which are mentioned in 1 Chron. 5:19, apparently as names of Hagrite tribes or chiefs, Jetur and Naphish appear in Gen. 25:15 as names of sons of Ishmael. In Ps. 83:6 Ishmaelites are distinguished from Hagrites; but it may be as a general and special term, as Parisians might be distinguished from the French in one passage and in another all might be called French, or, as among the seven nations of Canaan, one was called especially Canaanites.

Smith (Bib. Dict.) believes the name and location of the Hagrites may be represented by Hejer, the Agrae of Ptol. v.19.2, and Strabo xvi.767. Gesenius (12th ed.) believes that the agraioi of Strabo were probably another section of the same race. We know them only by the land taken from them E of Gilead; but as a pastoral tribe they no doubt traversed at different times a good deal of territory. Jetur is thought to be represented by Iturea. HAIL.

1. Gk. chaire, “be cheerful, rejoice.” A salutation conveying a wish for the welfare of the person addressed (Luke 1:28); continued among our Saxon forefathers in “Joy to you” and “Health to you.”

2. Congealed rain (Heb. bārād; Gk. chalaza) with which God defeated an army of Canaanites (Josh. 10:11, “the Lord threw large stones from heaven on them as far as Azekah, and they died”). This phenomenon, which resembled the terrible hail in Egypt (Ex. 9:24), was manifestly a miraculous occurrence produced by the omnipotent power of God, for the hailstones did not injure the Israelites who were pursuing the enemy. In Palestine, “hail is common, and is often mingled with rain and with thunder storms (cf. Pss. 18:12–13, etc.), which happen at intervals through the winter, and are frequent in the spring” (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 64).

As a hailstorm is generally accompanied by lightning, we find in Scripture hail and fire (i.e., lightning) mentioned together (Ex. 9:23; Pss. 78:48; 105:32; etc.).

Figurative. Hail is the symbol of divine vengeance upon kingdoms and nations, as the enemies of God and His people (Isa. 28:2, 17; 32:19; Hag. 2:17).

HAILSTONE (Heb. eben bārād). A stone of hail (Josh. 10:11). See above.

HAIR (properly Heb. šē-ar; Gk. thrix). The customs of ancient nations regarding the hair varied considerably.

Of the Head.

Egyptians. According to Herodotus, the Egyptians “only left the hair of their head and beard grow in mourning, being at all other times shaved.” This agrees perfectly with the authority of the sculptures and of Scripture, where Joseph is said to have “shaved himself,” when sent for from prison by Pharaoh (Gen. 41:14). Love of cleanliness seems to have been the motive for this custom, and the priests carried this so far that they shaved the whole body every three days. Even the heads of young children were shaved, certain locks being left at the front, sides, and back. Women always wore their own hair, and they were not shaved even in mourning, or after death. Wigs were also worn, though rather by women than by men.

Assyrian. In the Assyrian sculptures the hair always appears long, combed closely down upon the head and falling in a mass of curls upon the shoulders. Herodotus testifies that the Babylonians wore their hair long. The very long hair, however, that appears in the figures on the monuments is supposed to have been partly false, a sort of headdress to add to the effect of the natural hair.

Greeks. The Greeks of the oldest times regarded long hair in man as an ornament and cut it only as a sign of mourning. At Athens, down to the Persian wars, the hair was worn long and fastened up into a knot by a needle in the form of a grasshopper. A free Athenian citizen did not wear his hair short, or he would have been mistaken for a slave. The Greek women, to judge from existing monuments, followed an extraordinary variety of fashions, but all of them sought to cover the forehead as much as possible. Hairpins (made of ivory, bronze, silver, and gold), headbands, and nets were used in dressing the hair. Both Greek and Roman ladies tried by artificial means to lighten their dark hair.

Hebrews. The Hebrews bestowed special care on the hair and beard (see below), regarding thick, abundant hair as an ornament, whereas the bald head was exposed even to insults (2 Kings 2:23). Long flowing hair was worn only by youths in more ancient times (2 Sam. 14:26; Song of Sol. 5:11) and by Nazirites during the term of their vow (Num. 6:5). Women always wore their hair long (Song of Sol. 4:1; Luke 7:38; John 11:2; 1 Cor. 11:15) and put up in plaits (2 Kings 9:30); as did the Nazirites (Judg. 16:13, 19). Fashionable ladies were in the habit of curling artificial locks (cf. Isa. 3:24). The fashionable braided hair, in which the Jewish women of a later time probably imitated the style of Roman ladies, is censured by the apostles as unsuitable for Christian women (1 Tim. 2:9; 1 Pet. 3:3). Even men began at that time to curl their hair, a practice that was generally condemned (Josephus Ant. 14.9.4), the usual custom for men being to cut the hair from time to time with a razor (Ezek. 44:20) but without shaving it bare. Female hairdressers, who are first mentioned in the rabbinical writers, may have existed in more ancient times, for barbers are mentioned in 5:1.

The Beard.

Customs. Western Asiatics have always cherished the beard as the badge of the dignity of manhood and attached to it the importance of a feature, e.g., the eye or nose. The Egyptians, on the contrary, shaved the hair of the face and head and compelled their slaves to do the like. The enemies of the Egyptians, probably including many of the nations of Canaan, Syria, and Armenia, etc., are nearly always represented bearded. In the Ninevite monuments is a series of battle views from the capture of Lachish by Sennacherib, in which the captives have beards very like some of those in Egyptian monuments. There is, however, an appearance of conventionalism both in Egyptian and Assyrian treatment of the hair and beard on monuments, which prevents our accepting it as characteristic.

Hebrew Regulations, etc. Among the Hebrews the beard was considered an ornament and was not shaven, only trimmed (2 Sam. 19:24). The dressing, trimming, anointing, etc., of the beard were performed with much ceremony by persons of wealth and rank (Ps. 133:2). The removal of the beard was a part of the ceremonial treatment proper to a leper (Lev. 14:9). Size and fullness of beard are said to be regarded, at the present day, as a mark of respectability and trustworthiness. The beard is the object of an oath, and that on which blessings or shame are spoken of as resting. The custom in mourning was and is to shave or pluck out it and the hair (Isa. 15:2; 50:6; Jer. 41:5; 48:37; Ezra 9:3), to neglect it in seasons of permanent affliction (2 Sam. 19:24), and to regard any insult to it as the last outrage that enmity can inflict (10:4–5). The beard was an object of salutation (20:9), and it was a custom to swear by it (Matt. 5:36). The law forbade the deforming of the head by cutting away the hair around it, and of the beard by cutting the corners (Lev. 19:27). This is understood to mean that the hair was not to be cut in a circle from one temple to another, as among the Arabs; neither might that portion of the face where the beard and hair met be shaved. These regulations are thought by some to have reference to the fact that among some nations these customs are part of idolatrous worship.

Figurative. Hair was a symbol of that which was of the least value in man's person (1 Sam. 14:45; 2 Sam. 14:11; 1 Kings 1:52; Matt. 10:30; Luke 12:7; 21:18); of great number (Pss. 49:12; 69:4); a minute distance (Judg. 20:16). White or gray hair is the symbol of honor or authority and is thus entitled to respect (Lev. 19:32; Prov. 16:31; Dan. 7:9; Rev. 1:14); sometimes of approaching decay, as of Israel (Hos. 7:9). To cover the beard (NASB, "mustache"), i.e., to cover the face up to the nose, is a sign of mourning (Lev. 13:45), of trouble and shame (Ezek. 24:17; Mic. 3:7), and is really equivalent to covering the head (Jer. 14:4; Esther 6:12).

HAKILAH. See Hachilah.

HAK'KATAN (hak'a-tan, "little or junior"). A descendant (or native) of Azgad, and father of Johanan, which last returned with 110 male retainers from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:12), before 457 B.C.

HAK'KOZ (hak'oz). The head of the seventh division of priests according to the arrangement of David (1 Chron. 24:10), about 975 B.C. He is probably the one whose descendants were excluded by Nehemiah from the priesthood because of defective pedigree (Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:63; both "Koz," KJV). To the same family seems to have belonged Meremoth, who repaired two portions of the walls of Jerusalem, one portion of which extended from the door of the high priest's house to the end of it (3:4, 21).

HAKU'PHA (ha-kū'fa; "crooked, bent," cf. Arab. hakafa, "to be curved"). One of the Temple servants who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53), about 538 B.C.

HA'LAH (ha'la). The district in the Assyrian Empire into which the captive Israelites were taken by the Assyrian kings (2 Kings 17:6; 18:11; 1 Chron. 5:26) and situated on the banks of the Khabour, evidently near Gozan.

HA'LAK (hā'lak; "bare"). The Smooth or Bald Mountain mentioned in the description of Joshua's conquests in Canaan (Josh. 11:17; 12:7). Doubtless this ridge is referred to in Num. 34:3-4; Josh. 15:2-3, under the name "ascent of Akrabbim." It is now located NNE of Abdeh, which is on the Wadi el-Marra.

HALF SHEKEL, HALF OF A SHEKEL. A beka, a weight and a unit of money. See Metrology.

HAL'HUL (hal'hūl). A town in the highlands of Judah, in which, tradition says, Gad the seer of David was buried (Josh. 15:58); the modern Halhūl, about four miles N of Hebron.

HA'LI (ha'li; "jewel"). One of the towns assigned to Asher (Josh. 19:25), not definitely located.

HALL. See House.

HAL'LEL (hal'el; Heb. hallēl, Gk. humnos, "praise"). The name of a particular part of the hymnal service chanted at certain festivals. This service received the designation "hallel" because it consists of Pss. 113-18, which are psalms of praise and begin with "Hallelujah." It is also called the "Egyptian Hallel," because it was chanted in the Temple while the Passover lambs were slain. This Hallel was also chanted after the morning sacrifice on the feast of Pentecost, the eight days of the feast of Tabernacles, and the eight days of the feast of Dedication. It was chanted in private families on the first evening of Passover. The Great Hallel was so called because of the reiterated response after every verse, "For His lovingkindness is everlasting" (Ps. 136). It was recited on the first evening of the Passover, at the supper, by those wishing to have a fifth cup, i.e., one above the enjoined number. The hymn sung by Jesus and His disciples after the Last Supper (Matt. 26:30) is supposed to have been part of this Hallel.

HALLELU'JAH (hal-e-lū'ya; Heb. hallēlū-yâ; "praise ye Jah," i.e., Jehovah; Gk.

allēlovia). Evidently a common form of adoration and thanksgiving in Jewish worship, as appears from its frequent employment at the beginning and close of many of the psalms (see Pss. 106, 111-13, 117, 135). In the great hymn of triumph in heaven over the destruction of Babylon the large multitude in chorus, like the voice of mighty thunderings, burst forth, "Hallelujah! For the Lord our God, the Almighty, reigns," in response to the voice from the throne saying, "Give praise to our God, all you His bond-servants" (Rev. 19:1-6).

HALLO'HESH (ha-lō'hesh; "the whisperer, enchanter"). The father of Shallum, which latter assisted Nehemiah in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:12; "Halohesh," KJV). He was one of the popular chiefs who covenanted with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:24), 445 B.C.

HALLOW, HALLOWED (Heb. qādāsh, to "set apart, consecrate," KJV; Gk. hagiazō, to "make sacred," KJV, NASB, and NIV). Although the term hallowed appears but twice in the NASB and NIV (Matt. 6:9; Luke 11:2; both in the Lord's Prayer) and the term hallow not at all (in contrast to the KJV, where it appears frequently), the concept is present in the terms consecrate, dedicate, sanctify, and holy, all of which are used at one time or another in the NASB and NIV to replace KJV hallow or hallowed. See Consecrate; Sanctify.

HALO HESH. See Hallohesh.

HALT. See Diseases: Lame, Lameness.

HAM (ham; hot). One of Noah’s three sons (Gen. 5:32). Like his brothers he was married at the time of the Deluge, and with his wife was saved from destruction in the ark (7:13). After the Deluge he provoked the wrath of his father by an act of indecency toward him that occasioned a far-reaching prophecy (9:21–27). A list of his descendants is given in 10:6–18.

Cush, Mizraim, and Put were the progenitors of the tribes that peopled Africa, and Canaan became the father of those that principally occupied Phoenicia and Palestine (see table 12, “The Descendants of Ham”).

The Hamitic peoples are presented in Gen. 10:8–10 as developing earthly imperial power in their first appearance in human history. This power, moreover, is implied to be evil. Nimrod is said to have been “a mighty hunter before the Lord” (10:9). The simple construction of this passage, so commonly misinterpreted, is that Yahweh took note of his royal character as that of a “hunter,” which was the exact opposite of the divine ideal of a king—that of a shepherd (cf. 2 Sam. 5:2; 7:7; Rev. 2:27). A hunter gratifies himself at the expense of his victim. On the other hand, a shepherd spends himself for the good of the subjects of his care. Hamitic imperial power is said to have begun in Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh (Gen. 10:10). The cities of Babylon, Erech, and Accad are now well known. They were among the earliest great capitals of the civilized world and were located “in the land of Shinar.” This term denotes the entire alluvial plain of Babylon between the Tigris and the Euphrates, in approximately the last two hundred miles of these great rivers as they flowed in ancient times. This region was divided according to the cuneiform accounts into the northern portion called Accad in which Babel (Akkad. Babilu, signifying gate of god) and the city of Accad (Agade) were situated. The southern portion was called Sumer, in which Erech, ancient Uruk, modern Warka, was located. This, the cradle of ancient civilization, was the first center of imperialism under the Hamitic peoples.

The name of Ham, alone of the three sons of Noah, if our identification be correct, is known to have been given to a country (Pss. 78:51; 105:23; 106:22).

HA'MAN (hā'man). The son of Hammedatha the Agagite, and prime minister of Ahasuerus, the Persian king (Esther 3:1), after 486 B.C. As Agag was a title of the kings of the Amalekites, it is supposed that Haman was descended from the royal family of that nation. Either he or his father probably found his way to Persia as captive or hostage. His intrigues against Mordecai and the Jews, the discovery of his plot, and his own execution are graphically delineated in the book of Esther.

HAMATH (hā'math; "fortress"). An ancient city-state, capital of the upper Syria in the valley of the Orontes, and a most important town, as Shalmaneser claims to have captured eighty-nine towns belonging to it. Originally a Canaanite colony (cf. Gen. 10:18), in the time of Hezekiah it was taken by the Assyrians (2 Kings 18:34) and was annexed to the Assyrian empire, 720 B.C. It was located in a fertile and well-watered valley at the foot of Lebanon. The city kingdom of Hamath was prominent in OT history from the time of David onward and is well known from the Assyrian monuments. Its site (seventy-five miles S of Aleppo) has been extensively excavated, revealing a distinctive Hittite occupation. In the famous Battle of Karkar in 853 B.C., Hamath was prominently joined with Ben Hadad of Damascus and Ahab, king of Israel, against the encroachments of Shalmaneser III of Assyria. Despite this valiant stand, Hamath later succumbed to the Assyrians. Citizens of Hamath were transplanted into the Northern Kingdom when Israel fell (2 Kings 17:24, 30). Some Israelites were also transplanted to Hamath (Isa. 11:11). In later Assyrian history Hamath became a province of Syria and subsequently of Persia in the time of Nehemiah. M.F.U.

HAMATHITE (ham'a-thīt). The inhabitants (Gen. 10:18; 1 Chron. 1:16), or rather founders of Hamath (which see).

HAMATH-ZOBAB (hā'moth-zō'ba; 1 Chron. 8:3). Supposed to be the same as Hamath (which see). Some believe it different and distinguished from it by the suffix "zobah." It is, however, most likely to be identical with the well-known city of Hamath on the Orontes; Hadadezer's empire was large in extent and in all likelihood comprehended the region of Hamath, captured by Solomon (2 Chron. 8:3).

HAMITES (1 Chron. 4:40). The Simeonites, wishing to extend their territory, "went to the entrance of Gedor" (which see) and there found these Hamites who "lived there formerly." They may have been Egyptian Cushites or even Canaanites (1:8). Only this is certain, that they were a peaceful shepherd people, dwelling in tents and therefore nomads.

HAMMATH (hām'ath; "warm springs").

1. One of the fortified cities in the territory allotted to Naphtali (Josh. 19:35). It is not possible from this list to determine its position, but the notices of the Talmudists leave no doubt that it was near Tiberias, one mile distant—in fact, that it had its name Chammath, "hot baths," because it contained those of Tiberias. Josephus mentions it under the name Emmaus as a village not far from Tiberias. The Hummâm, at present three in number, still send up their hot and sulfurous water at a spot rather more than a mile S of the modern town. In the list of Levitical cities given out of Naphtali (21:32), the name of this place seems to be given as Hammoth-dor, and in 1 Chron. 6:76 it is further altered to Hammon. Now located at Hamman Tabariyeh, two miles S of Tiberias.

2. A Kenite, ancestor of the Rechabites (1 Chron. 2:55; "Hemath," KJV).

HAMMEDATHA (ham-e-da'tha). Father of the infamous Haman and commonly designated as "the Agagite" (Esther 3:1, 10; 8:5; 9:24), though also without the title (9:10).

HAMMELECH (ham'e-lek; "the king"). In the KJV, the father of Jerahmeel, which latter was one of those commanded by Jehoiakim to arrest Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer. 36:26), before 605 B.C. It is uncertain whether this was the same as Hammelech the father of Malchijah, into whose dungeon Jeremiah was afterward cast (Jer. 38:6), before 589 B.C. Others, however, as in the NASB and NIV, which render only “the king,” regard the word in both cases as an appellative, referring in the first passage to Jehoiakim and in the latter to Zedekiah. See Hammoleketh.

HAMMER. An implement described by four Heb. words in the OT. A heavy wooden mallet used for driving in tent pegs was called a halmût (Judg. 5:26). Another type of heavy maul was called a kêlap (Ps. 74:6; NIV, “hatchets”). A smaller tool suitable for the gold beater (Isa. 41:7) and the quarrymen (Jer. 23:29) was called a paṭṭîsh. A tool evidently similar to the paṭṭîsh, and doubtless a pointed hammer of the stonecutter and smith (1 Kings 6:7; Isa. 44:12), and in general a workman’s hammer (Judg. 4:21), was called a maqqābâ. M.F.U.

HAMMOL’EKETH (ha-mol’e-keth; “the queen”). A woman introduced in the genealogies of Manasseh as daughter of Machir and sister of Gilead (1 Chron. 7:17–18), and as having among her three children Abiezer, from whose family sprang the great judge Gideon. The Jewish tradition is that “she used to reign over a portion of the land that belonged to Gilead,” and that for that reason her lineage has been preserved. See Hammelech.

HAM’MON (ham’on; “glowing, warm”).

1. A town in the territory of Asher (Josh. 19:28), apparently midway between Naphtali and Sidon. Probably Umm el-Awamid, about ten miles S of Tyre.

2. A Levitical city of Naphtali assigned to the Gershonites (1 Chron. 6:76) and answering to the similar names of Hammath and Hammoth-dor (which see).

HAM’MOTH-DOR (ham’mōth-dōr; “hot springs of Dor”). A city of Naphtali (Josh. 21:32); probably the same as Hammath (which see).

HAMMU’EL (ha-mū’el; “heat or anger of God”). The son of Mishma and (apparently) father of Zaccur, of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:26; “Haniel,” KJV).

HAMMURA’BI (ham-u-rā’bi). The sixth king of the famous First Dynasty of Babylon, formerly identified with Amraphel of Gen. 14:1. This identification is now no longer possible as a result of the thousands of clay tablets recovered from the middle Euphrates city of Mari in 1937, and information based upon the Khorsabad List. New sources of information enable us to place Hammurabi’s reign c. 1728–1686 B.C. (Albright). This is at least three centuries subsequent to the age of Abraham. Hammurabi exalted Babylon as his capital. His city had a ziggurat. He adorned the cities of Asshur and Nineveh. His reign was one of great prosperity, advance in astronomy, architecture, mathematics, and literature. The creation and Flood epics were edited in his day and have descended to us in the form that they took under his reign. Copies of these epics, dating about 640 B.C., were found in the library of Ashurbanipal at Nineveh. Hammurabi’s black stela from the city of Ur was inscribed in both the Semitic and Sumerian languages. Hammurabi is famous in large part for his code of laws discovered in 1901–2 by Jacques de Morgan at Susa, where it had been carried by Elamite raiders. This famous code offers interesting parallels to pentateuchal laws, preceding them by at least three centuries and adapted to an urban irrigation culture in contrast to the simple agrarian culture of Palestine. HAM'ONAH (ham'ō-na; “multitude”). The figurative name of the place in the valley in which the burial of Gog and his forces are prophetically announced to take place (Ezek. 39:16).

HA'MON-GOG (ha'mon-gog; “multitude of Gog”). The name given by the prophet Ezekiel (39:11) to the valley in which the slaughtered army of Gog are described as being buried. See Gog.

HA'MOR (ha'mōr; a “he-ass”). A Hivite from whom (or his sons) Jacob purchased the plot of ground in which Joseph was afterward buried (Gen. 33:19; Josh. 24:32; Acts 7:16; in the latter verse “Emmor” in the KJV), and whose son, Shechem, seduced Dinah (Gen. 34:2). As the latter appears to have founded the city of Shechem, Hamor is also named as the representative of its inhabitants (Judg. 9:28) in the time of Abimelech. Neither his character and influence nor his judicious behavior in the case of his son saved him from the indiscriminate massacre by Dinah's brothers.

HAM'RAM (ham'ran; “fair”). A son of Dishon and descendant of Esau (1 Chron. 1:41; “Amram,” KJV; “Hemdan,” NIV). In Gen. 36:26 he is called more correctly Hemdan (which see).

HAMSTRING (Heb. āgar; to “extirpate”). The method employed to render useless the captured horses of the enemy (Josh. 11:6; 2 Sam. 8:4; 1 Chron. 18:4), since the Israelites were forbidden to use that animal (Deut. 17:16). It consisted in severing the achilles tendon of the hind legs. The KJV term is hough (pronounced “hock”).

HAMUEL. See Hammuel.

HA'MUL (ha'mūl; “pitied, spared”). The second of the two sons of Perez, son of Judah (1 Chron. 2:5). He could not have been born, however, before the migration of Jacob into Egypt (as appears to be stated in Gen. 46:12), since Perez was not at that time grown up (38:29).

HA'MULITES (ha-mū-līts). The descendants (Num. 26:21) of Hamul.

HAMU'TAL (ha-mū'tal; “kinsman of the dew”). Daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah, wife of King Josiah and mother of King Jehoahaz (2 Kings 23:31; 24:18; Jer. 52:1), 639 B.C.

HANAM'EL (ha-nam'el; “God has compassion”). The son of Shallum and cousin of Jeremiah to whom, while Jerusalem was besieged, he sold a field in Anathoth (Jer. 32:6–12), about 590 B.C. The prohibition to sell Levitical estates applied merely to their alienating them from the tribe. “The transaction was intended to evince the certainty of restoration from the impending exile by showing that possessions, which could be established by documents, would be of future value to the possessor” (vv. 13–15).

HA'NAN (hā'nan; “merciful”).

1. One of the sons (or descendants) of Shashak, one of the chief men of Benjamin, residing at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:23).

2. The last named of the six sons of Azel the Benjamite (1 Chron. 8:38; 9:44).

3. Son of Maacah and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:43), 1000 B.C.

4. One of the Temple servants whose posterity were among those who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:46; Neh. 7:49), 536 B.C.

5. One of the Levites who assisted Ezra in expounding the law to the people (Neh. 8:7), 445 B.C. He also sealed the covenant made by Nehemiah (10:10). He is probably the same as the one mentioned in 13:13 as the son of Zaccur, who, on account of his integrity, was appointed to distribute the Levitical revenues among his brethren.

6. A leader of the people who subscribed to the covenant drawn up by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:22). The same name occurs in v. 26.

7. The son of Igdaliah and an officer of the Lord's house. Into the chamber of his sons Jeremiah brought the Rechabites in order to test their temperance (Jer. 35:3–6), about 607 B.C.

HANAN'EL, TOWER OF (ha-nan'el; "God has favored"). A tower that formed part of the N wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:1; 12:39). From these two passages, particularly from the former, it might almost be inferred that Hananel was but another name for the Tower of the Hundred; at any rate they were close together and stood between the Sheep Gate and the Fish Gate. This tower is further mentioned in Jer. 31:38. The remaining passage in which it is named (Zech. 14:10) also connects this tower with the Corner Gate, which lay on the other side of the Sheep Gate.

HANA'NI (ha-na'ni; "gracious").

1. One of the sons of Heman, appointed by lot in the time of David for the service of song in the sanctuary. Hanani had charge of the eighteenth division (1 Chron. 25:4, 25), after 1000 B.C.

2. A prophet or "seer" who rebuked Asa, king of Judah, for seeking help from the king of Syria against Baasha, king of Israel. In punishment for his defection from the true God, Hanani threatened him with wars during the remainder of his reign. Enraged at the prophet's boldness, the king put him in prison (2 Chron. 16:7–10), 879 B.C. This Hanani is probably the same as the father of the prophet Jehu who denounced Baasha (1 Kings 16:1, 7) and King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 19:2; 20:34).

3. One of the sons (or descendants) of Immer, who had taken a foreign wife during the captivity (Ezra 10:20).

4. One of the "brothers" of Nehemiah who, with others, went from Jerusalem to Susa, probably sent by Ezra, and brought information concerning the condition of the returned Jews. Their information probably led to the mission of Nehemiah (Neh. 1:2). Hanani returned to Judah and, together with one Hananiah, was placed in charge of the gates of Jerusalem, to see that they were opened and shut at the proper hours, morning and evening (7:2), 445 B.C.

5. A priest, one of the musicians who officiated in the ceremony of purifying the walls of Jerusalem when they had been rebuilt (Neh. 12:36), 445 B.C.

HANANI'AH (han-a-ni'a; "Jehovah was favored").

1. One of the sons of Zerubbabel who was of the family of David (1 Chron. 3:19). His sons are given as Pelatiah and Jeshaiiah (v. 21).

2. One of the sons of Shashak and a leader of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:24).

3. A son of Heman, appointed by David to take charge of the sixteenth division of Levitical musicians (1 Chron. 25:4, 23), about 1000 B.C.

4. "One of the king's officers" in the army of Uzziah, king of Judah (2 Chron. 26:11), after 783 B.C.

5. An Israelite of the family of Bebai who renounced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:28), 456 B.C.

6. "One of the perfumers" (or makers of the sacred ointments and incense, Ex. 30:22–38) who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:8), 445 B.C. Possibly the same as no. 5.

7. The son of Shelemiah (Neh. 3:30) and one of the priests who repaired the wall of Jerusalem opposite their houses, from "above the Horse Gate" (v. 28), 445 B.C.

8. The “commander of the fortress” and the person who was associated with Nehemiah’s brother, Hanani, in charge of the gates of Jerusalem. He is described as “a faithful man” and one who “feared God more than many” (Neh. 7:2), 445 B.C. His office seems to have been one of authority and trust and perhaps the same as that of Eliakim, who was “over the household” in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Kings 19:2).

9. The name of one of the “leaders of the people” who sealed the covenant made by Nehemiah and the people to serve the Lord (Neh. 10:23), 445 B.C.

10. A priest, apparently son of Jeremiah, after the captivity (Neh. 12:12); probably the same as one of those who celebrated the completion of the walls of Jerusalem (v. 41), 445 B.C.

11. Son of Azzur, a prophet of Gibeon, who uttered false prophecies in the fourth year of Zedekiah, king of Judah. He publicly prophesied in the Temple that within two years Jeconiah and his fellow captives, with the vessels of the Lord’s house, which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away to Babylon, should be brought back to Jerusalem. He sought to uphold his prophecy by taking off from the neck of Jeremiah the yoke that he wore by divine command (Jer. 27:2), in token of the subjection of Judah and the neighboring countries to the Babylonian Empire. Jeremiah was told to go and tell Hananiah that for the wooden yokes that he had broken he should make yokes of iron, “that they may serve Nebuchadnezzar.” Jeremiah also added this rebuke and denunciation: “Listen now, Hananiah, the Lord has not sent you, and you have made this people trust in a lie. Therefore thus says the Lord, ‘Behold, I am about to remove you from the face of the earth. This year you are going to die, because you have counseled rebellion against the Lord.’ So Hananiah the prophet died in the same year in the seventh month” (28:1–17), about 593 B.C. “The history of Hananiah is of great interest, as throwing much light upon the Jewish politics of that eventful time, divided as parties were into the partisans of Babylon on one hand, and Egypt on the other. It also exhibits the machinery of false prophecies, by which the irreligious party sought to promote their own policy in a very distinct form” (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia).

12. The father of Zedekiah who was one of the officials to whom Micaiah reported Baruch’s reading of Jeremiah’s prophecies (Jer. 36:12), about 604 B.C.

13. The grandfather of Irijah, the captain of the guard at the Gate of Benjamin who arrested the prophet Jeremiah upon the supposition that he intended to desert to the Chaldeans (Jer. 37:13), 597 B.C.

14. The original name of Shadrach, one of the three Hebrew children, by which latter name he is better known (Dan. 1:6–7, 11, 19; 2:17).

HAND (Heb. yād, the “open” palm; kap, the “hollow” of the hand; Gk. cheir).

Figurative. Being the part of the body that is chiefly employed in active service, the hand is used in Scripture with a great variety of applications: (1) Hands are the symbols of human action; pure hands represent pure actions and unjust hands injustice, whereas “hands covered with blood” denote actions stained with cruelty, etc. (Job 9:30; Ps. 90:17; Isa. 1:15; 1 Tim. 2:8). (2) Washing the hands was a symbol of innocence (Deut. 21:6–7; Ps. 26:6; Matt. 27:24). (3) The hand, in general, was the symbol of power and strength, especially the right hand (Ex. 15:6; Ps. 17:7). (4) Holding by the right hand was expressive of support (73:23; Isa. 41:13); standing at the right hand indicated protection (Pss. 16:8; 109:31; 110:5); to lean upon the hand of another was a mark of familiarity, as well as of superiority (2 Kings 5:18; 7:17); to give the hand, as to a master, was a sign of submission (2 Chron. 30:8, marg.); pouring water on another’s hands signified to serve him (2 Kings 3:11); to “seal the hand” is to prevent one from working, e.g., by reason of the cold (Job 37:7); to withdraw the hand is to withhold support (Ps. 74:11), while to cut it off was an example of extreme self-denial (Matt. 5:30). (5) The open hand is figurative of liberality (Deut. 15:8; Ps. 104:28), the closed hand a lack of it (Deut. 15:7). (6) The right hand was used to indicate the S, and the left the N (1 Sam. 23:19; 2 Sam. 24:5; Job 23:9). (7) The right hand was the place of honor (1 Kings 2:19) and power (Mark 14:62). (8) "I will also turn My hand against you" (Isa. 1:25) signifies a movement of the hand, hitherto at rest, either for the purpose of inflicting punishment upon the person named (Ps. 81:14; Jer. 6:9; Ezek. 38:12; Amos 1:8, marg.), or, though this is seldom the case, for the purpose of saving one (Zech. 13:7).

Customs. Men lifted up their hands in prayer (Job 11:13; 1 Tim. 2:8), also in taking an oath (Gen. 14:22, marg.; etc.); put the hands together over the head as a gesture of extreme grief (2 Sam. 13:19; Jer. 2:37); the accuser stood at the right hand of the accused in a trial (Ps. 109:6; Zech. 3:1); the thumb of the right hand of the priest was touched with blood of the consecration ram (Ex. 29:20; Lev. 8:23–24). The Jews washed their hands before eating (Matt. 15:2; Mark 7:3) or after touching an unclean person (Lev. 15:11); servants were directed by movements of the hand of master or mistress (Ps. 123:2); treaties were made and sureties entered into by joining hands (2 Kings 10:15; Job 17:3, marg.; Prov. 6:1, marg.; 17:18, marg.); the hand was placed under the thigh of a person to whom an oath was made (Gen. 24:2–4, 9; 47:29); joy was shown by clapping the hands (2 Kings 11:12; Ps. 47:1), whereas striking and clapping them together expressed extreme anger (Num. 24:10; Ezek. 21:14, 17).

HANDBREADTH. See Metrology: Linear Measures.

HANDFUL. See Metrology: Dry Measures of Capacity.

HANDICRAFTS. The word handicraft is not found in Scripture, and yet it is appropriate, inasmuch as most of the mechanical work of ancient times was performed by hand.

Archaeological discoveries have revealed remarkable evidences left by the non-Semitic Sumerians who arrived in the Plain of Shinar in lower Babylonia sometime before 4000 B.C. The excavations of Abram's city of Ur have uncovered exquisite jewels, many of which may be seen in the University Museum of Philadelphia. The hoard of jewels recovered from the Royal Tombs is especially valuable. Queen Puabi's tomb (dating to about 2500 B.C.) was fabulously adorned. Apparently demonstrating complete loyalty to the beautiful queen, twenty-five of her court ladies had walked alive into the tomb or had been drugged and carried there. In full regalia, the royal sepulcher remained untouched until 1927 when retrieved by Sir Leonard Woolley. The artistic skill of the workmen of that day is revealed in the queen's diadem of minute beads, palmettes, flowerettes, rosettes, and exquisitely thin rolled gold. This splendor furnished the background for carved stags, antelopes, and bearded bulls. The queen wore a jeweled cap of gold, its silver bands adorned with beech leaves. Heavy gold earrings were in her ears. She was also bedecked with a necklace, gold pins, and fish-shaped amulets. Several other tombs of the period were also filled with magnificent pieces. Another remarkable example of Sumerian art was a solid gold helmet of a warrior. Also found were finely wrought golden tumblers, dainty cosmetic boxes, a paint cup, and a silver toiletry box with a lid carved from seashells showing a lion attacking a goat. At Tepe Gawra, an ancient city mound in northern Mesopotamia, objects of gold, silver, and their alloys were dug up. Also found were ivory combs banded with gold and studded with precious stones.

Jewels go back to early times in Egypt and seem only to have been preceded by the Sumerians. Stone necklaces and bracelets from the Badarian civilization (c. 3500 B.C.) have been found. Pre-Dynastic Egyptian artists developed fine styles. By the Twelfth Dynasty (2000–1750 B.C.), Egyptian craftsmanship in jewelry reached a high mark in beauty, color, and design. Egyptian jewelry is noted for its good taste and its fine execution. Sumerian and early Egyptian artists are also known for their skill in wood, leather, stone, and various other materials.

When they left Egypt, the Hebrews had among them skilled workmen in gold, silver, brass, wood, and leather, as is evident from the building of the Tabernacle. But when these artists died, the development of the mechanical arts seemed to have come to a standstill (Judg. 5:8; 1 Sam. 13:19). Even in the time of Solomon the Hebrews needed the teaching of the Phoenicians (1 Sam. 5:11; 1 Kings 5:1–9, 12; 7:13–14).

Manual labor was generally held in low esteem by the Greeks, and in later times many free citizens declined to engage in it at all. The Romans also seem to have thought that there was something objectionable in mechanical labor, and in many wealthy homes this was mostly done by slaves. To pursue a trade was not, at least in later times, considered degrading among the Jews. Indeed, at this time all the rabbinical authorities were working at some trade, and it became the fashion to enjoy hard labor: the great Hillel was a woodcutter; his rival, Shammai, a carpenter; and among the celebrated rabbis of later times we find shoemakers, tailors, carpenters, sandal makers, smiths, potters, builders, etc. They were not ashamed of their manual labor. It was a rabbinical principle that “whoever does not teach his son a trade, is as if he brought him up to be a robber.”

Apothecary. See Perfumer, below; article Perfume.

Armorer. In 1 Sam. 8:12 it is recorded that Samuel told the Israelites that if they chose a king he would take their sons and set them to make his “weapons of war,” i.e., to be engaged in the arts of warfare rather than in those of peace. As to the work of the armorer, it can be better understood by consulting the article Armor.

Baker (Heb. ḥāpâ, to “cook”). Makers of bread and pastry, a department then more varied than that of cook (Gen. 40:1–2, 5, 16–22; 41:10; Hos. 7:4). In Jer. 37:21 it is stated that bread was brought daily “from the bakers’ street,” a bakers’ bazaar that would indicate that bakers formed a guild.

In Egypt the bakery profession was one of great importance. A biblical reminiscence of this was the unfortunate baker who was placed in prison. The baker’s dream recounts all sorts of fancy baked food (Gen. 40:16–17). Egyptian bakers were required to give strict account of their stocks of materials to the overseer of granaries. Miniature models of such scenes have come down to us from excavated tombs. Closely associated with the baker was the miller. Mother and daughter had this task among the common people. The job consisted in turning with wooden handles the heavy grinding stones, sometimes a foot and a half in diameter. In more primitive times the grain was simply crushed in a curvature of the rock with a small hand stone. Public millers had a busy trade and used donkeys to turn the stones. At Ostia, the port of Rome, and at Pompeii archaeologists have recovered mills that indicate a booming business requiring large storehouses. The Bible refers frequently to the miller or “grinder” (Ex. 11:5; Judg. 16:21; Matt. 24:41; Luke 17:2). M.F.U.

Brick Maker. Brick making, a mere manual occupation with nothing to stimulate the clever workmen to creative craftsmanship, was only followed by the members of the community who had not even the satisfaction of working for themselves. Thus the Israelites were forced to this occupation in Egypt. Brickmaking was a government monopoly. The pay was a small remuneration for the laborious drudgery. Egypt and Babylonia, with mighty rivers and alluvial silt, excelled in brick construction. (See Brick.) However, these lowly workmen were essential to building trades in biblical lands. Guilds or unions of brick makers traveled in groups throughout the country ready to perform service where needed. An example of large-scale brick making and bricklaying comes to us from the splendid reign of Thutmose III (c. 1483–1450 B.C.). The tomb of the great officer of Thutmose’s court, Rekhmire, near Thebes, is adorned with scenes and inscriptions describing his career. In one of these pictures Rekhmire leans on a staff and inspects stonecutters, brick makers, sculptors, and builders who toil before him. Brick making in ancient Egypt was a process involving the breaking up of the Nile mud with mattocks, moistening it with water, and then mixing it with sand and chopped straw (Ex. 5:6–19). Then placed in molds, it was put in the sun to bake. Semitic foreigners appear on the tomb making and laying bricks, working on the temple of Amon. The bricklayers say: “He supplies us with bread, beer and every good sort” while the taskmaster says to the builders: “The rod is in my hand; be not idle” (cf. P. E. Newberry, The Life of Rekhmara; James Breasted, Ancient Records of Egypt, 1906–7, vol. 2, sec. 758ff.). This reference to brick making is all the more significant inasmuch as Thutmose III (according to the Masoretic chronology) was the pharaoh of the oppression.

Builder. Besides brick making and bricklaying, carpentry and stonemasonry were important trades in the ancient world.

Carpenters. The Egyptian carpenter was more important than the Palestinian. There were palaces and wealthy houses to beam and trim, wooden mummy cases to cut out, furniture to make, irrigation pumps (shadufs) to erect, large river-going vessels and smaller boats to make, and implements of various sorts to fashion. Especially noteworthy are the large barges that transported huge blocks of limestone and sandstone and giant obelisks; also, such large works as pillars, gates, temple, and palace doors. Carpenters’ tools such as adzes, ax heads, and chisels have been recovered. Palestinian carpenters in early Israel did not develop a high degree of skill. Palestinian dwellings, even of the peasantry, were of mud brick or stone so that woodwork for construction purposes was minimal. Solomon, therefore, had to import Phoenician craftsmen to build his royal palaces and the Temple. After the Solomonic era, however, carpentry was cultivated. Nebuchadnezzar II carried away carpenters (Jer. 24:1, KJV; NASB and NIV, “craftsmen”). The Palestinian carpenter must have had tools similar to those used in Egypt. Sandstone served as a plane, saws with flint teeth were mounted on a frame, and a heavy stone served as a hammer. The adz was an all-purpose tool. At the time of Isaiah, carpenters developed great skill not only in common construction work but in idol making (cf. Isa. 44:12–17).

Stonemasons. The worker in stone was indispensable in Palestine, as in the land of the Nile. The vast palaces, tombs, pyramids, temples, and obelisks required consummate skill on the part of a multitude of stone workers. The mighty pyramids with their minute constructional accuracy testify to the high development of the art of construction in early Dynastic Egypt. In early Israel before the prosperity of the Davidic-Solomonic era, stone houses among the Israelites were not common; Hiram of Tyre’s craftsmen, however, increased stonemasonry. There were building trades in Jerusalem during the Hebrew monarchy. When public buildings or the Temple fell into disrepair, money was raised by public subscription, and it was paid out “to the carpenters and the builders, who worked on the house of the Lord; and to the masons and the stonecutters, and for buying timber and hewn stone to repair the damages to the house of the Lord” (2 Kings 12:11–12). Timber was cut by men especially qualified for this work. Solomon boasted that the Sidonians were expert timber cutters. Solomon’s Temple was built out of fine quarry-chiseled marble (1 Kings 7:9–12). Jesus stressed the importance of a solid building foundation in a country where heavy rains might occur (Matt. 7:24–27). M.F.U.

Calker. A KJV term referring to one who repaired the seams of ships (Ezek. 27:9, 27). The original Heb. term appears also in other passages, as for example in 2 Kings 12:8; 22:5; Neh. 3:4–32, in connection with the repair of the Temple and, following the Exile, Jerusalem.

Carver. The rendering of six Heb. words meaning to engrave, sculpture, and carve. Carving was carried on to a great extent by the Egyptians both upon buildings and furniture. The arts of carving and engraving were much in demand in the building of the Tabernacle and the Temple (Ex. 31:5; 35:33; 1 Kings 6:18, 35; Ps. 74:6) as well as in the ornamentation of the priestly dresses. Carving of wood is mentioned (Ex. 31:5), and a detailed description of the process of idol making is given in Isa. 44:13. In the KJV and NASB the terms graved and graver sometimes appear in place of carved. The NIV usually reads “engraved,” or “engraver.”

Confectioner. See Perfumer, below; and also the articles Oils and Ointment; Perfume; Perfumer.

Dyer. This word does not occur in Scripture, but we have mention of dyed skin and of various colored curtains in the Tabernacle (Ex. 25:4–5; 26:14; etc.), and of Lydia, a seller of purple (Acts 16:14). The dyeing of purple was actively carried on, especially in Thyatira, and an inscription found there particularly mentions the guild of dyers of that place.

Nomadic society in Bible lands not only wove its own textiles but dyed them; however, commercial guilds of specialists existed in this field. Fragments of wooden looms and dyeing vats were found at Lachish in southern Judah. Clay loom weights were unearthed in some of the homes destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar. Long before Abraham’s time Canaanites wove and dyed fine textiles. At Tell Beit Mirsim (Kiriath-sepher) many loom weights were recovered along with an elaborate setup for cloth production. In Syria, at Ugarit, remains of a dyeing establishment were recovered. The Canaanites were especially skillful in extracting purple dyes from murex shells. Byblos on the Mediterranean was noted not only for its papyrus production but for its cloth manufacture. Weavers and dyers in ancient Sumer went through a long period of apprenticeship. Egypt was noted early for its superb linen. Fine awnings of blue, yellow, and light green were exported. Weavers’ beams (1 Sam. 17:7) have been found in biblical sites. Hebrews were more skillful at dyeing than almost any other art-craft. They used Tyrian murex shells, yielding purple reds, and vegetable dyes. Vegetable matter and indigo were employed from remote times. Pomegranate bark supplied black. Almond leaves yielded yellow. Potash, lime, and grape treacle yielded indigo. M.F.U.

Embalming (from Heb. hānat, “to spice”). The process of preserving a corpse by means of spices (Gen. 50:2–3, 26) was a distinct craft.

Egyptians. Egyptians preserved the body to keep it in a fit state to receive the soul that once inhabited it. The soul was thought to depend on the body for its future fortunes. Physical decomposition robbed the soul of some part of itself and was even thought to cease existence when the corpse had entirely disappeared. Hence the Egyptians made every possible effort to preserve the body. There were various kinds of mummification, determined by the financial ability of the deceased. During the Old Kingdom the internal organs were removed to canopic jars of marble or alabaster. The lids of those jars were shaped like an animal deity who was supposed to watch over the body. During the seventy-day process of mummification the brain was removed and a resinous paste inserted into the cranial cavity. The body was then entwined elaborately in linen. After bandaging, the body was put into a papyrus carton that was painted with elaborate religious symbols. Nobles were encased in three coffins. A mummy of a great pharaoh, like Tutankhamen, was inserted into a series of precious containers. That particular monarch was entombed in incredible splendor. The inner case of solid gold was inlaid with lapis lazuli, carnelian, and enamel. Gorgeous jewels and scarabs bearing a royal seal of the ruler were placed in early Egyptian tombs. Occasionally a scepter was placed in the hands of the deceased king. For a discussion of the process of mummification, see A. Lucas, Ancient Egyptian Materials and Industries. pp. 307–90.) Herodotus tells of a kind of embalming adopted by the poor. In this process they cleansed the body by an injection of synnoea and salted it for seventy days, after which time it was returned to the people who brought it.

Hebrew. Joseph’s and Jacob’s embalming after the manner of the Egyptians was exceptional (Gen. 50:2, 26). However, wealthy people did anoint the bodies of their loved ones with costly oil (John 12:7), and they wound them in linen with aromatic spices (19:39). See Burial. M.F.U.

Embroiderer. Weaving, plain sewing, and artistic needlework were practiced among the Hebrews as well as among their neighbors (Ex. 28:39; 35:35; 38:23; Judg. 5:30; Ps. 45:14). Long before Abraham's time the Canaanites wove fine textiles and had a flair for vivid colors. Remains of a dyeing establishment have been uncovered at Ugarit. Byblos and other Phoenician coastal cities were famous for their woven cloth and garments. From murex shells purple-red dye was extracted. Tell Beit Mirsim has yielded ample evidence of developed weaving, dyeing, and artistic work on the loom. Mesopotamian mantles were commonly known for their beauty. Long before the time of Abraham, a Babylonian ruler might have his own private factory for weaving materials. Egypt was famous not only for its fine linen, which Flinders Petrie said was as fine in the First Dynasty (c. 2900 B.C.) as our modern linen, but also for exquisitely embroidered garments and tapestries. The Israelites first learned the art of embroidery in Egypt, and it would appear that certain families were distinct in the arts of weaving and embroidering, especially in the tribes of Judah and Dan (Ex. 35:30, 35; 1 Chron. 4:21). The OT especially refers to a high degree of artistic development in the priests' garments, the ephod, and the gold, blue, scarlet, and fine twined linen of the Tabernacle covering. Assyrian and Babylonian garments were mentioned as early as the time of Joshua (7:21) and were cited as articles of commerce by Ezekiel (27:24). See also Needlework; Weaving. M.F.U.

Glassworker. The Egyptians and Phoenicians made opaque glass early and developed the art of making vases, jewelry, bottles, etc. See the article Glass.

Goldsmith. The Hebrews called this technician "a refiner" (šōrēph; Mal. 3:2–3), a melter of gold (Neh. 3:8, 32; Isa. 40:19; 46:6; Jer. 10:9, 14; 51:17). From early times gold has been used in jewels.

Egyptian. Gold was known long before silver in Egypt. Silver came much later from Asia Minor and was known as "white gold" by Egyptian jewelers. Gold was dug from the eastern desert and the Egyptian wadis; its shining splendor attracted men before they knew how to write. Gold was commonly used in Egypt, even being covered with inlay of stones or enamel. King Tutankhamen's solid coffin and his death mask inlaid with precious stones and enamel are well-known examples of Egyptian extravagance in the use of this metal. The pendant of King Senwosret (c. 1887–1849 B.C.), found in the tomb of his daughter, Princess Sit Hat Hor Yunet, near her father's pyramid at el Lahun, is of gold lavishly inlaid with precious stones. The cartouche of the king is at the center. This was likely the pharaoh who occupied the throne when Israel entered Egypt.

Babylonian. The headdress of Queen Puabi of Sumerian Ur (c. 2500 B.C.), recovered from the Royal Tombs by Woolley, is a superb illustration of the work of Sumerian-Semitic artists who were executing their finest work in gold during the third millennium B.C. The gold flowers springing from the "Spanish comb," the band of golden leaves, the heavy golden earrings, and the various necklaces done in semiprecious stones give us a good idea of the wonderful skill of the Sumerian goldsmiths. Also, glyptic artists or engravers produced solid gold cylinder seals with fine intaglio designs. These show exquisite artistic beauty as well as a vast variety of golden cups, helmets, and other objects. Gold and electrum (pale gold) objects from Mesopotamia and Tepe Gawra would grace any artistic display of the present day. In ancient oriental kingdoms special quarters were given over to the goldsmiths, who created fashionable articles for the court and sacred vessels for the temples.

Biblical. In the OT, anklets, bracelets, diadems, necklaces, nose rings, earrings, finger rings, crowns, coronets, camel crescents, gold hair nets, pendants, perfume boxes, jewelry boxes, and amulets are mentioned. Solar discs and lunar crescents (cf. Isa. 3:18) have been excavated at Ras Shamra, ancient Ugarit. Amulets or magical pendants to ward off evil spirits were common. The Jewish priest's ephod (Ex. 39) had four rows of three stones each, one gem representing each of the twelve Israelite tribes. Mentioned in the first row are "ruby, topaz, and emerald," in the second row "a turquoise, a sapphire and a diamond," in the third row "a jacinth, an agate, and an amethyst," and in the fourth row "a beryl, an onyx, and a jasper." They were enclosed in settings of gold filigree. Gems of gold fastened the splendid breastplate to the high priest's ephod at the shoulders (39:20–21). The lavish jewel finds at Ur, the home of Abraham, and other Mesopotamian cities make the account in Exodus thoroughly credible. The golden calf (chap. 32) wrought out of the people's "articles of silver and articles of gold" is another example of the art of the goldsmith among the Hebrews. Rebekah's jewelry consisted of a "gold ring weighing a half-shekel and two bracelets for her wrists weighing ten shekels in gold" (Gen. 24:22, 30). Saul and Jonathan had jewels of beauty. In 2 Sam. 1:10 the Amalekite says concerning the slaying of Saul: "And I took the crown which was on his head and the bracelet which was on his arm, and I have brought them here to my lord." David's royal jewels included not only a crown but buckles, shields, and spears. His vast bounty, a result of his conquests, enabled him to accumulate a fortune in jewels and gave his son Solomon a start on his splendid reign (cf. 1 Chron. 28–29). To the vast wealth in gold and precious stones inherited from his father, Solomon added great quantities of metal and precious stones acquired by tribute, exploitation, marriage dowries, and his own business enterprises in spice trade, horses, copper mining in the Arabah, and trade at Ezion-geber. A vast influx of gold especially characterized his reign. M.F.U.

Figurative. The skill of a goldsmith lies in the subtlety of his art, and with this the use of the word in Prov. 6:18 agrees: "A heart that devises wicked plans" (cf. 1 Sam. 23:9; lit., to "forge"). In the verse, "Behold, I have inscribed you on the palms of My hands" (Isa. 49:16), there is an allusion to the ancient custom of puncturing ornamental figures and mementoes upon the hand, arm, and forehead, and coloring the punctures with indigo, cypress, etc. This gives us the figure of Zion being as close to God as He is to Himself, and facing Him amid all the emotions of His divine life.

Graved, Graver. See Carver, above.

Launderer (Heb. kābas, to "wash"; Gk. gnapheus, a clothes "dresser"). The art of the launderer is of great antiquity and seems to have, at an early period, reached a comparative degree of perfection. Many persons, both men and women, were engaged in cleaning cloths and items of various kinds, and the occupations of the launderer form some of the subjects of Egyptian sculptures. It is probable that they were only a subdivision of the dyers. The trade of the launderers, so far as it is mentioned in Scripture, appears to have consisted chiefly in cleansing garments and whitening them (Mark 9:3; KJV renders "fuller"). The process of cleansing cloth consisted in treading or stamping on the garments with the feet or with bats in tubs of water, in which some alkaline substance (soap) had been dissolved. In early times before and even after the invention of soap, potash, niter, and several earths were employed for cleaning cloths, as well as various herbs, many of which are still in use among the Arabs. The "fuller's field" (2 Kings 18:17; Isa. 7:3; 36:2, see marg.) was near Jerusalem, and its mention would seem to indicate that it was a well-known resort of this craft. The KJV renders "fuller" in place of NASB "launderer." See also the articles Fuller's Field; Soap; Mineral Kingdom: Niter.

Leatherworker (Heb. ôr; Gk. dermatinos, Matt. 3:4). The probability is that the Israelites obtained much of their knowledge of the making of leather from the Egyptians. Part of the process of curing skins is introduced in the sculptures, and that of dyeing them is mentioned in the Bible (Ex. 25:5). In one instance a man is represented dipping the hide into a vase, probably containing water, in which it was left to soak, preparatory to lime's being applied to remove the hair, a process similar to that adopted at the present day in the East. The tanning and preparation of leather was also a branch of art in which the Egyptians displayed considerable skill; the leather cutters constituted one of the principal subdivisions of the fourth class, and a district of the city was exclusively appropriated to them in the Libyan part of Thebes. Of leather they made thongs, shoes, sandals, the coverings and seats of chairs or sofas, bow cases, and most of the ornamental furniture of the chariot; harps were also adorned with colored leather, and shields and numerous other things were covered with skin prepared in various ways. Reference is made (2 Kings 1:8; Matt. 3:4) to girdles of leather.

Mason. See Stoneworker, below; and also the article House in the general listing.

Metalworker. There were workers in metal throughout the ancient world.

Egyptian. Metal working and mining developed early in Egypt. In the Pyramid Age (c. 2900–2450 B.C.) skilled metal workers were producing ingenious bronze rip saws, often six feet in length, for heavy woodwork. The huge pyramid stone blocks were cut by special saws. Vast quantities of gold for Egypt's skillful goldsmiths were imported from E African Punt. Egyptian craftsmen made wide use of copper, perhaps unintentionally alloyed at the earlier periods. As early as the First Dynasty, Egyptians pioneered in the copper-rich Sinai Peninsula. They developed skill in copper smelting and compounding metals, evidently knowing the value of alloys. Egyptians had slave labor imported from Midian and Edom who worked first in the Sinai copper mines and later in the turquoise mines, well known from the First Dynasty on. The famous Queen Hatshepsut, who lived c. 1500 B.C. and was evidently the contemporary of Moses, cultivated the turquoise mines of Sinai. In this Sinai region occurs an early alphabetic script. What is most interesting is that Moses himself is said to have written in this very region.

Mesopotamian. Like the Egyptians, the early non-Semitic Sumerians before 3000 B.C. and later the Semitic Babylonians developed high skill in various types of metal work. Their work in gold is now well known. They also used copper; later, bronze; and finally, iron. Sacred and nonsacred utensils, tools of every description, weapons, idols, and ornaments have been uncovered in great quantities.

Israelite. References to metals in the OT are numerous. Gold, silver, iron, and copper-bronze appear frequently on its pages. Gold, silver, and copper were used in the Tabernacle. David took vast quantities of copper in war.

Iron was introduced into Israel in the period of Saul who, as a result of his victories over the Philistines, broke their tight monopoly on this important metal (1 Sam. 13:19–20). The iron-smelting formula became public property, and metal was popularized in Israel. This worked an economic revolution in Palestine, making possible a higher standard of living. It is not surprising, therefore, to read that in amassing materials supplied to Solomon for the building of the Temple, "David prepared large quantities of iron to make the nails for the doors of the gates and for the clamps" (1 Chron. 22:3). Mention is also made of saws, sharp instruments, and axes (20:3). For the working of metals, three different trades were developed early in Israel: that of the worker in iron (Isa. 44:12; 2 Chron. 24:12), the worker in bronze (1 Kings 7:14), and the worker in gold and silver (Judg. 17:4; Jer. 10:9, 14). We read of axes and other iron instruments (Num. 35:16; Deut. 19:5; 27:5), whereas vessels and cooking utensils were of copper. The working (hammering) of iron was known to the patriarchs. In later times arms and other things formerly made of copper, such as chains, bolts, and armor, were made of iron (cf. Judg. 16:21 with Job 20:24; Pss. 107:16; 149:8; Isa. 45:2). Copper working apparently was not older than that of iron, both originating with Tubal-cain (Gen. 4:22). Copper ore, found more frequently solid in large masses and easier to work than iron ore, was more widely spread in earlier ages. Smelted ore was in use by at least 2500 B.C. in the Ararat region. Bronze was used for all sorts of vessels, weapons, armor, mirrors (Ex. 38:8), and statues (Dan. 5:4, 23). Casting was certainly known and practiced among the Hebrews (Judg. 17:4; 1 Kings 7:46; 2 Chron. 4:17). In the last two passages we are told that the workmen employed by Solomon cast the metal vessels, etc., of the Temple in the clay soil of Jordan. See also Refiner, below.

Needlework (Heb. riqmâ, Judg. 5:30; Ps. 45:14, “embroidered work”; rôqēm, Ex. 26:36; 27:16; 28:39; 36:37; 38:18). It is best to understand this as colored weaving, i.e., stuff woven from yarn of different stripes or cubes; as distinguished from “the work of a skillful workman,” i.e., artistic weaving in which figures, flowers, and in some instances gold thread were woven (26:1, 31; 28:6, etc.). See Embroiderer; Weaver.

Perfumer. A person whose business it was to compound ointments in general was called an apothecary or perfumer (Neh. 3:8). The work was sometimes carried on by women (1 Sam. 8:13). Originally the “anointing oil” was prepared by Bezalel (Ex. 31:11; 37:29), after which it was probably prepared by one of the priests. Not least in importance of the duties of an ancient perfumer was the mixing of medicinal herbs. Babylonia, Egypt, and other areas of the Bible world developed the medical arts early. A clay tablet excavated in Nippur in lower Babylonia between the Tigris and the Euphrates gives a formula for a balsam salve prescribed for a metal worker who lived centuries before Abraham and suffered from burns. Perfumers also prepared spices for burials (2 Chron. 16:14).

The perfumes used in the religious services and in later times in the funeral rites of monarchs imply specialized knowledge and practice in the art of the perfumers, who appear to have formed a guild or association (Ex. 30:25, 35; Neh. 3:8; 2 Chron. 16:14; Eccles. 10:1). See Ointment; Perfume in the general listing.

The orientals delighted in perfumes and cosmetics. Especially in Egypt a knowledge of fragrant spices and oils was cultivated. The carved back of the chair of King Tutankhamen in the Cairo Museum shows the queen placing the finest perfume on the shoulder of the young king. From the ornate tomb of Queen Puabi of Ur, during the third millennium B.C., on down to noble ladies of many lands, examples survive of the perfumer’s art, and toiletry sets from the dressing rooms of many ancient queens have survived to illustrate the development of the beautician’s art. The spice and frankincense trade of the ancient world built up enormous wealth. Moses and the Israelites learned much from the perfume industry of Egypt.

Sacred Incense. Moses, in giving the formula for incense to be used exclusively in the Tabernacle, specified as follows: “Take ... spices, stacte and onycha and galbanum, spices with pure frankincense; there shall be an equal part of each. And with it you shall make incense, a perfume, the work of a perfumer, salted, pure, and holy” (Ex. 30:34–36). Stacte was a gum resin exuded from the storax tree. Onycha was probably related to benzoin. Galbanum was a brown-yellowish resin exuded from a carrotlike plant found in the ancient East. Frankincense was a white aromatic gum secreted from trees related to the terebinth, found in SW Arabia, Abyssinia (Ethiopia), and India.

Sacred Anointing Oil. In the holy anointing oil (used in the Tabernacle) the “finest of spices” were enumerated in Ex. 30:22–25 as “flowing myrrh,” “fragrant cinnamon,” “fragrant cane,” “cassia,” “and of olive oil a hin. And you shall make of these a holy anointing oil, a perfume mixture, the work of a perfumer; it shall be a holy anointing oil.” Myrrh was made from an aromatic resin exuded from a balsamlike shrub that grows in parts of the Arabian desert or from Syrian-Palestinian rock roses. Punt, in E Africa, had groves of myrrh trees. Queen Hatshepsut’s sailors from Egypt in the fifteenth century B.C. were amazed to see native huts built among those groves. Sweet cinnamon was made from the bark of a tree known in the Solomonic era in Palestine and in Babylonia. Cassia was a type of cinnamon. Calamus, or sweet cane, came from a far country (Jer. 6:20). It is mentioned as a sweet smelling plant in the Song of Solomon (4:14). It is evidently of the flag family and thrives in damp places, as does the iris.

Other Perfumes. Spikenard (Syrian nard) was a highly valuable ingredient of ointments. It may have come from the pasturelands of the Himalayas. At any rate, it was extremely expensive. Judas criticized the extravagance of Mary when she anointed Christ's feet with it (John 12:3–8). Henna, or camphire, a yellow-flowered shrub furnishing ancient dyeing matter for finger- and toenails, was often mixed with spikenard. Aloes may be Indian sandalwood or, as believed by some, the gum of the eagle tree of India. Mixed with myrrh and cinnamon, it was a highly valued perfume (Ps. 45:8; Prov. 7:17).

Potter. Pottery making is one of the oldest crafts of civilized man. The art of ceramics was invented at the close of the Late Stone Age in the Near East, perhaps as early as 5000 B.C. The simple pottery fragments that have survived the millennia tell a story of the tastes and destinies of nations. Recovered pottery fragments are one of the best allies of the archaeologist in dating ancient civilizations and identifying strata of culture from varied mounds. Archaeologists identify ancient cultures by the type of pottery unearthed. For example, in Mesopotamia the exquisite Halafian ware (c. 4500–4000 B.C.) from Tell Halaf marks a specific culture. Samarran ware, found at Samarra on the Tigris, dates c. 3800 B.C. Characteristic Obeidan pottery from Tell Obeid near Ur marks civilization c. 3500 B.C. Warkan ware from Erech (Uruk) dates around 3200 B.C. Jemdet Nasr ware dates c. 3200–3000 B.C. The invention of the pottery wheel marked a revolution in ancient cultures and paralleled the beginning of the historical period in Egypt (c. 3000 B.C.). At Lachish in S Judah a potter's workshop with a simple pottery wheel dating from c. 1500 B.C. was unearthed. Pottery found at Jericho, at Ugarit, at Megiddo, and practically all other Palestinian sites illustrates the biblical notices of this ancient craft. The Israelites, of course, had pottery in the wilderness. Biblical references to this craft occur in Isa. 45:9 and Jer. 18:3–6. At Jerusalem there was a royal establishment of potters (1 Chron. 4:23) from whose employment, and from the fragments cast away in the process (Isa. 30:14), the Potter's Field perhaps received its name (Matt. 27:7, 10).

Figurative. There are several allusions to both the potter and his products. The breaking of pottery is used, from its fragile nature, to illustrate the ease with which God punishes the wicked (Ps. 2:9; Isa. 30:14; Jer. 19:11); from its cheapness, the depreciation of good men (Lam. 4:2). The thorough acquaintance of the potter with both the clay and the vessel that he made from it is used to illustrate God's knowledge of humanity. The power of the potter in molding the clay is used to illustrate the absolute power of God in molding the destinies of men (Rom. 9:21). To place one's self as clay in the hands of God, as the potter, is a striking figure of complete trust and surrender (Isa. 64:8). The phrase "throw it to the potter" (Zech. 11:13) is apparently a proverbial expression for contemptuous treatment, although we have no means of tracing its origin satisfactorily. "As the words read, they can only be understood as signifying that the potter was in the house of Jehovah when the money was thrown to him: that he had either some work to do there, or that he had come there to bring some earthenware for the temple kitchens" (see 14:20; K. & D., Coms, ad loc.). M.F.U.

Refiner. Refining in Scripture was of liquids and metals, and the processes were quite different. In respect to liquids the primary idea was that of straining or filtering, the word for which was zāqaq; but in respect to metals it was that of melting, and for this the word was šārap. But the first word also, in course of time, came to be used of gold or other metals to denote their refined or pure state (1 Chron. 28:18; 29:4). The refiner's art was essential to the working of the precious metals. It consisted in the separation of the dross from the pure ore, which was effected by reducing the metal to a fluid state by the application of heat and by the aid of solvents, such as alkali (Isa. 1:25) or lead (Jer. 6:29), which, amalgamating with the dross, permitted the extraction of the unadulterated metal. The instruments required by the refiner were a crucible or furnace and a bellows or blow pipe. The workman sat at his work (Mal. 3:3); he was thus better enabled to watch the process and let the metal run off at the proper moment. The Egyptians carried the working of metals to an extraordinary degree of perfection; and there is no doubt that the Hebrews derived their knowledge of those arts from this source, though there is evidence that the art of working in copper and iron was known before the Flood (Gen. 4:22). See also Metalworker, above.

Rope. Ropes and various kinds of twine were made by the ancients of flax and other materials. For large ropes of ordinary quality and for common purposes, the fibers of the date tree were employed by the Egyptians as at the present day, and many specimens of these durable materials have been found in the excavations of Upper and Lower Egypt. In a tomb at Thebes, of the time of Thutmose III, is represented the process of twisting thongs of leather, which is probably the same as that adopted in rope making.

The Scripture references to rope are but few: the binding of Samson with ropes by Delilah (Judg. 16:11–12); in Ahithophel's counsel to drag down with ropes the supposed place of David's retreat (2 Sam. 17:13); the servants of the defeated Syrian king, Ben-hadad, coming to Ahab with ropes around their necks (1 Kings 20:31–32) as a sign of absolute surrender; and in the account of Paul's shipwreck (Acts 27:32).

Figurative. Isaiah directs a woe against those guilty of impiety: "Woe to those who drag iniquity with the cords of falsehood, and sin as if with cart ropes" (5:18). "There is a bitter sarcasm involved in the bold figure employed. They were proud of their unbelief, but this unbelief was like a halter with which, like beasts of burden they were harnessed to sin, and therefore to the punishment of sin, which they went on drawing farther and farther, in ignorance of the wagon behind them" (Delitzsch, Com, ad loc.).

Shipbuilder. The Hebrews were not a seafaring or shipbuilding people but seafaring occupations were prominent in the great empires on the Nile, Tigris-Euphrates, and the Phoenician coastal cities.

Egyptian. The Egyptians were the earliest Mediterranean boat builders, with the Phoenicians of Byblos running a close second. Small flat-bottomed boats were useful for fishing and fowling in the Delta marshes. Large barges transported stone from Upper Egypt. Trading boats toured the river, as well as funeral barges that carried mummies and tomb adornments along the river. Some of the barges were sacred to the sun god. During the third millennium B.C. the Egyptians sailed oceangoing vessels to Phoenicia regularly, especially to obtain forest products.

Phoenician. The Phoenicians developed early a reputation for their boats and skill in manning them. Although these were often no larger than coastal New England fishing boats, they carried on extensive trade over all the Mediterranean. With masts of cedar, flooring of fir, oars of oak, rowing benches of ivory inlaid with boxwood, and sailcloth made in the looms of Egypt, these vessels put out from Sidon, Arvad, and Tyre. In the Solomonic era (c. 960 B.C.) Phoenician boat builders and mariners were employed by the Hebrew monarch to develop a fleet at Ezion-geber to carry goods to S Arabian and N African ports.

Mesopotamian. At an early period the Sumerians, and later the Babylonians, built boats of reed basketwork caulked with bitumen. The Assyrians constructed skin boats and rafts of timber by the eighth century B.C. These were precursors to the guffahs, which still sail the Euphrates. The seaborne traffic for Babylon, which arrived through the Persian Gulf from India and Africa bringing exotic spices and luxury articles, consisted of wooden boats not drastically different from the Phoenician and Egyptian craft.

Greek. By 600 B.C. the Greeks were developing distinctive boats, making improvements on Egyptian and Phoenician models. Bow and stern were turned up. Corinthian warships were double-decked, one deck for rowers and the other for fighters. Their ships were large, requiring anchors and employing slave labor.

Biblical. The tribe of Dan apparently had ships (Judg. 5:17). Solomon's fleet (1 Kings 9:26–28) takes a prominent place, but it was an unusual feature of Solomon's prosperity and splendor. Ferryboats crossing the Jordan are mentioned (2 Sam. 19:15, 18, KJV). The Galilean fishing boats in which Jesus went back and forth across the sea of Galilee are prominent in the gospels. The ships in which the apostle Paul sailed in his Mediterranean missionary journeys are mentioned conspicuously in the book of Acts. M.F.U.

Stoneworker. Stone work of various kinds was familiar in the ancient world.

Egyptians. The Egyptians, at a remote period, used stone implements; and we find that stone-tipped arrows continued to be used occasionally for hunting long after the metal head had been adopted. Examples of stone knives used for certain religious purposes have also been found in excavations and tombs.

“The most ancient buildings in Egypt were constructed of limestone, hewn from the mountains bordering the valley of the Nile; but so soon as the durability of sandstone was ascertained the quarries of Silsilis were opened, and these materials were universally adopted. Immense blocks of stone were quarried here and transported to their destined localities. The obelisks transported from the quarries of Syene, at the first cataracts, to Thebes and Heliopolis, vary in size from seventy to ninety-three feet in length. Small blocks of stone were sent from the quarries by water to their places of destination in boats or on rafts, and if any land carriage was required, they were placed on sledges and rollers; but those of very large dimensions were dragged the whole way by men, overland.... The immense weight of stone shows that the Egyptians were well acquainted with mechanical powers and the mode of applying a locomotive force with the most wonderful success.... The hieroglyphics on obelisks and other granite monuments are sculptured with a minuteness and finish which is surprising, even if they had used steel as highly tempered as our own” (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, 2:156, 300ff.).

Hebrews. Stone work among the Hebrews consisted of the hewing and smoothing of stones and marble for great buildings. They were also skillful in cutting and engraving precious stones for ornaments (Ex. 35:33). From the fact that David secured masons from Hiram (2 Sam. 5:11; 1 Chron. 14:1), we infer that the Hebrews were not as skillful as the Tyrians.

As will be seen from the above, the ancients employed substantially the same appliances as are used in working stone today, and the great pyramids, temples, aqueducts, etc., of the East testify to the workmen's skill.

Tailor. See the article Dress in the general listing.

Tanner. A dresser of hides (Acts 9:43). The art of treating skins of animals was widely cultivated in antiquity. It was known by the Hebrews (Ex. 25:5). The Egyptians were adept at it. Ancient Egyptian literature gives an insight into the process of tanning. A three-day treatment with salt and flour cleansed the skins from foreign matter. Lime was used to remove the hair. The acrid juices of desert plants or oak bark were also used. The skin was dried for several days and treated with acid barks and leaves such as sumac. Hebrews and Egyptians and other ancient peoples used leather for various purposes—for tent coverings (26:14), for water containers (Gen. 21:14), for milk (Judg. 4:19, see marg.) and wine (Matt. 9:17), for oil and other liquids. It was also used for shields, the leather being oiled to keep it soft and pliable (2 Sam. 1:21; Isa. 21:5). Various articles of clothing were also made of leather. Elijah and John the Baptist wore leather garments (2 Kings 1:8; Matt. 3:4). Sandals, shields, and helmets were also prepared. Another common use was leather finely treated for writing parchment. The art of tanning, although necessary, was a malodorous task and one that was regarded as unclean by many who recognized certain animals as unclean. Thus, under Judaism, tanners had to live outside the city, often near the water, like Simon the tanner who lived by the seashore at Joppa (Acts 10:6). It is highly significant in the context of 9:43 and 10:9–23 that Peter lodged with Simon the tanner. This is an element in the narrative showing the divine dealing with the apostle of the circumcision in overcoming the Judaistic horror of the ceremonially unclean. The entire Acts narrative displays God's working with Peter to break down his prejudices against the Gentiles and to prepare him for the scene and sermon in Cornelius's house when the gospel was opened to the Gentiles. See Leatherworker.

Tools. Metalworkers used the anvil, hammer (Isa. 41:7), tongs, chisel or graving tool (Ex. 32:4), bellows (Jer. 6:29), melting or refining pot (Prov. 17:3), and for large castings, the furnace (Ezek. 22:18).

Weaver, Weaving. Weaving was common in almost every home in Palestine in Bible times. Families wove their own textiles, from common articles of dress to coarse tent cloth. Woolen looms and dyeing vats were uncovered in excavation at Lachish in southern Judea and other places. The Canaanites, long before the arrival of the Hebrews, wove and dyed their own fabrics. Evidence of the weaver and dyer's art came from Tell Beit Mirsim, Ugarit, and Byblos, which was particularly famous for its woven materials, as well as many other places. Samson's "thirty linen wraps and thirty changes of clothes" (Judg. 14:12–13) indicate the activity of the weaving arts in the time of the Judges. Carpet looming was also common (Prov. 7:16).

The weaving of the common, coarser, and finer woolen, linen, cotton, and hair cloths into garments, covers, tent curtains, etc., was the business of the wives, as was the spinning of flax, wool, cotton, goat's and camel's hair (Ex. 35:25–26, 35; 2 Kings 23:7; Prov. 31:13, 19). But the art of weaving (Ex. 27:16), ornamented with flowers and figures, was performed by men, as well as the weaving of fine linen in which the sons of Shelah were engaged even in Egypt (1 Chron. 4:21). Hence the particular manipulations of this business were so generally known that in figurative language we often read of the weavers' beam (1 Sam. 17:7; 2 Sam. 21:19), the shuttle (Job 7:6), warp and woof (Lev. 13:47–59), etc. See also Embroiderer; Needlework, above. M.F.U.

Woodworker. Carpentry was employed in many ways by the Egyptians and the Israelites.

Egyptian. Carpenters and cabinetmakers were a numerous class of workmen, and their occupations form one of the most important subjects in the paintings that represent the Egyptian trades. From these we learn that the Egyptians used wood to make furniture (boxes, tables, sofas, chairs, etc.) and various parts of houses (doors, etc.). With the carpenters may be mentioned the wheelwrights, makers of coffins, and the coopers; and this subdivision of one class of artisans shows that they had systematically adopted the division of labor. The makers of chariots and traveling carriages were of the same class. Palanquins, canopies, and wooden chests for traveling and religious purposes were the work of cabinetmakers or carpenters; but the makers of coffins were distinct from both of these. The boat builders and basket makers were subdivisions of workers in wood. The occupation of the cooper was comparatively limited in Egypt, where water and other liquids were carried or kept in skins and earthenware jars; and the skill of the cooper was only required to make wooden measures for grain, which were bound with hoops of either wood or metal. Among the many occupations of the carpenter, that of veneering is noticed in the sculptures of Thebes as early as the time of the New Kingdom, about 1450 B.C.

Israelites. As among the Egyptians the carpenter, joiner, carver, sculptor, wagon maker, and basket maker all worked in wood. These trades were probably never strictly separated from one another. Mention of the first three is made in connection with the building of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25:9–28; 35:30–35; 37:1, 10, 15, 25). The Israelite leaders had covered wagons in the desert, which they probably brought from Egypt (Num. 7:3), and baskets are mentioned (Num. 6:15, 17, 19; Deut. 26:2, 4); but coopering is not mentioned at all.

Tools. Among the Egyptians, the usual tools of the carpenter were the ax, adz, handsaw, chisels of various kinds, the drill, and two sorts of planes (one resembling a chisel, the other, apparently of stone, acting as a rasp on the surface of the wood, which was afterward polished by a smooth body, probably of stone); and these, with the ruler, plummet, right angle (square), a leather bag containing nails, the hone, and the horn of oil, constituted the principal, and perhaps the only, implements used.

Among the Israelites the following tools for carpenters and joiners are incidentally mentioned: the ax, hatchet, saw, plane, level, compass (cf. Isa. 44:13), hammer, and pencil (or red lead).

HANDKERCHIEF (Gk. soudarion, “sweat-cloth”). A cloth used for wiping the perspiration from the face and for cleaning the nose (Luke 19:20; Acts 19:12). A similar “face-cloth” was also used for swathing the head of a corpse (John 11:44; 20:7).

HANDLE (Heb., plural kappôt, lit., “hands”). The thumb pieces or knobs of the bolt or latch to a door (Song of Sol. 5:5). See Lock.

HANDS, LAYING ON OF. This occurs in Scripture as a patriarchal usage, as with Jacob’s laying his hands upon the heads of Joseph’s children (Gen. 48:14). It also occurs in later times, as when Jesus placed His hands upon children presented to Him for His blessing (Matt. 19:15). The laying on of hands formed part of the ceremony observed at the appointment and consecration of persons, such as of Joshua by Moses (Num. 27:18–23; Deut. 34:9). It sometimes attended the healing of persons by a prophet, although in one instance (2 Kings 4:34) Elisha placed his hands upon the hands of the child. In the gospel age the action was, undoubtedly, used in connection with the bestowal of supernatural gifts, or the miraculous effects of the Holy Spirit (Mark 5:23, 41; 7:32), although our Lord extended His hands over the apostles when blessing them at the Mount of Olives (Luke 24:50). The apostles laid their hands upon the sick and healed them (Matt. 9:18; Mark 6:5, 13, etc.), and at times also laid their hands upon the baptized, that they might receive the special gifts of the Spirit (Acts 8:15–18; 19:6). A quite natural extension of this practice was to apply it to those who were set apart to the sacred office in the church—the men already possessed of delegated power and authority proceeding, like Moses in respect to Joshua, to put some of their own honor upon those chosen to the same responsible and dignified position (14:3; 1 Tim. 4:14). “Not that the mere act could confer any special spiritual power, but it was employed as a fit and appropriate symbol to denote their full and formal consent to the bestowal of the divine gift; and, being accompanied by prayer to Him who alone can really bestow it, might ordinarily be regarded as a sign that the communication had actually taken place.”

Ecclesiastical Uses. In the rites of the early church the laying on of hands was used in confirmation, which generally was an accompaniment of baptism and symbolized the reception of the Holy Spirit. It was also practiced in ordination (which see). In the modern church Roman Catholics use the laying on of hands in the ceremonies that precede extreme unction, in ordination, and in confirmation (in both of which services it has received a sacramental efficacy). In the mass, previous to the consecration of the elements, the priest extends his hands over the people in blessing. The Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal churches employ it as a symbolical act in baptism and confirmation. The Methodist, the Presbyterian, and the Congregational churches employ it only in ordination.

HANDSTAVES (Heb. maqṣēl, a “rod” or “staff”). A KJV term replaced in the NASB and NIV by “war clubs” (Ezek. 39:9). See Armor.

HANDWRITING. See Certificate of Debt.

HANES (ha'nez). A place in Egypt mentioned only in Isa. 30:4: “For their princes are at Zoan, and their ambassadors arrive at Hanes.” Hanes has been supposed by Vitranga, Michaelis, Rosenmüller, and Gesenius to be the same as Heracleopolis Magna in the Heptanomis. This identification depends on the similarity of the two names. Other scholars, however, are inclined to identify Hanes with Tapanhes, a fortified town on the eastern frontier. This is the identification of the Aram. paraphrase on the passage.

HANGING. See Punishment.

HANIEL. See Haniel, no. 2.

HANNAH (han'a; “grace, favor”). Wife of Elkanah (a Levite of Ephrath) and mother of Samuel. Although childless, she was much beloved by her husband. But she was greatly distressed by the insults of Elkanah's other wife, Peninnah, who had children. On one of her visits to Shiloh she vowed before the Lord that if He would give her a son, she would devote him to His service. Her manner, speaking in an inaudible tone, attracted the attention of the high priest, Eli, who suspected her of drunkenness. From this suspicion she easily vindicated herself, received a blessing from Eli, and returned to her home with a lightened heart. Before the end of the year Hannah became the mother of a son, whom she named Samuel, about 1106 B.C. When Samuel was old enough to be weaned Hannah took him to Shiloh and presented him, with due form, to the high priest (1 Sam. 1:1–28). The joy of Hannah found expression in an exulting song of thanksgiving. It is especially remarkable that in this song (2:10) is the first mention in Scripture of the word anointed or Messiah, and, as there was no king in Israel at the time, it seems the best interpretation to refer it to Christ. There is also a remarkable resemblance between this song and that of Mary (Luke 1:46–55). Hannah came up to Shiloh every year to visit Samuel and to bring him a coat. She received the kindly notice of Eli and, blessed of God, gave birth to three other sons and two daughters (2:21).

HAN'NATHON (han'a-thon; probably “favored”). A place on the northern boundary of Zebulun (Josh. 19:14), apparently about midway between the Sea of Galilee and Mt. Carmel, perhaps at Tell el-Bedeiwyeh.

HAN'NIEL (han'i-el; “grace of God”).

1. The son of Ephod, leader of the tribe of Manasseh, and one of those appointed by Moses to divide the land among the several tribes (Num. 34:23).

2. One of the sons of Ulla and a leader of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:39; “Haniel,” KJV).

HA'NOCH (ha'nok; dedicated, “initiated”).

1. The third son of Midian and grandson of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chron. 1:33), after 1950 B.C.

2. The oldest son of Reuben (Gen. 46:9; Ex. 6:14; 1 Chron. 5:3), from whom came “the family of the Hanochites” (Num. 26:5), perhaps about 1850 B.C.

HA'NOCHITES (ha'no-kīts). See Hanoch, no. 2.

HA'NUN (ha'nun; “favored”).

1. The son and successor of Nahash, king of the Ammonites (2 Sam. 10:1–5; 1 Chron. 19:2–6). David, who had received kindness from Nahash, sent an embassy to console Hanun on the death of his father, about 984 B.C. The young king, led by his courtiers, misapprehended the object of the mission and treated the ambassadors shamefully. Their beards were half shaven and their garments cut off at the middle, and in this plight they were sent back to David. After news was brought to the king of the affront, he commanded the ambassadors to remain in Jericho until their beards grew. He vowed vengeance, and Hanun, anticipating war, called to his aid the Syrians. The power of the Syrians, however, was broken in two campaigns, and the Ammonites were left to their fate.

2. A Jew who was associated with the inhabitants of Zanoah in repairing the Valley Gate of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 3:13), 445 B.C.

3. The sixth son of Zalaph, who repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:30), 445 B.C.

HAPHARA'IM (haf-a-ra'yim; “double pit”). A place near the borders of Issachar, mentioned as between Shunem and Shion (Josh. 19:19). Probably et-Taiyibeh, eight miles NW of Bethshan.

HAPPIZZEZ (hap'piz-zez). The head of the eighteenth division of the priests as established by David (1 Chron. 24:15).

HA'RA (hā'ra). A province of Assyria, mentioned (1 Chron. 5:26) as one of the localities to which Tiglath-pileser deported the 2½ trans-Jordanic tribes. Being joined with Hala, Habor, and the river of Gozan, all situated in western Assyria between the Tigris and Euphrates, we may safely conclude that Hara was in their neighborhood.

HAR'ADAH (har'a-da; “place of terror”). The twenty-fifth station of the Israelites in the desert (Num. 33:24); perhaps at the head of the valley NE of Jebel Araif en Nakah.

HA'RAN (ha'ran; cf. Akkad. harrānu, “road caravan route”).

1. One of the three sons of Terah, brother of Abraham, and the father of Lot, Milcah, and Iscah. He died in his native place (Ur) before his father, Terah (Gen. 11:26–29), probably before 2250 B.C.

2. The son of Ephah, a concubine of Caleb, and father of Gazez (1 Chron. 2:46), after 1440 B.C.

3. (Hebrew same as no. 1). One of the three sons of Shimei, a Gershonite, who was appointed by David to superintend the offices at the Tabernacle (1 Chron. 23:9), about 960 B.C.

HA'RAN, CITY OF. An ancient and still-existing northern Mesopotamian commercial city on the Balikh River, sixty miles from its entrance into the Euphrates. It was located in Paddan-aram (“field of Aram”). The city was on the busy caravan road connecting with Nineveh, Asshur, and Babylon in Mesopotamia, and with Damascus, Tyre, and Egyptian cities in the W and S. It was a natural stopping place for Terah and Abraham on their trek to Palestine. Interestingly, Haran, like Ur, was a center of the moon god cult. Whether Terah was a worshiper of the moon god Sin and refused to break with his idolatry is an open question (Gen. 11:31–32). At any rate, when Terah died at Haran, Abraham and his nephew Lot and their families continued their migration SW into Canaan, passing through the hill country of Shechem and on to Bethel. Abraham and his clan kept in touch with Haran. Isaac’s wife, Rebekah, was brought from Nahor, a neighboring city of Haran (chap. 24). Jacob’s wife Rachel also came from this region (chap. 29), where Jacob himself spent twenty years. The Mari Tablets, unearthed in excavations at Mari by the Musée du Louvre under the leadership of André Parrot, mention Nahor. These tablets belong to the eighteenth century B.C. Haran was also a flourishing city in the nineteenth and eighteenth centuries B.C., as is known from frequent references to it in cuneiform sources. Cuneiform tablets from Nuzu, a small Assyrian town SW of Kirkuk, greatly illuminate the patriarchal age. Such social usages as the deathbed blessing (chap. 27) and the use of concubines to ensure heirs (16:3) are referred to in the Nuzu Letters. The city of Haran remained important throughout the centuries. Here the Assyrians made their last stand (609 B.C.), and three years later the city fell to the Medes, who destroyed it and drove the Assyrians back across the Euphrates. M.F.U.

HA'RARITE (ha'ra-rit). The designation of three of David’s guard: Agee (2 Sam. 23:11), Shammah (2 Sam. 23:33), and Sharar (2 Sam. 23:33, “the ararite”) or Sacar (1 Chron. 11:35), the father of Ahiam, another member of the guard.

HARBO'NA (har-bō'na; Avestan, “the bald man”). One of the seven chamberlains of King Ahasuerus, commanded by him to exhibit the beauty of Queen Vashti to his courtiers (Esther 1:10). He also suggested to the king the hanging of Haman (7:9, “Harbonah”), about 478 B.C.

HARBO'NAH (har-bō'na; Esther 7:9). See Harbona.

HARDEN. “To harden one’s face” (Prov. 21:29, KJV); is to put on an impudent, shameless face; the NASB expression is “shows a bold face,” and the NIV, “puts up a bold front.” “To harden the neck” (Prov. 29:1, NASB, KJV; “stiffened their neck,” 2 Kings 17:14; Neh. 9:29, KJV) is to be stubborn, self-willed.

HARDNESS OF HEART (Matt. 19:8; Mark 3:5). Indicates a destitution of feeling, insensitivity to spiritual things, persistence in wrongdoing, wickedness; in common use—stinginess, solidity, firmness. In Ezek. 3:7 (see marg.) the reference is evidently to a moral hardening. To “harden” or “stiffen the neck” (2 Kings 17:14; Neh. 9:29; Prov. 29:1; etc.) is to be stubborn, self-willed.

HARE. See Animal Kingdom: Rabbit.

HA´REPH (ha´ref; “reproachful”). The “father” of Beth-gader and “son” of Caleb of Judah by one of his legitimate wives (1 Chron. 2:51), about 1190 B.C.

HA´RETH. See Hereth.

HARHA´IAH (har-ha´ya). The father of Uzziel, “of the goldsmiths,” which latter repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 3:8), 445 B.C.

HAR´HAS (har´has; 2 Kings 22:14). Given in 2 Chron. 34:22 as Hasrah (which see).

HAR´HUR (har´hur). One of the Temple servants whose posterity returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53), before 536 B.C.

HA´RIM (hā´rim; perhaps “consecrated, devoted, or flat-nosed”).

1. The head of the third course of priests as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:8), after 1000 B.C.

2. An Israelite whose descendants, to the number of 320 males, or 1,017 in all, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:32, 39; Neh. 7:35, 42), before 536 B.C. Among these some are enumerated (Ezra 10:21) as priests in the corresponding lists of those who renounced their Gentile wives and others (10:31) as ordinary Israelites. Others consider Harim to be a place and identify it with the village Charim, situated eight miles NE of Jaffa (McC. and S., Cyc.).

3. The father of Malchijah, who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:11), before 445 B.C.

4. One of the priests who signed the covenant of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:5), 445 B.C.

5. One of the leaders of the people who signed the covenant (Neh. 10:27), 445 B.C.

6. One of the priests who returned from Babylon (Neh. 12:15). In the former list the name is changed to Rehum (v. 3), about 536 B.C.

HA´RIPH (hā´rif; “autumnal”).

1. An Israelite whose descendants (or possibly a place whose inhabitants), to the number of 112, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:24), probably the same as Jorah (Ezra 2:18), before 536 B.C.

2. A leader of the people who gave his hand to the covenant made by Nehemiah (10:19), 445 B.C.

HARLOT, WHORE. Terms used for several Heb. words having similar connotations.

1. Harlot (Heb. zōnâ; Gk. pornē). Any woman, married or single, who practices unlawful sexual indulgence, whether for gain or lust (Gen. 34:31; Judg. 19:2; Prov. 23:27; Matt. 21:31–32; Luke 15:30; 1 Cor. 6:15–16). The term is usually rendered “prostitute” in the NIV. From Gen. 38:15 it would appear that such women were marked by a veil or by some peculiarity of its size or the method of wearing it; although Jahn (Bib. Arch., p. 141) thinks that all such women went without the veil and that Tamar assumed one for the purpose of concealing herself from her father-in-law. The representation given by Solomon shows that in his time prostitutes practiced their trade upon the “streets” (Prov. 7:6–23; 9:13–18).

2. Temple Prostitute (Heb. qāḏēshâ, “to consecrate”). In the three passages (Gen. 38:21–22; Deut. 23:17; Hos. 4:14), one “set apart to a sacred purpose,” according to the infamous rites in use among the worshipers of certain deities in Canaan and neighboring countries. Herodotus refers to the custom of the Babylonians, who compelled every native female to attend the temple of Venus once in her life and to prostitute herself in honor of the goddess. Such prostitution was forbidden by the law of Moses (Lev. 19:29; 21:9), yet it seems to have been assumed that the harlot class would exist, and the prohibition of Deut. 23:18 forbidding offerings from the wages of such sin is perhaps due to the influence of the heathen example. It is interesting to note that men were not excluded from the practice of temple prostitution (23:18, marg.).

3. Foreigner (Heb. nokrîyyâ, 1 Kings 11:1; Prov. 5:20; 7:5). There are different possibilities as to why there is a connection between foreign or “strange” (KJV) women and harlotry. One account seems to be that it refers to a man’s leaving his own rightful wife for another, who ought to be strange to him (Prov. 5:17–18, 20). Another explanation is that the earliest and most frequent offenders against purity were foreigners like the Midianite woman in the days of Moses (Num. 25), the Canaanites, and other Gentiles (Josh. 23:12–13).

Figurative. The term harlot, or prostitute, is used figuratively for idolatress (Isa. 1:21; Jer. 2:20; 3:2; Ezek. 16:13–63; Rev. 17:1, 5, 15; 19:2). See Adultery; Fornication.

HARMON (har´mon). A place name otherwise unknown or, more likely, a term to be translated “mountain of oppression” (Amos 4:3, marg.).

HARNE´PHER (har-ne´fer). One of the sons of Zophah, a leader of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:36).

HARNESS, HARNESSED. The act of fastening animals to a cart or vehicle, e.g., yoking cattle (1 Sam. 6:7, 10, “hitched”) or horses (Jer. 46:4). From the monuments we see that the harness of the Egyptian war chariots was of leather, richly decorated, many-colored, and studded with gold and silver.

HA´ROD (ha´rod; “trembling or terror”). The spring at which the test of drinking was applied before the battle of Israel with the Midianites (Judg. 7:1, 4–7). The well bursts out of the source “some fifteen feet broad and two feet deep, from the very foot of Gilboa.” It is identical with the present fountain Ain Jalud, a mile E of Jezreel, and opposite Shunem. The Israelis have built a beautiful park at the site.

HA´RODITE (ha´ro-dît). Shammah and Elika, two of David’s heroes (2 Sam. 23:25), were so called probably from their being natives of Harod (which see). In 1 Chron. 11:27 an error in writing gives us Harorite.

HAR´OEH (har´ō-e; 1 Chron. 2:52). See Reaiah.

HA´RORITE (ha´ro-rît; 1 Chron. 11:27). Another form for Harodite (which see), an epithet of Shammoth, one of David’s heroes.

HARO´SHETH-HAGGO´YIM (ha-rō´sheth-ha-goy´im). A city in the N of Palestine, the home of Sisera (Judg. 4:2, 13, 16). Harper thinks the name signifies “forests” and says “there still are the densely wooded slopes.” Easton says “the name in the Hebrew is Harosheth ha Gojim, i.e., ‘the smithy of the nations,’ probably so called because here Jabin’s iron war chariots, armed with scythes, were made.” Jabin’s great army gathered here preparatory to battle and defeat. It has been located at Tell ‘Amar on the northern bank of the Kishon, sixteen miles NNW of Megiddo, but excavations indicate that it was not occupied until the tenth century B.C. The KJV renders “Harosheth of the Gentiles.”

HARP. See Music.

HARROW (Heb. hōrēsh). The verb rendered “to harrow” (Job 39:10) expresses apparently the “breaking of the clods” (Isa. 28:24; Hos. 10:11), and is so far analogous to our harrowing, but whether done by any such machine as we call “a harrow” is doubtful.

The term harrow appears in the KJV of 2 Sam. 12:31; 1 Chron. 20:3; it is replaced in the NASB by sharp iron instruments, and in the NIV by iron picks.

HAR'SHA (har'sha; possibly "silent, dumb"). One of the Temple servants whose descendants returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:52; Neh. 7:54), before 536 B.C.
HART. See Animal Kingdom: Deer.

HA'RUM (ha'rūm; "exalted"). The father of Aharhel, the "families" of which latter are enumerated among the posterity of Coz, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:8).

HARU'MAPH (ha-rū'maf; "snub-nosed"). "Father" of Jedaiah, which latter was one of the priests who repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:10), 445 B.C.

HAR'UPHITE (har'ū-fīt). A patronymic applied to Shephatiah (1 Chron. 12:5), which denotes either one descended from Haruph, or a native of Hariph (which see).

HA'RUZ (ha'ruz; "gold," or cf. S. Arab; "be covetous or eager"). A citizen of Jotbah and father of Meshullemeth, who became the wife of King Manasseh and mother of King Amon (2 Kings 21:19), before 641 B.C.

HARVEST (Heb. qāṣîr, "a cutting"). The crops in the southern parts of Palestine and in the plains come to maturity about the middle of April, but in the northern and mountainous sections they do not become ripe until three weeks later, or more. The harvest began with the barley and the festival of the Passover (Lev. 23:9–14; Ruth 2:23; 2 Sam. 21:9–10) and ended with the wheat (Gen. 30:14; Ex. 34:22) and the festival of Pentecost (Lev. 23:16). See Agriculture.

Figurative. Harvest is a figurative term for judgment (Jer. 51:33; Hos. 6:11; Joel 3:13; cf. Rev. 14:15); a season of grace (Jer. 8:20); a time when many are ready to receive the gospel (Matt. 9:37–38; John 4:35); and, as the harvest is considered the end of the season, so our Lord says, "The harvest is the end of the age" (Matt. 13:39). Dew in harvest, causing the plants to ripen with rapidity and luxuriance, is a symbol of God's fostering care (Isa. 18:4); cold in harvest is refreshing, like a faithful messenger (Prov. 25:13); whereas rain in harvest, being untimely, is a symbol of honor given to a fool (26:1).

HASADI'AH (has-a-dī'a; "favored by Jehovah"). One of the five sons of Zerubbabel mentioned in 1 Chron. 3:20.

HASENU'AH (has-e-nū'a). An Israelite of the tribe of Benjamin, whose descendants dwelt in Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:7), before 536 B.C.

HASHABEI'AH (hash-a-bī'a; "Jehovah reckons, imputes").

1. The son of Amaziah and father of Malluch, of the family of Merari (1 Chron. 6:45).
2. The son of Bunni and father of Azrikam, of the family of Merari (1 Chron. 9:14; Neh. 11:15), before 445 B.C.
3. The fourth of the six sons of Jeduthun (1 Chron. 25:3), who had charge of the twelfth course of singers (v. 19), after 1000 B.C.
4. A Hebronite, appointed by David on the W side of Jordan "for all the work of the Lord and the service of the king" (1 Chron. 26:30), after 1000 B.C.
5. Son of Kemuel and chief officer of the Levites in David's time (1 Chron. 27:17), perhaps the same as no. 4.
6. One of the chief Levites who made voluntary offerings of victims for the Passover kept by King Josiah (2 Chron. 35:9), about 639 B.C.
7. One of the Levites who responded to the invitation of Ezra to act as a minister in the house of the Lord (Ezra 8:19), about 457 B.C.

8. One of the chief priests into whose care Ezra entrusted the silver, gold, and other valuables for the sacred vessels at Jerusalem (Ezra 8:24). He is probably the same whose father, Hilkiah, is mentioned in Neh. 12:21, 457 B.C.

9. The son of Mattaniah and father of Bani (Neh. 11:22), before 445 B.C.

10. A chief of the Levites (Neh. 12:24) who repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (3:17) and subscribed the covenant of fidelity to Jehovah (10:11), 445 B.C.

HASHABIAH. See Hashabeiah.

HASHAB'NAH (ha-shab'na; probably for Hashabiah). One of the leaders of the people who subscribed Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:25), 445 B.C.

HASHABNEI'AH (ha-shab-nī'a; "Jehovah has taken account").

1. The father of Hattush, which latter repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:10), before 445 B.C.

2. A Levite who was among those who officiated at the solemn fast under Ezra and Nehemiah when the covenant was sealed (Neh. 9:5), 445 B.C.

HASHBAD'DANA (hash-bad'da-na). One of those who stood at Ezra's left hand while he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), 445 B.C.

HA'SHEM (ha'shem). The sons of Hashem the Gizonite are named among the members of David's guard (1 Chron. 11:34; the Jashen of 2 Sam. 23:32), before 1047 B.C.

HASHMO'NAH (hash-mo'na). The thirtieth station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 32:29–30), near Mt. Hor. It was located, apparently, near the intersection of Wadi el-Jerafeh with Wadi el-Jeib, in the Arabah.

HA'SHUB. See Hasshub.

HASHU'BAH (ha-shū'ba; "esteemed"). One of the five sons of Zerubbabel (Keil, Com.), but according to some authorities the son of Pedaiah, the descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:20).

HA'SHUM (ha'shūm).

1. An Israelite whose posterity (or perhaps a place whose inhabitants), to the number of 223, came back from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:19), or 328 in all (Neh. 7:22). Seven men of them married foreign wives, from whom they separated (Ezra 10:33), before 536 B.C.

2. One of those who stood up with Ezra while he read the book of the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), about 445 B.C.

3. The head of a family who sealed the covenant made by Nehemiah and the people (Neh. 10:18), 445 B.C.

HASHU'PHA. See Hasupha.

HAS'RAH (has'ra). The father (or mother) of Tikvah or Tokhath and grandfather of Shallum, which last was husband of Huldah the prophetess (2 Chron. 34:22). The parallel passage (2 Kings 22:14) gives the name, probably by transposition, in the form Harhas. Hasrah is said to have been "keeper of the wardrobe," perhaps the sacerdotal vestments, before 639 B.C.

HASSENA'AH (has-en-a'a). A Jew whose sons rebuilt the Fish Gate during the repair of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:3), before 445 B.C. In Ezra 2:35; Neh. 7:38 the name is given without the article—Senaah (which see).

HASSENUAH. See Hasenuah.

HAS'SHUB (ha'shūb). The name of several OT persons. Except for 1 Chron. 9:14, the name is rendered "Hashub" in the KJV.

1. The son of Pahath-moab, and one of those who repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:11), 445 B.C. Perhaps he is the same person mentioned (10:23) as one of the Israelite leaders who joined in the sacred covenant of Nehemiah.

2. Another who assisted in the building of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:23), 445 B.C.

3. A Levite, son of Azrikam and father of Shemaiah, which last was one of those living in the "villages of the Netophathites," and having general oversight of the Temple (1 Chron. 9:14; Neh. 11:15), before 445 B.C.

HAS'SOPHEREETH (ha'sō-fe-reth). One whose "sons" were a family who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, among the descendants of Solomon's servants, about 536 B.C. Called Sophereth in the KJV of Ezra 2:55 and in the KJV, NIV, and NASB of Neh. 7:57.

HASU'PHA (ha-sū'fa). One of the Temple servants whose descendants returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46), before 536 B.C.

HAT (Dan. 3:21, KJV). A cap (so NASB) or type of headwear. The NIV renders "turban." See Dress.

HA'TACH. See Hathach.

HATE (Heb. śānē; Gk. miseō). In the root of the Heb. word is the idea of ugliness, deformity; hence to regard with feelings contrary to love; to abhor, to loathe, to cherish dislike to. In both the Heb. and Gk. words we find the above meaning in some places (e.g., 2 Chron. 18:7; Ps. 45:7; Matt. 24:10; etc.); whereas in others the meaning is "to regard with less love" (e.g., Prov. 13:24; Mal. 1:3; Rom. 9:13).

The requirement to hate father and mother, wife and children, and one's own life (Luke 14:26) means that all earthly ties and love must be subordinate to love for Christ.

God's hatred is toward all sinful thoughts and ways. It is a feeling of which all holy beings are conscious in view of sin, and is wholly unlike the hatred that is mentioned in the Scriptures among the works of the flesh (cf. Gal. 5:19–21).

HA'THACH (hā'thak). A eunuch in the palace of Ahasuerus, appointed to wait on Esther, and who acted for her in her communications with Mordecai (Esther 4:5–6, 9–10), about 478 B.C.

HA'THATH (hā'thath; "terror," as in Job 6:21). Son of Othniel and grandson of Kenaz, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:13), consequently also grandnephew and grandson of Caleb (v. 15; cf. Judg. 1:13), probably after 1170 B.C.

HATI'PHA (ha-ti'fa; Aram., "captive"). One of the Temple servants whose posterity returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:54; Neh. 7:56), before 536 B.C.

HAT'ITA (hat'i-ta; Aram., "dug up, furrowed"), or Hati'ta (hà-tī'tà). One of the gatekeepers whose descendants returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45), before 536 B.C.

HAT'TIL (hat'il). One of the descendants of "Solomon's servants" whose posterity returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59), before 536 B.C.

HAT'TUSH (hat'ūsh; derivation uncertain).

1. One of the sons of Shemaiah, among the posterity of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:22), after 536 B.C.

2. A descendant of David who accompanied Ezra to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:2), 457 B.C.

3. Son of Hashabneiah, and one of those who rebuilt the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:10), 445 B.C. Perhaps identical with no. 2.

4. One of the priests who united in the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:4), about 445 B.C.

5. A priest who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:2), 536 B.C.

HAURAN' (how-ran'; "hollow" or "black land of basaltic rock"). A mound-dotted extinct volcanic plateau E of the Sea of Galilee and S of Damascus and Mt. Hermon. This region has roughly the same boundaries as OT Bashan. The region is extremely fertile and forms a natural granary. Numerous ghost towns exist in its area, some of them constructed of basalt and called "the giant cities of Bashan." In later Greco-Roman times the area, smaller than formerly, was known as Auranitis. This was one of the four provinces that Augustus gave to Herod the Great (c. 23 B.C.). Subsequently it formed a part of Philip's tetrarchy. Ezek. 47:16–18 envisions Hauran as a boundary for restored Israel.

HAVEN. The rendering of two Heb. and one Gk. word, and having the meaning of our words port or harbor.

HAV'ILAH (hav'i-la; perhaps "sandy," cf. Heb. hōl, "sand").

1. A region encompassed by the Pishon branch of Eden's river. It is represented as richly producing gold, onyx, and bdellium—an aromatic gum (Gen. 2:11–12). This region is not to be confused with the Havilah of the Joktanites (10:29; 25:18; 1 Sam. 15:7) or of the Kushites (Gen. 10:7; 1 Chron. 1:9). It evidently skirted Babylonia and was on the boundary "as one goes toward Assyria."

2. A district evidently N of Sheba in Arabia, between Ophir and Hazarmaveth. Its people were nomads (Ishmaelites, Gen. 25:17–18). Apparently its boundaries were fluid and reached into N Arabia, as is indicated by the narrative of Saul's warfare with the Amalekites (1 Sam. 15:7).

3. The second son of Cush (Gen. 10:7; 1 Chron. 1:9).

4. The twelfth named of the thirteen sons of Joktan (Gen. 10:29; 1 Chron. 1:23). M.F.U.

HAV'VOTH-JA'IR (ha'voth-jā-ir; "huts or hamlets of jair"). A district of villages in Bashan, E of the Jordan, which the son of Manasseh took and called by his name (Num. 32:41).

Deut. 3:14 says that "Jair ... took all the region of Argob as far as the border of the Geshurites and the Maachathites, and called it ... Bashan, after his own name, Havvoth-jair" ("Bashan-havoth-jair," KJV). In Judg. 10:4 it is recorded that Jair the Gileadite and judge had thirty cities called Havvoth-jair.

HAZ'AEL (haz'a-el; "God beholds, i.e., cares for"). An officer of Ben-hadad, king of Syria, whom Elijah was commanded to anoint to be king (1 Kings 19:15).

When Elisha was at Damascus, Hazael was sent by his master, then ill, to consult the prophet respecting his recovery (2 Kings 8:7–13), about 843 B.C. The answer was that he "shall surely recover." "But," the prophet added, "the Lord has shown me that he will certainly die." He then looked steadily upon Hazael until he became ashamed, upon which the man of God wept. Upon Hazael's asking, "Why does my lord weep?" Elisha replied, "Because I know the evil that you will do to the sons of Israel," etc. Hazael exclaimed, "But what is your servant, who is but a dog, that he should do this great thing?" The prophet responded, "The Lord has shown me that you will be king over Aram."

Hazael returned and told Ben-hadad the prophet's answer. The next day he took a cloth, dipped it in water, and spread it over the face of the king, who, in his feebleness and probably in his sleep, was smothered and died what seemed a natural death (2 Kings 8:15).

Hazael ascended the throne and was soon engaged in hostilities with Ahaziah, king of Judah, and Jehoram, king of Israel, for the possession of Ramoth-gilead (2 Kings 8:28). A text from Asshur mentions the significant dynastic change at Damascus and strikingly confirms the biblical account of Hazael's accession: "Adadidri forsook his land [i.e., died violently or was murdered]. Hazael, son of nobody, seized the throne." Evidence from the stela of Ben-hadad from the region of Aleppo in N Syria, discovered in 1940, indicates that the Adadidri of this account is none other than Ben-hadad I and that the Ben-hadad in the biblical account is neither an error nor a gloss for Adadidri, as E. J. Kraeling surmises (Aram and Israel, pp. 77, 79, n. 1), but is the same person (Albright, Bulletin of the Am. Schools of Oriental Research 87:26).

Hazael was soon confronted by Jehu of Israel (c. 842–815 B.C.), a dangerous usurper like himself. Jehu incurred the implacable hatred of Hazael by submitting to Shalmaneser III in the Assyrian invasion of 841 B.C. rather than joining the Syrian coalition to resist the enemy's advance. Shalmaneser's Black Obelisk shows Jehu, or his emissary, kneeling before the Assyrian emperor presenting "tribute of Iaua [Jehu], son of Omri." Hazael single-handedly stemmed the Assyrian invasion of 841 B.C. and was able at least to ward off a crushing blow. Until 837 B.C., which marked Shalmaneser's final effort to subdue central and southern Syria, Hazael was free to satisfy his lust for territorial expansion. He began relentlessly to thresh Gilead and Bashan "with implements of sharp iron" (2 Kings 10:32–33; Amos 1:3–4).

Hazael renewed his relentless attacks upon Israel at Jehu's death (815 B.C.) and reduced his son Jehoahaz (815–801 B.C.) to an extreme stage of abasement (2 Kings 13:1–9, 22, 25). Hazael became so powerful that he took possession of the Philistine plain, destroyed Gath, and besieged Jerusalem. He was bought off by the payment of a large sum raised by stripping the Temple (12:17–18).

In extending his sway to the S, Hazael became the most powerful of the Aramean conquerors who ruled at Damascus. In fact, he became the chief power in all Syria. However, the reappearance of Assyria in the W under Adadnirari III (807–782 B.C.) demonstrated that Hazael's empire, built on brute force, lacked intrinsic solidarity. Whereas a unified Syria had met and checked Shalmaneser's advance under Ben-hadad I at Karkar in 853 B.C., Adadnirari's westward push gave no proof at all of such solidarity. Damascus did escape actual destruction but was put under an oppressive tribute. According to the Saba stela discovered in 1905, Adadnirari says, "To march against Aram I gave command. Mari' [Hazael] I shut up in Damascus, his royal city. One hundred talents of gold, 1000 talents of silver ... I received" (D. D. Luckenbill, 2, sec. 735). Even such countries as Bit Humri (Israel) and Palastu (Philistia) revolted in the crisis and sent tribute to Assyria. From the upper portion of a slab found at Nimrud (Calah), the cuneiform inscription of Adadnirari lists among other countries "Tyre, Sidon, Humri [Omriland, Israel], Edom, Palastu [Philistia]" as lands that he says "I brought into submission to my feet. Tribute and tax I imposed upon them" (Luckenbill, op. cit., sec. 739).

After an extended rule of at least forty years, Hazael died in 801 B.C., or slightly later. Adadnirari III, for the year 802 B.C. and likely several years earlier, names Mari' as a king at Damascus. This circumstance must be accounted for under the supposition that the term is a second name of Hazael and is merely a popular title of the kings of Damascus. According to Albright, it is an abbreviation of a name like Mari-hadad—"Hadad is my lord" (Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 87:28, n. 16). An inscription from an ivory recovered from the site of Arslan Tash in N Syria carries the name "Our lord Hazael" and dates from the time of Adadnirari III (F. Thureau-Dangin, A. Barrois, G. Dossin, and M.

Dunand, Arslan Tash, 1931, pp. 135–38). It is significant in computing the date of Hazael's death. Other similar ivories found at Nimrud are dated somewhat later since an Assyrian tablet of inventory lists them as booty from Damascus at the time of Hazael's successor (see C. C. McCown, The Ladder of Progress in Palestine, 1943, p. 198). M.F.U.

HAZA'IAH (ha-za'ya; "Jehovah beholds"). Son of Adaiyah and father of Col-hozeh, a descendant of Perez (Neh. 11:5), before 536 B.C.

HA'ZAR (ha'zar; an "enclosure"). A term frequently prefixed to geographical names in order to indicate their dependence as villages upon some town or noted spot. Gesenius (Heb. Lex., s.v.) says that Hazar is "spoken also of the movable villages or encampments of nomadic tribes, who usually pitch their tents in a circle, or so as to form an inclosure." The African Arabs, who originally emigrated from Arabia, have retained many of their ancestral customs. When these Arabs are in a region where they are liable to attacks from enemies, they pitch their tents in a circle, with their cattle and goods in the center. The whole is then fenced in with a low wall of stones, in which are inserted thick bundles of thorny acacia, the tangled branches and long needlelike spikes forming a perfectly impenetrable hedge around the encampment. See Hazaraddar, etc.

HA'ZARAD'DAR (ha'zar-ad'ar; "village of Addar"). A place in the southern desert part of Palestine, between Kadesh-barnea and Azmon (Num. 34:4; Josh. 15:3, where it is simply "Addar," or "Adar," KJV).

HA'ZAR-E'NAN (ha'zar-ē'nan; "village of fountains"). A village named as a boundary place (Num. 34:9–10; Ezek. 47:17; 48:1), probably located seventy miles ENE of Damascus and identified as Qaryatein on the road to Palmyra. "And the boundary shall extend from the sea to Hazar-enan at the border of Damascus" cannot have any other meaning than that the northern boundary, which started from the Mediterranean Sea, stretched as far as Hazar-enan, the frontier city of Damascus (Keil, Com., Ezek. 47:17).

HA'ZAR-GAD'DAH (ha'zar-gad'a; "village of fortune"; Josh. 15:27). A town in the extreme S of Judah. Perhaps identified with Khirbet Ghazza.

HA'ZAR-HATTICON. See Hazer-hatticon.

HA'ZARMA'VETH (ha'zar-ma'veth; "village of death"). One of the sons of Joktan (Gen. 10:26; 1 Chron. 1:20), or a district of Arabia Felix that was settled by him.

HA'ZAR-SHU'AL (ha'zar-shū'al; "village of jackals"). A town, the identifications of which are all supposition; some locate it at Khirbet el-Meshash, fifteen miles E of Beersheba. It was upon the S border of Judah (Josh. 15:28; Neh. 11:27) but afterward included in the territory of Simeon (Josh. 19:3; 1 Chron. 4:28).

HAZAR SUSAH (hā'zar su'sa). A town of unknown location included in the territory of Benjamin (Josh. 19:5).

HAZAR SUSIM (hā'zar su'sim). Another form of Hazar Susah (which see; 1 Chron. 4:31).

HAZ'AZON-TA'MAR (haz'a-zon-ta'mar). The ancient name of Engedi (Gen. 14:7; "Hazon-tamar," KJV; 2 Chron. 20:2).

HAZEL. See Vegetable Kingdom: Almond.

HA'ZER-HAT'TICON (ha'zer-hat'i-kon; "middle village"). Named in the prophecy of Ezekiel (47:16; "Hazar-hatticon," KJV) as the ultimate boundary of the land. Its location has not been ascertained.

HAZE'RIM (ha-ze'rim; "villages"). In the KJV, the name of a place (Deut. 2:23); or, perhaps, a general designation of many towns by the name of Hazor, or Hagar, found among the Avites (which see), in NW Arabia Petraea.

HAZE'ROTH (ha-ze'roth; "villages"). The sixteenth station of the Israelites and their second after leaving Sinai (Num. 11:35; 12:16; 33:17–18; Deut. 1:1). At Hazeroth the people "remained" (Num. 11:35), and here occurred the sedition of Miriam and Aaron (chap. 12), after which Israel moved to "the wilderness of Paran."

HA'ZIEL (ha'zī-el; "vision of God"). A "son" of the Gershonite Shimei, and head of the family of Ladan (1 Chron. 23:9), about 960 B.C.

HA'ZO (ha'zō). One of the sons of Nahor by Milcah (Gen. 22:22), after 2100 B.C. He must, in all likelihood, be placed in Ur of the Chaldees, or the adjacent countries.

HA'ZOR (hā'zor; "enclosure, village").

1. A chief city of N Palestine (Josh. 11:10), near Lake Huleh, and the seat of Jabin, a powerful Canaanite king who sent out a summons to the neighboring kings to assist him against Joshua (11:1–5). Like other strong places in Palestine, it stood on a mound or tell (v. 13), but the surrounding country was suitable for chariot maneuvers (see vv. 4, 6, 9; Judg. 4:3). Another Jabin king of Canaan, oppressed Israel, from whose yoke deliverance was obtained by Deborah and Barak; Hazor remained in possession of the Israelites and belonged to the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. 19:36; Judg. 4; 1 Sam. 12:9). It was one of the places that Solomon fortified and for which he made a tax levy (1 Kings 9:15). Its inhabitants were carried off to Assyria by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings 15:29; Josephus Ant. 9.11.1). Hazor is mentioned in the Amarna Letters (227:3 and 228:23).

Hazor was located nine miles N of the Sea of Galilee at Tell el-Qedah. It was the largest city in Palestine in OT times. At its peak in the fifteenth to fourteenth centuries B.C., it may have had a population of 40,000. Hazor consisted of a bottle-shaped mound about 130 feet high and covering 25 to 30 acres and a lower city of 175 to 200 acres. John Garstang excavated there briefly in 1928, and Yigael Yadin led a Hebrew University dig there from 1955 to 1958 and in 1968. The lower city was found to have had five levels of occupation. First settled in the mid-eighteenth century B.C., it was finally destroyed in about 1230 B.C. The last destruction Yadin dated to Joshua's days. In passing, it must be asked why Deborah and Barak could not have been responsible for the 1230 destruction and Joshua for an earlier destruction during the Amarna Period in the fourteenth century.

Settlement on the tell was found to begin in the twenty-seventh century. After the destruction of the Canaanite city in the thirteenth century, Yadin concluded that Israelites resettled the site. An unfortified town of the eleventh century was followed by Solomonic construction of walls and a gate during the tenth century. The gate complex is similar to those that Solomon built at Gezer and Megiddo. After Solomon's city was destroyed by fire, the House of Omri rebuilt the site in the ninth century, erecting a strong citadel and a number of public buildings. One of the latter, a large storehouse with two rows of pillars in the center, was mistakenly interpreted by Garstang as stables of Solomon's day. A large underground water system, on the same plan and larger than the one at Megiddo, was discovered on the mound's southern edge. This consisted of a vertical shaft with a rock-cut staircase dug one hundred feet into the tell where it entered an eighty-two-foot tunnel that led to water. The Omride citadel continued in use until the conquest and destruction by Tiglath-pileser in 732 B.C. H.F.V.

2. A city in the S of Judah (Josh. 15:23), perhaps Hezron, near Kadesh-barnea (v. 3). This is believed to have been the central town of that name, the other Hazors, Hazor-hadattah, etc., being so called probably for distinction's sake.

3. "The kingdoms of Hazor" (Jer. 49:28–33); probably a district of Arabia. "It may be a collective name, and refer to settled, not wandering Arabs, dwelling in strong farmsteads. The tents of these nomads, and the insignificant Bedouin villages, without doors and bars, present a strange contrast to the great cities of Syria, with their magnificent palaces (vv. 23–27); and yet even the former contain precious goods, tempting the foreigner's greed" (Orelli, Com., ad loc.).

4. A city inhabited by the Benjamites after the captivity (Neh. 11:33); possibly the modern Khirbet Hazzur, four miles NNW of Jerusalem. From the places mentioned with it, such as Anathoth, Nob, etc., it would seem to have been a little N of Jerusalem.

HA'ZOR-HADAT'TAH (hā'zor-ha-dat'a; "New Hazor," Josh. 15:25). One of the extreme southern towns of Judah; apparently el-Hudeira, SE of Tuwāni toward the Dead Sea.

HAZZELELPO'NI (haz-e-l-el-pō'ni), or rather, Zelelpo'ni (ze-l-el-pō'ni). The sister of Jezreel and others of the sons of Etam, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:3).

HAZZOBEBAH (hazōbē'ha). A descendant of Judah and son of Coz (or Koz) and grandson of Helah (1 Chron. 4:8).

HE (ה) (hā). The fifth letter of the Heb. alphabet, pronounced like English "h." In the Heb. of Ps. 119:33–40 each verse begins with this letter.

HEAD. This part of the body has generally been believed to be the seat of intelligence, whereas the heart, or the parts near it, were the place of the affections (Gen. 3:15; Ps. 3:3; Eccles. 2:14). In Scripture the head is sometimes used for the whole person (Gen. 49:26; Prov. 10:6), or for life itself (Dan. 1:10).

Customs. In grief the head was covered (2 Sam. 15:30; Esther 6:12), shorn (Job 1:20), sprinkled with dust (Josh. 7:6; Job 2:12) or ashes (2 Sam. 13:19), or the hands placed on it (13:19; Jer. 2:37). Shaving the head was forbidden to the priests and Nazirites (Lev. 21:5, 10; Num. 6:5). Lepers always went with the head uncovered (Lev. 13:45), and women generally covered the head in public (Gen. 24:65; 1 Cor. 11:5–6). The heads of criminals and enemies slain in war were often cut off (Judg. 5:26; 1 Sam. 17:51, 57; 31:9; Matt. 14:10). The KJV suggests that the head was bowed in worshiping God (Gen. 24:26; Ex. 4:31) and as a token of respect (Gen. 43:28).

Diseases. The head was liable to leprosy (Lev. 13:42–44), scabs (Isa. 3:17), and internal disease (2 Kings 4:19; Isa. 1:5). See Diseases.

Figurative. The head is illustrative of God (1 Cor. 11:3), of Christ (11:3; Eph. 1:22; Col. 2:19), of rulers (1 Sam. 15:17; Dan. 2:38), of chief men (Isa. 9:14–15); of the chief city of a kingdom (7:8). The covered head is a symbol of defense and protection (Ps. 140:7), or of subjection (1 Cor. 11:5, 10); made bald signifies heavy judgments (Isa. 3:24; 15:2; 22:12; Mic. 1:16); lifted up, of joy and confidence (Ps. 3:3; Luke 21:28); of exaltation (Gen. 40:13; Ps. 27:6); anointed, of joy and prosperity (23:5); shaking or wagging the head is a gesture of mockery at another's fall (Isa. 37:22) or misfortune (Ps. 22:7; Jer. 18:16; Matt. 27:39). According to Scripture the head is the noblest part of man. Because the human organism culminates in the head, Christ is called the "head of the church"; and for the same reason the head is the general metaphorical designation of him who is most exalted, the most excellent, the chief. He who blesses lays his hand upon the head of the person to be blessed, and he who consecrates on the head of the person to be consecrated. Precisely for the same reason tongues of fire are distributed on the heads of the apostles, as it was a heavenly laying on of hands.

HEADBAND (Heb. plural, qishshūrîm). The Heb. term is translated "attire" (Jer. 2:32) and "sashes" (Isa. 3:20) in the NASB. The NIV renders "wedding ornaments" and "sashes," respectively. See Dress.

HEADDRESS. See Dress.

HEAD OF THE CHURCH. On account of the intimate union that exists between Christ and the church He is called the head (Eph. 4:15; 5:23) and the church His Body (4:12; Col. 1:24), inseparably united. Not only does the church, as a Body, stand in need of Christ (Eph. 4:15–16; Col. 2:19), but the apostle ventures the bold expression that Christ also needs the church, as that which belongs to His completeness. Believers are baptized by the Holy Spirit into Christ (Rom. 6:3–4; Gal. 3:27) and into His Body. The figure of body and head is used more than any other to represent the service and manifestation of Christ through His redeemed people of this age. Christ is not only head of His mystic Body, the church, He is also head of the bride (Eph. 5:23–33). This last figure again presents the church in the unique relationship it sustains to Christ, which will be realized after its glorification and the marriage of the Lamb.

HEADSTONE. In Zech. 4:7 (KJV; NASB, "top stone"; NIV, "capstone") Christ, under the symbolism of a stone, is presented as the head of the corner (Acts 4:11; 1 Pet. 2:7). The whole company of believers is viewed as a building of God, composed of living stones, Christ being the cornerstone (Eph. 2:19–22). In the millennial age, toward which the golden candlestick of Zech. 4:1–7 points, Christ will be manifested also as the corner or headstone of the Temple of His restored covenant people Israel, the golden candlestick of 4:2 more specifically speaking of converted Israel as the light of the world in the Kingdom age. See Cornerstone.

HEART (Heb. mostly lēb; Gk. kardia). According to thorough investigation and evidence of Scripture in all its parts, the heart is the innermost center of the natural condition of man. The heart is: (1) the center of the bodily life, the reservoir of the entire life-power (Ps. 40:8, 10, 12) and indeed in the lowest physical sense, for eating and drinking, as strengthening of the heart (Judg. 19:5–6, 8–9; 1 Kings 21:7; Acts 14:17; etc.), becomes the strengthening of the whole man; (2) the center of the rational-spiritual nature of man; thus when a man determines upon anything, it is called to "presume" in his heart to do so (Esther 7:5, marg.); when he is strongly determined, he "stands firm in his heart" (1 Cor. 7:37); what is done gladly, willingly, and of set purpose, is done "obedient from the heart" (Rom. 6:17). The heart is the seat of love (1 Tim. 1:5) and of hatred (Lev. 19:17). Again, the heart is the center of thought and conception; the heart knows (Deut. 29:4; Prov. 14:10), it understands (Isa. 44:18; Acts 16:14), and it reflects (Luke 2:19). The heart is also the center of the feelings and affections: of joy (Isa. 65:14); of pain (Prov. 25:20; John 16:6); all degrees of ill will (Prov. 23:17; James 3:14); of dissatisfaction from anxiety (Prov. 12:25) to despair (Eccles. 2:20, KJV); all degrees of fear, from reverential trembling (Jer. 5:24) to blank terror (Deut. 28:28; Ps. 143:4); (3) the center of the moral life; so that all moral conditions, from the highest love of God (Ps. 73:26) even down to the self-deifying pride (Ezek. 28:2, 5–6), darkening (Rom. 1:21), and hardening (Isa. 6:10; 63:17; Jer. 16:12; 2 Cor. 3:15) are concentrated in the heart as the innermost life circle of humanity (1 Pet. 3:4). The heart is the laboratory and origin of all that is good and evil in thoughts, words, and deeds (Matt. 12:34; Mark 7:21); the rendezvous of evil lusts and passions (Rom. 1:24); a good or evil treasure (Luke 6:45); the place where God's natural law is written in us (Rom. 2:15), as well as the law of grace (Isa. 51:7; Jer. 31:33); the seat of conscience (Heb. 10:22; 1 John 3:19–21); the field for the seed of the divine word (Matt. 13:19; Luke 8:15). It is the dwelling place of Christ in us (Eph. 3:17); of the Holy Spirit (2 Cor. 1:22); of God's peace (Col. 3:15); the receptacle of the love of God (Rom. 5:5); the closet of secret communion with God (Eph. 5:19). It is the center of the entire man, the very hearth of life's impulse.

HEATHEN (Heb. gôyim, “troop”). At first the word gôyim denoted generally all the nations of the world (Gen. 18:18; cf. Gal. 3:16), but afterward the Jews became a people distinguished from the other nations. They were a separate people (Lev. 20:23; 26:14–38), and the other nations were heathen. With these nations the Israelites were forbidden to associate (Josh. 23:7; 1 Kings 11:2), to intermarry (Josh. 23:12), or to worship their gods. Owing to its position these nations penetrated into Palestine, and the advance of heathen culture could not be prevented. For that reason the lines of defense against all illegality were only the more strictly and carefully drawn by the vigilance of the scribes. “Two points especially were not to be lost sight of in guarding against heathen practices—heathen idolatry and heathen non-observance of the Levitical law of uncleanness. With respect to both the pharisaism of the scribes proceeded with extreme minuteness. For the sake of avoiding even an only apparent approximation of idolatry, the Mosaic prohibition of images (Ex. 20:4; Deut. 4:16–18; 27:15) was applied with the most relentless consistency.” Not only did they declare themselves ready to die rather than to allow a statue of Caligula in the Temple (Josephus Ant. 18.3.1), but the Jews also repudiated pictorial representations in general, such as the trophies in the theater or the eagle at the gate of the Temple. Minute and exact regulations were made to prevent any encouragement of idolatry or contact with it: e.g., an Israelite was not to have any business transaction with a Gentile during the three days preceding or the three days following a heathen festival, and on the festival itself an Israelite was to hold no kind of interaction with the town; all objects possibly connected with idolatrous worship were forbidden, wood taken from an idol grove was prohibited, and bread baked by it could not be eaten, or if a weaver's shuttle was made of such wood its use was forbidden, as well as cloth woven with it. A Gentile—as a nonobserver of the laws of purification—was unclean, and all dealings with him were defiling, including his house and all objects touched by him (John 18:28). Provisions coming from the heathen were not to be eaten by Jews, although they were allowed to trade in them. A strictly legal Israelite could not at any time eat at a Gentile table (Acts 11:3; Gal. 2:12; Schurer, div. 2, 1:51ff.). See Gentile.

HEAVEN. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words:

Material. (1) The sky (Heb. shāmayim, “lofty”), by far the most frequent designation of heaven in the Heb. Scriptures, and meaning the firmament, which appears like an arch spread out above the earth, and represented as supported on foundations and pillars (2 Sam. 22:8; Job 26:11), with the rain descending through its gates or windows (Ps. 78:23; cf. Gen. 28:17). We find such expressions as “toward the heavens,” “reaching to heaven” (Gen. 15:5; 28:12); “under heaven,” i.e., on earth (Eccles. 1:13; 2:3); “under the heavens,” i.e., the whole earth (Gen. 7:19; Deut. 2:25; Job 28:24; etc.); “the heavens and the earth,” i.e., the universe (Gen. 1:1; 2:1). Akin to this word is height (Heb. mārôm, “elevation”), which, though not rendered “heaven,” has doubtless a celestial signification (Pss. 68:18; 93:4; 102:19), rendered “on high,” “height.” (2) A wind (Heb. galgal, “a wheel”), rendered “heaven” in Ps. 77:18 (KJV), but meaning a whirlwind (as in NASB and NIV). (3) Clouds (Heb. shahag, “cloudy dust, vapor”), the skies or heavens; serene (Job 37:18) or covered with clouds (37:16); from which descend the rain and dew (36:28; Prov. 3:20), and manna (Ps. 78:23; cf. Isa. 45:8), and whence the thunder is heard (Ps. 77:17–18). Closely connected with (3) is (4) Celestial expanse (Heb. rāqîa, “that which is spread out”), i.e., firmament (which see). (5) Of the Greek terms, ouranos signifies the heights and therefore the vaulted expanse of the sky; the region where clouds and tempests gather (Matt. 16:2–3; Luke 4:25); also heaven, the region above the sky, the seat of things eternal and perfect where God and the other heavenly beings dwell (Matt. 5:34; 23:22; etc.). Paul (2 Cor. 12:2) seems to designate this heaven the third heaven.

Spiritual. Scripture evidently specifies three heavens, since “the third heaven” is revealed to exist (2 Cor. 12:2), and it is logical that a third heaven cannot exist without a first and second. Scripture does not describe specifically the first and second heaven. The first, however, apparently refers to the atmospheric heavens of the birds (Hos. 2:18, “sky”) and of clouds (Dan. 7:13). The second heaven may be the stellar spaces (cf. Gen. 1:14–18). It is the abode of all supernatural angelic beings. The third heaven is the abode of the Triune God. Its location is unrevealed. It is the divine plan at present to populate the third heaven. It is a place (John 14:1–3). It is called “glory” (Heb. 2:10); those who enter it will be perfected forever (10:14) and made partakers of Christ’s fullness (John 1:16), which is all fullness (Col. 1:19) and which comprehends the very nature of the Godhead bodily (2:9). The apostle John was called into heaven (Rev. 4:1). The apostle Paul was caught up to the third heaven (2 Cor. 12:1–9). He was prohibited, however, from revealing what he saw and heard. Heaven is a place of beauty (Rev. 21:1–22:7), of life (1 Tim. 4:8), service (Rev. 22:3), worship (19:1–3), and glory (2 Cor. 4:17–18).

The Heavenly City. In Rev. 21:9–22:7 the apostle John describes the New Jerusalem, the heavenly city. Prophetic students have given this various interpretations. Seiss, Scott, Kelly, Darby, and Jennings maintain it describes the Millennium. Ottman, Larkin, Govett, and others hold that it describes the eternal state. J. Dwight Pentecost (Things to Come, 1958, p. 572) correctly proposes that it describes the eternal habitation of the resurrected saints during the Millennium.

The city is a literal city. From Heb. 12:23–23 we learn that the inhabitants of the city (besides its being the abode of the Triune God) consist of: (1) The bride, the Lamb’s wife, the church, referred to as “the general assembly and church of the first-born who are enrolled in heaven.” (2) The redeemed saints of the OT. These are referred to as “the spirits of righteous men made perfect.” (3) “Myriads of angels,” i.e., unfallen angels. Our Lord referred to this city in John 14:2–3 when He said He would go away and would come again and that He was preparing “a place” for His disciples.

Entrance to the city will be by translation (glorification) or resurrection, both in the case of the church saints and the saved OT saints. As J. Dwight Pentecost correctly says, “Thus all the redeemed of the ages who enter this city may do so by resurrection. The city thus becomes the abode of all the resurrected saints who enter it at the time of their resurrection” (Things to Come, p. 577).

With regard to the relation of this heavenly eternal city to the earth, it may be said that the resurrected saints of all ages in that city will be in their eternal state and possessed of eternal blessings, although this will not be true of things on the millennial earth. Concerning the relationship of this heavenly city to eternity, it may be said that at the end of the Millennium, after the earth has been renovated by fire, this dwelling place is removed. Afterwards, however, it will find its place and will be the connecting link between the new heaven and the new earth in the eternal state.

The description of the heavenly city by the apocalyptic seer is lavishly magnificent. It is said to possess “the glory of God” (Rev. 21:11), with a “brilliance ... like a very costly stone, as a stone of crystal-clear jasper” (v. 11). Its twelve gates, inscribed with the names of the twelve tribes of sons of Israel, indicate Israel’s portion in the city; that is, the redeemed of Israel. The twelve foundations of the city’s wall will have in them the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb (v. 14). The city is called “the bride, the wife of the Lamb” (v. 9). This shows its connection with the church, the bride, being called “wife” here because the symbolism of marriage is viewed as consummated, indicating that Christ is joined gloriously with His redeemed people of this age from Pentecost to the translation.

The foundations of the walls of the city are described as garnished with all manner of precious stones such as jasper, sapphire, chalcedony, emerald, sardonyx, sardius, chrysolite, beryl, topaz, etc. The twelve gates are set each one so that they consist of one huge pearl. The seer’s city is said to be pure gold. No temple is there because the Triune God is unveiled in all of His glory. No light is needed because the unobscured glory of God is revealed in the city.

In the heavenly city paradise is restored, and the river of the water of life flows freely. The reference in 22:2 to “the tree of life” yielding its “fruit” monthly and its leaves being for “the healing of the nations” has reference to the city during the millennial period. Evidently, after the millennial period as the city merges into the eternal state all traces of the curse will be removed and there will be no need for healing as there will be no sickness. But sickness will prevail during the Millennium.

This picture of the heavenly city brings to a close the revelation of the glorious future for the redeemed of the ages. See also Jerusalem, New. M.F.U.

HEBER (hē’ber; Heb. heber, “fellowship”).

1. Son of Beriah and grandson of Asher (Gen. 46:17; 1 Chron. 7:31–32). His descendants are called Heberites (Num. 26:45).

2. “A descendant of Hobab (which see); whose wife, Jael, slew Sisera (Judg. 4:17–22). He is called Heber the Kenite (4:11, 17; 5:24), which seems to have been a name for the whole family (1:16). Heber appears to have lived separate from the rest of the Kenites, leading a patriarchal life. He must have been a person of some consequence from its being stated that there was peace between the house of Heber and the powerful King Jabin. At the time the history brings him under our notice his camp was in the plain of Zaanaim, near Kedesh, in Naphtali” (Kitto).

3. Probably a son of Mered (of Judah) by his “Jewish wife” (see Jehudijah); and father or founder of Soco (1 Chron. 4:18).

4. One of the sons of Elpaal and a head of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:17).

5. For KJV “Heber” in 1 Chron. 5:13; 8:22, see Eber.

HEBREW LANGUAGE. The language of the Hebrews and of the OT Scriptures, with the exception of a few chapters written in Aram. It is not called Heb. anywhere in Scripture, but this is not surprising when we remember how rarely that name is employed to designate the Israelites. It is called “the language of Canaan” (Isa. 19:18), as distinguished from that of Egypt; and “Judean” (2 Kings 18:26, 28), as distinguished from Aramaean. Heb. belongs to the Semitic or Shemitic group of languages.

Characteristics. (1) Heb. has a predominance of guttural sounds—at least four, if not five; the use of strong letters, which may be represented by tt, ts, kk (or kh); and the vowels are kept in strict subordination to the consonants, it being a rare and exceptional case when a word or syllable begins with a vowel. (2) Like other Semitic languages, Heb. is characterized by the three-letter root. This is expanded into a variety of conjunctive forms expressing intensity, reflexiveness, causation, etc., modifications of the root idea being indicated not by additions to the root but by changes within the root. (3) It has a peculiar use of the plural, not only denoting plurality but likewise extension, in space or time. (4) In composition the Heb. is simple, pictorial, and poetical.

History. Heb. was already in spoken and written use when Moses and the Israelites came up out of Egypt (c. 1440 B.C.). The evidence of the Pentateuch and the witness of archaeology support this fact. The proto-Semitic script discovered by Petrie early in the twentieth century, and the discovery of a simple alphabetic Semitic script closely akin to Heb. at Ras Shamra-Ugarit on the N Syrian coast, 1929–37, added new evidence that Heb. was available as a literary vehicle for Moses, the first inspired penman of Scripture. “Ugaritic,” belonging to the Amarna Age, late fifteenth and fourteenth centuries B.C. (cf. Cyrus Gordon, The Living Past [New York, 1941], pp. 103–35), was contemporary with the Mosaic age. Although there is not the slightest need to suppose that Moses wrote in any other script than the primitive prong-shaped alphabet of early Heb., yet as one brought up in the Egyptian court (Ex. 2:10) and well versed in Egyptian sciences and hieroglyphics (Acts 7:22), he could have written in Egyptian. Besides, he was likely familiar with Akkad., the lingua franca of all SW Asia at the time, a fact proved by the Amarna Letters. See David Diringer, “Early Hebrew Writing” in The Biblical Archaeologist 13, no. 4 (1950): 74–95.

Origin. Heb. originated from the old Phoenician alphabet from which all alphabets in current use, Semitic and non-Semitic, were ultimately derived. The origin of this proto-Semitic alphabet is still unclear, although an early example of the rude script was discovered at Serabit el Khadem in the Sinaitic Peninsula in 1904–5. Albright dates this script in the early fifteenth century (Bulletin of the Am. Schools of Oriental Research 110 [April 1948]: 22). It is of more than passing interest that this proto-“Sinai-Hebrew Script” was discovered in the very area in which Moses was commanded to write (Ex. 17:8–14), but early Heb. goes back to the time of Abraham. The question is, Did the patriarch import it from Haran or find it in Palestine? The patriarchs evidently used an Aram. dialect in Mesopotamia, but when they came into Canaan they adopted a local Canaanite dialect that was not identical with the standard speech of the sedentary Canaanites, as may be linguistically demonstrated (W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity, p. 182). The Canaanite origin of Heb. is attested by Ugaritic and Phoenician. Numbers of important Canaanite inscriptions have been recovered, notably the Sarcophagus of Ahiab of Byblos, eleventh century B.C. Later Phoenician inscriptions from Cyprus, Sardinia, Carthage, and other colonies of the Mediterranean show the Canaanite affinities of Heb. The Gezer Calendar (c. 925 B.C.) written in perfect classical Heb., followed by the Moabite Stone (c. 850 B.C.) written in the language of Moab, which was closely akin to Heb., as well as later inscriptions from Samaria from the time of Jeroboam II help to trace the development of Heb. as a closely aligned Canaanite dialect. Other important early Heb. materials include the Siloam Inscription (c. 701 B.C.) cut in Hezekiah's rock conduit, and notably the Lachish Letters, which give us the Heb. spoken and written at the time of Jeremiah.

Written Hebrew. The rounded letters of present-day Heb. Bibles are evidently a modification of Aram. characters. The famous Dead Sea Scrolls from the second century B.C. are written in this type of letter, as is the Nash Papyrus, dated c. 125 B.C. The vowel points in modern Heb. Bibles were not added until A.D. 600–800 and were the work of Masoretic scholars, notably at Tiberias in Palestine. M.F.U.

HEBREWS. The first person in the Bible called a Hebrew is Abram (Gen. 14:13). Thereafter his descendants through Isaac and Jacob were known as "Hebrews" (40:15; 43:32; Ex. 2:11). The origin of the name Hebrew offers a difficult problem. The term may be derived from the prominent Semitic progenitor, Eber, the ancestor of Abraham (Gen. 10:21). Again "Abram the Hebrew" (14:13) may be "Abram who crossed the river," that is, the Euphrates (Josh. 24:2–3). Accordingly, the LXX translates "Abram, the Hebrew" hā Ἰβηρί, from ābar, "to cross over." Gen. 14:13 has ho peratēs, "the one who crossed over." Another archaeological and linguistic possibility is the widely discussed question whether or not the Habiru, featured in the Nuzian-Hittite and Amarna documents of the fifteenth and fourteenth centuries B.C., are not to be identified, at least in part, with the Hebrews. For the scholar who follows the underlying chronology of the MT and places the Exodus c. 1440 B.C., the identification Hebrew (Habiru) may fit historically, but its linguistic affiliation is doubtful. The Habiru in central Palestine, reflected in the Amarna Letters, do not seem to have been the same as biblical Hebrews.

HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO. This magnificent epistle, from the standpoint of doctrinal contribution and literary excellence, is in many ways without peer among NT books. This book is of unparalleled importance in expounding the transition from the old Levitical economy to Christianity. It eloquently sets forth the foundation Judaism furnished Christianity in messianic type, symbolized in prophecy.

Attestation and Authorship. External evidence unmistakably attests the early existence of the epistle. Clement of Rome, Polycarp, Justin Martyr, Dionysius of Alexandria, and Theophilus of Antioch quote from it. However, Marcion and the Muratorian Fragment do not recognize it. Eusebius, Origen, Athanasius, and others held that it was written by Paul, but the authorship has remained uncertain. The writer of the epistle does not mention his name, which is contrary to the custom of the apostle. Moreover, the writer to the Hebrews uses the LXX throughout except possibly at 10:30, whereas Paul employs both the Heb. text and the LXX. The style and vocabulary are not particularly Pauline.

Occasion and Date. It seems clear that the Temple was still in existence and the ritual still continued. The present tense is repeatedly used in this connection (8:4, 13; 9:4–9; 10:1–10; 13:10–11). The readers had evidently been Christians for a long time and had suffered severely. A date A.D. 67–69 would seem to fit the internal evidence.

Purpose. The writer aims to establish the supremacy of Christ and Christianity (1:1–10:18) and to warn those who accepted Christ of the dangers of apostasy (6:4–8; 10:26–31; 13:14–17). In view of the outmoded nature of Judaism the writer also exhorts his readers to make a complete break with it (12:18–13:17). To accomplish this purpose the writer in closely knit argument establishes the superiority of Christ over angels, over Moses and Joshua, and over OT priesthood and ritual.

Outline.

- I. Introduction (1:1–4)
- II. The Son superior to the angels (1:5–2:18)
 - A. OT proof (1:5–14)
 - B. Resulting obligation (2:1–4)
 - C. Reasonableness of the Son’s humiliation (2:5–18)
- III. The Son superior to Moses and Joshua (3:1–4:16)
 - A. To Moses (3:1–6)
 - B. Failure under Moses and Joshua (3:7–4:2)
 - C. Provided rest (4:3–10)
 - D. Necessity of attaining this rest (4:11–13)
 - E. Christ’s triumph as High Priest our incentive to draw near (4:14–16)
- IV. The superiority of Christ’s high priesthood (5:1–7:28)
 - A. His high priestly qualifications (5:1–10)
 - B. Necessity of comprehending spiritual truth (5:11–6:20)
 - C. Melchizedek aspect of Christ’s high priesthood (7:1–25)
 - D. Christ’s high priesthood contrasted with the Levitical (7:26–28)
- V. The superiority of Christ’s high priestly ministry (8:1–10:18)
 - A. The circumstances (8:1–13)
 - B. Contrast of sanctuary and service under the two covenants (9:1–28)
 - C. Contrast of Levitical sacrifices and Christ’s sacrifice (10:1–18)
- VI. Practical application (10:19–12:29)
 - A. Plea for faithfulness (10:19–39)
 - B. Call to achieve by others’ example (11:1–12:4)
 - C. Consolation by fact of sonship (12:5–13)
 - D. Warning against apostasy (12:14–17)
 - E. Argument from the higher position of the Christian (12:18–29)
- VII. Conclusion: Social and religious obligations, personal instructions (13:1–25) M.F.U.

HE’BRON (hē’bron; a “community”; “alliance”).

1. A town in the mountains of Judah, about three thousand feet above the Mediterranean Sea, and between Beersheba and Jerusalem, being about twenty miles from each. It was named Kiriath-Arba (Gen. 23:2; Josh. 14:15; 15:13). About two miles to the N is Mamre (which see), after Mamre the Amorite (Gen. 13:18; 35:27), which is now called el-Khalil (“the friend”). Among those who lived there were the Canaanites and the Anakim (23:2; Josh.

14:15; 15:13), Abraham (Gen. 13:18), Isaac and Jacob (35:27). David made it his royal residence (2 Sam. 2:1–4; 5:5; 1 Kings 2:11); as did Absalom (2 Sam. 15:10). Sarah was buried here (Gen. 23:17–20); Joshua took Hebron (Josh. 10:36–37; 12:10), and Caleb retook it (14:14). The Romans also captured and destroyed it.

The traditional site of the cave of Machpelah, burial place of some of the patriarchs, is currently marked by the mosque of Hebron, which was formerly a Crusader church and that stands on the site of a church erected by the emperor Justinian in the sixth century. Cenotaphs in the mosque memorialize Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, and Jacob and Leah, who are presumed to have been buried in the cave below. H.F.V.

2. The third son of Kohath and a grandson of Levi; a younger brother of Amram, father of Moses and Aaron (Ex. 6:18; Num. 3:19; 1 Chron. 6:2, 18; 23:12), before 1440 B.C. His descendants are called Hebronites (Num. 3:27; etc.).

3. The son of Mareshah and, apparently, grandson of Caleb, of the posterity of Judah (1 Chron. 2:42–43), after 1400 B.C.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. Avi-Yonah, The Holy Land (1972), pp. 13, 16–18, 54, 96, 128, 224.

HE'BRONITE (hē'bron-īt). A descendant of Hebron, the third son of Kohath (Ex. 6:18; Num. 3:19, cf. v. 27; 1 Chron. 26:23, 30–31). We find them settled in Jazer, in Gilead, “men of outstanding capability,” seventeen hundred in number, who were superintendents for King David (26:31–32), whereas twenty-seven hundred others held the same position over the 2½ tribes (v. 30).

HEDGE. See Vegetable Kingdom.

HEDGEHOG. See Animal Kingdom.

HEG'AI (heg'ī). The eunuch having charge of the harem of Ahasuerus, and the preparation of the females sought as concubines for him (Esther 2:3, 8, 15), about 478 B.C.

HEIFER. See Animal Kingdom: Ox, and also the article Sacrifices.

Figurative. As the heifer, or young cow, was not used for plowing, but only for treading out the grain, when it ran without any headstall, the expression a “stubborn heifer” (Hos. 4:16) is used for resisting authority. To “plow” with another man’s heifer (Judg. 14:18) is to take an unfair advantage of another. A heifer that “loves to thresh” (Hos. 10:11) is figurative of one choosing pleasant, productive, and profitable labor, because in threshing the animal was allowed to eat at pleasure (Deut. 25:4). “A pretty heifer” is figurative of the beauty and wealth of Egypt (Jer. 46:20); to “skip about like a threshing heifer,” of the luxurious Chaldeans (50:11).

HEIFER, RED. See Sacrificial Offerings.

HEIR. See Inheritance.

HE'LAH (hē'la). One of two wives of Ashhur (1 Chron. 4:5, 7), a descendant of Judah, and the mother of Coz (which see), or Koz.

HE'LAM (hē'lam; 2 Sam. 10:16–17). Memorable as the place located between the Euphrates and the Jordan, where David routed the Syrians under Hadadezer. The town named Alema (1 Macc. 5:26), modern 'Alma in the Hauran, is the probable location.

HEL'BAH (hel'ba; “fatness”). A town of Asher not far from Sidon, and one of the places from which the Canaanites were not expelled (Judg. 1:31). Identified with Mahalib of the Assyrian monuments, four miles NE of Tyre. It still exists in the village of Halbun, a place with many ruins eighteen miles N of Damascus in the midst of a valley by the same name.

HEL'BON (hel'bon; “fat,” i.e., fertile). A place named only in Ezek. 27:18, where “the wine of Helbon” is mentioned among the commodities furnished by Damascus to the great market of Tyre. “It still exists in the village of Helbon, a place with many ruins three and a half miles N of Damascus in the midst of a valley of the same name” (Keil, Com., ad loc.).

HEL'DAI (hel'dāi). See Heleb; Helem.

HE'LEB (he'leb; “fat, fatness”). Son of Baanah the Netophathite and one of David's warriors (2 Sam. 23:29); elsewhere more correctly called Heled (1 Chron. 11:30), or, better still, Heldai (1 Chron. 27:15).

HEL'ECH (hel'ek). A place otherwise unknown whose men provided protection to the walls of Tyre according to the lament-song of Ezekiel (Ezek. 27:11).

HE'LED (he'led). Son of Baanah, a Netophathite, and one of David's warriors (1 Chron. 11:30), called in the parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:29) Heleb, but more accurately Heldai (1 Chron. 27:15).

HE'LEK (he'lek; a “portion”). The second son of Gilead, of the tribe of Manasseh, whose descendants were called Helekites (Num. 26:30; Josh. 17:2).

HE'LEM (he'lem).

1. The brother of Shemer and great-grandson of Asher (1 Chron. 7:34–35), probably before 1440 B.C. Perhaps the same as Hotham (v. 32).

2. One assisting Zechariah in typical crowning of the high priest (Zech. 6:14), probably by erroneous transcription for Heldai (v. 10).

HE'LEPH (he'lef). A city mentioned as the starting point of the northern border of Naphtali, beginning at the W (Josh. 19:33). Khirbet Arbatsh, NE of Mt. Tabor, has been suggested as its location.

HE'LEZ (he'lez; perhaps, “strength”).

1. One of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:26), an Ephraimite of Pelon (1 Chron. 11:27), and captain of the seventh monthly course (27:10), about 970 B.C.

2. Son of Azariah and father of Eleasah, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:39).

HE'LI (he'li). The father-in-law of Joseph and maternal grandfather of Christ (Luke 3:23, KJV; NASB marg.). Also rendered Eli.

HELIOPOLIS (“city of the sun”). The Gk. name for several biblical cities. See Baalbek; Beth-shemesh, no. 4; City of Destruction; On, no. 2; Sun, Worship of.

HEL'KAI (hel'kai; probably a shortened form of Hilkiah). Son of Meraioth and one of the chief priests in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:15), after 536 B.C.

HEL'KATH (hel'kath; “portion, field”). A town assigned to the tribe of Asher on the eastern border (Josh. 19:25) and one of the Levitical cities (21:31). In 1 Chron. 6:75 Hukok is an old copyist's error.

HEL'KATH-HAZ'ZURIM (hel'kath-haz'ū-rim; “smoothness of the rocks,” others, “field of the sharp edges”). The name given to the plain near the pool of Gibeon because of the deadly combat of twelve of the adherents of Ish-bosheth with as many of David's, which appears to have brought on a general engagement, resulting in the defeat of the men of Israel (2 Sam. 2:12–17).

HELL. A term that in common usage designates the place of future punishment for the wicked. Other meanings in many instances are expressed by this term, which must be recognized to prevent mistakes and confusion. In some cases it refers to the grave, in others to the place of disembodied spirits without any necessary implication as to their happiness or unhappiness. This fact, however, does not affect the correctness of the belief indicated by the common use of the term, a belief supported by many passages of Scripture.

Scripture Terms. The words of the original Scriptures rendered “hell” in English are three in number. With a solitary exception (2 Pet. 2:4, tartaroō, to “incarcerate”) they are the only words thus translated. These, however, are not the only terms, as we shall see, in which the idea of a place of future penal suffering for the wicked is clearly and strongly expressed. The three words are as follows:

Sheol. Without entering into the discussion as to the derivation or root meaning of this term in the OT, it may be sufficient to say that it occurs several times in Scripture. The general idea is “the place of the dead”; and by this is meant, not the grave, but the place of those who have departed from this life. The term is thus used with reference to both the righteous and the wicked: of the righteous (Pss. 16:10; 30:3; Isa. 38:10; etc.), of the wicked (Num. 16:33; Job 24:19; Ps. 9:17; etc.). This is in accordance with the general character of the OT revelation, which presents much less clearly and strongly than the NT the doctrine of the future life with its distinct allotments of doom. But there are many hints, and more than hints, of the difference in the conditions of the departed. The psalmist prays: “Do not drag me away with the wicked and with those who work iniquity” (28:3; see also Isa. 33:14; 66:24; Dan. 12:2).

Hades. One of the NT terms rendered “hell.” Like the OT “sheol,” it is comprehensive and has a quite similar significance. It refers to the underworld, or region of the departed, the intermediate state between death and the resurrection. It occurs several times in the NT, namely: Matt. 11:23; 16:18; Luke 10:15; 16:23; Acts 2:27, 31; Rev. 1:18; 6:8; 20:13–14. The KJV renders this word “hell” in every case, with the exception of 1 Cor. 15:55 in the KJV only, where it gives “grave” (the NASB and NIV at this point read “death,” from thanatos, not hadēs). The NIV usually renders “depths,” or “grave,” for hades. The distinction thus recognized between “hades” and “hell” as a place of misery is a valid one. Nevertheless it is equally plain that our Lord, certain of His words, associated judgment and suffering with the condition of some of the inhabitants of “hades” (e.g., Matt. 11:23–24; Luke 16:23–27). See Hades.

Gehenna. The valley of Hinnom. A place where the Jewish apostasy, the rites of Molech, were celebrated (1 Kings 11:7). It was converted by King Josiah into a place of abomination, where dead bodies were thrown and burned (2 Kings 23:13–14). Hence the place served as a symbol, and the name was appropriated to designate the abode of lost spirits. In this way the term was used by our Lord.

The word occurs in the NT, and in every case it is properly translated “hell,” denoting the eternal state of the lost after resurrection. That is, the meaning of the English word is particularly the meaning of Gehenna (Matt. 5:22, 29–30; 10:28; 18:9; 23:15, 33; Mark 9:43, 45, 47; Luke 12:5; James 3:6).

The distinction between hades (the intermediate state) and Gehenna (eternal hell) is of importance, not only because it is necessary to the understanding of quite a large number of passages in the NT, but it may also prevent misconstruction and remove uncertainty as to Christ’s teaching with regard to the future state of the wicked. It also has important bearing upon the doctrine of “Christ’s descent into hell” (hades) and that of the intermediate state.

Scripture Synonyms. The Bible doctrine of hell is by no means confined to the terms above mentioned and to the passages in which they appear. There are many phrases in which the overshadowing idea is presented with great distinctness, such as “unquenchable fire,” “black darkness,” “furnace of fire,” “fire and brimstone,” “the smoke of their torment,” “the lake of fire which burns with brimstone,” “where their worm does not die,” “the eternal fire which has been prepared for the devil and his angels.” Van Oosterzee does well to remark: “There is no doubt that Holy Scripture requires us to believe in a properly so-called place of punishment, in whatever part of God’s boundless creation it is to be sought. That the different images under which it is represented cannot possibly be taken literally will certainly need no demonstration; but it is perhaps not unnecessary to warn against the opinion that we have to do here with mere imagery. Who shall say that the reality will not infinitely surpass in awfulness the boldest pictures of it?"

For theological treatment of the doctrine, see Punishment; Gehenna.

HEL'LENIST (hel'en-ist). A term employed of a person who spoke Gk. but was not racially of the Greek nation. The expression is especially used of Jews who adopted the Gk. language and, to some extent, Greek customs and culture (Acts 6:1; 9:29).

HELMET. See Armor, Arms.

HE'LON (he'lon; "valorous, strong"). The father of Eliab, which latter was head of the tribe of Zebulun at the Exodus (Num. 1:9; 2:7; 7:24; 10:16), 1440 B.C.

HELP. Besides its usual meaning of assistance, a technical application is given the term in 1 Cor. 12:28 (Gk. antilēpsis; a "laying hold of"), where it is used in connection with the ministrations of the deacons who have care of the sick, and refers to helpers.

Another Gk. term, boētheia, is behind the word helps in Acts 27:17 and refers to apparatus for securing a leaking vessel by means of ropes, chains, etc., forming a process of undergirding. The NASB gives "supporting cables," whereas the NIV reads "ropes."

HELPER (Heb. ēzer k̄negdō; a "help as his counterpart"). An aid "suitable for him," such as the man stood in need of (Gen. 2:18). KJV renders "a help meet for him."

HELPER (Gk. paraklētos, "summoned, called to one's side"; "Paraclete," KJV). In the Gk., this word refers to one who pleads another's cause before a judge; the word is rendered "advocate" in 1 John 2:1 where it is applied to Christ. The NIV translates, "one who speaks ... in our defense." When Jesus promised to His sorrowing disciples to send them the Holy Spirit as a "Helper," He took the title to Himself: "I will ask the Father, and He will give you another Helper" (John 14:16; see marg.). The Gk. paraklētos applies well to both Jesus and the Spirit. Jesus was eminently a helper to His disciples, teaching, guiding, strengthening, and comforting them; and now that He has gone the Spirit is His substitute to carry on His work in us. In this present age it is, therefore, evident that the Holy Spirit is the believer's paraklētos on earth, indwelling and helping him, whereas Christ is his paraklētos in heaven, interceding for him at the Father's right hand. See Advocate; Holy Spirit.

HELVE (Heb. ēš, "wood"). An obsolete term (Deut. 19:19, KJV) for the handle of an axe. See Ax, Axe.

HEM OF A GARMENT. The extremity, border of the outer garment (Ex. 28:33; 39:24–26; cf. Matt. 9:20; 14:36). The importance that the later Jews, especially the Pharisees, attached to this portion of the dress (Matt. 23:5) was founded upon the regulation in Num. 15:38–39. The fringe did not owe its origin to this regulation but was originally the ordinary mode of

HE`MAM (hē`mam). The son of Lotan, the eldest son of Seir (Gen. 36:22). The same as Homam (which see).

HE`MAN (hē`man; “faithful”).

1. One of the four persons celebrated for their wisdom, to which that of Solomon is compared (1 Kings 4:31). He is probably the same as the son of Zerah and grandson of Judah (1 Chron. 2:6). The mention of these men together as famous for their wisdom does not at all require that we should think them contemporaries.

2. Son of Joel and grandson of Samuel the prophet; one of the “sons of the Kohathites,” and one of the leaders of the Temple music as organized by David (1 Chron. 6:33, where singer should better be rendered musician; 15:17; 16:41–42), about 970 B.C. This, probably, is the Heman to whom the eighty-eighth psalm is ascribed. He had fourteen sons and three daughters. “Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun are termed ‘seers’ (2 Chron. 35:15), which refers rather to their genius as sacred musicians than to their possessing the spirit of prophecy (1 Chron. 15:19; 25:1; 2 Chron. 5:12), although there is not wanting evidence of their occasional inspiration” (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia).

HE`MATH. For the city (1 Chron. 13:5; Amos 6:14), see Hamath, the NASB and NIV spelling; for the man, see Hammath.

HEM`DAN (hem`dan; “pleasant”). The first named of the four “sons” of Dishon, which latter was a son of Seir, and one of the Horite “chiefs” in Mt. Seir (Gen. 36:26). In 1 Chron. 1:41 the name is given as Amram in the KJV and as Hamran in the NASB.

HEMLOCK. See Vegetable Kingdom: Wormwood.

HEMORRHAGE. See Diseases: Issue.

HEMORRHOIDS. See Diseases.

HEN. See Animal Kingdom: Cock.

HEN (hen; favor, “grace”). The son of Zephaniah, to whom the prophet was sent with a symbolical crown (Zech. 6:14); probably a figurative name for Josiah (v. 10). “By the LXX and others the words are taken to mean ‘for the favor of the son of Zephaniah’” (Smith, Dict.).

HE`NA (hē`na; signification unknown). A city, probably in Mesopotamia, mentioned in connection with Hamath, Arpad, etc., as having been overthrown by Sennacherib before his invasion of Judea (2 Kings 18:34; 19:13; Isa. 37:13). It is probably the city of Ana on the Euphrates.

HEN`ADAD (hen`a-dad; “favor of Hadad”). A Levite whose sons were active in the restoration after the captivity (Ezra 3:9). Two of the latter, Bavai and Binnui, are named (Neh. 3:18, 24; 10:9), before 536 B.C.

HENNA. See Vegetable Kingdom.

HE`NOCH. See Enoch.

HE`PHER (he`fer; a “pit, well”).

1. The younger son of Gilead and great-grandson of Manasseh (Num. 27:1). He was the father of Zelophehad (26:33; 27:1; Josh. 17:2–3), and his descendants were called Hephherites (Num. 26:32), before 1400 B.C.

2. The second son of Asshur (a descendant of Judah) by one of his wives, Naarah (1 Chron. 4:6), after 1440 B.C.

3. A Mecherathite, one of David's heroes, according to 1 Chron. 11:36. The name does not appear in the list given in Samuel and is supposed to be an interpolation, or identical with Eliphelet of 2 Sam. 23:34.

4. A royal city of the Canaanites, taken by Joshua (12:17) and used by Solomon for commissary purposes (1 Kings 4:10). It is to be sought for in the neighborhood of Socoh, in the plain of Judah. Some identify it with Hafireh, about two miles E of Arubboth.

HEPH'ZIBAH (hef'zi-bah; "my delight is in her").

1. The queen of Hezekiah and mother of King Manasseh (2 Kings 21:1), before 690 B.C.

2. In the KJV and NIV, a symbolical name given to Zion by Isaiah (62:4). Zion had been called "Forsaken" but now is called Hephzibah, i.e., "My delight is in her," as the object of God's affection. This prophetic identification will find fulfillment in the future conversion and millennial blessing of the nation Israel.

HERALD (Heb. kārôzā, only in Dan. 3:4). A crier, from an old Persian word khresii (Keil, Com., ad loc.). The several Gk. words usually rendered "preach" in the NT have the meaning of to proclaim as a herald, whereas the word preacher (1 Tim. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:11; 2 Pet. 2:5) would be more correctly rendered herald.

HERB. See Vegetable Kingdom: Grass.

HERBS, BITTER (Heb. mrôrîm). The Israelites were commanded to eat "bitter herbs" with the Passover bread (Ex. 12:8; Num. 9:11) in remembrance of the bitterness of their bondage in Egypt (Ex. 1:14). "The Mishnah mentions these five as falling within the designation of 'bitter herbs,' viz., lettuce, endive, succory, what is called 'Charchavina (urtica, beets?), and horehound'" (Edersheim, The Temple, p. 204).

HERD (Heb. bāqār; Gk. agelē). "The herd was greatly regarded both in the patriarchal and Mosaic period. The ox was the most precious stock next to horse and mule. The herd yielded the most esteemed sacrifice (Num. 7:3; Ps. 69:31; Isa. 66:3); also flesh meat and milk, chiefly converted, probably, into butter and cheese (Deut. 32:14; 2 Sam. 17:29), which such milk yields more copiously than that of small cattle. The full-grown ox was hardly ever slaughtered in Syria; but, both for sacrificial and convivial purposes, the young animal was preferred (Ex. 29:1). The agricultural and general usefulness of the ox, in plowing, threshing, and as a beast of burden (1 Chron. 12:40; Isa. 46:1), made such a slaughtering seem wasteful. The animal was broken to service probably in his third year. In the moist season, when grass abounded in the waste lands, in the 'south' region, herds grazed there. Especially was the eastern table land (Ezek. 39:18; Num. 32:4) 'a place for cattle.' Herdsmen, etc., in Egypt were a low, perhaps the lowest caste; but of the abundance of cattle in Egypt, and of the care there bestowed on them, there is no doubt (Gen. 47:6, 17; Ex. 9:4, 20). So the plague of hail was sent to smite especially the cattle (Ps. 78:48), the firstborn of which also were smitten (Ex. 12:29). The Israelites departing stipulated for (10:26), and took 'much cattle' with them (12:38). Cattle formed thus one of the traditions of the Israelitish nation in its greatest period, and became almost a part of that greatness. When pasture failed, a mixture of various grains (Job 6:5) was used, as also 'chopped straw' (Gen. 24:25; Isa. 11:7; 65:25), which was torn in pieces by the threshing machine and used probably for feeding in stalls. These last formed an important adjunct to cattle keeping, being indispensable for shelter at certain seasons (Ex. 9:6, 19)” (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

HERDMAN, HERDSMAN. (Heb. bôqēr, a tender of oxen; in distinction from rôcî, a feeder of sheep). The rich owners of herds placed them in charge of herdsmen, who watched the cattle to keep them from straying, to protect them from wild beasts, and lead them to suitable pasture. Usually they carried a staff furnished with a point of iron (see Goad) and a wallet or small bag for provisions, etc. (1 Sam. 17:40; Ps. 23:4; Mic. 7:14; cf. Matt. 10:10; Luke 9:3–4). They wore a cloak, with which they could envelop the entire body (Jer. 43:12); and their food was always simple, sometimes only the chance fruit they might find (Amos 7:14; Luke 15:15–16). Their wages consisted of the products of the herd, especially of the milk (Gen. 30:32–33; 1 Cor. 9:7). The occupation of herdsman was honorable in early times (Gen. 47:6; 1 Sam. 11:5; 1 Chron. 27:29; 28:1). Saul himself resumed it in the interval of his cares as king; also Doeg, “the chief of Saul’s shepherds,” was certainly high in his confidence (1 Sam. 21:7). Pharaoh put some of Joseph’s brothers in charge of his livestock (Gen. 47:6). David’s herdsmasters were among his chief officers of state. The prophet Amos at first followed this occupation (Amos 1:1; 7:14). See Shepherd.

HE RES (he’rez; “mountain of the sun”).

1. A city of Dan, near Aijalon, which the Amorites continued to hold (Judg. 1:35), but as tributaries. Keil (Com., ad loc.) believes it is only another name for Ir-shemesh, i.e., Beth-shemesh.

2. A mountain pass in the Transjordan near Succoth by which Gideon returned from his conquest of the Midianite chiefs (Judg. 8:13).

HE RESH (he’rezh; “silent, dumb”). One of the Levites who lived in the “villages of the Netophathites,” near Jerusalem, on the return from captivity (1 Chron. 9:15), 536 B.C.

HERESY (Gk. hairesis, a “choice”). Means, in the NT: (1) a chosen course of thought and action; hence one’s chosen opinion, tenet, and so a sect or party, as the Sadducees (Acts 5:17); the Pharisees (15:5; 26:5); and the Christians (24:5, 14; 28:22); (2) dissensions arising from diversity of opinions and aims (Gal. 5:20, marg.; 1 Cor. 11:19, KJV; NASB, “factions”; NIV, “differences”); (3) doctrinal departures from revealed truth, or erroneous views (Titus 3:10, KJV; 2 Pet. 2:1); the apostles vigorously warned the church against such departures (Acts 20:29; Phil. 3:2).

In the apostolic age we find three fundamental forms of heresy, which reappear with various modifications in almost every subsequent period.

Judaistic. “The Judaizing tendency, the heretical counterpart of Jewish Christianity, so insists on the unity of Christianity with Judaism, as to sink the former to the level of the latter, and make the Gospel merely a perfected law. It regards Christ also as a mere prophet, a second Moses, and denies, or at least wholly overlooks, his priestly and kingly offices, and his divine nature in general. The Judaizers were Jews in reality, and Christians only in appearance and name. They held circumcision and the whole moral and ceremonial law of Moses to be still binding, and the observance of them necessary to salvation. Of Christianity as a new, free, and universal religion, they had no conception. The same heresy, more fully developed, appears in the 2d century under the name of Ebionism.”

The Paganizing or Gnostic Heresy. “This exaggerates the Pauline view of the distinction of Christianity from Judaism, sunders Christianity from its historical basis, resolves the real humanity of the Saviour into a Docetic illusion (i.e., the heavenly Being, whose nature is pure light, suddenly appearing as a sensuous apparition). The author of this baptized heathenism, according to the uniform testimony of Christian antiquity, is Simon Magus, who unquestionably adulterated Christianity with pagan ideas and practices, and gave himself out, in pantheistic style, for an emanation of God. This heresy, in the 2d century, spread over the whole Church, east and west, in various schools of gnosticism.”

Syncretistic Heresy. As attempts had already been made, before Christ, by Philo and others to blend the Jewish religion with heathen philosophy, especially that of Pythagoras and Plato, so now, under the Christian name, there appeared confused combinations of these opposing systems, forming either a paganizing Judaism or a Judaizing paganism, according as the Jewish or the heathen element prevailed.

“Whatever their differences, however, all these three fundamental heresies amount at last to a more or less distinct denial of the central mystery of the Gospel—the incarnation of the Son of God for the salvation of the world. They make Christ either a mere man or a mere superhuman phantom; they allow, at all events, no real and abiding union of the divine and human natures in the person of the Redeemer.”

Heresy disturbed the unity of doctrine and of fellowship in the early church, which was therefore forced to exclude those holding false doctrine from its communion. Once excluded, they formed societies of their own. This was the case with the Novatians, Gnostics, Donatists, etc.

HE´RETH (he´reth; “thicket”). The place in the wooded mountains to which David fled from Saul (1 Sam. 22:5). Possibly the scene of the incident narrated in 2 Sam. 23:14–17; 1 Chron. 11:16–19.

HERETIC. See Heresy.

HERITAGE. See Inheritance.

HER´MAS (hūr´mas; Gk. Hermas, “Mercury”). A Christian resident of Rome to whom Paul sent greeting (Rom. 16:14). Irenaeus, Tertullian, and Origen attributed to him the work called The Shepherd, but that is highly unlikely because The Shepherd was written about A.D. 150. He is celebrated as a saint, in the Roman calendar, on May 9.

HER´MES (hūr´mēz; the Greek name of Mercury).

1. A man mentioned (Rom. 16:14) as a disciple in Rome. “According to the Greeks he was one of the seventy disciples and afterward Bishop of Dalmatia” (Calmet, Dict., s.v.).

2. Messenger god of the Greeks (Acts 14:12). The Roman name and KJV rendering is Mercury. See Gods, False: Mercury.

HERMOG´ENES (hūr-moj´ē-nēz; “Mercury-born”). A disciple in Asia Minor mentioned by the apostle Paul, along with Phygelus, as having deserted him, doubtless from fear of the perils of the connection (2 Tim. 1:15). Nothing more of him is known.

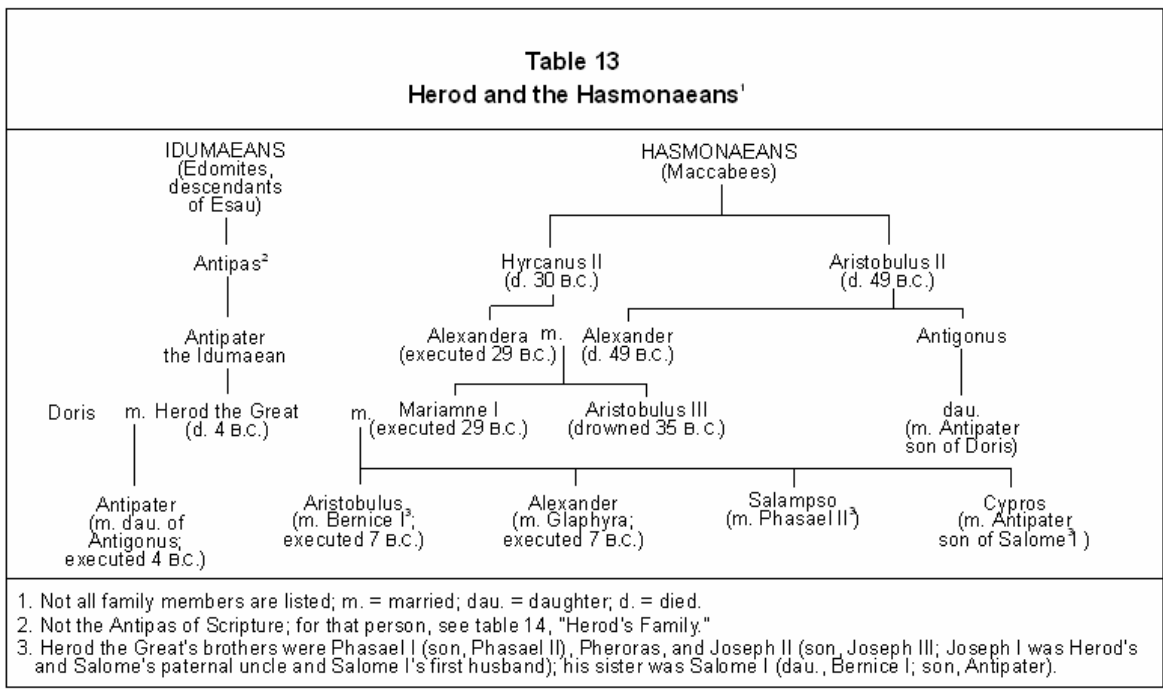

HER´MON (hūr´mon; “sacred mountain”). A mountain that formed the northernmost boundary (Josh. 12:1) of the country beyond the Jordan (11:17), which Israel took from the Amorites (Deut. 3:8). It must, therefore, have belonged to Anti-Libanus (1 Chron. 5:23; cf. Deut. 4:48; Josh. 11:3, 17; etc.). It is identified with the present Jebel es-Sheikh, i.e., Sheikh’s Mountain, situated thirty miles SW of Damascus and forty miles NE of the Sea of Galilee. Its height is 9,101 feet above the Mediterranean Sea. In Deut. 4:48 it is called Mt. Sion, i.e., a high mountain, being by far the highest of all mountains in or near Palestine. The ancient inhabitants of Canaan had sacred places on the high mountains and the hills. We need not wonder, then, that Hermon should have been selected for the altar and the sacred fire. Hermon was the religious center of primeval Syria. Its Baal sanctuaries not only existed but gave it a name, before the Exodus (Josh. 11:17). The view from the perpetually snow-clad Hermon is magnificent. From the torrid Dead Sea region its cooling snows can be seen 120 miles distant; its melting snows form the main source of the Jordan and the rivers that water the Damascus plateau. The psalmist speaks (133:3) of the “dew of Hermon.” The snow on the mountain condenses the vapors during the summer so that abundant dews descend upon it while the surrounding country is parched. One of its tops is called Abu-Nedy, i.e., “father of dew.”

It has been widely held that the Hermon region was the scene of our Lord’s transfiguration. If so, Christ traveled from Bethsaida, on the NW shore of the Sea of Galilee, to the coasts of Caesarea Philippi; from there He led His disciples “up to a high mountain by themselves. And He was transfigured before them.” Afterward He returned, going toward Jerusalem through Galilee (cf. Matt. 16:13; Mark 8:22–28; 9:2–13, 30–33).

HER’MONITES (hūr’mōn-īts). Properly “the Hermons,” with reference to the three summits of Mt. Hermon (“peaks of Hermon,” NASB, Ps. 42:6).

HER’OD (her’ud). This was not a personal name but the family or surname. It belonged alike to all the generations of the Herodian house as known to the Scriptures; much confusion has arisen from not having recognized that simple fact. Hence some have even questioned the accuracy of Luke in that he called Herod Antipas “Herod,” when Josephus uniformly calls him “Antipas.” But the point assumed is itself a mistake. For Luke mentions him as “Herod,” and “Herod the tetrarch,” and “the tetrarch of Galilee” in the same chapter (3:1, 19); and Josephus repeatedly calls him “Herod the tetrarch,” and “Herod the tetrarch of Galilee,” and “that Herod who was called Antipas” (Ant. 18.2.3; 18.7.1; Wars 2.9.1). The identification therefore is perfect as regards the person, the official title, and the political geography; Luke’s mention is strictly historical. All the descendants of Herod the Great down to the fourth generation, who were identified with the government of Palestine and are mentioned in the NT, are known in history by the surname Herod: Herod Archelaus, Herod Antipas, Herod Philip II, Herod Agrippa I, and Herod Agrippa II.

Her’od the Great (37–4 B.C.)

History. The father of Herod the Great was a man of Idumaeen blood named Antipater. The Idumaeans were of the Edomite stock, descendants from Esau (Josephus Ant. 14.1.3). They occupied a southern district of Palestine known as the Negeb, located between the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea and southward. By conquest John Hyrcanus brought the Idumaeans into the Jewish state about 130 B.C., and as they conformed to the Jewish rite of circumcision they embraced the Jewish religion (see table 13, “Herod and the Hasmonaeans”). However, the Jews regarded the Idumaeans with considerable suspicion and prejudice, calling them “half Jews” (Ant. 14.15.2). Josephus records that Herod was appointed procurator of Galilee when he was only twenty-five years of age (Ant. 14.9.2; see Whiston’s note ad loc). Mark Antony gave Herod a tetrarchy (Ant. 14.13.1–2; Wars 1.12.5), and afterward he persuaded the Roman senate to make Herod a king (Ant. 14.14.4). The great Roman historian Tacitus affirms that Herod was placed on the throne by Mark Antony and that Augustus (Caesar) enlarged his privileges (Histories 5.9). But Herod did not succeed in asserting his royal rights over Palestine until he had captured Jerusalem, 37 B.C. Nevertheless, his coronation by Caesar was made an occasion of great magnificence (Wars 1.20.3).

Architecture. Herod had a passion for pretentious display in magnificent architecture and monuments, as had all his ruling descendants after him. To conciliate the Jews, who had been alienated by his cruelties, he proposed to reconstruct their ancient Temple that Solomon had originally built, though it has been shrewdly suspected that he entertained the sinister motive to possess himself of the public genealogies collected there, especially those relating to the priestly families. It is said that he thereby hoped to destroy the genealogy of the expected Messiah, lest He should come and usurp his kingdom. However that may be, he endeavored to make the Jewish people understand that he was doing them a great kindness without cost to them, and he promised that he would not attempt to build them a new Temple but merely restore to its ancient magnificence the one originally built by David’s son.

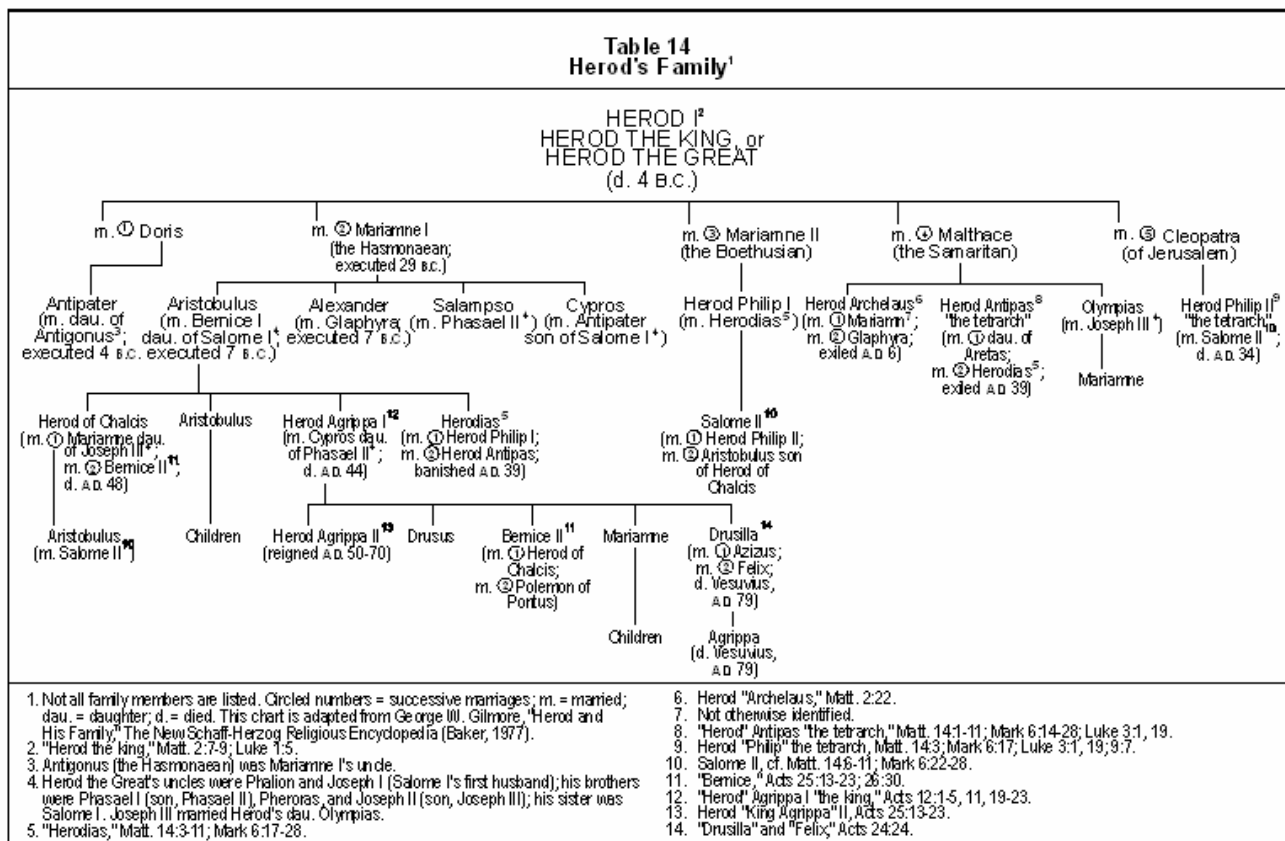

The Temple proper that he erected was one hundred cubits in length and twenty cubits in height. It was constructed of white stone, each one being twenty-five cubits long and eight in height (Ant. 15.11.2–3). Surmounting this structure was a great white dome adorned with a pinnacle of gold, suggestive of a mountain of snow as seen from afar. The Jewish tradition holds that “the temple itself was built by the priests in one year and six months, when they celebrated its completion with Jewish feast and sacrifices; but that the cloisters and outer inclosures were eight years in building.” However that may be, additions were made continually from year to year; so that though Herod began the rebuilding in 20 B.C., as a whole it was literally true that the Temple was “built in forty-six years,” as the Jews so asserted to Jesus (John 2:20). But the end was not yet, for the work was really continued until A.D. 64, just six years before the final destruction of the Temple by the Roman soldiers of Titus. Even then, when the Romans under Vespasian made incursion into Palestine in 66, Herod’s great-grandson, Herod Agrippa II, was making expensive preparations to “raise the holy house twenty cubits higher” (Wars 5.1.5).

The destruction of the Temple occurred on the Jewish Sabbath, August 10, in the year 70. When Jerusalem was captured, the Temple was burned, the Jewish people were expatriated; and never since has sacrifice been offered up to God on Jewish altars.

At about the same time Herod rebuilt the Temple at Samaria, “out of a desire to make the city more eminent than it had been before, but principally because he contrived that it might at once be for his own security and a monument of his magnificence” (Ant. 15.8.5). He is also credited with having erected a monument over the royal tombs at Jerusalem, after having attempted to rob the dead of their sacred treasures, such as “furniture of gold, and precious goods that were laid up there” (Ant. 16.7.1).

Herod was Palestine’s greatest builder. He built a magnificent new Greco-Roman capital and port at Caesarea with its impressive breakwaters and a temple to the divine Augustus. He rebuilt Samaria and renamed it Sebaste (the Greek form of Augustus). The city was equipped with a theater and forum, and crowning the heights was a temple to Augustus. At Masada, Jericho, the Herodium near Bethlehem, and in Jerusalem he built luxurious palaces and fortified retreats. In Jerusalem he constructed baths, a theater, and a hippodrome, and he promoted Greek and Roman games. Actually he did not so much introduce as to promote Hellenistic features in Jewish life. Under the Ptolemies, Seleucids, and Hasmonaeans Hellenistic influences had been growing.

Character. Herod was not only an Idumaeans in race and a Jew in religion, but he was a heathen in practice and a monster in character. During his administration as king he proved himself to be exceedingly crafty, jealous, cruel, and revengeful. He exercised his kingly power with the disposition of a very despot. This characteristic was illustrated in its worst form toward the several members of his own family (for a family tree, see table 14, "Herod's Family"). He had nine or ten wives (Wars 1.28.4) and on the merest suspicion put to death his favorite wife, Mariamne (Ant. 15.7.1-7), and also her sons, Aristobulus and Alexander (Wars 2.11.6., closing sentence; cf. Ant. 16.10.1-16.11.7), and at last, when on his own deathbed, just five days before he died, he ordered his son Antipater to be slain (Ant. 17.7.1; Wars 1.33.7). It is no wonder that Augustus should have ridiculed this Jewish king, saying, "It is better to be Herod's hog than to be his son!" It is easy to understand how it is in accord with his character that the inquiry made by the magi, "Where is He who has been born King of the Jews?" should so arouse his jealous spirit that he should "search for the Child to destroy Him," and "sent and slew all the male children who were in Bethlehem" (Matt. 2:2, 13, 16). One of Herod's most infamous crimes occurred when he was on his deathbed. He commanded "that all the principal men of the entire Jewish nation" should come to his presence. Then he shut them up in the hippodrome and surrounded it by soldiers. He ordered that immediately after his own death, which he expected soon, they should all be killed, that it might seemingly, at least, afford "the honor of a memorable mourning at his funeral" (Ant. 17.6.5; Wars 1.33.6). The royal wretch died but the order concerning the men at the hippodrome was never carried out (Wars 1.33.8; Ant. 17.8.2; 17.9.5).

Her'od Archela'us (4 B.C.-A.D. 6). He was the eldest of the three sons who succeeded the father in the government of Palestine—the son of Malthace, the Samaritan wife (Wars 1.33.7).

Accession. His father provided in his will that Archelaus should become a king at his own death; but a deputation of fifty Jews of distinction, by the consent of Quintilius Varus, Prefect of Syria, sailed to Rome and protested against such measure, urging that instead there might be a theocracy under the civil authority of a Roman procurator. It is said that eight thousand Jews met and hailed these deputies with shouts of joy in sympathy with this movement (Wars 2.6.1).

Ethnarchy. When the emperor Augustus had read the will and heard the protestations against Archelaus, he refused him royalty and instead appointed him ethnarch over one-half of his father's kingdoms, including Samaria, Judea, and Idumaea, promising, however, that if his ruling his people should justify the measure he would thereafter make him a king over the same territory (Wars 2.7.3).

Government. But Archelaus began at once to usurp kingly prerogatives without and against imperial authority. Soon his course produced tumults and revolts, which he sought to quiet by cruelties and terrorism. On the occasion of a certain Passover he slew three thousand Jews, "till the temple was full of dead bodies: and all this was done, not by an alien, but by one who pretended to the lawful title of a king" (Ant. 17.9.5).

Deposition. In consequence of the complaints made against the ethnarch, Archelaus was deposed in the year 6 of corrected chronology, which was early in the tenth year of his government, and he was banished to Vienna in Gaul (France), where at length he died. His territory was then reduced to a Roman province and placed under the authority of Coponius as procurator (Wars 2.8.1).

Scripture Reference. A single incidental allusion is made in the gospels to Archelaus, but it is in exact accordance with his character. It was probably near the close of the first year of Christ's infancy that Joseph and Mary returned from Egypt, intending to go to Galilee by way of Jerusalem. "But when he heard that Archelaus was reigning over Judea in place of his father, Herod (the Great), he was afraid to go there. And being warned by God in a dream, he departed for the regions of Galilee" (Matt. 2:22). (For criticism on the expression "Archelaus was reigning," see Herod Antipas: Kingship, below).

Her'od An'tipas (ăń-tĭ-pās; A.D. 6–39). This prince was the full but younger brother of Archelaus (Ant. 17.1.3).

Character. As a ruler he was regarded as "sly, ambitious, luxurious, but not so able as his father" (Schürer, History of the Jewish People). Hausrath does him the scant courtesy of calling him "a wily sneak." Of him Jesus said, "Go and tell that fox, 'Behold, I cast out demons'" (Luke 13:32). His administration was characterized throughout with cunning and crime. He was intensely selfish and utterly destitute of principle.

Tetrarchy. His father had contemplated making him a king, to reign over the territory ruled by Archelaus, which constituted one-half of his own kingdom, but subsequently concluded to alter his will, making him a mere "tetrarch" of Galilee and Perea, which embraced but one-fourth of the original territory (Ant. 17.8.1), and Caesar afterward confirmed the will and "made Antipas tetrarch" (Wars 1.33.7). Besides this testimony a coin exists that distinctly proves the historicity of this tetrarchy. It was struck in the year 33 and reads on the obverse side, "Of Herod the Tetrarch"; and on the reverse side, "Tiberias," as the capital of the tetrarchy.

Marriages. Herod Antipas was first married to the daughter of Aretas, an Arabian king of Petraea. Nevertheless he was intrigued with Herodias, the wife of his half-brother, Philip I, who was a tetrarch of noble standing, in whose house Antipas was a guest. The two eloped, although both were married at the time (Ant. 18.5.1). Now Herodias was granddaughter of Herod the Great and sister of Herod Agrippa I, and the wife and niece of Herod Philip I.

John and Antipas. The scandalous conduct of Herod Antipas and Herodias is cited in the first three gospels in connection with the reproof administered by John the Baptist to Herod Antipas, and is treated quite at large by Josephus (Matt. 14; Mark 6; Luke 3; Ant. 18.7.1). For John had been saying to Herod, "It is not lawful for you to have your brother's wife" (Mark 6:18). Luke added, "But when Herod the tetrarch was reproved by him on account of Herodias, his brother's wife, and on account of all the wicked things which Herod had done, he added this also to them all, that he locked John up in prison" (Luke 3:19–20).

The first two gospels mention "the daughter of Herodias," but neither gives her name. Josephus says that her name was Salome (Ant. 18.5.4). The occasion referred to by both evangelists and historian, in which so much interest centers, was a festive party of the nobles who assembled at the tetrarch's palace to celebrate his birthday. Salome first appears in sacred history in this scene. On the mother's side she was granddaughter of Simeon, the high priest. Now the fact that a child was born to Philip and Herodias by the first marriage of the mother was a bar to her second marriage under Jewish law. Her marriage to Antipas, while her proper husband and his proper wife were still living, was aggravating to the Jews because she was a Jewess and belonged to the royal family; and their evil reputation was the more conspicuous in that Herod Antipas was the ruler of the Jews and had shamelessly defied the Jewish laws (Lev. 18:18; 20:21).

This anniversary was the occasion, and this daughter, Salome, was made the guilty person by whom Herodias secured revenge for the reproof given her husband for living with her unlawfully. After Salome danced before the nobles to the great fascination and gratification of Herod, he promised her anything she might ask of him, to the half of his kingdom. Herodias saw her opportunity and induced her daughter to request the head of John the Baptist, who was then in the nearby prison. "And although he was grieved, the king commanded it to be given because of his oaths, and because of his dinner guests" (Matt. 14:1–10). The executioner was sent to the prison at once, and the ghastly gift was given. John the Baptist was beheaded, the man who "among those born of women there has not arisen anyone greater" (11:11; Luke 7:28). The voice of one crying in the wilderness was at last silenced. "And his disciples came and took away the body and buried it; and they went and reported to Jesus" (Matt. 14:12).

The place of John the Baptist's prison was anciently known as Machaerus, but the modern name is Mkaur. It is located in the mountain fastnesses with a deep ravine below, on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea, between Abarim and Pisgah, not far from the northern extreme of the sea. It is said that the rock-hewn dungeon was beneath the splendid banquet hall in which the nobility were entertained when the swordsman was sent to bring in the prisoner's head. Here in the same mountains in which Israel sought for the grave of her first prophet (Moses), the last prophet (John) was entombed.

Treacheries. It was now the thirty-ninth year of our chronology when Caius Caligula had been upon the imperial throne at Rome for two years. He soon discovered the real character of Herod Antipas. Ascertaining that the tetrarch was plotting with a Roman officer of the army named Sejanus, had been cooperating with the king of Parthia against the Roman Empire, and had laid in store arms for seventy thousand men of war, Caligula soon called Antipas to judgment. Meantime Herodias was most urgent that the tetrarch should go to Rome and make request that he might receive a crown as king. Moreover, Antipas was extremely jealous of his nephew Herod Agrippa I, who had already received a kingdom. Antipas had deeply offended Agrippa by insulting reflections on his condition of poverty before he had had royalty bestowed on him. Agrippa was on intimate terms with the emperor and kept him posted as to these movements of his uncle Antipas. At length Antipas unwillingly was constrained to go to Rome and request that the first will of his father might be granted him by the emperor. Herod Agrippa I immediately sent his freedman named Fortunatus to Rome with the necessary documents to prove his accusations against his uncle, and Agrippa himself followed in a few days to confront Antipas with the facts and proofs in person. Antipas was just having his first interview with the emperor when Fortunatus entered and handed the letters at once to the emperor. When Agrippa had also arrived, and all the accusations against Antipas were understood by Caligula, the emperor challenged Antipas to deny the charges preferred against him of treachery toward the imperial government, in alliance with Sejanus and with Artabanus, king of Parthia, and the secret storing up arms. The tetrarch could not deny these accusations and so confessed his guilt.

Antipas Deposed. Thereupon Caligula deprived Herod Antipas of his tetrarchy “and gave it by way of addition to Agrippa’s kingdom,” confiscated his money, and sent him and his wife into perpetual banishment in Lyons, Gaul (France), and eventually in Spain, where he died (Ant. 18.7.1–2; Wars 2.9.6). Dion Cassius also relates that “Herod the Palestinian, having given a certain occasion by reason of his brothers (nephew) was banished beyond the Alps, and his estates of the government confiscated to the state” (book 55, Caesar Augustus, 27).

Jesus and Antipas. It is now in place to consider the relationships of our Savior and this tetrarch during the week of the crucifixion, which occurred six years before Herod Antipas was deposed and exiled. From the time that this Herod had slain John the Baptist, this crime had haunted his conscience. When then he heard of the deeds done by Jesus, “he was greatly perplexed, because it was said by some that John had risen from the dead.... And Herod said, ‘I myself had John beheaded; but who is this man about whom I hear such things?’” (Luke 9:7, 9). And he said, “This is John the Baptist; he has risen from the dead; and that is why miraculous powers are at work in him” (Matt. 14:2).

We find Herod Antipas at Jerusalem when Jesus was before Pilate on trial for His life. When Pilate understood that Jesus was from Galilee, the territory of Antipas, he sent him to Herod as belonging to his jurisdiction. “Now Herod was very glad when he saw Jesus; for he had wanted to see Him for a long time, because he had been hearing about Him and was hoping to see some sign performed by Him.” Nevertheless, as Christ did not reply to his questions of curiosity, he was offended, and “Herod with his soldiers, after treating Him with contempt and mocking Him, dressed Him in a gorgeous robe and sent Him back to Pilate. Now Herod and Pilate became friends with one another that very day, for before they had been at enmity with each other” (Luke 23:6–12; cf. Acts 4:27).

Kingship of Antipas. Criticism has found difficulty in understanding how the evangelists mention that “Archelaus was reigning over Judea in place of his father Herod (the Great)” as if he were a king, whereas Archelaus was but an ethnarch, and his father ruled a kingdom (Matt. 2:22). So also Herod Antipas is repeatedly called “a king” in the first two gospels when his principality was merely a tetrarchy (14:1, 9; Mark 6:14, 22–27). Alford says, “Herod was not king properly, but only a tetrarch.” Westcott states that “he was called king by courtesy.” Whedon says that he was so called “in compliance with custom”; and Farrar, “It is only popularly that he is called king.” The determining argument, however, is fatal to all these conjectural opinions and is based upon the uses of the word king at the time the evangelists employed it, and not in its modern restricted sense. We now apply the term absolutely and exclusively to royalty, but in the time of Augustus and afterward, it was applicable not only to a sovereign ruler but “in a general and lower sense applied equally to a prince, ruler, viceroy, and the like” (Robinson’s Greek Dictionary of the New Testament, on Basileus, and also Basileuō). The designation was applied “to a chief, a captain, a judge ... to a king’s son, a prince, or anyone sharing in the government; generally a lord, a master, a householder, and after Augustus, to any great man” (Liddell and Scott, Greek Dictionary [1883], on Basileus). Josephus (born A.D. 37), who lived in the time of the apostles, confirms this usage when he relates that Herod the Great altered his will, “and therein made Antipas king,” when in fact he was merely made tetrarch (Wars 1.32.7).

Herod Philip II (4 B.C.-A.D. 34), Philip the Tetrarch. See also Philippi. This Herod was also the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra of Jerusalem. He should not be confused with a half-brother of the same name, who was the son of Mariamne the Boethusian, and known as Philip I. By his father’s will Philip I was excluded from all government rights on account of the supposed treachery by his mother toward her husband (Wars 1.30.7). He married his niece Herodias, who afterward eloped with her husband’s half-brother Herod Antipas. Philip I and Herodias had a daughter named Salome, who played a role in the death of John the Baptist. Philip II, the tetrarch, married this Salome.

Tetrarchy. With characteristic accuracy, Luke (3:1) refers to this “Philip” and is confirmed in all particulars by Josephus and contradicted in none. This Jewish historian gives us definitely the countries included in Philip’s tetrarchy. He mentions (Ant. 17.11.4; cf. 17.8.1) how Herod the Great by will provided that his own kingdom should be divided among his three sons. Archelaus was to take half the territory, as has already been described, to be ruled as an ethnarch. The remaining half was to be divided into two parts, to be called tetrarchies, meaning each a fourth part, to be given to Philip II and Antipas: Philip’s tetrarchy was to include Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis (i.e., Gaulonitis, and part of Jamia; Antipas’s tetrarchy was to include Perea and Galilee. These regions were located in northeastern Palestine. There is in existence a coin struck by the authority of Philip II, in the reign of the Emperor Tiberius, which bears the following superscription:

Obverse: Tiberios Sebastos Kaiser (“Tiberius Augustus Caesar”).

Reverse: Philippou tet [rarches] (“Of Philip Tetrarch”).

Philip’s subjects were mostly Syrians and Greeks. He had a peaceful rule for thirty-seven years.

Conduct. This tetrarch was altogether the best of all the Herods. He is described as “a person of moderation and quietness in the conduct of his life and government,” whose consideration for his subjects was remarkable; When he traveled among them he was careful to have “his tribunal . . . on which he sat in judgment, [follow] him in his progress; and when any one met him who wanted assistance, he made no delay, but had his tribunal set immediately, wheresoever he happened to be; and sat down upon it, and heard his complaint” (Ant. 18.4.6). Moreover, he left monuments of himself worthy of his name in improvements for his people. At Paneas, at the base of Mt. Hermon, in the N, at the principal source of the Jordan, he built a new city called Caesarea Philippi (Ant. 18.2.1; cf. Matt. 16:13). It is now a ruin. This city must be distinguished from Caesarea on the Mediterranean Sea. He also erected Bethsaida to the rank of a city, whose site was a little N of the Sea of Galilee on the upper Jordan, and he gave it the name Julias, after Julia, “Caesar’s daughter” (Ant. 18.2.1; Wars 2.9.1).

Death. After a long rule distinguished for its moderation and equity, this worthy tetrarch died A.D. 34, which was “in the thirtieth year of the reign of Tiberius” (Ant. 18.4.6). He was greatly beloved by his people. He had married Salome, the daughter of Herodias, but they left no children. Upon his death his territory was annexed to the Roman province of Syria. “When he was carried to [the] monument which he had already erected for himself beforehand, he was buried with great pomp” (Ant. 18.4.6).

Philip and the Gospels. He is mentioned by Luke as “tetrarch of the region of Ituraea,” which is the Gk. name for the country lying at the base of the Lebanon mountains (Luke 3:1). “When Jesus came into the district (Mark, Gk. tas kōmas, “the villages”) of Caesarea Philippi, He began asking His disciples, saying, ‘Who do people say that the Son of Man is. . . . But who do you say that I am?’ And Simon Peter answered and said, ‘Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.’ And Jesus answered and said to him, ‘Blessed are you, Simon Barjona, because flesh and blood did not reveal this to you, but My Father who is in heaven’” (Matt. 16:13–17; Mark 8:27–30). It was in this region that Jesus began to teach them that “the Son of Man must suffer many things, and be rejected by the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised up on the third day” (Luke 9:22). “But they did not understand this statement, and they were afraid to ask Him” (Mark 9:32).

Thus the second generation of the Herodians known to the gospels passes out of history.

We come now to the third generation of the Herods.

Her’od Agrip’pa I (A.D. 37–44).

Princely Life. This Agrippa was the son of Bernice and Aristobulus, a son of Herod the Great, who killed him. He was born 10 B.C. and died A.D. 44. He was the child of two first cousins and was himself married to another first cousin, who again was married to an uncle! Josephus mentions him as “Agrippa” and “Agrippa the Great” (Wars 1.28.1; Ant. 17.2.2; 18.5.4). In the NT he is called either by his surname “Herod” or “Herod the king” (Acts 12:1, 6, 11, 19–21). He was brought up and educated at Rome, as were most of the Herodian princes. Agrippa appears to have been a man of gracious manners, of kindly spirit, gifted with extraordinary powers of eloquence, and quite vain. In religion he was a zealous rather than a devout Jew, attentive to “tithing mint and dill and cummin,” but neglectful of “the weightier provisions of the law: justice and mercy and faithfulness.” He was keenly fond of popularity and possessed much personal magnetism (Ant. 19.6.1–2; 19.7.3).

Reverses. Agrippa and Caius (Gaius) Caligula, the heir apparent to the imperial throne, in early life became warm personal friends, a fact that afterward was greatly to the advantage of this prince, for out of this intimacy came some remarkable surprises and reverses of fortune to Agrippa. One day these friends were riding out together in a chariot, and Eutychus, a freedman, was their charioteer. In the course of conversation, Agrippa enthusiastically stretched out his hands and said confidently to Caligula that he wished that old Tiberius would die, that Caius Caligula might assume the purple and the throne. The freedman, overhearing the remark, reported it to the emperor Tiberius, who at once peremptorily ordered Agrippa to be put in chains and then imprisoned. The order was executed, and wearing his robe of distinction, Agrippa was placed among the criminals of the state. This humiliation was endured, however, but six months, when Tiberius died, and Caligula at once became emperor (Ant. 18.6.5–6; Wars 2.9.5–6).

Kingship. A few days after the imperial funeral Agrippa was summoned to appear at the new emperor’s palace—the palace of Caligula. Having shaved and changed his garment, he presented himself hopefully in the presence of the new emperor, his friend, who immediately proceeded to “put a diadem upon [Agrippa’s] head, and appointed him to be king of the tetrarchy of [his uncle] Philip [and that of] Lysanius.” He also “changed his iron chain for a gold one of equal weight,” which he hung about his neck (Ant. 18.6.10). Afterward this golden chain was “hung up within the limits of the temple [at Jerusalem], over the treasury, that it might be a memorial of the severe fate he had lain under, . . . that it might be a demonstration how the greatest prosperity may have a fall, and that God sometimes raises what is fallen down: for this chain thus dedicated, afforded a document to all men, that King Agrippa had once been bound in a chain for a small cause, but recovered his former dignity once again; . . . and was advanced to be a more illustrious king than he was before” (Ant. 19.6.1). The Senate at Rome also gave him the honorary position of praetor.

Assumes Government. In the second year of Caligula’s reign Agrippa requested leave of the emperor to return home to Palestine and take possession of his kingdom (Ant. 18.6.11). Accordingly he sailed on the Mediterranean, in the usual course, to Alexandria in Egypt. At this time the Jews and Greeks of the city were in unpleasant relations with each other. When the Greeks saw this Jewish king, accompanied by his bodyguard and making much use of gold and silver, they spitefully took occasion to mock him with the meanest insults. They even took a poor, naked, idiot boy named Carabas, who was the butt of the street boys, placed a crown of paper on his head, clothed him in mat cloth, gave him a stick for a scepter and the gamin of the city for a bodyguard, and thrust him out onto the public stage in mockery of the new king (see Philo of Alexandria Against Flaccus 5.8). But when Agrippa reached his subjects in Palestine the Jews were astonished to see him returning as a king, and he was received with apparent satisfaction.

Memorable Services. Having organized and established his kingdom in accordance with his promise on leaving the emperor at Rome, King Agrippa I returned to the imperial capital. It was about this time that Caligula developed unmistakable indications of insanity and, among other things, demanded that he should be universally deified and adored as a god and that all men should swear by his name. He filled his Jewish subjects with the utmost horror when he ordered Petronius, governor of Syria, to place a gilded statue of the emperor in the Holy of Holies of the Temple at Jerusalem to be worshiped, because when they had submitted to become subjects of the empire they were guaranteed all their own national and religious rights. A similar attempt at Alexandria had occasioned both tumults and massacres. A delegation composed of Jews, who were the principal men among them, was organized, with the eminent Philo at their head, to persuade Caligula to desist from this inexpressible wrong. But when they went to the emperor he refused them his presence and bade Philo, “Begone!” Petronius meantime marched with an army to Jerusalem. At Ptolemais “many ten thousands of Jews” flocked to petition the Syrian prefect not to compel them to “violate the law of their forefathers”; but that, if he persisted in carrying out the imperial order, to first kill them, and then do what he was resolved upon (Ant. 18.8.1–2). Petronius was touched with this loyalty to their faith and, dismissing the Jews, promised to send to Rome in their interests in this matter (18.8.3–6). Meantime Agrippa, who was at this time at Rome, furnished in honor of Caligula a magnificent banquet. When the emperor was full of wine, and Agrippa had toasted his health, Caligula generously proposed in return everything that might contribute to Agrippa’s happiness and that so far as was in the emperor’s power, he should be at his service. With admirable tact and address Agrippa declined to receive anything on his own behalf, as he had already received so much; but, on behalf of his brethren at home, he said, “My petition is this, that thou wilt no longer think of the dedication of that statue which thou hast ordered to be set up in the Jewish temple by Petronius.” Caligula thereupon “as a favour to Agrippa” rescinded the order (Ant. 18.8.7–8). Nevertheless, because Petronius so far disobeyed Caligula’s orders as to make representations and so delay executing his orders, the emperor ordered the prefect to commit suicide (18.8.9); but the order was delayed at Rome, and soon Caligula died by the dagger of the assassin Chaerea, whom the emperor had outrageously insulted. This was in A.D. 41.

Enlarged Kingdom. Claudius now became emperor through the friendly offices of Herod Agrippa I, who with great diplomacy used his influence with the Senate favorably for this man. As a return for being elevated to the imperial succession in the house of the Caesars and the empire of the world, Claudius published edicts in favor of the Jews and greatly enlarged the dominions of Agrippa by adding Judea, Samaria, and Abilene, so that his realm was now almost as extensive as that of his grandfather King Herod the Great, lacking only Idumaea (Ant. 9.5.1; Wars 2.11.5). Evidence of the historicity of this account is furnished in a coin struck by Herod Agrippa I, at Caesarea. It reads:

Obverse: Basileus megas Agrippa Philokaiser (“Agrippa the Great, Lover of Caesar”).

Reverse: Kaisar ē Sebastō Aimeni (“Caesar on Port Sebastus”).

Sebaste is the standing Greek word for Augustus, the title assumed by several emperors. “Cumanus took one troop of horsemen, called the troop of Sebaste, out of Caesarea” (Wars 2.12.5).

Humiliations Imposed. Though having received royalty, with the added heritage of his grandfather's kingdom, Herod Agrippa was made to feel that his dominion was after all a mere dependency upon the Roman power that dominated the nations included in the Empire. Being of Idumaeen origin, it is related that on one occasion, before his kingdom had been enlarged by Claudius, when the feast of Tabernacles (or Booths, NASB) was observed, the lesson from the law for the day was read: "You shall surely set a king over you whom the Lord your God chooses, one from among your countrymen ... you may not put a foreigner over yourselves who is not your countryman" (Deut. 17:15). Remembering that he was of foreign stock and was so recognized by his brethren, Agrippa, from bitter anticipations, burst into tears before them all; but the people, sympathizing with him, exclaimed, "Fear not, Agrippa, thou art our brother!" For the law required also, "You shall not detest an Edomite, for he is your brother.... The sons of the third generation who are born to them may enter the assembly of the Lord" (Deut. 23:7-8). Agrippa thus was clearly entitled to this consideration; he was at least the third generation removed from the Idumaeans or Edomites.

Now Agrippa resided mostly at Jerusalem, and he began the building of impregnable walls to fortify the city (Ant. 19.7.2). But Marsus Vibius, prefect of Syria, ordered the constructions discontinued on the mere grounds of suspicion. The king, like his ancestors, was fond of pretentious display. He had once invited a number of petty kings contiguous to his own realm to be his guests and accept his hospitality at the city Tiberias, where royal spectacles were to be witnessed. Marsus Vibius came also from Syria. Agrippa and the five kings, thinking to do him honor, went forth in a chariot about seven furlongs to meet the prefect. But Marsus, being suspicious of the meaning of the hospitable popularity and display of the public games, offered a great affront to all concerned when he ordered the five kings to proceed at once and quietly to their respective homes (Ant. 19.8.1).

Christian Persecutions. Herod Agrippa I is known in the NT simply as "Herod." He was the only Herod who had royalty bestowed upon him and who governed all Palestine after the death of his grandfather Herod the Great, who died soon after the birth of Jesus. He is mentioned only in the book of Acts, where he is named twice in the same chapter in connection with two different events (chap. 12). Although usually a gracious man, he was exceedingly ambitious to please his Jewish subjects, and this passion led him to become a persecutor of the Christians in the little community at Jerusalem. The record reads: "Now about that time Herod the king laid hands on some who belonged to the church, in order to mistreat them. And he had James the brother of John put to death with a sword. And when he saw that it pleased the Jews, he proceeded to arrest Peter also," with a view of slaying him after the Passover was ended (Acts 12:1-3). But Peter was delivered at night by the intervention of an angel. Now this procedure was exactly in agreement with the Jewish Talmud in the Mishna, which reads thus: "The ordinance of putting to death by the sword is this, the man's head is cut off with a sword, as is accustomed to be done by royal command" (Lomby, Com., ad loc.).

Death. Agrippa and his deputies and other dignitaries of the land assembled at Caesarea, at the seaside, to celebrate the games at a festival and to offer vows for the safety and prosperity of the emperor Claudius. Early in the morning of the second day of the celebration the king presented himself to the people clad in "a garment made wholly of silver, and of a texture truly wonderful." When the sun's rays touched his dress the reflections "shone out after a surprising [splendor]." Josephus says that the people exclaimed that "he was a god" and that “the king did neither rebuke them nor reject their impious flattery” (19.8.2; cf. Acts 12:19–23). After five days the king “departed this life, being in the fifty-fourth year of his age, and in the seventh of his reign; for he reigned four years under Caius [Caligula] Caesar, three of them were over Philip’s tetrarchy only, and on the fourth he had that of Herod [Antipas] added to it; and he reigned besides those, three years under the reign of Claudius Caesar” (Ant. 19.8.2).

Her’od Agrip’pa II (A.D. 50–70).

Identification. Much confusion and difficulty have been experienced in trying to identify these two historical personages—father and son—as they bear exactly the same name. Nevertheless, they are known in both profane and sacred history by different names. Outside of Scripture the elder is called Herod Agrippa I and the younger Herod Agrippa II. But in the NT the father is named either “Herod,” as he is repeatedly called in the same chapter (Acts 12:6, 11, 19–21), or “Herod the king” (12:1); whereas the son, in contrast to the father, is called either “Agrippa” (25:22–23; 26:32) or “King Agrippa” (25:26; 26:27). True, both were kings and bore the same name, but they were not both rulers at the same time, and their kingdoms were different. So far as appears in Scripture, Herod Agrippa I was king of all Palestine proper during the period A.D. 41–44, whereas Herod Agrippa II was king of perhaps one-third of that country, lying to the N and NE, during the period A.D. 52–70, when his government was utterly destroyed by the Roman-Jewish war and the Jewish nation ceased to exist. As to scriptural incidents associated with each, it was Herod Agrippa I who beheaded James, the brother of John, and also imprisoned Peter at Jerusalem (12:1–3); but it was Herod Agrippa II who went to Caesarea, whom Paul called “King” or “King Agrippa” in his defense at Caesarea (26:2, 7, 13, 19, 26–27) and whom Luke calls either “Agrippa” or “King Agrippa” in narrating the same occasion (25:13, 22–24, 26; 26:28, 32).

Youth. When Herod Agrippa I died in A.D. 44, he left this son and three daughters, named Bernice, Mariamne, and Drusilla (Ant. 18.5.4; 19.9.1). Agrippa II, who was born A.D. 27, was only seventeen years old at his father’s death and was resident at the imperial capital, receiving his education under the patronage of the emperor. “Now Agrippa, the son of the deceased, was at Rome, and brought up with Claudius Caesar” (Ant. 19.9.2). This emperor at first contemplated placing young Agrippa immediately upon his father’s throne to rule all Palestine; but better counsel prevailing, he concluded that it would be “a dangerous experiment” for “so very young a man,” who was without any experience, to undertake to govern so large a kingdom (Ant. 19.9.2). So Claudius made the country a Roman province, and “sent Cuspius Fadus to be procurator of Judea, and the entire kingdom” (Ant. 19.9.2; Wars 2.11.6).

Royalty. When his uncle, Herod king of Chalcis, died in A.D. 48, Agrippa was twenty-one. Claudius now appointed him to be governor of that vacant kingdom. At the same time he was made superintendent of the Jewish Temple at Jerusalem and manager of its treasury, with full power to remove the high priests from office at will, an authority that he frequently exercised, as did his uncle before him (Ant. 20.1.3; 20.8.11; 20.9.1, 4, 6). These frequent changes of the high priesthood for political reasons made Herod Agrippa II quite unpopular with the Jews.

It is not clear whether royalty was conferred upon this Agrippa when he was appointed at Chalcis over his uncle’s vacant kingdom, but it is quite certain he had this distinction at least when he was transferred to another and greater kingdom. His royal residence was finally established at Caesarea Philippi, at the southwestern base of Mt. Hermon, which is at the principal source of the Jordan River.

Kingdom. Josephus remarks: “Now after the death of Herod, king of Chalcis, Claudius set Agrippa, the son of Agrippa, over his uncle’s kingdom, while Cumanus took upon him the office of procurator of the rest [of the territory], which was a Roman province” (Wars 2.12.1). He also mentions that about the year 53, “when [Claudius] had completed the twelfth year of his reign, he bestowed upon Agrippa [II the two former tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanius]; but took from him Chalcis, when he had been governor thereof four years” (Ant. 20.7.1; Wars 2.12.1), “and removed [him] into a greater kingdom” (Wars 2.12.8). His realm was now situated in the N and NE of Palestine, but the regions known as Peraea, Judea, Samaria, and Galilee, which belonged to the kingdom of his father, were never included in the kingdom of King Herod Agrippa II. A coin exists, struck by the authority of the second Herod, at Caesarea Philippi, the capital of his new kingdom, in the imperial reign of Nero, which reads thus:

Obverse: “Nero Caesar.”

Reverse: “By King Agrippa, Neronias.”

That is, the city Caesarea Philippi is renamed “Neronias” in honor of Nero, the reigning emperor at that time.

End. Herod Agrippa II, unlike his father, was never popular with his subjects. It appears to have been the purpose of the procurator, Florus, to goad the Jews into revolt and war with the whole Roman Empire by his own official and infamous conduct toward those people. The “multitude of Jews . . . addressed themselves to the king [Agrippa II] and to the high priests, and desired they might have leave to send ambassadors to Nero against Florus” (Wars 2.16.3). But Agrippa, in a public address, endeavored to dissuade the Jews from their warlike purpose, an appeal that ended in tears and greatly moved the impassioned people addressed. But when Agrippa saw that the inevitable had come, he joined his forces with those of the Romans and made war upon his abused and aggrieved subjects (Wars 2.16.4–2.17.4). In a battle before Gamala he was wounded in the elbow by a stone but continued in command of his own troops until the Romans had destroyed both his kingdom and the Jewish commonwealth. The war closed in the capture of Jerusalem in the year 70. Agrippa then retired to Rome, where at length he died at the age of seventy-three, A.D. 100, and in the third year of the reign of the emperor Trajan.

Josephus makes special note that Titus, the Roman general, affixed his signature to the history of the Roman-Jewish war, as written by himself, and authenticated its statements as being historical, and, moreover, when he was emperor, ordered the publication of his books; and that Josephus then had in his possession sundry letters from Herod Agrippa II attesting the truth of his historical narrative as one who was an eye-witness of the facts stated therein (Life 65).

Princesses of the House of the Herods. The Herodian princesses were not themselves Jewish rulers but were married to those who were. They belonged to the royal family by birth. Though there were others, Herodias, Bernice, and Drusilla are the only Herodian princesses mentioned in the NT.

Herodias (he-rō-di-as; feminine of Herod). The daughter of Aristobulus—one of the sons of Mariamne and Herod the Great—and sister of Herod Agrippa I. See above, under Herod Antipas: John and Antipas.

Bernice (ber-nî-se). Bernice was the eldest daughter of Agrippa I, by his wife Cypros, and the sister of Herod Agrippa II, Mariamne, and Drusilla. She was espoused to Marcus, the son of Alexander, and upon his death was married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, by whom she had two sons (Josephus Ant. 18.5.4; 19.5.1). After the death of Herod she lived for some time with her brother, Agrippa II, probably in an incestuous relationship. She was afterward married to Polemon, King of Cilicia, but soon deserted him and returned to her brother. With him she visited Festus on his appointment as procurator of Judea, when Paul defended himself before them all (Acts 25:13, 23; 26:30). She afterward became the mistress of Vespasian and his son Titus.

Drusilla. Herod Agrippa I left three daughters, named Bernice, Mariamne, and Drusilla, in that order (Ant. 18.5.4). When the father died in A.D. 44, Drusilla was only six years old.

As she grew into womanhood she became a celebrated beauty and was the envy of even her sister Bernice.

Being a Jewess of a family of distinction, she accepted in marriage Azizus, king of Edessa (Emesa), on the express condition that he would conform to the required ceremony of becoming a Jew, but when “Felix was procurator of Judea, he saw this Drusilla, and fell in love with her; for she did indeed excel all other women in beauty.” Felix sent a Jew “to persuade her to forsake her present husband, and marry him; and, [he] promised, that if she would not refuse him, he would make her a happy woman.” She accepted this offer and was “prevailed upon to transgress the laws of her forefathers, and to marry Felix; and when he had a son by her, he named him Agrippa” (Ant. 20.7.1–2). This son and mother died in the eruption of Mt. Vesuvius in A.D. 79.

Claudius Felix was a man of low origin and instinct. He “had been a slave [in Rome], in the vilest of all positions, at the vilest of all epochs, in the vilest of all cities” (Farrar). Tacitus says that as a procurator “Antonius Felix exercised the prerogatives of a king, with the spirit of a slave, rioting in cruelty and licentiousness”; a man who “supposed he might perpetrate with impunity every kind of villainy” (Annals 12.54). Suetonius remarks that “in consequence of his elevation [to be procurator of Judea], he became the husband of three queens” (Claudius 28).

During the procuratorship, “Felix arrived with Drusilla, his wife who was a Jewess, and sent for Paul, and heard him speak about faith in Christ Jesus. And as he was discussing righteousness, self-control, and the judgment to come, Felix became frightened and said, ‘Go away for the present, and when I find time, I will summon you.’” He hoped that bribe money would be given him to release Paul and accordingly sent for him often, but when he was to be succeeded by the honorable Porcius Festus, “Felix left Paul imprisoned” to please the Jews (Acts 24:24–27). Thus closed the scene and the procuratorship of Felix at Caesarea. H.F.V. BIBLIOGRAPHY: F. W. Farrar, The Herods (1898); A. H. M. Jones, The Herods of Judea (1938); S. HERODIANS (he-rō'di-anz). A party among the Jews of the apostolic age, and keenly opposed to Jesus (Matt. 22:16; Mark 3:6; 12:13); but of which no explicit information is given by any of the evangelists. The party was probably formed under Herod the Great and appears to have held that it was right to pay homage to a sovereign who might be able to bring the friendship of Rome and other advantages, but who had personally no title to reign by law and by religion. On this question they differed from the Pharisees (Matt. 22:16–17), although they joined forces with them in disguised opposition, or in open union against Jesus, in whom they saw a common enemy. The Herodians were obviously something more than a political party and something less than a religious sect.

HERO'DION (he-rō'di-on; derived from “Herod”). A Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation as his kinsman (Rom. 16:11).

HERON. See Animal Kingdom.

HE'SED. The father of one of Solomon's deputies, Ben-hesed (which see).

HESH'BON (hesh'bon; “reckoning”). Originally a Moabite town, but when the Israelites arrived from Egypt it was ruled over by Sihon, called both “king of the Amorites” and “king of Heshbon.” It was taken by Moses (Josh. 13:21, 26) and became a Levitical city (21:39; 1 Chron. 6:81) in the tribe of Reuben (Num. 32:37; Josh. 13:17), but being on the border of Gad, is sometimes assigned to the latter (Josh. 21:39; 1 Chron. 6:81). Heshbon, now Hesbân, is twenty miles E of Jordan and four thousand feet above that stream as it enters the Dead Sea. It is the site of an excellent spring that made it an extremely desirable location. Its extensive ruins, particularly from the Roman period, are still visible.

Siegfried Horn of Andrews University excavated at Heshbon in 1968 and 1971, and Lawrence Geraty (also of Andrews) worked there in 1974 and 1976. A cut through part of the tell revealed that it had an occupational history extending from the twelfth century B.C. to the fourteenth century A.D., and excavations do not support existence of a town on the site in the days of Sihon. In spite of some searching in the area, no other candidate for the Heshbon of Sihon has yet been found.

Figurative. In Song of Sol. 7:4 the eyes of the Shulammitte are likened to “the pools in Heshbon, by the gate of Bath-rabbim.” The bright pools in the stream that runs beneath Hesbân on the W are probably intended (Harper). H.F.V.

HESH'MON (hesh'mon). A town in the S of Judah (Josh. 15:27), perhaps the same as Azmon (v. 4).

HES'LI (hes'li). Son of Naggai and father of Nahum of the maternal ancestry of Christ after the Exile (Luke 3:25; “Eslī,” KJV and NIV). He is probably the same as Elioenai (which see), the son of Neariah and father of Johanan (1 Chron. 3:23–24).

HETH (heth). The forefather of the nation of the Hittites (which see) called “sons of Heth” (Gen. 23:3, 5, 7, 10, 16, 18, 20; 25:10; 49:32). Once we hear of the “daughters of Heth” (27:46). In the genealogical tables of 10:15–18 and 1 Chron. 1:13–16 Heth is named as a son of Canaan, younger than Sidon, the firstborn, but preceding the Jesusite, Amorite, and other Canaanite families. The Hittites were, therefore, a Hamitic race. The NIV renders all references to the “sons of Heth” as “the Hittites.”

HETH (ח) (hāth). The eighth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, cf. Ps. 119:57–64.

HETH'OLON (heth'lon). The name of a place on the northern border of Palestine (Ezek. 47:15; 48:1). In all probability the “way of Hethlon” is the pass of the northern end of Lebanon and is thus identical with “Lebo-hamath,” i.e., “the entrance of Hamath” in Num. 34:8, KJV, marg. It may, however, be identified with Heitela, NE of Tripoli in Syria.

HEWING. The Gibeonites, having deceived Joshua, were sentenced to serve as “hewers of wood and drawers of water for the whole congregation” (Josh. 9:21), a service that was performed by the lowest class of the people (Deut. 29:11). In 1 Kings 5:15 it is recorded that Solomon had “80,000 hewers of stone in the mountains.” The NIV refers to them as “stonecutters.”

HEZ'EKI. See Hizki.

HEZEKIAH (hez-i-kī'a). The name of a king (which see) of Judah and of two other persons.

1. An ancestor of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. 1:1), 630 B.C. rendered “Hizkiah” in KJV.

2. One of those who sealed the covenant with Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. 10:17; “Hizkijah,” KJV). Some believe that the name should be taken with that preceding and it should be read as “Ater-Hezekiah,” a name given (KJV) in the lists of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (cf. Ezra 2:16; Neh. 7:21; Smith, s.v.).

HEZEKIAH, KING (hez-i-kī'a; “Jehovah is strength”).

The twelfth sovereign (excluding Athaliah), of the separate kingdom of Judah. His coregency lasted from 728 to 715 B.C. and his sole regency from 715 to 686 B.C. He was the son of Ahaz and Abi of Abijah, born 736 B.C. (2 Kings 18:1–2; 2 Chron. 29:1).

Reformer. As a godly king his first act was to purge, repair, and reopen the Temple, which had been neglected and polluted during the idolatrous reign of his weak father, Ahaz. His task consisted of rooting out Canaanite fertility cults and other pagan contaminations. Hezekiah's reformation was so thorough that he did not even spare “the high places.” These centers of contaminated worship on hilltops “he removed ... and broke down the sacred pillars and cut down the asherah” (2 Kings 18:3–7; 2 Chron. 29). A still more decisive act was the destruction of the bronze serpent of Moses (cf. Num. 21:9), which had become an idolatrous object. His great reformation was followed by the celebration of the Passover (chap. 30), to which not only all Judah was summoned but also the remnant of the ten tribes.

Warrior.

War with Philistines. Early in his reign (c. 714 B.C.) Hezekiah assumed an aggressive war against the Philistines. He not only retook the cities that his father had forfeited (2 Chron. 28:18–19) but even dispossessed the Philistines of their own cities except Gaza (2 Kings 18:8) and Gath (Josephus Ant. 9.13.3). Accordingly, he came to rule as a sort of feudal overlord of the Philistine cities, and Ashdod under its Greek prince was induced to lead them in the revolt against Assyria.

Early Relations with Assyria. Hezekiah inherited the Assyrian menace from his father, who mortgaged the Judean kingdom to “the giant of the Semites.” From 715 B.C., the beginning of his own independent rule, Hezekiah faced a series of Assyrian invasions that dominated his reign. As a wise and godly ruler, he made every attempt to build up his country that he might eventually throw off the Assyrian yoke his father had saddled upon it by alliance (2 Kings 16:7–9). The purport of his reform was to fortify the moral and spiritual defenses of his country. He also built up the national economy and the military. Agriculture and trade expanded by the establishment of warehouses and stock yards at strategic places (2 Chron. 32:27–29). A national system of defenses was inaugurated (32:5–7), and Jerusalem was given an adequate water supply in the event of siege (32:30). Ample warning was granted Judah of the Assyrian peril. In Hezekiah's fourth co-regnal year (724 B.C.)—undoubtedly his regency is meant—Shalmaneser V had begun, and by the beginning of 721 B.C. Sargon II had completed, the siege of Samaria (2 Kings 18:9–11). In the ensuing interval the Assyrian menace moved ever nearer. In 711 B.C. Sargon claimed the credit of a campaign against Ashdod. The Assyrian record (Isa. 20:1) clearly outlines that it was the Assyrian commander-in-chief “tartan” (Assyrian turtannu, “second in rank”) who actually conducted the campaign. See W. F. Albright, O.T. Commentary, Philadelphia (1948), p. 161.

Sennacherib and Hezekiah. Early in the reign of Sennacherib, Hezekiah revolted against Assyria. The Assyrian preoccupation in lower Mesopotamia with the irrepressible Chaldeans of the sea lands under Merodach-baladan, king of Babylon, coupled with Hezekiah’s consciousness of his own prosperity, were prime factors in the revolt. It was the same Merodach-baladan who, pretending to congratulate Hezekiah upon his recovery from a serious illness, tried with lavish gifts to win over Judah into a coalition that was being secretly formed against Assyria (Isa. 39:1–8). This Merodach-baladan was twice ruler of Babylon (722–710 B.C., 703–702 B.C.), and his embassy to Judah was apparently dispatched in the latter part of the earlier period of his reign. Hezekiah manifested egotistical folly in showing Merodach-baladan’s emissaries all his treasures. Isaiah, foreseeing the future strengthening of the Chaldeans, severely rebuked Hezekiah for his foolishness. In 701 B.C. the Assyrian emperor launched his great western campaign as a punitive measure against Hezekiah and other Palestinian-Syrian rebels. This important campaign is not only vividly described in the biblical record but is also contained in the annals of Sennacherib, which were recorded on clay cylinders, or prisms. The edition of these annals is found on the so-called Taylor Prism of the British Museum, with a copy on a prism of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago. In detail Sennacherib depicts his third campaign, which included the siege of Jerusalem. After the subjugation of Philistine coastal towns and Philistine strongholds, together with Moabite, Edomite, and other cities, he refers to a victorious battle near Altaku (Eltekeh), where Palestinian forces were reinforced by Egyptian bowmen and chariotry. Then Sennacherib makes a lengthy reference to his attack on Hezekiah’s realm. “As for Hezekiah, the Jew, who did not submit to me, all 46 of his strong walled cities as well as the small cities in their neighborhood ... I besieged and took. 200,150 people, great and small, male and female, horses, mules, asses, camels, cattle and sheep without number I brought away from them and counted as spoil. Himself, like a caged bird, I shut up in Jerusalem, his royal city. Earth works I threw up against him—the one coming out of his city gate I turned back to his misery. The cities of his which I had despoiled I cut off from his land and to Mitinti, king of Ashdod, Padi, king of Ekron, and Sili-bel, king of Gaza, I gave them.” Sennacherib goes on to tell that the “terrifying splendor” of his majesty overcame Hezekiah. This Assyrian monarch boasts placing Hezekiah under a large tribute, carrying away gems, antimony, jewels, couches of ivory, elephant hides, maple, boxwood, and all kinds of valuable treasures as well as his daughters, his harem, and his musicians. The account of Sennacherib’s western campaign recorded on the Taylor Prism is evidently the same as that described in 2 Kings 18:13–19:37; 2 Chron. 32:1–12; and Isa. 36:1–37:37. There are numerous striking points of agreement, as well as some difficulties. For example, when Sennacherib invaded Palestine he is said to have captured many of the fortified Judean cities (2 Kings 18:13) and to have threatened Jerusalem with a great army dispatched from Lachish under “Tartan and Rab-saris and Rabshakeh” (v. 17). A sculpture recovered at Nineveh shows Sennacherib sitting upon his chair throne at Lachish and receiving rich spoils while prisoners are tortured. These details fit well into the biblical account. Moreover, it is now known from the monuments that Tartan (Assyrian turtannu, “second in rank”), Rabshakeh (Assyrian rab-shaqu, “chief officer”), and Rab-saris (Assyrian rabu-sha-reshi, originally “chief eunuch”) were titles of high Assyrian officials and not personal names at all (Millar Burrows, What Mean These Stones? New Haven [1941], p. 43f.). Hezekiah’s tribute is placed at thirty talents of gold in both sources but at only three hundred talents of silver in 18:14, as compared with eight hundred that the Assyrian king mentions. E. Schrader reconciles the two differences on the basis of the Babylonian light and Palestinian heavy talent, whereas George Barton suggests a textual corruption (Archaeology and the Bible, 7th ed. [1937], p. 473).

Sickness and Death. The Assyrians, despite their boasts, were not able to take Jerusalem. Toward the end of his reign Hezekiah became dangerously ill (2 Kings 20:1; 2 Chron. 32:24; Isa. 38:1). His kingdom was still in a perilous state from the Assyrian menace. Having no heir at the time, Hezekiah prayed that his life might be spared. He was granted a fifteen-year extension of life and died a natural death peacefully (686 B.C.).

Builder.

Siloam Tunnel. Hezekiah is famous for the steps he took to supply fresh water within the city walls of Jerusalem. "He made the pool and the conduit, and brought water into the city" (2 Kings 20:20). In Chronicles it is appended that "it was Hezekiah who stopped the upper outlet of the waters of Gihon and directed them to the west side of the city of David" (2 Chron. 32:30). The intermittent spring of Gihon, Jerusalem's most ancient water supply, was located below the steep eastern hill (Ophel) in the deep Kidron Valley. It was thus exposed to enemy attack. Hezekiah completely covered over this ancient spring and diverted it through a conduit 1,777 feet long and hewn out of solid rock into a reservoir within the city walls. Tunnels at Megiddo and Gezer are similar to this amazing engineering feat of Hezekiah's workmen.

Siloam Reservoir. In addition to the tunnel, Hezekiah built a larger reservoir, called the Pool of Siloam. The pool measures about 20 × 30 feet. In Jesus' day the blind man who was healed was directed to go and wash in this pool (John 9:7–11).

The Siloam Inscription. Hezekiah's tunnel was made famous by its remarkable inscription, discovered accidentally in 1880 by a boy wading in the pool. The six-line memorial, beautifully cut on the wall of the conduit in classical Heb. characters about nineteen feet from the Siloam end of the aqueduct, has paleographic value on a par with the Moabite Stone. The inscription is translated: "The boring through is completed. Now this is the story of the boring through. While the workmen were still lifting pick to pick each toward his neighbor and while three cubits remained to be cut through, each heard the voice of the other who called his neighbor, since there was a crevice in the rock on the right side. And on the day of the boring through the stone cutters struck, each to meet his fellow pick to pick; and there flowed the waters to the pool for 1200 cubits and 100 cubits was the height of the rock above the heads of the stone cutters."

HE'ZION (he'zi-on; "vision"). The father of Tabrimmon and grandfather of Ben-hadad I, to whom Asa sent silver and gold from the sacred treasury to secure his aid against Baasha (1 Kings 15:18), before 915 B.C. In the absence of all information, the natural suggestion is that he is the same person as Rezon, the contemporary of Solomon (11:23). The two names are similar in Heb. and even more so in the versions (Smith).

HE'ZIR (he'zir; "swine, boar").

1. The head of the seventeenth course of priests as established by David (1 Chron. 24:15), after 1000 B.C.

2. One of the heads of the people who sealed the solemn covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:20), 445 B.C.

HEZ'RO (hez'rō). One of David's elite heroes known as "the thirty" (2 Sam. 23:35; 1 Chron. 11:37). He was a Carmelite, i.e., a native of the town of Carmel in the mountains of Judah. See Carmel.

HEZ'RON (hez'ron).

1. The third son of Reuben (Gen. 46:9; Ex. 6:14; 1 Chron. 4:1; 5:3). His descendants were called Hezronites (Num. 26:6).

2. The elder of the two sons of Perez and grandson of Judah (Gen. 46:12; Ruth 4:18–19; 1 Chron. 2:5, 9, 18, 21, 24–25; cf. Matt. 1:3; Luke 3:3, where the KJV renders “Esrom,” and the NASB and NIV, “Hezron”).

3. A place on the southern boundary of Judah, W of Kadesh-barnea (Josh. 15:3, 25). In the latter passage it is called Kerioth-hezron and is identified with Hazor (which see).

HID'DAI (hid'ay). One of the “thirty” heroes of David, “of the brooks of Gaash” (2 Sam. 23:30). In 1 Chron. 11:32 he is given as Hurai (which see).

HID'DEKEL (hid'e-kel; Heb. Hiddekel; Sumerian, Igna; Babylonian, Idigla, Diglat; Old Persian, Tigra; Gk. Tigris). The Hiddekel is thus the ancient name of the Tigris (Gen. 2:14, see marg.; Dan. 10:4, marg.), a name used by the NIV. Modern Arabs still call it Diglah. The Pishon and the Gihon mentioned in connection with the rivers of Eden (Gen. 2:10–14) are presumably canals, called rivers in Babylonia, which connected the Tigris and Euphrates as ancient river beds. Biblical notices thus place the Garden of Eden somewhere in the Tigris-Euphrates country, evidently in the easternmost third of Breasted's “Fertile Crescent.” The Tigris has its chief source in central Armenia, originating on the southern slope of the Anti-Taurus. Two eastern sources rise out of Lake Van. As the river flows ESE through the Kurdistan Mountains, it is gradually augmented by various tributaries such as the Upper and Lower Zab and the Dyalah. In ancient times the Tigris entered separately into the Persian Gulf; now it joins the Euphrates and mingles with its waters for more than one hundred miles in the Shatt al-Arab before entering the Persian Gulf. The entire length of the Tigris to the junction of the Euphrates is 1,146 miles and is only slightly more than half the length of the latter stream. On the banks of the Tigris were located Nineveh and the ancient Assyrian city of Ashur.

HI'EL (hi'el; perhaps “God liveth”). A native of Bethel, who rebuilt Jericho in the reign of Ahab (1 Kings 16:34), and in whom was fulfilled the curse pronounced by Joshua (Josh. 6:26), after 875 B.C.

HIERAP'OLIS (hē-er-ap'o-lis; city of the mythical Amazon queen Hiera). This important center of Christian influence was situated near Colossae and Laodicea in the Lycus River valley of Phrygia. It is referred to only in Col. 4:13 (cf. Acts 19:10, marg.). Paul evidently did not preach there. Other of the early Christians did, possibly Philip the Evangelist and John. The hot baths of Hierapolis, noted for their medicinal benefits, drew patrons of the Plutonium (“Entrance to Hades”). The city was a wealthy dyeing center. It was a cosmopolitan city with a considerable Jewish population. In 1887 Karl Humann led a German archaeological team in preliminary excavations at Hierapolis. Italian archaeologists under the supervision of Paolo Verzone worked at the site in 1957, 1958, 1961, and 1962. The main street, more than a mile long, was built during the reign of Domitian near the end of the first century A.D. An arch of Domitian and a Byzantine gate also stand on that section of roadway. N of town may be seen ruins of a second century bath converted into a Christian church in the fifth century. Beyond that sprawls a necropolis with tombs dating from Hellenistic to Christian times. In the south end of town stand a greater bath complex dating from the second century A.D., a well-preserved theater from the same century, a temple of Apollo of the third century, and a Christian basilica of the sixth century. From dates indicated, it is evident that what has been excavated so far does not date to NT times. H.F.V.

HIEROGLYPHICS (hī'er-o-glif'iks; from Gk. hieros, “sacred,” and gluphein, to “carve”). Pictures of such objects as an animal, tree, bird, etc., representing a word, syllable, or single sound and intended to convey a meaning. The name was first applied to the engraved marks and symbols found on the monuments and other records of ancient Egypt. The key to these inscriptions was the Rosetta Stone, which Champollion successfully deciphered. The Egyptian hieroglyphics were generally engraved but in old temples are found in high relief. They are generally read from right to left either vertically or horizontally. They ceased to be written about A.D. 300. See Writing.

HIGGAI'ON (hi-gī'yon). Possibly a musical note. It is transliterated in Ps. 9:16; translated “resounding music” in 92:3 and “meditation” in 19:14.

HIGHEST (Heb. elyôn, “elevated”; Gk. hupsistos). A title ascribed to Jehovah (Ps. 18:13; 87:5; KJV only; NASB and NIV, “Most High”) and, in the NT, to our Savior as being of the highest region, i.e., heaven (Matt. 21:9; Mark 11:10; Luke 2:14; etc.). See also Most High.

HIGH PLACE (from Canaanite bāmâ, plural, bāmôt, “ridge”; Heb. “elevation of land”). Localities chosen as places of worship of God or idols. The high places were features of Canaanite religion, and the conquering Israelites were commanded to destroy them when they entered Canaan (Num. 33:52; Deut. 33:29). Israel came in contact with the high places of the Moabites before they entered the land (Num. 21:28; 22:41). Being defiled by Canaanite fertility cults and other paganistic pollutions, the high places were often connected with licentiousness (Hos. 4:11–14) and immorality (Jer. 3:2). One of the best known high places is the “Conway High Place” at Petra. (See W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine, pp. 161–65.) The Ugaritic tablets of the late fifteenth century B.C. from Ras Shamra show that animals were sacrificed in the high places of Baal in North Syria. Always contiguous to the rock altar was a sacred pillar, maššēbâ, a sacred pole having phallic associations capped with a symbol of the āshērâ, evidently denoting female fertility. Male prostitutes, qdēshîm, and sacred courtesans, qāḏēshôt (1 Kings 14:23–24; 2 Kings 23:7), maintained chambers for cultic prostitution in honor of the heathen deity. At Gezer firstborn babies were slain and their bodies placed in jars near the high place (cf. Isa. 57:5). Early shrines indicate that the elevation was intended to display impressiveness. Babylonians devised artificial hills called ziggurats. The Greeks loved their lofty Mt. Olympus and their Acropolis. The worship of Jehovah, contrary to the law of Moses, which specified one altar for all Israel, was often conducted on high places. The Mosaic prescription was a safeguard to protect the people from idolatrous associations and corruption. The worship of the God of Israel at other altars was allowable only in times of great stringency, as after the fall of Shiloh, when the Temple had not yet been erected (1 Kings 3:2–4; 2 Chron. 1:3). High places were legitimate also in the Northern Kingdom, when access to the Jerusalem Temple was no longer possible. After Solomon, who grievously sinned in erecting high places for his heathen wives (1 Kings 11:1–8), this heathenistic institution prevailed among many kings of the Davidic line. Jehoram, Jehoshaphat's son, made high places in the mountains of Judah (2 Chron. 21:11), as did Ahaz. Hezekiah broke them down (2 Kings 18:4, 22); Manasseh, in his idolatrous orgy, re-erected them (21:3). They were again destroyed by Josiah (23:5, 8, 13). The prophets denounced the high places (Ezek. 6:3). Emphasis was placed on the fact that Zion was the place to worship (Isa. 2:2–3; 8:18; Joel 2:1; 3:17; Amos 1:2; Micah 4:1–2). M.F.U.

HIGH PRIEST. See Priest, High.

HIGHWAY (usually Heb. m^hillâ). An embanked road or raised causeway. See Roads.

HI'LEN (hi'len; 1 Chron. 6:58). See Holon.

HILKI'AH (hil-kî'a; portion of Jehovah).

1. The father of Eliakim, who was overseer of the household in the time of Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:18, 26, 37; Isa. 22:20; 36:3, 22), 715 B.C.

2. High priest in the reign of Josiah. According to the genealogy in 1 Chron. 6:13 (see Neh. 11:11) he was son of Shallum and, from Ezra 7:1, apparently the ancestor of Ezra the scribe. His high priesthood was rendered particularly illustrious by the great reformation effected under it by King Josiah (2 Kings 23:4; 24; 2 Chron. 34:9, 14–22), by the solemn Passover kept at Jerusalem in the eighteenth year of the king's reign (35:1–19), and, above all, by the discovery that he made in the house of the Lord of a book called “the book of the law” (2 Kings 22:8) and “the book of the covenant” (23:2), 639 B.C. The contents of this book are unknown.

3. A Merarite Levite, the son of Amzi and father of Amaziah (1 Chron. 6:45).

4. The second son of Hosah, a Merarite, appointed by David as gatekeeper of the Tabernacle (1 Chron. 26:11), about 995 B.C.

5. One of those who stood at the right hand of Ezra while he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), about 445 B.C.

6. One of the chief priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. 12:7). His son, Hashabiah, is mentioned in v. 21, 536 B.C.

7. A priest of Anathoth and father of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 1:1), before 626 B.C.

8. Father of Gemariah, who, with Elasah, was sent by Zedekiah with a message to the captives at Babylon (Jer. 29:3), before 599 B.C.

HILL. The rendering of several words in the original.

1. “Hill” (Heb. gîb·â; “high”), from a root that seems to indicate curvature or humpishness, peculiarly applicable to the rounded hills of Palestine (Ex. 17:9; 1 Sam. 7:1; etc.).

2. “Mountain” (Heb. har). Our translators have also employed the English word “hill” for the very different term har, which has a much more extended sense than gîb·â, meaning a whole district rather than an individual eminence, and to which our word mountain answers with tolerable accuracy. For instance, the “hill country” of Deut. 1:7; Josh. 9:1; 10:40; 11:16 is the elevated district of Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim, which would more correctly be called “the mountain.” In 2 Kings 1:9 and 4:27, the use of the word hill obscures the allusion to Carmel, which in other passages on the life of the prophet (e.g., 1 Kings 18:19; 2 Kings 4:25) has the term Mount correctly attached to it.

3. In the NT the Gk. word bounos (“hillock”) is rendered “hill” (cf. Luke 3:5; 23:30), whereas oros (to “rise” or “rear”) is sometimes rendered “hill” and sometimes “mountain” (cf. Matt. 5:1 to 5:14; Luke 4:29 to 9:37; etc.).

HILL COUNTRY. The rendering in the OT (Josh. 21:11) of har (see Hill, no. 2; and Bethel, Mount of); and in the NT of the Gk. oreinos, “mountainous” (Luke 1:39, 65); and meaning Mt. Ephraim. The rendering “hill country” is misleading. “With their usual exactness the Hebrews saw that these regions (i.e., the mountains of Judah, Ephraim, and Naphtali) formed part of one range, the whole of which they called not by a collective name, but singularly—the mountain” (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 53).

HIL'LEL (hil'lel; “praising”). A Pirathonite and father of the judge Abdon (Judg. 12:13, 15), before 1070 B.C.

HIN. See Metrology: Liquid Measures of Capacity.

HIND. The female of Hart. See Animal Kingdom: Deer.

HINGES. The rendering of two Heb. words, namely, šîr, to “open,” Prov. 26:14, and pōth literally an “interstice,” 1 Kings 7:50 (NIV, “sockets”). Doors in the East turn on pivots rather than on what we call hinges. They were sometimes made of metal (e.g., Solomon had hinges in the Temple made of gold) or at least plated with it, but generally they were of the same material as the door itself. These pivots worked in sockets—above and below—in the door frame. With the weight of the door resting on the lower pivot, the door would open with much less ease than one working on our hinges, especially when the lower socket became worn (cf. Prov. 26:14).

HINNOM, VALLEY OF (hin'om). Otherwise called “the valley of the son of Hinnom,” or “the valley of Benhinnom”; a deep and narrow ravine with steep, rocky sides to the S and W of Jerusalem, separating Mt. Zion to the N from the “Hill of Evil Counsel,” and the sloping rocky plateau of the “valley of Rephaim” to the S. The earliest mention of the valley of Hinnom is in Josh. 15:8; 18:16, where the boundary line between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin is described as passing along the bed of the ravine. On the southern brow, overlooking the valley at its eastern extremity, Solomon erected high places for Molech (1 Kings 11:7), whose horrid rites were revived from time to time in the same vicinity by the later idolatrous kings. Ahaz and Manasseh made their children “pass through the fire” in this valley (2 Kings 16:3; 2 Chron. 28:3; 33:6), and the fiendish custom of infant sacrifice to the fire-gods seems to have been kept up in Topheth at its southeast extremity for a considerable period (Jer. 7:31; 2 Kings 23:10). To put an end to these abominations the place was polluted by Josiah, who rendered it ceremonially unclean by spreading over it human bones and other corruptions (2 Kings 23:10, 13–14; 2 Chron. 34:3–5). From that time it appears to have become the common cesspool of the city, into which its sewage was conducted to be carried off by the waters of the Kidron, as well as a laystall, where all its solid filth was collected. From its ceremonial defilement and from the detested and abominable fire of Molech, if not from the supposed everburning funeral piles, the later Jews applied the name of this valley Ge Hinnom, “Gehenna,” to denote the place of eternal torment. The name by which it is now known is Wâdi Jehennam, or Wâdi er Rubêb. See Gehenna; Hell.

HIP AND THIGH. In KJV a proverbial expression for a “great slaughter” (Judg. 15:8), similar to the Arab. “war in thigh fashion” or the German “cutting arm and leg in two.”

HIPPOTAMUS. See Animal Kingdom: Behemoth.

HI'RAH (hi'ra). An Adullamite and friend of Judah (Gen. 38:1, 12; cf. v. 20).

HIRAM (hī'ram; probably shortened from ahiram, “exalted brother,” Heb. and Phoenician). Generally in the Chronicles “Hiram”; and “Hirom” in 1 Kings 5:10, 18, marg. Hiram (Ahiiram) was a common Phoenician royal name, as is attested by the inscriptions, notably that discovered on the sarcophagus of Ahiiram at Byblos (biblical Gebal, Ps. 83:7; Ezek. 27:9), discovered in 1923–24 by a French expedition under M. Montet and dating probably from the eleventh century B.C. (See W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel, p. 40.) However, we cannot definitely identify Hiram of Tyre with Ahiiram of Byblos.

1. King of Tyre, who sent an embassy to David after the latter had conquered the stronghold of Zion and taken up his residence in Jerusalem. It seems that the dominion of this ruler extended over the western slopes of Lebanon; and when David built himself a palace, Hiram materially assisted the work by sending cedar wood from Lebanon and skillful workmen to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:11; 1 Chron. 14:1). He reigned c. 970–936 B.C., and was the same prince who sent an embassy of condolence and congratulation when David died and Solomon ascended the throne. In consideration of large quantities of grain, wine, and oil sent him by Solomon, Hiram furnished from Lebanon the timber required for the Temple, delivering it at Joppa, the port of Jerusalem (1 Kings 5:1–12, 18; 9:11–14, 27; 2 Chron. 2:3, 11–12). He also supplied large quantities of gold and received from Solomon in return twenty towns in Galilee (1 Kings 9:11–14). When he came to inspect them, they pleased him so little that he applied to them a name of contempt (Cabul) and returned them to Solomon (1 Kings 9:11–13; 2 Chron. 8:2). It does not, however, appear that the good understanding between the two kings was broken by this unpleasant circumstance. It was after this that he admitted Solomon’s ships to a share in the profitable trade of the Mediterranean (1 Kings 10:22); and Jewish sailors, under the guidance of Tyrians, were taught to bring the gold of Ophir (9:26–28) to Solomon’s two harbors on the Red Sea. Diodorus, the Phoenician historian, and Menander of Ephesus assign to Hiram a prosperous reign of thirty-four years and relate that his father was Abibal and his son and successor Baleazar. Others (later writers, as Eusebius, after Tatian, Proep. Ev. 10.11) relate that Hiram, besides supplying timber for the Temple, gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon. Some have regarded this Hiram as a different person from the friend of David, arguing from the long reign necessary if he was the same one who helped David build his house. Hiram I was evidently a powerful ruler, since at this era southern Phoenicia was consolidated under one king who ruled at Tyre but who was officially called “King of the Sidonians.”

Another Hiram, king of Tyre, is mentioned in the royal records of the great Assyrian conqueror Tiglath-pileser III (744–727 B.C.).

2. The son of a widow of the tribe of Naphtali and of a Tyrian father. He was sent by King Hiram to execute the principal works of the interior of the Temple and the various utensils required for the sacred services (1 Kings 7:13–14, 40). It is probable that he was selected for this purpose by the king with the notion that his half-Hebrew blood would render him the more acceptable at Jerusalem, about 960 B.C. He is known as Hiram (which see) in the NIV.

HIRE. See Wages.

HIRED MAN, HIRED SERVANT (Heb. šākîr; Gk. misthōtos). A laborer employed on hire for a limited time (Job 7:1; 14:6; Mark 1:20), as distinguished from one belonging to his master. Naturally, as a temporary laborer, he would feel much less interest than would the shepherd or permanent keeper of the flock (John 10:12–13, “hireling”). See Service.

HISS (Heb. shāraq, to “whistle”). This term usually expresses insult and contempt (Job 27:23) or mingled astonishment and contempt, as by beholders of the ruined Temple (1 Kings 9:8). The Heb. term may also be translated whistle (which see).

HISTORY, NEW TESTAMENT AND EARLY CHRISTIANITY. The fifty years from the birth of Christ to the accession of the last of the Herods—Herod Agrippa II—is a period of unparalleled changes and complications in the government and political geography of Palestine.

Table 15 (pp. 573–75) synchronizes the reign of the Roman emperors of the first Christian century, the numerous high priests of the Jews, and the different political governments of that country, with the Christian history of the same period.

Table 16 (p. 576) lists and gives dates for the high priests who served from 4 B.C. to A.D. 67 and slightly after, and it compares the dates assigned to the successive procurators of Judea by various critics (Schürer, Lewin, Whitehouse, and McClintock and Strong).

HISTORY, OLD TESTAMENT. To write an OT history would require careful analysis of the entire biblical narrative. Such a task is impossible here. Therefore, table 17 (pp. 577–79), summarizing the correlation of OT events with contemporary history, is presented (see also Chronology.) In locating such pivotal events as Abraham's entrance into Canaan, the Exodus, and the conquest in the frame of contemporary history, the author adheres to the numbers preserved in the MT of the Heb. OT, thus placing Abraham's birth c. 2161 B.C., his entrance into Palestine c. 2086 B.C., the Egyptian sojourn c. 1871–1441 B.C., the Exodus c. 1441 and the conquest c. 1400 B.C. Scholars who do not hold to the OT chronological scheme place Abraham anywhere from 2000 B.C. to 1600 B.C., the Egyptian sojourn not until 1720 B.C. or later, and the Exodus 1290 B.C. in the reign of Rameses II or in the reign of Merneptah (1230

B.C.) or even later toward the close of the thirteenth century B.C. These views, however, cannot be reconciled with the general chronological scheme underlying Genesis through Kings, despite alleged archaeological evidence offered in their support.

HITTITES (hit'its; Heb. Hittî, Hittîm, Hêt).

Old Testament References. A people mentioned frequently in the OT, forty-seven times under their own name and fourteen times as descendants of Heth (Gen. 10:15). In the days of Abraham a group was located in the neighborhood of Hebron (chap. 23), from whom the patriarch bought a burial place. Esau married Hittite wives (26:34; 36:2); the spies sent out by Moses found Hittites located in the hill country (Num. 13:29). Hittites were among the dwellers of Canaan at the time of the conquest and offered opposition to Israel (Josh. 9:1–2; 11:3). They were located near a territory held by Israel, for the inhabitants of Luz built a new city in Hittite territory (Judg. 1:26). As the land was gradually conquered, the Hittites were not driven out by Israel but remained and in some cases intermarried. They appear in various ways at later times. Hittites were among David's followers (1 Sam. 26:6). Uriah, whom David put to death, was a Hittite (2 Sam. 11:3). Solomon had Hittite women in his harem (1 Kings 11:1). Hittites, among others, were used as forced labor (9:20–21). The various biblical references to the Hittites used to be treated with great skepticism, but thanks to our ability through archaeology to resurrect an ancient people, today the Hittites and Hittite culture are well known.

Archaeological Discovery. It is now known that the center of Hittite power was in Asia Minor. There an empire that once vied with Egypt and Assyria, but had been long forgotten, has been discovered by modern archaeologists. A missionary at Damascus named William Wright and the orientalist A. H. Sayce were among the first scholars to piece together the picture of this ancient imperial people from scattered monuments (Wright, The Empire of the Hittites [1884]; A. H. Sayce, The Hittites, the Story of a Forgotten Empire, rev. ed. [1925]). Knowledge was vastly increased when a German professor named Hugo Winckler discovered thousands of cuneiform tablets at Boghaz-keui, the Hittite capital located on the great bend of the Halys River, ninety miles E of Ankara. This phenomenal discovery was made in 1906–7 and 1911–12. A Czech scholar, Friedrich Hrozný, and other linguists have deciphered Hittite cuneiform used between 1900 and 1100 B.C. This accomplishment has opened up a vast Hittite literature consisting of their annals, religious texts, and myths in Sumero-Akkadian characters received from the Hurrians (Horites). Portions of Hittite legal codes have also been discovered. Though many Hittite excavations have been conducted, pride of place goes to the work at Boghaz-keui, the four-hundred-acre capital of the Hittite empire. From 1931 to 1939, Kurt Bittel led German Oriental Society digs there and resumed them again in 1952. Since then annual excavations have been conducted at the site.

Periods of Hittite Power. Two chief periods of Hittite power are to be distinguished. The first (1800–1600 B.C.) refers back to the time of the First Dynasty of Babylon; the second comprises the new Hittite kingdom, which was powerful in the years 1380–1200 B.C. This latter kingdom was consolidated by a powerful ruler at Boghaz-keui named Suppiluliuma. This mighty conqueror incorporated into his empire the Mesopotamian kingdoms of Mitanni and of the Hurri and pushed his army southward into Syria to the very confines of Palestine. The king of Mitanni, whom he conquered, was named Tushratta, well-known from his correspondence with Amenhotep III and IV of Egypt (J. A. Knudtzon, Die el-Amarna Tafeln). Tushratta gave his daughter to be the wife of Amenhotep III. Suppiluliuma was followed by Arandash and then Arandash's brother; Mershilish was followed by his son Muwatallish. The latter clashed with Rameses II in the famous Battle of Kadesh and almost defeated the proud pharaoh. The brother and second king after Muwatallish was Hattushilish, who signed a non-aggression pact with Rameses II. This agreement was sealed by the marriage of the Hittite king's daughter to Rameses II. Around 1200 B.C. Egyptian power went into temporary eclipse, and the Hittite empire came to its end. The capital at Boghaz-keui fell. However, Hittite kingdoms continued to exist at Senjirli, Carchemish, Sakjegeuzi, Hamath, and other places. Evidently Hittites from these city states filtered S into Palestine and even entered the Hebrew armed forces. One such person, Uriah the Hittite, was the husband of Bathsheba.

Language and Culture. The Hittites were non-Semitic, probably Aryan, the first Indo-Europeans to cross the Caucasus into Armenia and Cappadocia. They brought with them pre-Indo-European language, the harbinger of Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, Slavonic, and Teutonic tongues. They formed a cultural tie between Europe and Mesopotamia.

Aggressiveness. Many scholars consider the Hittites to be the third most influential of ancient peoples of the Middle East, rivaling the Egyptians and the Mesopotamians. Hebrews dreaded them as well as the empires on the Tigris and Euphrates. About 1750 they destroyed the Babylonian capital of the great Hammurabi. Their aggressiveness is demonstrated also in their commercial activities, which included an extensive trade in horses with Solomon. Clay tablets reveal that like the Hyksos, the Mitanni, and other peoples of Western Asia, the Hittites were noted for fine horses. The Hittites also kept secret their iron-smelting formula when iron was regarded to be almost as valuable as silver and gold. Not until two centuries later did the Philistines come into this knowledge and not until the Saul-Davidic era did Israel learn it.

Religion. Hittite religion contains a grand medley of Egyptian and Babylonian deities. The Hittites transported Ishtar of Nineveh as far W as Asia Minor. Marduk, the patron god of Babylon, is said on one tablet to have gone to the land of the Hittites where he sat upon his throne for twenty-four years. They also assimilated Egyptian deities with the gods of Syria and Asia Minor. Hittites dwelt in what later became prominent centers of early Christianity: Tarsus, Iconium, Lystra, etc. The famous Ephesian goddess Diana may have been a Hittite Artemis. Hittite gods are frequently depicted astride the backs of animals or enthroned between them. However, they are not actually presented as animals. This was evidently the arrangement in Jeroboam's cultic calves at Dan and Bethel, with Jehovah invisibly enthroned. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

HI'VITES (hī'vīts; cf. Heb. ḥawwâ, "tent village," Arab. ḥiwa, "collection of tents," Heb. "the Hivite"). One of the seven nations of Canaan who were to be destroyed by the Israelites (Deut. 7:1, and elsewhere; cf. Gen. 10:17). The focus of the Hivites seems to have been in the N. In Josh. 11:3 the Hivites dwelt "at the foot of Hermon in the land of Mizpeh"; in Judg. 3:3 they "lived in Mount Lebanon, from Mount Baal-hermon as far as Lebo-hamath"; in 2 Sam. 24:7 "all the cities of the Hivites" are numbered apparently near Tyre. And all these seem to be in some sense official locations of the Hivite race, rather than mere chance settlements. But the name Hivite may be a descriptive term like Amorite (which see) and not a local name, for we find Hivites in other localities. Hamor, the father of Shechem, was a Hivite. The whole story (Gen. 34:2–31) shows them to have been warmhearted, impulsive, and overconfident (v. 23), as well as overly trustful (v. 21) and given to trade and to the multiplication of flocks and herds rather than to war. It is hinted that the absence of any attempt at revenge confirms this impression of unwarlike character, as does the ease with which Abimelech took the city, though indeed at last not without hard fighting (Judg. 9:22–49) and by the “unmilitary character” of his slayer and of her weapon (v. 53). Perhaps the name of their god, Baal-berith, “Baal of the league,” may confirm this impression of their unwarlike character. In Josh. 9:7, 17 we find Hivites occupying four confederate cities (Gibeon, Chephirah, Beeroth, and Kiriath-jearim) in the western half of the territory assigned. Here we find the same foresighted keenness and disposition to gain their ends by diplomacy rather than by arms; their craft this time is less self-confident and more successful.

The Hivite form of government is not described, but the mention of “our elders and all the inhabitants of our country” (Josh. 9:11) certainly indicates one in which the people had considerable voice, since the sending of an embassy of unconditional peace is one of the highest acts of sovereignty. Hamor and Shechem “spoke to the men of their city” (Gen. 34:20–24) and reasoned but did not attempt to command.

There is confusion between Hivite and Horite (Hurrian) in the original text of Gen. 36:2, 20, 29 and Josh. 9:7, LXX. It is possible that the Hivites were an ethnic subdivision of the Horites (Hurrians). See Horite.

HIZ'KI (hiz'kî; “my strength”; or perhaps an abbreviation for Hezekiah). One of the “sons” of Elpaal; one of the chief residents of Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:17–18; “Hezeki,” KJV).

HIZKI'AH, HIZKI'JAH. A son of Neariah and descendant of Jehoiachin and thus part of the post-exilic royal line (1 Chron. 3:23). See Hezekiah.

HOAR FROST. See Frost.

HO'BAB (hō'bab; “beloved”). The son of Reuel the Midianite (Num. 10:29; Judg. 4:11), 1440 B.C. He has usually been identified with Jethro (Ex. 18:5, 27; cf. Num. 10:29); but it is rather his father, Reuel, to whom the title “Moses’ father-in-law” is intended to apply in 10:29. That Jethro and Reuel were names of the same person seems evident from Ex. 2:18, 21; 3:1. Hobab would, therefore, be the brother-in-law of Moses. When Jethro returned to his home (18:27), Moses prevailed upon Hobab to remain (as seems implied by the absence of any refusal to his second request in Num. 10:29–32) and act as guide through the desert. We find his descendants among the Israelites (Judg. 4:11).

HO'BAH (hō'ba). A place N of Damascus to which Abraham pursued the kings who had pillaged Sodom (Gen. 14:15). Location uncertain, possibly Tell el-Salihiye, about ten miles E of Damascus.

HOBATIAH. See Habaiah.

HOD (hod; “majesty”). One of the sons of Zophah, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:37).

HODATIAH. See Hodaviah.

HODAVIAH (hod-a-vī'a; “praise of Jehovah”).

1. The first named of the seven sons of Elieoenai, of the descendants of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:24), probably a brother of Nahum (Luke 3:25; “Naum,” KJV).

2. One of the chief men of the tribe of Manasseh, E of Jordan at the time of the Assyrian captivity (1 Chron. 5:24).

3. Son of Hasennuah and father of Meshullam, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 9:7), before 536 B.C.

4. A Levite whose descendants (seventy-four in number) returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:40), before 536 B.C. In the parallel passage (Neh. 7:43) his name is written Hodevah. He is probably the same as Judah (Ezra 3:9).

HO'DESH (hō'desh; "a month"). One of the wives of Shaharaim, of the tribe of Judah, several of whose children are enumerated (1 Chron. 8:9), in v. 8 more correctly Baara (which see).

HODE'VAH (ho-dē'va; "majesty of Jah," Neh. 7:43). See Hodaviah, no. 3.

HODI'AH (ho-dī'a; "majesty of Jehovah").

1. A man referred to in 1 Chron. 4:19. The KJV interpreted Hodiah as a female name, and spoke of "the sons of his wife" as being "the father of Keilah the Garmite, and Eshtemoa the Maacathite." The KJV reading, "the sons of his wife Hodiah the sister of Naham," is probably in error; see the NASB of 1 Chron. 4:17–19. The NIV reads, "the sons of Hodiah's wife, the sister of Naham." The Heb. grammatical structure supports the interpretation that it is the wife of Hodiah who is in view, for otherwise the words "Hodiah" and "wife of" should be reversed in line with normal appositional structure.

2. One of the Levites who assisted Nehemiah in expounding the law (Neh. 8:7; 9:5). From the association of his name in 10:10 with some of those mentioned in connection with his in 8:7, we conclude that they are the same person, 445 B.C.

3. Another Levite mentioned in Neh. 10:13 as one of those who signed the covenant with Nehemiah.

4. One of the Israelites who joined in signing the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:18).

HOG'LAH (hog'la; perhaps "partridge," cf. Arab. hajal, "partridge"). The third of the five daughters of Zelophehad the Gileadite to whom, in the absence of male heirs, portions were assigned by Moses (Num. 26:33; 27:1; 36:11; Josh. 17:3).

HO'HAM (hō'ham; derivation uncertain). The king of Hebron who joined the league against Gibeon but was overthrown in battle by Joshua and slain after being captured in the cave of Makkedah (Josh. 10:3), after 1400 B.C.

HOLD. See Stronghold.

HOLIDAY (Heb. hānāḥâ, "quiet"). It has been related that when Ahasuerus took Esther to be his wife he "made a holiday for the provinces" (Esther 2:18; "release," KJV). The exact nature of this holiday or "quiet" is not known, but the LXX and Aram. understand it as immunity from taxes.

HOLINESS (Heb. qōdesh; Gk. hagiōsunē; in both cases "separation," or "setting apart," holy, from Saxon, "halig," "whole," "sound"). Holiness is a general term used to indicate sanctity or separation from all that is sinful, impure, or morally imperfect; i.e., it is moral wholeness. The term is used with reference to persons, places, and things.

Holiness of God. Holiness is one of the essential attributes of the divine nature. It is, on the one hand, entire freedom from moral evil and, on the other, absolute moral perfection. The Scriptures lay great stress upon this attribute of God (Ex. 15:11; 1 Sam. 2:2; Pss. 71:22; 99:9; 111:9; Isa. 6:3; Hab. 1:12; Rev. 15:4; etc.). Of great consequence in this connection is the revelation of God's holiness in the character and work of Jesus Christ. (Regarding the sinlessness of Christ, see the discussion “The Uniqueness of Christ as a Person” in the article Jesus Christ; and also the article Atonement).

By the holiness of God, it is not implied that He is subject to some law or standard of moral excellence external to Himself, but that all moral law and perfection have their eternal and unchangeable basis in His own nature. He is the One in whom these eternal sanctities reside, who is Himself the root and ground of them all. In this sense it is said without qualification, “There is none holy like the Lord” (1 Sam. 2:2); “Thou alone art holy” (Rev. 15:4).

The holiness of God is set before us in the Scriptures as of great practical consequence. (1) It is the special ground of reverence, awe, and adoration (Pss. 71:22; 111:9; Isa. 6:3; etc.). (2) It is the standard of all holiness (Matt. 5:48; 1 Pet. 1:6; etc.). (3) It implies necessarily the divine opposition to, and condemnation of, all sin (Hab. 1:13; 1 Sam. 6:20; Isa. 6:5; etc.). (4) The contemplation of this attribute is accordingly peculiarly adapted to awaken or deepen human consciousness of sin. See Scriptures above referred to. (5) It is revealed to men, nevertheless, as setting before them the highest end of their aspiration, hope, and endeavor (Ex. 19:6; Lev. 20:7; Heb. 12; 1 Pet. 1:16).

Holiness in Moral Creatures Generally. The Scriptures represent the unfallen angels as “holy” (Matt. 25:31; Mark 8:38); men are also in many instances represented thus (2 Kings 4:9; 2 Chron. 35:3; Ezra 8:28; Mark 6:20; 1 Pet. 2:5).

But in all such cases the following distinctions are to be borne in mind: (1) Holiness of the most exalted type in the creature, as in the holy angels, is less than the holiness of God. Their holiness is perfect conformity to the will of God, One infinitely superior to themselves. The holiness of God is absolute; its law is in the perfection of His own Being. (2) God is in the most complete sense separate from evil. In Him is no possibility of sin. With infinite comprehension He perfectly measures the enormity of sin and hates it with a perfect hatred. The angels are finite in their capacities, and, however holy, there exists for them at least the abstract possibility of sinning. For this reason it is written, “There is no one holy like the Lord” (1 Sam. 2:2); “He puts no trust even in His servants; and against His angels He charges error” (Job 4:18), and, “Behold, he puts no trust in his holy ones, and the heavens are not pure in His sight” (15:15). In connection with the last passage, Dillmann says, “In comparison with the all-transcending holiness and purity of God, the creatures which ethically and physically are the purest are impure.”

Holiness in Man. We may note: (1) In many cases the holiness ascribed to men in the Scriptures is simply ceremonial and formal. They are persons “separated,” “set apart,” or dedicated to holy services. They were expected or required along with this outward dedication, however, to lead holy lives and to be inwardly dedicated, a requirement frequently overlooked. Thus the priests and the Levites are spoken of in the OT as “holy.” (2) The holiness predicated or required of men, upon which the Scriptures everywhere lay almost exclusive stress, is that of character and conduct. (3) Man appears before us in the Scriptures as a fallen being, by nature unholy and sinful. Created in the image of God, he has lost one of the most essential features of that image—holiness. (4) Holiness, so far as it appears in man, is an outcome of God’s gracious work in salvation and yet not without the proper exertion of one’s own free will and the putting forth of strenuous effort (Eph. 4:22–24). (5) Exalted attainments in holiness are possible for men and often realized in this life (Luke 1:75; 2 Cor. 7:1; 1 Thess. 3:13). (6) The whole tone of Scripture accords with the weighty exhortation “Pursue peace with all men and the sanctification without which no one will see the Lord” (Heb. 12:14). (6) The NT teaches that the believer was sanctified positionally when he was saved by virtue of his being presented “in Christ” (1 Cor. 1:2, 30), that he is being sanctified experientially as he reckons upon his position in Christ (Rom. 6:11), and that he will be ultimately sanctified in the sense of full conformity to Christ in glorification (Rom. 8:30). See Sanctification.

Holy Place, Things, etc. The Scriptures also ascribe holiness to places (e.g., the Temple and the “Holy of Holies”) and to things such as altars and other accessories of worship. By holiness in such instances is meant “separation” or dedication to holy uses, and of course there is implied no moral quality or inherent sanctity in the objects themselves. They were to be treated with reverence, as should churches and accessories of worship in these days, because of the holiness of God to whose service they are dedicated. See Holiness, Ceremonial.

HOLINESS, CEREMONIAL. Jehovah had called Israel to be “a kingdom of priests and a holy nation” (Ex. 19:6), having placed them in covenant fellowship with Himself. In this covenant relationship He established an institution of salvation, which furnished the covenant people with the means of obtaining the expiation of their sins and securing righteousness before God and holiness of life with Him (see also Lev. 11–15; 17–18; Deut. 14:1–21). This holiness was shown in certain ceremonies and laws:

1. The dedication of the firstborn (Ex. 13:2, 12–13; 22:29–30; etc.) and the offering of all firstlings and firstfruits (Deut. 26:2, 10; etc.).
2. The distinction between clean and unclean food (Lev. 11; Deut. 14).
3. Provision for purification (Lev. 12–15; Deut. 23:1–14). See Purification.
4. Laws against disfigurement (Lev. 19:28; Deut. 14:1–2) and against excessive scourging (25:3).
5. Laws against unnatural marriages and lusts (Lev. 18, 20).
6. Holiness of priests (which see), Levites (which see), and sacred places. See Tabernacle; Temple.

HOLM OAK. See Vegetable Kingdom: Cypress.

HO'LON (hō'lon; “sandy”).

1. A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:51), given to the priests (21:15). Sometimes identified with Khirbet 'Alin, ten miles NW of Hebron.

2. A city in the plain of Moab upon which judgment was pronounced by Jeremiah (Jer. 48:21). Not identified although named in connection with Jahzah, Dibon, and other known places.

HOLYDAY (Heb. hāgag, to “dance”; Gk. heortē). A KJV term better rendered “festival” (so NASB and NIV, Ps. 42:4; Col. 2:16) or “feast.”

HOLY SPIRIT. The third Person in the Trinity.

Scriptural Designations (Heb. rûah, ēlohîm “Spirit of God,” or rûah, YHWH, “Spirit of Jehovah”; Gk. to pneuma to hagion, “the Holy Ghost,” or “the Holy Spirit”). Frequently the term is simply “the Spirit,” or “the Spirit of the Lord,” or “the Spirit of God,” or “the Spirit of Jesus Christ” (Matt. 3:16; Luke 4:18; John 14:17; Acts 5:9; Phil. 1:19).

Theological Statements. The doctrine of the Holy Spirit has about it the difficulty that belongs to that of the Trinity or the existence of God as a purely spiritual being—the difficulty that arises from the narrow limits of human understanding. Nevertheless, the Scriptures bring to us their definite representations of truth, and with these Christian thought must concern itself. The chief topics of theology respecting the Holy Spirit are: (1) His personality; (2) His deity; (3) His relation to the Father and to the Son; and (4) His office or work.

Personality. The historic and prevailing doctrine of the Christian church, in accordance with the Scriptures, has been that the Holy Spirit is a person distinct from the Father and the Son, though united to both in the mysterious oneness of the Godhead. He is not simply a personification or figurative expression for the divine energy or operation, as some have held at various periods of the history of the church (Anti-Trinitarians), but He is an intelligent agent, possessed of self-consciousness and freedom. In proof of this it is justly said: (1) that the Scriptures that ascribe distinct personality to the Father and the Son with equal explicitness ascribe distinct personality to the Holy Spirit. Prominent illustrations of this are found in Matt. 3:16–17; 28:19; John 14:16–17; 15:26. (2) The pronouns used with reference to the Holy Spirit are invariably personal pronouns, e.g., John 16:13–14; Acts 13:2. (3) The attributes of personality, self-consciousness, and freedom are ascribed to the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 2:10; 12:11). (4) The relations described as existing between the Holy Spirit and mankind are such as to emphasize His personality. The Spirit strives with man (Gen. 6:3). He instructs, regenerates, sanctifies, and comforts believers (John 3:5–6; 14:16–17; 16:13–14; 1 Pet. 1:2). We are warned not to “blaspheme against,” “not to resist,” not to “grieve,” nor to “quench” the Holy Spirit (Matt. 12:31–32; Acts 7:51; Eph. 4:30; 1 Thess. 5:19).

Deity. The deity of the Holy Spirit has been but little disputed in the church by those who have admitted His personality. The Arian heresy of the fourth century, which represented the Holy Spirit as the earliest of all the creatures of the created Son, is the chief exception to the general rule. The Scriptures that establish the personality of the Holy Spirit in many cases, as must have been noted, also establish His deity. Beyond this, attention is commonly called to the following sure indications of Holy Scripture: (1) The Holy Spirit is distinctly called God, and names are given to Him that properly belong to God (Acts 5:3–4; Acts 28:25–27; Heb. 10:15–17; 2 Cor. 3:17–18). (2) Divine attributes, such as knowledge, sovereignty, and eternity, are ascribed to the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 2:11; 12:11; Heb. 9:14). (3) Divine works, such as creation and the new birth, are attributed to Him (Gen. 1:2; Job 26:13, KJV; John 3:3–8). (4) Worship and homage such as belong only to God are paid to the Holy Spirit (Acts 28:25–27; 2 Cor. 13:14). And harmonious with this is the fact that the sin against the Holy Spirit is the unpardonable sin (Matt. 12:31–32). See Sin: The Unpardonable Sin.

Relation to Trinity. The relation of the Holy Spirit to the Father and to the Son is a subject with respect to which the faith of the church developed slowly. The controversies of the first four centuries related principally to the Son. The Council at Nicaea, A.D. 325, gave forth simply this clause respecting the third Person in the Trinity: “And we believe in the Holy Spirit.” The second Council at Constantinople, A.D. 381, added the words “the Lord and Giver of life who proceeds from the Father, who is to be worshiped and glorified with the Father and the Son, and who spake through the prophets.” At the third Synod of Toledo, A.D. 589, the words “filio que” (“and the Son”) were added, so as to assert the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son as well as the Father. This was a principal cause of the division between the Western and Eastern churches, the former maintaining, the latter denying, that the Holy Spirit proceeds from both the Father and the Son (see Shedd, Hist. of Doctrine, 1:355–62). The prevailing doctrine may be thus summed up: (1) The Holy Spirit is the same in substance and equal in power and glory with the Father and the Son. (2) He is, nevertheless, as to His mode of subsistence and operation, subordinate to both the Father and the Son, as He proceeds from them and is sent by them, and they operate through Him (John 15:26; 16:13–15; 14:26; Phil. 1:19; Acts 11:15–17).

Office. Van Oosterzee does well to say, “Happily, not the sounding the depths of the Holy Spirit’s nature, but the receiving and possessing of the Holy Spirit himself, is for us, even as Christian theologians, the main point.” Hence, without detracting from the value of what has preceded, of paramount importance is the office and work of the Holy Spirit. This is indicated as follows: (1) The Spirit is the immediate source of all life, physical and intellectual (Ps. 104:30; Isa. 32:15; Job 33:4; Gen. 2:7, KJV; Ex. 31:3; Num. 11:17; etc.). (2) He bore an important part in the coming of Christ in the flesh and the qualifying of His human nature for His work (Luke 1:35; John 3:34; 1:32–33). (3) He is the revealer of all divine truth. The Scriptures are especially the product of the Holy Spirit (Mic. 3:8; John 14:26; 16:13; 1 Cor. 2:10–13). (4) He moves upon the hearts and consciences of all men, attending revealed truth with His power wherever it is known and even where it is not known, affording some measure of divine light and gracious influence (Acts 2:17; John 16:7–11; 1 Cor. 2:4). (5) He convicts men of sin; graciously aids them in repentance and faith; regenerates, comforts, and sanctifies believers; bears witness to their acceptance with God and adoption as God’s children; and dwells in them as the principle of a new and divine life. In addition to Scripture quoted above, see Rom. 8:14–16; 1 Cor. 6:19; 2 Cor. 3:17–18 (see Witness of Spirit). (6) He also exercises guidance in the ministrations of the church, calling men to various offices and endowing them with qualifications for their work (Acts 13:2, 4; 1 Cor. 12:4–11).

Special Work in the Believer. The Holy Spirit in this particular age from Pentecost to the outtaking and glorification of the church, the Body of Christ, performs a special work in every believer the moment he exercises saving faith in Christ. Simultaneously with regenerating him the Spirit baptizes the believer into union with other believers in the Body (1 Cor. 12:13) and into union with Christ Himself (Rom. 6:3–4). This is a unique and distinctive ministry of the Spirit during this age. The Holy Spirit also dwells perpetually within every believer (John 14:17; Rom. 8:9–14; 1 Cor. 6:19–20) and seals every believer for the day of redemption (Eph. 4:30). In addition, the Holy Spirit fills every believer when special conditions of filling are met (5:18).

Dispensational Ministry. According to the prophetic announcement of John the Baptist of the Spirit’s baptizing work (Matt. 3:11–12; Mark 1:8; Luke 3:16–17; John 1:32–33), the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ were to inaugurate the new age of the Holy Spirit’s ministry. Our Lord prophetically announced a drastic change in the Holy Spirit’s operation in the age that was to begin. At Pentecost the Holy Spirit came as the ascension gift. He came, moreover, in a sense in which He was not here before and to perform all the ministries delegated to Him in this age; namely, regenerating, baptizing, sealing, and indwelling every believer with the added privilege of each believer’s being filled with the Spirit, if he meets the conditions of filling. The distinctive ministry of the Spirit for this age is His baptizing work. This occurred for the first time in Acts 2 (cf. 1:5; 11:15–16). The first occurrence of the baptizing work of the Spirit in chap. 2 marked the birthday of the Christian church. In chap. 8 the racially mongrel Samaritans were admitted to gospel privilege and granted the gift of the Holy Spirit, which included the Spirit’s baptizing work, placing them in the church, the Body of Christ. In chap. 10 the Gentiles were likewise admitted. This latter instance marks the normal course of the age. Every believer, upon the simple condition of faith in Christ, is regenerated, baptized into the Body, indwelt perpetually, sealed eternally, and given the privilege of being continuously filled. The experiences of OT saints and all pre-Pentecost believers came short of these tremendous blessings that are the heritage of every genuine believer in this age.

HOLY SPIRIT, SIN AGAINST. See Sin: The Unpardonable Sin.

HO'MAM (hō'mam; cf. Heb. hāmam, "confuse, make a noise"). One of the sons of Lotan and grandson of Seir the Horite (1 Chron. 1:39). In the parallel passage (Gen. 36:22) his name is written Hemam.

HOME. See Family; Household.

HOMER. See Metrology: Dry Measures of Capacity.

HONESTY. "Honest" is generally rendered "honorable" and "right." Gk. semnotēs has the meaning of "gravity, probity, purity" (1 Tim. 2:2, KJV; "dignity," NASB; "holiness," NIV). "Honesty" (Rom. 13:13; 1 Thess. 4:12, KJV) is the rendering of the Gk. euschēmonōs and means "seemly, properly, with propriety" ("decently," NIV). In general, honesty stands for upright disposition, integrity in dealing with others, probity, purity. In Gen. 42:11 and Luke 8:15, mention is made of "honest men" and an "honest heart" (NIV, "noble heart").

HONEY. A sweet, thick fluid manufactured by bees from flowers and fruits and placed in the cells of the comb (Judg. 14:8; Ps. 19:10). In the East honey was much esteemed as food (Gen. 43:11; 2 Sam. 17:29). It was often eaten directly from the honeycomb or prepared in various ways (Ex. 16:31; 1 Sam. 14:26). Canaan is often described as a land "flowing with milk and honey" (Ex. 3:8, 17; etc.). This graphic figure portrays the fertile land supplying rich pasture for cattle, which give milk so abundantly that the land is said to flow with it, and producing many kinds of flowers, which provide food to honey-producing bees. Wild honey was frequently deposited in rocks (Deut. 32:13), in trees (1 Sam. 14:25–26), and, upon occasion, in the carcasses of animals (Judg. 14:8). It was sought for making pastries and condiments. Honey was produced not only from bees but also artificially from dates and grapes (Arab. dibs; Josephus Wars 4.8.3). Honey was excluded from the offerings made by fire to the Lord (Lev. 2:11), apparently because, like leaven, it produces fermentation. Honey was often presented as a gift (Gen. 43:11; 1 Kings 14:3). John the Baptist had "wild honey" as an important part of his diet (Matt. 3:4). Honey in general supplied the place of sugar. For example, three hundred pounds of grapes produced one hundred pounds of dibs and, when diluted with a little water, furnished a kind of sugar (Ex. 16:31).

Figurative. Honey and milk are used to denote sweet discourse (Song of Sol. 4:11). The Word of God is compared to honey and described as spiritually delectable (Pss. 19:10; 119:103), and honey taken in appropriate quantities is used to illustrate pleasure in moderation (Prov. 25:16, 27). See also Animal Kingdom: Bees. M.F.U.

HONOR. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words, meaning: (1) respect paid to superiors, such as to God (John 5:23; Rev. 5:12); to parents and kings, including submission and service (Ex. 20:12; Matt. 15:4; 1 Pet. 2:17); the esteem due to virtue, wisdom, glory, reputation, and probity (Prov. 15:33; 22:4; 29:23); (2) the reward, emolument, position given to subjects (Num. 22:17, 37; 2 Chron. 1:11–12) and the final reward of righteousness (John 5:44, marg.; Rom. 2:7; Heb. 2:7; 2 Pet. 1:17).

HOOD (Heb. ṣānîṭp). A KJV expression (Isa. 3:23). See Diadem; Dress; Turban.

HOOF (Heb. parsâ, to “split, divide”). The cleft or “split” foot of cattle (Ex. 10:26; Lev. 11:3; etc.), and also of the horse, though not cloven (Isa. 5:28; Jer. 47:3). The parting of the hoof is one of the main distinctions between clean and unclean animals. See also Claw; Nail.

HOOK.

1. A ring, such as we place in the nose of a bull to lead him about (2 Kings 19:28; Isa. 37:29; Ezek. 29:4; etc.); an allusion in the first two passages to the absolute control of Jehovah over Sennacherib. A similar method was adopted for leading captives, such as Manasseh (2 Chron. 33:11).

2. A peg, or pin, upon which the curtains were hung in the Tabernacle (which see; Ex. 35:11; etc.).

3. A vinedresser’s pruning hook (Isa. 2:4; Mic. 4:3; Joel 3:10).

4. Forked pegs, upon which the carcasses of beasts were hung for flaying (Ezek. 40:43).

5. A fleshhook or fork (both which see).

HOOPOE. See Animal Kingdom.

HOPE. In the NT the “expectation of good” (Gk. elpis). This original word denotes a joyful and contented expectation of eternal salvation (Acts 23:6; 26:7; Rom. 5:4–8; 1 Cor. 13:13). Because of God’s manifested salvation in Christ, and because He is the source of all the believer’s expectations, He is called the “God of hope” (Rom. 15:13). Paul calls his converts his hope, not as the cause but as objects of his hope. In the OT hope is expressed by several different words meaning “safety, security, trust” (Heb. betah, Pss. 16:9; 22:9, both KJV; etc.). Another Heb. word denoting “refuge,” in the sense of firm and certain expectation, is mibṭah (Pss. 42:5; 71:5). In KJV hope is used in the sense of “refuge,” or “shelter” (Heb. maḥāseh, Jer. 17:7, 17; Joel 3:16). Another expression denotes something “waited for” (Heb. miqweh, Ezra 10:2). In Zech. 9:12 still another term is employed (Heb. tiqwâ; “the prisoners of hope”); those described here cherishing expectation of deliverance. The fountainhead of hope is the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ (1 Pet. 1:3). “Christ in you” is the “hope of glory” (Col. 1:27). In the NT hope is also marked by an eschatological significance, for example, in Titus 2:13, where the coming of the Lord is called “the blessed Hope,” that is, the expectation giving joy to the Christian in promise of future glorification. HOPH’NI (hof’ni). The first named of the two sons of the high priest Eli (1 Sam. 1:3; 2:34), who fulfilled their hereditary sacerdotal duties at Shiloh. Their brutal greed and lust, which increased with their father’s age (2:12–17, 22), filled the people with indignation and provoked the curse that was pronounced against their father’s house, first by an unknown prophet (vv. 27–36) and then by the youthful Samuel (3:11–14). Both were slain on the day the Ark was captured by the Philistines (4:10–11), about 1050 B.C., at the battle of Ebenezer. The Scriptures call them “sons of Belial” (2:12, see marg.).

HOPH’RA (hof’ra). See Pharaoh, Hophra.

HOR, MOUNT (hōr; “the mountain”). The name of two mountains.

1. The mountain on which Aaron died (Num. 20:25, 27). The word Hor is regarded by lexicographers as an archaic form of Har, the usual Heb. term for “mountain.” The few facts given us in the Bible regarding Mt. Hor are soon told. It was “by the border” (20:23) or “at the edge” (33:37) of the land of Edom. It was the next halting place of the people after Kadesh (20:22; 33:37), and they left it for Zalmonah (33:41) on the road to the Red Sea (21:4). It was during the encampment at Kadesh that Aaron was “gathered to his people.” The once commonly accepted site of Mt. Hor is E of the ’Arabah, the highest and most conspicuous of the whole range of the sandstone mountains of Edom, having close beneath it on its E side the mysterious city of Petra. The tradition has existed from the earliest date. It is now the Jebel Nebi-Harûn, “the mountain of the Prophet Aaron.” This identification does not, however, meet the full requirements of the narrative. “There is a mountain which fully meets the requirements of the Bible text, and the natural demands of the narrative, as to the Mount Hor where Aaron died and was buried. That mountain is Jebel Madurah, near the western extremity of Wady Feqreh, a little to the SW of the passes es-Sufâh and el-Yemen. Its formation, its location, its name, go to identify it with the place of Aaron’s burial, and there is even a smack of tradition in its favor.... In its location, Jebel Madurah stands at a triangular site, where the boundaries of Edom, of Canaan, and the Wilderness of Zin meet. It is at the extremest NW boundary of Edom, yet it is not within that boundary line. It is on the very verge of the land of promise, yet it is not within the outer limits of that land” (Trumbull, Kadesh-Barnea, p. 129).

2. A mountain named only in Num. 34:7–8 as one of the marks in the northern boundary of the land of promise. Its identification is difficult. The Mediterranean was the western boundary; the first point was Mt. Hor and the second the entrance of Hamath, or “Lebohamath.” R. A. S. Macalister equates it with Mt. Hermon. The reference is evidently to the whole Lebanon range or a prominent peak of the range.

HO’RAM (ho’râm). The king of Gezer, who, coming to the relief of Lachish, was overthrown by Joshua (Josh. 10:33), after 1400 B.C.

HO’REB (ho’rëb; “dryness, desert,” Ex. 3:1; 17:6; 33:6; Deut. 1:2, 6, 19; etc.; 1 Kings 8:9; 19:8; 2 Chron. 5:10; Ps. 106:19; Mal. 4:4). In the opinion of some a lower part or peak of Sinai from which one ascends, towards the S, the summit of Sinai (Jebel Musa); but according to others a general name of the whole mountain of which Sinai was a particular summit. See Sinai.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B. Bernstein, Sinai: The Great and Terrible Wilderness (1979).

HO’REM (hō’rem). One of the “fortified cities” of Naphtali (Josh. 19:38), between Migdal-el and Beth-anath. Exact location not known.

HOR’ESH (hor’esh). A place in the wilderness of Ziph where David fled from Saul and where Jonathan met him to provide him support (1 Sam. 23:15, 16, 18, 19). See Ziph.

HOR-HAGGID’GAD (hor’-ha-gid’gad). The thirty-third station of Israel in the desert (Num. 33:32–33), probably the same as their forty-first station, Gudgodah (which see; Deut. 10:7).

HO’RI (hō’ri). See Horite.

1. A son of Lotan, and grandson of Seir (Gen. 36:22; 1 Chron. 1:39).

2. A Simeonite, whose son Shaphat was the commissioner or “spy” of his tribe, sent by Moses to explore the land of Canaan (Num. 13:5), c. 1401 B.C.

3. The expression “of Hori” in the KJV of Gen. 36:30 is rendered “descended from the Horites” in the NASB and NIV.

HORIM. See Horites.

HO'RITE (hō'rīt; Heb. Hōrî, plural, Hōrîm).

Biblical References. In the Pentateuch are a number of references to an enigmatic people called Horites. These people were defeated by Chedorlaomer and the invading Mesopotamian army (Gen. 14:6). They were governed by chieftains (36:29–30) and are described as having been exterminated or destroyed by Esau's descendants (Deut. 2:12, 22). This unknown people used to be thought of as a local and restricted group of cave dwellers, the name Horites being thought of as derived from Heb. hōr, "cave." Other than this alleged etymological description, the Horites remained completely obscure, not appearing in the Bible outside the Pentateuch or in extrabiblical literature.

Archaeological Discoveries. In recent decades, however, archaeology has brought to light evidences of the Hurrians (whom many equate with the biblical Horites, but others question the identification), who now occupy a prominent place on the stage of ancient history. This ethnic group is now known not only to have existed but to have played a far-reaching role in ancient Near Eastern cultural history. As a result of the recovery of the Hurrian civilization, the popular etymology that connects them with early cave dwellers has generally been abandoned. Excavations at Mari on the middle Euphrates, about seven miles N of Abou Kemal, conducted since 1933 by the Musée du Louvre, have unearthed numerous Hurrian tablets. To this early phase of Hurrian literature (c. 2400–1800 B.C.) belong some of the Hurrian religious texts found at the ancient Hittite capital of Hattushash (Boghaz-keui) in Asia Minor. But the most important discovery regarding the Hurrians comes from Nuzi, present-day Yorgan Tepe, a dozen miles SW of modern Kirkuk. In the old Akkadian period (c. 2360–2180 B.C.) this city was known as Gasur and had a predominantly Semitic population. But before the eighteenth century B.C. the city had become an important center of the Hurrians. It was known as Nuzi. At this period the Hurrians were a dominant ethnic element throughout the Middle East. Thousands of clay tablets were uncovered at Nuzi. These were inscribed by Hurrians in the Babylonian language but contained many native Hurrian words. A large number of these tablets are to be dated in the fifteenth century B.C., and they give much information concerning the life of the Hurrian people. Remarkable parallels from Nuzi tablets concerning marriage, adoption, and social customs, such as those that prevailed in the patriarchal period of Genesis, occur. Scholars are still busy translating thousands of clay tablets shedding light on the Hurrians and other peoples of western Asia. As this material becomes accessible, the puzzle of the biblical Horites is becoming solved.

National Affiliations. The Hurrians were non-Semites, who before the second millennium B.C. migrated into northern Mesopotamia. Their homeland was evidently the region S of the Caucasus. They appear first upon the pages of history c. 2400 B.C. in the Zagros Mountain region E of the Tigris. After the Gutian victory over the last kings of Akkad, the Hurrians seem to have inundated northern Mesopotamia, especially the E Tigris country. Hurrian names were common even in southern Mesopotamia during the Third Dynasty of Ur (c. 1960 B.C.), and they continued to be numerous under the First Dynasty of Babylon (c. 1830–1550 B.C.).

HOR'MAH (hor'ma; "a devoted place, destruction"). The chief town of a Canaanite king in the S of Palestine (Josh. 12:14), near which the Israelites were overcome by the Amalekites when against the advice of Moses they attempted to enter Canaan by that route (Num. 14:45; cf. 21:1–3; Deut. 1:44). It was afterward taken by Joshua and assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:30) but finally fell to Simeon (19:4; 1 Chron. 4:30). Hormah has not been positively identified, and several leading scholars have their candidates.

HORN, HORNS (Heb. qeren, “projecting”; Gk. keras). Horns are mentioned in Scripture in several ways.

1. Trumpets were at first merely horns perforated at the tip, such as are still used for calling laborers to meals. Later they were made of metal, such as the silver trumpets of the priests (Num. 10:1; etc.). Those used at the overthrow of Jericho (Josh. 6:4, 6, 13) were probably large horns or instruments in the shape of a horn, which gave a loud, far-sounding note (see Lev. 23:24; 25:9). See also Music.

2. Horns, being hollow and easily polished, have been used in ancient and modern times for drinking and kindred purposes, such as a flask or vessel to hold oil (1 Sam. 16:1, 13; 1 Kings 1:39) or antimony for blacking the eyelashes. See Inkhorn.

3. The projections of the altar of burnt offering (Ex. 27:2) and of the altar of incense (30:2) at their four corners were called “horns.” By laying hold of these horns of the altar of burnt offering, a criminal found safety (1 Kings 1:50; 2:28) if his offense was accidental (Ex. 21:14).

4. The peak or summit of a hill was called a horn (Isa. 5:1, NASB, marg.).

5. In the KJV of Hab. 3:4, “he had horns coming out of his hand,” the context implies rays of light (so NASB and NIV; cf. Deut. 33:2).

Figurative. Two principal applications of this metaphor will be found—strength and honor. Horns being the chief source of attack and defense with the animals to which God has given them, they are employed in Scripture as emblems of the power of God (Ps. 18:2), of Christ (Luke 1:69; Rev. 5:6), of Ephraim (Deut. 33:17), of the wicked (Pss. 22:21; 75:10), and of the righteous, of kingdoms (Dan. 7:7–8, 24; 8:3, 5–6, 20), and of anti-Christian powers (Rev. 13:1; 17:3, 7).

The budding or sprouting of horns is figurative of the commencement or revival of a nation or power (Ps. 132:17; Ezek. 29:21); raising up, of arrogance (Ps. 75:4–5) and also of glory (v. 10); exalting, of increase of power and glory (1 Sam. 2:1, 10; Pss. 89:17, 24; 92:10; 112:9); pushing with, of conquests (Deut. 33:17; 1 Kings 22:11; Mic. 4:13); bringing down, of degradation (Job 16:15, I have “thrust,” i.e., laid low, “my horn in the dust,” as a wounded animal); cutting off, of destruction of power (Ps. 75:10; Jer. 48:25; Lam. 2:3, see marg.).

HORNET. See Animal Kingdom.

HORONA'IM (hōr'o-na'im; “double cave”). A city of Moab, on the mountain slope of Luhith, along the route of the invading Assyrians (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:3, 5, 34). It is probably el-'Arak.

HOR'ONITE, THE (hōr'o-nit). An epithet of Sanballat (only in Neh. 2:10, 19; 13:28).

Fürst and Gesenius derive it from Beth-horon, whereas Strong's Exhaustive Concordance and Robinson's Gesenius take it from Horonaim. On the latter supposition Sanballat was a Moabite, and this would accord well with his connection with Tobiah the Ammonite. But if the term is from Beth-horon, he was probably a Samaritan or related to the Samaritans. This would agree with Josephus, who says: “He was a Cuthean by birth, of which stock were the Samaritans also” (Ant. 11.7.2). W.H.

HORSE. See Animal Kingdom: Horse; Dromedary; and also the article Horses, Horsemen in the general listing.

Figurative. On account of the strength of the horse, he has become the symbol of war (Deut. 32:13; Ps. 66:12; Isa. 58:14; Zech. 9:10; 10:3); of conquest, as in Song of Sol. 1:9, where the bride advances with her charms like a “mare among the chariots of Pharaoh.” The war horse rushing into battle is figurative of the impetuosity of the wicked in sin (Jer. 8:6). In Zech. 6:2–7 the prophet mentions horses that were red, black, white, and dappled. The red horses symbolize war, the black pestilence, and the dappled famine, whereas the white points to the glorious victories of the ministers of the divine judgment.

HORSE GATE. A gate in the old wall of Jerusalem at the W end of the bridge leading from Zion to the Temple (Neh. 3:28; Jer. 31:40; 2 Chron. 23:15), perhaps so called because the “horses which the kings of Judah had given to the sun” (2 Kings 23:11) were led through it for idolatrous worship.

HORSELEECH. See Animal Kingdom: Leech.

HORSES, HORSEMEN. In antiquity the Hittites cultivated horses. This animal seems to have been introduced from inner Asia. Horses were bred by the fierce Mitanni, who wrote about them in Hittite cuneiform. Even as a cart horse it was apparently unknown in Egypt even in the great Pyramid Age (2800–2400 B.C.). Egyptian wall reliefs depict asses and donkeys but no horses at the earlier periods. From the Hyksos the Egyptians acquired a taste for horse-drawn chariots such as those that pursued the fleeing Israelites (Ex. 14:9, 26–29). The introduction of the horse into lower Mesopotamia is still obscure. When Israel entered Palestine, they found people of the plains equipped with horses and chariots made of iron (Judg. 1:19). Not until the period of the monarchy, after 1020 B.C., did the hill-dwelling Israelites possess horse-drawn chariots such as their neighbors owned. David hamstringed the horses he captured from his enemies, doubtless in obedience to Deut. 17:16: “Moreover, he shall not multiply horses for himself, nor shall he cause the people to return to Egypt to multiply horses.” Solomon, disregarding the Deuteronomic injunctions, equipped his army with thousands of horses and chariots (2 Chron. 9:25). Solomon also had as one of his pet commercial projects horse-and-chariot trade between Egypt and Asia Minor, bringing handmade chariots (and evidently horses, too) from Egypt and shipping fine horses from Cilicia. In early Israel mules were traditionally royal mounts (2 Sam. 18:9; cf. Zech. 9:9; Matt. 21:5). Kings of Judah and Israel had numerous horses, and Ahab of Israel is mentioned on the Assyrian monuments as furnishing a sizable contingent of horses and chariotry in the Syrian coalition against Shalmaneser III at Karkar (853 B.C.). The Assyrians were great horse-lovers, Assyrian monarchs often using them for lion hunting. Persian kings made large use of horses as couriers (cf. Zech. 1:8–11; 6:1–8). Romans employed cavalry escorts for important prisoners, such as for Paul enroute to Antipatris (Acts 23:23–32). Chariot racing was a favorite diversion in their amphitheaters. In Bible times horses were unshod and driven with bit and bridle. They were often sumptuously adorned, frequently with bells (Zech. 14:20). M.F.U.

HO'SAH (hō'sa; “hopeful”).

1. A city of Asher, at a point on the boundary line where it turned from the direction of Tyre toward Achzib (Josh. 19:29); location unknown.

2. A Levite of the family of Merari who, with thirteen of his relatives, was appointed gatekeeper to the Ark after its arrival in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 16:38; 26:10–11, 16). In the latter distribution the gate of Shallecheth, on the W side of the Temple, fell to him, about 988 B.C.

HOSANNA (Gk. hosannah, from Heb. hōshîânâ, “save now”). The cry of the multitude as they joined in our Lord’s triumphal procession into Jerusalem (Matt. 21:9, 15; Mark 11:9–10; John 12:13). The psalm from which it was taken (Ps. 118) was one with which they were familiar from being accustomed to recite verses 25 and 26 at the feast of Tabernacles. On that occasion the Hallel, consisting of Pss. 113–18, was chanted by one of the priests, and at certain intervals the multitudes joined in the responses, waving their branches of willow and palm and shouting “Hallelujah,” or, “Hosanna,” or, “O Lord, we beseech Thee, do send now prosperity” (118:25). On each of the seven days during which the feast lasted, the people thronged the court of the Temple and went in procession about the altar, setting their boughs bending toward it, the trumpets sounding as they shouted, “Hosanna.” It was not uncommon for the Jews in later times to employ the observances of this feast, which was preeminently a feast of gladness, to express their feelings on other occasions of rejoicing (1 Macc. 13:51; 2 Macc. 10:6–7). See Hallel.

The early Christian church adopted this word into its worship. It is found in the apostolical constitutions connected with the great doxology “Glory be to God on high” and was frequently used in the Communion service, during which the great doxology was sung. HOSE, HOSEN (Aram. paṭîsh, Dan. 3:21). The KJV rendering of the Aram. term. The NASB reads “coats,” marg., “cloaks,” and the NIV, “trousers.”

HOSE´A (Heb. hōshēa, “deliverer”). The son of Beerī, and the first of the minor prophets.

Time. In the first verse of his prophecy it is stated that the word of the Lord “came to Hosea the son of Beerī, during the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and . . . of Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel.” J. F. McCurdy dates the beginning of Hosea’s public life at 748 B.C. and Hezekiah’s death at 690 B.C., which would make the prophet’s ministry extend over a period of about fifty-eight years. The book furnishes strong presumptive evidence in support of this chronology.

Place. There seems to be a general consent among commentators that the prophecies of Hosea were delivered in the kingdom of Israel and that he was a subject of that kingdom. This is favored not only by the fact that his prophetic addresses are occupied throughout with the ten tribes but also by the peculiar style and language of his prophecies, which have here and there an Aramean coloring, and still more by the 5:1; 6:8–9; 12:12), which even goes so far as to call the Israelite kingdom “the land” (1:2), and the king of Israel “our king” (7:5). It has been conjectured that Hosea, having long appealed in vain to his countrymen, retired to Judah, and that there his prophecy was committed to writing in its present form.

The Prophet’s Family Relations. It is recorded in 1:2–9 that Hosea, at the command of God, took a harlot (Gomer the daughter of Diblaim) as his wife and had by her two sons (Jezreel and Lo-ammi) and one daughter (Lo-ruhamah), and in 3:1–2 that by divine command he purchased an adulteress. These statements have given rise to much discussion as to their literal or allegorical interpretation. Strong (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopaedia, s.v.) expresses the opinion that “there were two marriages by the prophet: first in chaps. 1, 2, of a woman (probably of lewd inclinations already) who became the mother of three children, and was afterward repudiated for her adultery; and the second in chap. 3, of a woman at least attached formerly to another, but evidently reformed to a virtuous wife. Both these women represented the Israelitish nation, especially the northern kingdom, which, although unfaithful to Jehovah, should first be punished and then reclaimed by him.” Keil (Com., ad loc.) says, “No other course is left to us than to picture to ourselves Hosea’s marriages as internal events, i.e., as merely carried out in that inward and spiritual intuition in which the word of God was addressed to him; and this removes all the difficulties that beset the assumption of marriages contracted in outward reality.”

HOSE’A, BOOK OF. The span of Hosea’s ministry is indicated in the superscription to the book: “During the days of Uzziah [c. 792–740 B.C.], Jotham [c. 750–742 B.C.], Ahaz [c. 735–715 B.C.], and Hezekiah [c. 715–686 B.C.], kings of Judah, and during the days of Jeroboam [II, c. 793–753 B.C.] ... , king of Israel” (1:1). The prophetic ministry of Hosea extended well beyond Jeroboam II’s death into the period of civil war in which Zachariah (c. 753–752), Shallum (c. 752), Menahem (c. 752–742), Pekahiah (c. 742–740), Pekah (c. 752–732), and Hoshea (c. 732–723) reigned, until the fall of Samaria. For this reason some scholars, such as R. Pfeiffer (Introduction to the O.T. [1940], p. 566), view the reference to Hezekiah and other Judean kings in 1:1 as an interpolation. This is not necessitated since the recorded prophecies of Hosea are obviously only a compendium of his activity that extended into the early years of Hezekiah’s reign. Whether the prophet was carried into Assyrian captivity is not known. Like Jeremiah of Judah, he was the prophet of doom to the Northern Kingdom.

Purpose. Hosea is the prophecy of God’s unchanging love for Israel. Despite their contamination with Canaanite paganism and fertility cults, the prophet bent every effort to warn the people to repent in the face of God’s perpetual love for them. His theme is fourfold: Israel’s idolatry, wickedness, captivity, and restoration. Throughout the entire book, however, he weaves the theme of the love of God for Israel. Israel is depicted prophetically as Jehovah’s adulterous wife, shortly to be put away but eventually to be purified and restored. These events are set forth in the divine command that the prophet marry a harlot. The offspring of that union are given names symbolic of Hosea’s chief prophecies: Jezreel, “the dynasty of Jehu is to be extirpated”; Lo-ruhamah, “not shown mercy,” a prophecy of the Assyrian captivity; Lo-ammi, “not my people,” temporary rejection of Israel (cf. Rom. 11:1–24). In 2:1 Hosea is commanded to “say, to your brothers, ‘Ammi,’ and to your sisters, ‘Ruhamah,’ i.e., “my people” and “shown mercy,” pointing to final restoration of the nation (cf. 11:25–27) in the end time (Hos. 1:2–2:23).

Contents.

I. Israel, Jehovah’s faithless wife, repudiated and restored (1:1–3:5)

A. The first marriage (1:1–2:23)

Israel rejected, birth of Jezreel, Lo-ruhamah, Lo-ammi (1:1–9)

Israel comforted (1:10–11)

Israel chastised (2:1–13)

Israel restored (2:14–23)

B. The second marriage (3:1–5)

The marriage itself (3:1–3)

The symbolic meaning (3:4–5)

II. Israel, the object of God’s love, reestablished as a repentant and restored nation (4:1–14:9)

A. Israel’s guilt (4:1–19)

B. The Divine displeasure (5:1–15)

C. The repentant remnant’s cry (6:1–3)

D. Jehovah’s response (6:4–13:8)

E. Final restoration (13:9–14:9)

Authorship and Genuineness. The book is unquestionably written by “Hosea, the son of Beeri” (1:1). Even the critical school commonly admits this unity. Two types of passages were sometimes denied to Hosea by late nineteenth-century criticism, namely those dealing with Judah and those promising restoration and blessing. Actually, there is no compelling reason for not attributing to Hosea any of the prophecy. More recent criticism tends to deny fewer passages as later interpolations (Aage Bentzen, Introduction to the O.T. [1949], 2:33, and Oesterley and Robinson, Introduction to the Books of the O.T., p. 349). While granting the “possibility, even the probability” that certain passages in which Judah is mentioned may be later interpolations, critics by no means insist upon that and, regarding the passages on restoration, assert that the evidence “does not justify us in dogmatically asserting that they are not the work of Hosea himself.” Divine authority and authenticity of the book are indicated by quotations from the prophet found in the NT (cf. Hos. 11:1 and Matt. 2:15; Hos. 6:6 and Matt. 9:13, 12:7; Hos. 10:8 and Luke 23:30; Hos. 2:23 and Rom. 9:25; Hos. 13:14 and 1 Cor. 15:55; Hos. 1:9–10, 2:23 and 1 Pet. 2:10). M.F.U.

HOSHA ʾIAH (hō-shaʾya; “Jah has saved”).

1. A man who assisted in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem after it had been rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh. 12:32), 445 B.C.

2. The father of a certain Jezaniah, or Azariah, who was a man of note after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. He wanted Jeremiah to favor the flight of the remnant of the Jews into Egypt (Jer. 42:1; 43:2), 586 B.C.

HOSHA ʾMA (hō-shaʾma), or Hosh ʾama (hōshʾa-ma; “Jah has heard”). One of the sons of King Jehoiachin, born during his captivity (1 Chron. 3:18), after 597 B.C.

HOSHE ʾA (ho-shēʾa; Heb. same as Hosea).

1. The original name of Joshua, the son of Nun (Num. 13:8, 16; Deut. 32:44, marg.). Moses changed his name when he sent the spies into the land of Canaan.

2. The son of Elah, and last king of Israel. He conspired against and killed his predecessor, Pekah (2 Kings 15:30), “in the twentieth year of Jotham.” Tiglath-pileser set up Hoshea as the nominal king of Samaria, his personal representative (about 732 B.C.). He did not become established on the throne till after an interval of at least eight years, in the twelfth year of Ahaz (17:1). It is declared of him that “he did evil in the sight of the Lord, only not as the kings of Israel who were before him” (v. 2). Shortly after his accession he submitted to the supremacy of Shalmaneser, who appears to have entered his territory with the intention of subduing it by force if resisted (v. 3), and indeed seems to have stormed the strong cities of Beth-arbel (Hos. 10:14). Discovering that Hoshea had entered into negotiations with So, king of Egypt, prompted Shalmaneser to return and punish the rebellious king with imprisonment for withholding tribute (2 Kings 17:4). He was probably released by the payment of a large ransom, but a second revolt soon after provoked the king of Assyria to march an army into the land of Israel. After a three years’ siege Samaria was taken and destroyed, and the ten tribes were carried away beyond the Euphrates, 721 B.C. (2 Kings 17:5–6; 18:9–12). Of the subsequent fortune of Hoshea we know nothing.

3. Son of Azaziah and leader of the tribe of Ephraim in the time of David (1 Chron. 27:20), about 1000 B.C.

4. One of the leaders of Israel who joined in the sacred covenant with Nehemiah after the captivity (Neh. 10:23), 445 B.C.

HOSPITALITY. In biblical times it was believed to be a sacred duty to receive, feed, lodge, and protect any traveler who might stop at one's door. The stranger was treated as a guest, and men who had thus eaten together were bound to each other by the strongest ties of friendship, which descended to their heirs and was confirmed by mutual presents. Hospitality was a religious duty for the Greeks as well as for the Hebrews, who were enjoined by the law of Moses (Lev. 19:34). The present practice of the Arabs is still similar to ancient Hebrew hospitality. A traveler may sit at the door of a perfect stranger and smoke his pipe until the master welcomes him with an evening meal, may tarry a limited number of days without inquiry as to his purposes, and may then depart with a simple "God be with you" as his only compensation. As the Hebrews became more numerous, inns were provided, but they did not entirely supersede home hospitality. The OT gives illustrations of it in Gen. 18:1–8; 19:1–3; 24:25, 31–33; etc. Job says (31:32), "The alien has not lodged outside, for I have opened my doors to the traveler." Neglect of the law of hospitality is illustrated in the case of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19–25).

The spirit of Christian hospitality is taught in the NT (Luke 14:12–14). The Gk. philoxenos (a "lover of strangers") is the word used for hospitable in Titus 1:8; 1 Pet. 4:9; and philoxenia ("love of strangers") for hospitality in Rom. 12:13; Heb. 13:2.

HOST.

1. In a social sense, literally a "stranger" (Gk. xenos), i.e., one who receives and entertains hospitably. See Rom. 16:23, where "and to the whole church" is added; meaning that Gaius received all the members of the church who crossed his threshold or kindly permitted the church to worship in his house.

2. "One who receives all comers," an innkeeper (so NASB and NIV) or host (so KJV), from Gk. pandocheus (Luke 10:35).

3. In a military sense ("host," KJV; "army," NASB), see Army.

HOST OF HEAVEN ("army of the skies," Gen. 2:1; etc.). The sun, moon, and stars, under the symbol of an army, in which the sun is considered king, the moon his viceregent, and the stars and planets their attendants (cf. Judg. 5:20). The worship of the host of heaven was one of the earliest forms of idolatry (which see) and was common among the Israelites in the times of their turning away from the pure service of God (Deut. 4:19; 2 Kings 17:16; 21:3, 5; Jer. 19:13; Zeph. 1:5; Acts 7:42).

The "host of heaven" referred to in Dan. 8:10–12 appears to be figurative for "the holy people," i.e., Israel (see 8:24). The comparison of Israel to the "host of heaven" has its root in the fact that God, the King of Israel, is called the God of hosts ("the Commander of the host," v. 11). The hosts are generally understood as stars or angels, but the tribes of Israel, who were led by God out of Egypt, are also called "the hosts of the Lord" (Ex. 7:4; 12:41; NIV, "divisions"). As in heaven the angels and stars form the host of God, so on earth the sons of Israel are His host. This comparison serves, then, to characterize the insolence of Antiochus (the "horn," Dan. 8:9) as a wickedness against heaven and the heavenly order of things (Keil, Com., ad loc.).

Jehovah is frequently mentioned as “the Lord, the God of hosts,” i.e., of the celestial armies (Jer. 5:14; 38:17; 44:7; Hos. 12:5; etc.). The Heb. Sabaoth, “hosts,” is used by the apostles Paul and James (Rom. 9:29; James 5:4). The NIV frequently renders “the Lord, the God of hosts” as “the Lord God Almighty.”

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S. N. Kramer, Mythologies of the Ancient World (1961).

HOSTAGE (Heb. ta-ărûbâ; “suretyship”). One delivered into the hand of another as security for the performance of a pledge or engagement. In ancient times it was usual for conquered kings or nations to give hostages for the payment of tribute and of continuance in subjection. Thus Jehoash, king of Israel, exacted hostages from Amaziah, king of Judah (2 Kings 14:14; 2 Chron. 25:24).

HO'THAM (hō'tham; a “seal ring”). One of the sons of Heber, the grandson of Asher (1 Chron. 7:32; 11:44). He is probably the same as Helem, whose sons are enumerated in v. 35 and grandsons in vv. 36–37.

HO'THAN (hō'than; Heb. same as Hotham). An Aroerite, father of Shama and Jeiel, two of David's “mighty men” (1 Chron. 11:44), about 1000 B.C.

HO'THIR (hō'thîr). The thirteenth son of Heman (which see), who, with eleven of his kinsmen, had charge of the twenty-first division of Levitical singers (1 Chron. 25:4, 28), after 1000 B.C.

HOUSE (Heb. bayit; Gk. oikia). The beginning of house building is lost in the darkness of primeval times and reaches back in the sacred record to the days of Cain (Gen. 4:17). Although the Israelites did not become dwellers in cities until their sojourn in Egypt and after the conquest of Canaan (cf. Gen. 47:3; Ex. 12:7; Heb. 11:9), the Canaanites, the Assyrians, and the Egyptians were from an early period builders of houses and cities. Of course, houses would vary according to the climate, tastes, and condition of the people. And yet we find some leading characteristics in the oriental house, distinguishing it from that of northern latitudes.

Material. The material for house building is determined partly by what is to be had in the locality, partly by the object of the buildings, and partly by the means of the builders. The houses of the rural poor in Egypt, as well as in most parts of Syria, Arabia, and Persia, are for the most part mere huts of mud or sunburnt bricks. Those of the Israelites were probably mostly made of brick burned or merely dried in the sun, or of lime and sandstone. Only houses of the rich and palaces were built of hewn stone (1 Kings 7:9; Isa. 9:10) or white marble (1 Chron. 29:2). For mortar, clay or lime or gypsum (Isa. 33:12; cf. Deut. 27:4) and asphalt (Gen. 11:3) were used. The beams, doorposts, doors, windows, and stairs were commonly of sycamore (Isa. 9:10). In more ornamental buildings they were of olive, cypress, cedar, and sandal (1 Kings 7:2; Jer. 22:14).

Exterior. In earlier times it appears that only large palaces were built of more than one story. Such were the palace of Solomon, the house of Lebanon (1 Kings 7:2–12), and the three-story side chambers of Solomon's Temple (6:5–10). There is no other mention in Scripture of any house in Palestine with more than one story, for Acts 20:9 refers to Troas.

(1) The walls were whitewashed outside and inside with lime or gypsum; palaces were painted bright red (Jer. 22:14). The exterior of a dwelling house of the better kind in Palestine was for the most part plain and unattractive, having not more than the doorway and two or three latticed windows.

(2) The roof was usually flat, without any chimneys, and did not overhang the external walls. In the poorer class of houses the roofs were made of earth, stamped and rolled upon a foundation of boughs or rafters. The nature of these roofs readily explains the transaction referred to in Mark (2:4) and Luke (5:19). The bearers of the paralytic probably broke up the simple materials of the roof and through the aperture let him down into the presence of Jesus. The better class of houses had their roofs laid with tiles and stone. The outer edge was provided with a parapet or latticelike railing to prevent falling (Deut. 22:8). The roof is one of the most important parts of an Eastern house, as various kinds of business and amusement occurred upon it. Rahab hid the spies beneath the stalks of flax laid on the roof to dry (Josh. 2:6). The roof was used for confidential communing (1 Sam. 9:25), for sleeping (v. 26), for lamentation (Isa. 15:3; Jer. 48:38), and for watching the approach of an enemy (Isa. 22:1) or the bearer of tidings (2 Sam. 18:24, 33). Booths were built upon the roof (Neh. 8:16) and altars for idolatrous worship (2 Kings 23:12; Jer. 19:13; Zeph. 1:5). Upon the roof, as in a most public place, Absalom spread the tent for his father's concubines, to indicate the unalterable estrangement between himself and David (2 Sam. 16:21–22). Announcements were made from the roof (Matt. 10:27; Luke 12:3). It was usual to have two flights of steps to ascend to the roof, one within the house and one in the street, which would afford a more ready escape than through the house (Matt. 24:17).

(3) The porch (Heb. ʾûlām, “vestibule”) was not uncommon in Egyptian houses, but was an unusual feature in the houses of ancient Palestine; no reference to it is found in the OT, except in the case of the Temple and Solomon's palace (1 Kings 7:6, 12; 2 Chron. 15:8; Ezek. 40:7). In the KJV and NIV “porch” (Judg. 3:23, Heb. mišdāṣrôn) is incorrect and is better rendered “roof chamber,” as in NASB. Again in KJV we read of a porch attached to the high priest's palace (Matt. 26:71, Gk. pulōn), which was the gate or entrance to the house from the street, as elsewhere (Acts 10:17; 12:14; 14:13; Rev. 21:12). In John 5:2 we read of a portico, that is, a porch or colonnade often at the entrance of a building.

(4) Doors were commonly made of wood, the more expensive being of cedar (Song of Sol. 8:9). But doors made of single slabs of stone, some inches thick, occasionally ten-foot high, and turning on stone pivots, are found in the old houses and sepulchers in Syria. The doorways of Eastern houses were sometimes richly ornamented, although they were generally plain in appearance even when belonging to sumptuous dwellings. The doorway from the street into the court was usually guarded from sight by a wall or some arrangement of passages and had a stone seat for the porter and other servants. The Israelites were directed to write sentences from the law and place them over the door (Deut. 6:9).

(5) The court (Heb. ḥāṣer, “inclosed”) was one of the common characteristics of Eastern houses, the latter being built to inclose one, two, and even three courts. If there was only one court, it was an open space or quadrangle, around which the apartments for the inhabitants, and in country places also the sheds for the cattle, were arranged. A house of a somewhat better description usually consisted of the court, three or four storerooms on the ground floor, with a single chamber above, from which a flight of stairs led to the court. The houses of men of rank and also palaces were usually built with a roomy court, surrounded with porticoes and galleries, paved, and provided with a well (2 Sam. 17:18) and baths (11:2), probably planted with trees, and forming the reception room of the house. If there were three or more courts, all except the outer one were alike in size and appearance. But the outer one, being devoted to the more public life and contact with society, was materially different from all the others. Into this court the principal apartments looked and were either open to it in front or were entered from it by doors. Over the doorway leading from the street was a projecting window with a lattice more or less elaborately wrought, which, except in times of public celebrations, was usually closed (2 Kings 9:30). An awning was sometimes drawn over the court and the floor strewn with carpets on festive occasions. The stairs to the upper apartments were usually in a corner of the court. Around part, if not the whole, of the court was a veranda, often nine- or ten-feet deep, over which, when there was more than one floor, ran a second gallery of like depth with a balustrade. If there were more than three courts the second was for the use of the master of the house, where he was attended by his eunuchs, children, and wives; he saw only those whom he called from the third court, where they lived. It was into this court that Esther came to invite the king to visit her part of the palace, but she would not on any account have gone into the outer court.

(6) The window of an Eastern house had no glass, consisted generally of an aperture inclosed with latticework, and was small so as to exclude the heat. The windows usually looked onto the court, but in every house one or more looked onto the street, making it possible for a person to observe the approach of another without himself being visible (Judg. 5:28; 2 Sam. 6:16; Prov. 7:6; Song of Sol. 2:9). Where houses were built against the city wall it was not unusual for them to have projecting windows surmounting the wall and looking out into the country. From such a window the spies escaped from Jericho (Josh. 2:15) and Paul from Damascus (2 Cor. 11:33). Daniel's room had several windows, and his lattices were open when his enemies found him at prayer (Dan. 6:10). The projecting nature of the window and the fact that a couch or raised seat encircled the interior so that persons sitting at the window were near the aperture, easily explain the falls of Ahaziah and Eutyclus (2 Kings 1:2; Acts 20:9).

(7) The pillar formed an important feature in oriental buildings, partly, perhaps, as reminiscent of the tent with its supporting poles, and partly from the use of flat roofs. Pillars were used to support flat roofs or awnings as well as to support curtains (Ex. 26:32). The circumstance of Samson's pulling down the house by means of the pillars may be explained by the fact that the company was assembled on tiers of balconies above each other, supported by central pillars on the basement. When these were pulled down the whole of the upper floors also fell (Judg. 16:26–30).

(8) These ancient houses did not have chimneys; the word so rendered (Hos. 13:3) means a hole through which the smoke escaped. They were used only in the poorer houses, where wood was used for fuel. In the better class of houses the rooms were warmed by charcoal in braziers (Jer. 36:22; Mark 14:54; John 18:18) or by a fire in the open court at night (Luke 22:55).

Interior.

(1) The upper room (Heb. ālīyyâ, Gk. huperōon) was on the roof and, being the most desirable place in the house, was often given up to favored guests, but it must not be confused with the guest chamber (which see, below). Usually the Scriptures mention but one upper room, as if there were only one (1 Kings 17:19; 2 Kings 4:11; Acts 9:39; 20:8), but in the larger houses there were several (1 Chron. 28:11; 2 Chron. 3:9). Frequent mention is made of them in connection with kings, who seem to have used them as summer houses because of their coolness (Judg. 3:20; 2 Kings 1:2; 23:12). The summer house spoken of in Scripture was seldom a separate building; the lower part of the house was the winter house and the upper the summer house. This room was used for meditation and prayer (Mark 14:15; Luke 22:12), was set apart for the prophets (1 Kings 17:19; 2 Kings 4:10), and, because of its size and coolness, was a place of meeting (Acts 1:13; 20:8). For similar reasons the dead were laid out in it (9:39). An upper room appears to have been built over the gateways of towns (2 Sam. 18:33).

(2) The guest chamber (Heb. lishkâ, Gk. kataluma) was placed opposite the entrance onto the court and was used by the master of the house for the reception of all visitors. It was often open in front and supported in the center by a pillar and was generally on the ground floor but raised above the level of the court. This would seem to have been the guest chamber where our Lord ate His last Passover (Mark 14:14–15; Luke 22:11), being not the “upper room” but an elevated ground-floor room. Before entering, the guests took off their shoes; so our Lord is thought to have had His feet bare when the woman washed them (Luke 7:38).

(3) Other rooms. There are seldom any special bedrooms in Eastern houses, except in those of the wealthy (2 Kings 11:2; Eccles. 10:20; 2 Sam. 4:7). In Egypt there were such rooms (Gen. 43:30; Ex. 8:3), as also in Syria (2 Kings 6:12). Generally a low divan, raised around the sides of the room, served for seats by day, and on it were placed the beds for sleeping during the night. The ceilings of the principal apartments were adorned with much care and often at great expense. The kitchen, when there was an inner court, was always attached to it, as the cooking was performed by the women. The furniture of this apartment consisted of a sort of raised platform of brick, with receptacles on it for fire, answering to the “boiling places” of Ezekiel (46:23). The fuel used was usually charcoal, and the food was cooked in pots and chafing dishes.

(4) The furniture in ancient Eastern houses was generally simple, owing probably to the people’s spending so much time outdoors. And though we have no exact information respecting the furniture of houses in Palestine, it is probable that they indulged, as did surrounding nations, in many luxuries, as wealth permitted. For the furnishing of an apartment the Israelites appear to have held the following articles as indispensable: a bed, table, chair, and lampstand (2 Kings 4:10). To these were added, for the complete furnishing of a house, the necessary cooking, eating, and drinking vessels. In the houses of the wealthy these articles were not only provided in great abundance but were also costly and luxurious. The rooms were furnished with cushions and couches, which served also as beds, and were covered with costly carpets (Prov. 7:16) and soft pillows. The bedsteads were inlaid with ivory (Amos 6:4), and the tables and stools, which were much more in use among the Israelites than at present in the East (2 Kings 4:10; Prov. 9:14), were artistically wrought. The eating and drinking vessels were of gold and silver, and the wardrobes and chests were equally ornate.

Figurative. The word house is often used in Scripture in the sense of lineage or family; thus Joseph was of the house of David (Luke 1:27, marg.; 2:4); offspring (2 Sam. 7:11); household (Gen. 43:16; Isa. 36:3). Heaven is the house of God (John 14:2); the grave is the house appointed for all living (Job 30:23; Isa. 14:18, marg.); the body is called a house (2 Cor. 5:1–2).

HOUSEHOLD.

1. The rendering generally of the same Heb. and Gk. words as are rendered “house,” and meaning the members of a family living in the same dwelling, including servants and dependents (Isa. 36:3). The expression “those of Caesar’s household” (Phil 4:22) seems to refer to some of the servants of the emperor.

2. One of the divisions of the Hebrews, such as tribes, families, households, etc. See Israel, Constitution of.

HOUSETOP. The flat roof of an Eastern house (which see).

Figurative. Some of these roofs were covered with earth rolled hard, which, softened by rain, would afford nourishment for grass seeds. When the returning drought and heat came the grass soon withered, a proper illustration of momentary prosperity followed by ruin (2 Kings 19:26; Ps. 129:6; Isa. 37:27).

HOWLER. See Animal Kingdom: Owl, no. 8.

HUB (Heb. ḥishshûr). The central part of the wheel, where the spokes unite. In the KJV of 1 Kings 7:33 the Heb. term is incorrectly translated “spoke.” Cf. Nave; Spoke; Rims.

HUB´BAH (hub´a). One of four sons of Shomer, a descendant of Asher (1 Chron. 7:34).

HUK´KOK (hūk´ok). A city on the southern border of Naphtali, near Aznoth-tabor (Josh. 19:34). Robinson and Van de Velde identify it with Yakuk, five miles W of the site of Capernaum, and that is now generally accepted. There is another Hukkuk (1 Chron. 6:75; NASB and NIV, “Hukok”) in Asher. In Josh. 21:31 it is called Helkath instead of Hukkuk, a case in which two names are applied to one place.

HU´KOK (hū´kok; 1 Chron. 6:75). See Hukkuk.

HUL (hūl; “circle”), the second son of Aram, and grandson of Shem (Gen. 10:23; 1 Chron. 1:17). The geographical location of the people whom he represents is not positively known. Identification either with Huleh around Lake Merom or with Hūlîḥa in the Mt. Massius regions mentioned by Ashurnasirpal seems quite probable.

HUL´DAH (hul´da; “mole, weasel”). A prophetess, the wife of Shallum (which see), who was keeper of the wardrobe (2 Kings 22:14). She dwelt, in the reign of Josiah, in that part of Jerusalem called the Mishneh (the “Second Quarter”). To her the king sent Hilkiah the priest, Shaphan the scribe, and others to consult respecting the denunciations in the lately found book of the law. She then delivered an oracular response of mingled judgment and mercy, declaring the near destruction of Jerusalem but promising Josiah that he should be taken from the world before these evil days came (22:14–20; 2 Chron. 34:22–28), about 639 B.C. Huldah is known only from this circumstance.

HUMAN SOUL. See Soul.

HUMANITY OF CHRIST. See Christ, Incarnation of.

HUMILIATION OF CHRIST. An expression that refers to the earthly life of the Lord Jesus Christ and contrasts His condition during that period, on the one hand, with the glory of His pre-existent state and, on the other, with His subsequent exaltation. The fact, the constituent features, the end, and the ethical significance of Christ’s humiliation are all matters of explicit Scripture teaching.

(1) The fact was more than suggested in certain utterances of the Lord Himself (John 3:13; 6:62; 16:28; 17:5). In deepest harmony with such utterances, as well as with the declared facts of our Lord’s earthly history, was apostolic teaching; e.g., Paul said, “He humbled Himself” (Phil. 2:8; see also 2 Cor. 8:9; Heb. 2:9–10, 17–18). According to the importance of these and other passages, the humiliation of Christ began with His incarnation, culminated in His death upon the cross, and came to its end in His exaltation to the right hand of God.

(2) Nature. An examination of the Scripture bearing upon this subject shows that the humiliation consisted (a) in His voluntary incarnation; (b) in His not only entering into union with human nature but also in assuming a manhood that, though sinless, was still subject to the infirmities of man’s moral condition (see Rom. 8:3); (c) in that He was “born under the Law” (Gal. 4:4–5), i.e., subjected to legal measures and obligations appropriate only for human beings; (d) in His standing as the representative of sinners (2 Cor. 5:21); (e) in His sacrificial death; (f) in that His humiliation was made more conspicuous by poverty, persecutions, and the scorn and cruelties that He suffered at the hands of blind and sinful men.

(3) The end of His humiliation was (a) in a subordinate sense, the fulfillment of certain types and predictions of the OT dispensation (see Matt. 2:23; 27:9–10; John 12:38); (b) chiefly, that Christ might come in the most complete sense into oneness with mankind and thus accomplish human redemption (2 Cor. 5:21; 8:9; etc.).

(4) Its ethical import appears in that (a) Christ sets before the world the most perfect example of usefulness (see Matt. 20:28; 2 Cor. 8:9); (b) likewise of patience and humility (Matt. 10:24–25; 11:29; Heb. 12:2–3).

HUMILITY (Heb. ʿānāwâ, “gentleness, affliction,” also from ʿānâ, “to be bowed down”; Gk. tapeinophrosunē, “lowliness of mind,” praotēs, “gentleness”). Humility in the spiritual sense is an inwrought grace of the soul that allows one to think of himself no more highly than he ought to think (Eph. 4:1–2; Col. 3:12–13; cf. Rom. 12:3). In contrast, the moralists considered humility (from humus, “earth”) to be meanness of spirit. The exercises of it are first and chiefly toward God (Matt. 11:29; James 1:21). It requires us to feel that in God’s sight we have no merit and to in honor prefer others to ourselves (Rom. 12:10; cf. Prov. 15:33). It does not demand undue self-depreciation but rather lowliness of self-estimation and freedom from vanity. The Gk. term praotēs, “gentleness” (rendered “meekness” in KJV) expresses a spirit of willingness and obedience and a lack of resistance to God’s dealings with us. But humility must also be expressed towards those who wrong us, in order that their insults and wrongdoing might be used by God for our benefit (see Acts 20:18–21). It is enjoined of God (Ps. 25:9; Col. 3:12; James 4:6, 10) and is essential to discipleship under Christ (Matt. 18:3–4).

HUM’TAH (hum’ta). One of the cities in the hill country allotted to Judah following Israel’s conquest of Canaan (Josh. 15:54).

HUNCHBACK. See Diseases.

HUNDREDS. One of the groups (Ex. 18:21) into which Moses divided the people of Israel. See Israel, Classification of.

HUNDRED, TOWER OF THE (mēʾâ, “a hundred”). One of the towers on the wall of Jerusalem, rebuilt by Nehemiah (3:1; 12:39), near the Sheep Gate. The KJV gives Tower of Meah.

HUNGER (Heb. rāʿēb). The rendering of the same Heb. and Gk. words that are sometimes rendered famine (which see).

Figurative. Our Lord, in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:6), uses hunger as symbolic of deep and earnest longing after righteousness.

HUNT, HUNTER, HUNTING (Heb. ṣayid, to “lie in wait”; rādap, to “run after”).

Naturally, the pursuit and capture of wild animals early became a means of both sustenance and pleasure.

Egyptians. In Egypt the desert had its perils and resources; the lion, leopard, panther, and other dangerous beasts were found there. The nobles, like the pharaohs of later times, regarded as their privilege or duty the stalking and destroying of these animals. The common people hunted the gazelle, oryx, mouflon sheep, ibex, wild ox, the ostrich, and such humbler game as the porcupine and the long-eared hare. To scent and retrieve the game, the hyena ran side by side with the wolf-dog and the lithe Abyssinian greyhound. When the Egyptian wished to procure animals without seriously hurting them, he used the net for birds, and the lasso and the bola for quadrupeds, these being less injurious than the spear and arrow. The bola was made of a single rounded stone, attached to a strap about five yards long. When the stone was thrown the cord twisted around the legs, muzzle, or neck of the animal, and the hunter was able to bring down his prey.

Chaldeans. Among this people the chase was a favorite pastime and afforded substantial additions to the food supply. It was, however, essentially the pastime of the noble, who hunted the lion and bear in the wooded covers or the marshy thickets of the river bank, and the gazelle, ostrich, and bustard on the elevated plains or rocky tablelands of the desert. Recovered reliefs show that Assyrian kings especially delighted in hunting lions. Ashurbanipal is presented most vividly in his chariot spearing a leaping lion.

Biblical. The chase is mentioned as being pursued as early as the time of Nimrod, who was “a mighty hunter before the Lord” (Gen. 10:9); but it does not appear to have formed a special occupation among the Israelites. It was practiced by farmers and shepherds, partly for the sake of food (Gen. 27:3–5, 30–31; Prov. 12:27), partly in defending their flocks against beasts of prey (1 Sam. 17:34–35).

Hunters used the bow and arrow (Gen. 27:3), slings (1 Sam. 17:40), nets, snares, and pits, especially for larger animals, such as antelopes (Isa. 51:20) and lions (2 Sam. 23:20; Ezek. 19:3–4).

The following regulations are given in the Mosaic law: (1) The products of the land in the Sabbatic year were to be left, in part to serve the wants of the beasts of the field (Ex. 23:11; Lev. 25:7). (2) If eggs or young birds were taken from a nest, the mother was allowed to escape (Deut. 22:6–7). (3) Israelites and any strangers among them were required to let the blood flow from edible wild beasts and birds taken in the hunt and to cover it with earth (Lev. 17:13) because, containing the life, it was considered holy.

HU'PHAM (hū'fam). Apparently one of the sons of Benjamin (Num. 26:39) and founder of the family of the Huphamites. He is supposed to be the same as Huppim. From 1 Chron. 7:12, 15, it would appear that Huppim was a grandson of Benjamin.

HU'PHAMITES (hū'fam-īts). The descendants (Num. 26:39) of Hupham (which see).

HUP'PAH (hūp'a; “covering, protection”). A priest in David's time, having charge of the thirteenth of the twenty-four classes into which the king divided the priests (1 Chron. 24:13), 1000 B.C.

HUP'PIM (Gen. 46:21; 1 Chron. 7:12, 15). See Hupham.

HUR (hūr; a “hole, prison”). The name of five men.

1. A man who is mentioned in connection with Moses and Aaron on the occasion of the battle with Amalek at Rephidim, when he and Aaron held up the hands of Moses (Ex. 17:10, 12). He is mentioned again in connection with Aaron in 24:14 as being left in charge of the people by Moses during his ascent of Sinai, c. 1440 B.C. He was, according to Josephus (Ant. 3.2.4), the husband of Miriam, the sister of Moses.

2. The grandfather of Bezalel, the chief artificer of the Tabernacle—“the son of Uri, son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah” (Ex. 31:2; 35:30; 38:22). In the lists of the descendants of Judah in 1 Chronicles the pedigree is more fully preserved. Hur there appears as one of the great family of Perez. He was the firstborn son of Caleb, the son of Hezron, by a second wife, Ephrath (2:19–20; 2:50; 4:4; cf. 2:5, also 4:1), and the father, besides Uri (2:20), of three sons, who founded the towns of Kiriath-jearim, Bethlehem, and Beth-gader (v. 51), before 1440 B.C. (Smith, Dict.).

3. The fourth named of the five kings of Midian who were slain (with Balaam) by the Israelites, under the leadership of Phinehas (Num. 31:8), about 1401 B.C. In a later mention of them (Josh. 13:21) these five Midianites are called “dukes of Sihon,” properly, “vassals.”

4. A person whose son (Ben-hur) was the first named of Solomon's twelve deputies. His district was in Mt. Ephraim (1 Kings 4:8), about 960 B.C.

5. Father of Rephaiah, which latter is called “the official of half the district of Jerusalem” after the captivity and who assisted in repairing its walls (Neh. 3:9), before 445 B.C.

HU’RAI (hū’rī). A native of the valleys (“brooks”) of Mt. Gaash and one of David’s mighty men (1 Chron. 11:32), called less correctly (2 Sam. 23:30) Hiddai (which see), 953 B.C.

HU’RAM (hū’ram). Another form of Hiram (which see).

1. A Benjamite, son of Bela, the firstborn of the patriarch (1 Chron. 8:5).

2. The form in which the name of the king of Tyre in alliance with David and Solomon—and elsewhere given as Hiram—appears in Chronicles (2 Chron. 2:3, 11–12; 8:2, 18; 9:10, 21). The NIV, however, renders “Hiram” in Chronicles.

3. The same change occurs in Chronicles in the name of Hiram the artificer, which is given as Hiram (2 Chron. 4:11) and Hiram-abi (2:13; 4:16).

HU’RI (hū’rī). The son of Jaroah and father of Abihail, of the descendants of Gad in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:14).

HUSBAND. See Marriage.

HUSBANDMAN, HUSBANDMEN. The KJV rendering for several Heb. terms (ʾîsh ʾadāmâ, “man of the ground”; ʾikkār; ʿebed; yôgēb) and one Gk. one (geōrgos). Replaced in the NASB and the NIV by farmer, tiller of the ground, plowman, and vinedresser. The term husbandry appears in the KJV of 2 Chron. 26:10 (Heb. ʾădāmâ) and 1 Cor. 3:9 (Gk. geōrgos). The NASB and NIV readings are “soil” and “field” respectively. See Farmer; Plowman.

HUSBANDRY. See Husbandman.

HU’SHAH (hū’sha; “hurry; haste”). Son of Ezer and descendant of Hur, of the family of Judah (1 Chron. 4:4), and probably from where the patronymic Hushathite (which see) came (2 Sam. 21:18; 1 Chron. 11:29; 20:4). He seems to be the same as Shuhah in 1 Chron. 4:11.

HU’SHAI (hū’shī; “hasty”). An Archite and a prominent actor in the history of Absalom’s rebellion. When David fled from Jerusalem Hushai joined him, but, at David’s suggestion, he returned to the city for the purpose of serving his master, as occasion might offer (2 Sam. 15:32–37). Accordingly, he offered his allegiance to Absalom (16:16–19) and was invited by him to a conference that would decide the prince’s action. Hushai advised delay in the pursuit of the king until more ample preparation had been made, thus defeating the counsel of Ahithophel (17:5–22). The immediate result was the suicide of the defeated Ahithophel (v. 23) and the ultimate consequence was the crushing of the rebellion, about 997 B.C. He is called the “friend” of David (1 Sam. 15:37; 1 Chron. 27:33). Baana, Solomon’s deputy in Asher (2 Kings 4:16), was doubtless his son.

HU’SHAM (hū’sham; “hastily”). A Temanite, the son of Bedad and successor of Jobab, among the native princes of Mt. Seir before the usurpation of the Edomites (Gen. 36:34–35; 1 Chron. 1:45–46).

HU’SHATHITE, THE (hū’sha-thīt). The designation of one of the heroes of David’s guard, Sibbecai (2 Sam. 21:18; 1 Chron. 11:29; 20:4; 27:11). Josephus, however, calls him a Hittite. In 2 Sam. 23:27 he is called Mebunnai, a corruption of Sibbecai. See Hushah.

HU’SHIM (hū’shim; “hasters”).

1. The son of Dan (Gen. 46:23), given as Shuham in Num. 26:42.

2. A name given as that of “the sons of Aher,” or Aharah, the third son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:12; cf. 8:1), and therefore only a plural form for Shuham, as a representative of his brethren.

3. One of the wives of Shaharaim, a Benjamite, in the country of Moab, by whom he had Abitub and Elpaal (1 Chron. 8:8, 11).

HUT (Heb. mā'ûnâ, Isa. 1:8, NASB and NIV; Heb. sūkâ, Job 27:18, NASB and NIV). The “hut” in Isa. 1:8 (NASB and NIV) was a shed or lodge (so KJV) for the watchman of a garden: “The daughter of Zion is left like a shelter in a vineyard, like a watchman’s hut in a cucumber field.” It was usually built on an elevation of ground, with room for only one person, who in solitude watched the ripening crop. “So did Jerusalem stand in the midst of desolation reaching far and wide—a sign, however, that the land was not entirely depopulated” (Delitzsch, Com., ad loc.).

HUZ. See Uz.

HUZ'ZAB (hūz'ab; Heb. nāṣab, to “establish”). This word is erroneously rendered in KJV (Nah. 2:7) as a proper name. The meaning appears to be as follows: the prophet has been declaring that “the gates of the river are opened, /And the palace is dissolved,” and then he cries out, as if against objectors, “And it is fixed” (so NASB), or “decreed” (so NIV), i.e., it is determined (by God).

HYK'SOS (hik'sōs; Egyptian for “rulers of foreign lands”). A mixed race, predominantly NW Semitic, which gradually infiltrated Egypt and finally took control (c. 1720–1550 B.C.). They reigned during Dynasties XV and XVI. Their capital was at Zoan-Tanis in the Delta. Archaeological excavations have uncovered many Hyksos remains. They introduced the horse and chariot into Egypt, as well as the composite bow. These implements of war made possible the New Empire of Egypt after 1550 B.C. and the expulsion of the Hyksos. The Hyksos Dynasties of Egypt were brought to an end when Khamose and Ahmose expelled them from the Delta (c. 1600–1550 B.C.). Amenhotep I inaugurated the splendid strong Eighteenth Dynasty (c. 1546–1319 B.C.). Although many scholars maintain that the Exodus took place under the Nineteenth Dynasty, the chronological data preserved in the MT undeniably places this event in the Eighteenth Dynasty. The Hyksos erected large earthen enclosures for their horses. This type of construction can be seen at Jericho, Shechem, Lachish, and Tell el-Ajjul. They also erected many temples to Baal. There are evidences of the worship of the mother goddess. Common in Hyksos levels are cultic objects such as nude figurines, serpents, and doves, showing their complete devotion to a degrading worship. Hyksos burial customs are distinctive, as is their chariotry. M.F.U.

HYMENAE'US (hī-men-ē'us; “pertaining to Hymen, god of marriage”). A person in Ephesus twice named in the epistles of Timothy, who, with Alexander (1 Tim. 1:20) and Philetus (2 Tim. 2:17), had departed from the truth in faith and practice.

Error. The chief doctrinal error of these persons consisted in maintaining that “the resurrection has already taken place” (2 Tim. 2:18). The precise meaning of this expression is by no means clearly ascertained; the most general and perhaps best founded opinion is that they understood the resurrection in a figurative sense of the great change produced by the gospel dispensation. Thus he stands as one of the earliest of the Gnostics.

Sentence. “Whom I have delivered over to Satan” (1 Tim. 1:20). The exact meaning of this formula has been much discussed. Some believe it means simply excommunication; others, supernatural infliction of corporeal punishment; others, a combination of both. Elliott (Com., ad loc.) says, “We conclude, then, with Waterland, that ‘delivery over to Satan’ was a form of Christian excommunication, declaring the person reduced to the state of a heathen, accompanied with the authoritative infliction of bodily disease or death.” Satan was held to be the instrument or executioner of all these visitations (cf. 1 Cor. 5:5; 1 John 5:16).

HYPOCRISY (Heb. from hānāp, to “defile,” cf. Jer. 3:9, “polluted”; Gk. hupokrisis, “an answer, to play a part”). Dissimulation of one’s real character or belief; a false assumption of character or belief. The Gk. word signifies the part taken by an actor; hence, outward show. Hypocrisy is professing to be what one is not and is generally applied to religious character. It is forbidden to the Christian (James 3:17).

HYPOCRITE. The hypocrite is a double person, natural and artificial. The first he keeps to himself, and the other he puts on, as he does his clothes, to make his appearance before men. Hypocrites have been divided into four classes: (1) The wordly hypocrite, who makes a profession of religion and pretends to be religious, merely from worldly considerations (Matt. 23:5). (2) The legal hypocrite, who relinquishes his vicious practices, in order thereby to merit heaven, while at the same time having no real love for God (Rom. 10:3). (3) The evangelical hypocrite, whose religion is nothing more than a bare conviction of sin; who rejoices under the idea that Christ died for him, and yet has no desire to live a holy life (Matt. 13:20). (4) The enthusiastic hypocrite, who has an imaginary sight of his sins and of Christ and talks of remarkable impulses and high feelings, etc., while living in the most scandalous practices (2 Cor. 11:14).

HYSSOP. In some of the sacrifices the relation between the shed blood and the transgressor was made manifest by the sprinkling on him of part of the blood. This was done using a bunch of hyssop. The first record of this use of hyssop is in connection with the Exodus, when the Israelites employed it to sprinkle the doorposts with the blood of the paschal lamb (Ex. 12:22). It was also used in connection with the ceremony of purifying lepers (Lev. 14:4–7) and in sprinkling blood on the leprous house (vv. 48–53). Hyssop was also used in the peculiar ordinance appointed for the purification of ceremonial uncleanness contracted by touching a dead body (Num. 19:14–18). See Sacrificial Offerings: Heifer, The Red.

The simplest form of the hyssop sprinkler is the “bunch,” which each father in Israel hastily prepared before leaving Egypt. In the Mosaic ritual the bunch of hyssop was tied with a scarlet thread (19:6). In the account of the crucifixion (John 19:28–29) it is recorded, “they put a sponge full of the sour wine upon a bunch of hyssop, and brought it to His mouth.” In the parallel passages of Matthew and Mark no reference is made to the hyssop, but it is said that the sponge was put upon a reed. Some explain the difference of statement by the supposition that the hyssop was fastened to a reed; others that the Gk. term rendered “reed” was a long stalk of hyssop; others, as Haley (Alleged Discrepancies, p. 235), believe that drink was twice offered to our Lord.

Figurative. The psalmist, having in view the frequent use of hyssop in the ceremonial law as a means by which the virtue of the sacrifice was transferred to the transgressor, applies it figuratively to the purification of the soul from guilt when he prays, “Purify me with hyssop, and I shall be clean” (Ps. 51:7). In alluding to Solomon’s botanical knowledge it is said, “He spoke of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even to the hyssop that grows on the wall” (1 Kings 4:33). The tall cedar and the humble hyssop at once suggests the most extensive range in the vegetable world. See Vegetable Kingdom. David at the time the Ziphites proposed betraying him to Saul (1 Sam. 23:19; 26:1, 3). Hachilah appears to have been the long ridge, now called El Kôlah, where there is a high hill with a ruin, called Yŭkîn.

HACH’MONI (hak’mō-ni; “wise, skillful”). A man known only as the father (or ancestor, cf. 1 Chron. 27:2) of Jashobeam, the chief of David’s warriors (11:11, where son of Hachmoni is rendered “Hachmonite”; the parallel passage in 2 Sam. 23:8 has “Tahchemonite”), and also of Jehiel, the companion of the princes in the royal household (1 Chron. 27:32), considerably before 1000 B.C. Hachmon or Hachmoni was, no doubt, the founder of a family to which these belonged. The actual father of Jashobeam was Zabdiel (27:2), who belonged to the Korahites (12:6); possibly the Levites descended from Korah (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia).

I

I AM (əhyeh ʾăsher ʾehyeh, “I am Who I am”). The name God gave Himself when speaking to Moses from the midst of the burning bush (Ex. 3:14; lit., God is He who is); the absolute I, the self-existent One.

IBEX. See Animal Kingdom.

IB'HAR (ib'hār; “choice”). One of the sons of David, born to him in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chron. 3:6; 14:5), after 1000 B.C.

IB'LEAM (ib'lē-am). A city—with suburban towns—within the natural boundaries of Asher but assigned to Manasseh (Josh. 17:11); one of the towns from which Manasseh failed to expel the Canaanites (v. 12). It is called Bileam (1 Chron. 6:70), a Levitical city (cf. Josh. 21:25, where it is called Gath-rimmon). Probably preserved in the ruins of Khirbet-belameh, about ten miles SE of Megiddo.

IBNE'IAH (ib-nē'ya; “built by Jah”). A son of Jeroham, who, with other Benjamites, returned to Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:8), after 536 B.C.

IBNI'JAH (ib-nī'ja; “building of Jah”). The ancestor of Meshullam, a Benjamite, who settled in Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (1 Chron. 9:8), after 536 B.C.

IB'RI (ib'ri; an “Eberite,” or “Hebrew”). The last of the sons of Merari by Jaaziah, apparently a descendant of Levi in the time of David (1 Chron. 24:27).

IB'SAM (ib'sam; “fragrant, pleasant”). One of the “sons” or descendants of Tola, the son of Issachar, in David’s army (1 Chron. 7:2; “Jibsam,” KJV), about 1000 B.C.; or he may have been a son of Tola, with descendants in the army of David.

IB'ZAN (ib'zan). The tenth judge of Israel (Judg. 12:8–10). He was of Bethlehem, probably the Bethlehem of Zebulun (so Michaelis and Hezel) and not of Judah (as Josephus says). He governed seven years, probably after 1080 B.C. The prosperity of Ibzan is marked by the great number of his children (thirty sons and thirty daughters) and his wealth by their marriages, for they were all married.

ICE (Heb. qerah, “smooth,” Job 6:16; 38:29; Ps. 147:17; sometimes “hail,” NIV). “On the Central Range (in Palestine) snow has been known to reach a depth of nearly two feet, and the pools at Jerusalem have sometimes been covered with ice. But this is rare” (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 65).

ICH'ABOD (ik'a-bad; “where is the glory? inglorious”). The son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli. The wife of Phinehas was about to give birth when she heard that her husband was slain in battle, that Eli was dead, and that the Ark of God had been taken by the Philistines. Under such circumstances her labor proved fatal to her. When she was lying at the point of death, the women standing about tried to cheer her, saying, “Do not be afraid, for you have given birth to a son.” She replied only by naming the child Ichabod, adding, “The glory has departed from Israel, for the ark of God was taken” (1 Sam. 4:19–22), about 1050 B.C. The only other mention of Ichabod is in 14:3, where it is stated that his brother Ahitub was father of Ahijah (which see), who acted as high priest for Saul.

ICO'NIUM (ī-kō'ni-um). A celebrated city of Asia Minor, visited probably three times by the apostle Paul (Acts 13:51; 14:1, 19, 21; 16:2), the present Konya, having a population of 200,000.

ID'ALAH (id'a-la). A city of Zebulun, near its western border, mentioned between Shimron and Bethlehem (Josh. 19:15). It is identified with Khirbet et Huwara about one-half mile S of Beit Lahm.

ID'BASH (id'bash; “honeyed”). A descendant of Judah who, with his two brothers (and a sister), are said to be “the sons of Etam” (1 Chron. 4:3), probably meaning of the lineage of the founder of the place, or perhaps that they themselves were its settlers.

ID'DO (id'o).

1. The father of Ahinadab, Solomon's deputy in the district of Mahanaim (1 Kings 4:14), before 960 B.C.

2. A Gershomite Levite, son of Joah and father of Zerach (1 Chron. 6:21); perhaps more correctly called Adaiah in v. 41.

3. Son of Zechariah, and ruler of the half tribe of Manasseh in Gilead (1 Chron. 27:21), 960 B.C.

4. Heb. same as no. 2, a seer whose “visions” against Jeroboam incidentally contained some of the acts of Solomon (2 Chron. 9:29). He appears to have written a chronicle relating to the life and reign of Abijah (13:22), which he seems to have called a midrash (see marg.), or “exposition,” and also a book concerning genealogies, in which the acts of Rehoboam were recorded (12:15), after 934 B.C. These books are lost, but they may have formed part of the foundation of the existing books of Chronicles.

5. The father of Berechiah and grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. 1:1, 7), although in other places Zechariah is called “the son of Iddo” (Ezra 5:1; 6:14; Neh. 12:16). Iddo returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (12:4), 536 B.C.

6. The “leading man” of the Jews established at Casiphia. It was to him that Ezra sent for Temple servants to join his company. Thirty-eight Levites and 220 Temple servants responded to his call (Ezra 8:17–20), 457 B.C. It would seem from this that Iddo was a chief person of the Temple servants and also that this is one of the circumstances that indicate that Jews, in their several colonies under the Exile, were still ruled by the heads of their nation and allowed the free exercise of their worship (Kitto).

IDLE. This word appears in Matt. 12:36, KJV, with the meaning of unprofitable or pernicious. The NASB renders “careless,” marg. “useless.” The meaning of the term in Luke 24:11, KJV, is nonsensical, absurd. The NASB reads “as nonsense.”

IDOL, IMAGE. These are the rendering of a large number of Heb. and Gk. words and may be divided as follows: (1) abstract terms, which, with a deep moral significance, express the degradation associated with, and stand out as a protest of the language against, the enormities

marg. margin, marginal reading of idolatry; (2) those that apply to the idols or images as the outward symbols of the deity who was worshiped through them; (3) terms relating to material and workmanship.

Abstract Terms. Seven of these terms were used.

1. An empty thing (Heb. āwen), rendered elsewhere “trouble,” “iniquity,” “vanity,” “wickedness,” “sorrow,” etc., and only once “idol” (Isa. 66:3). The primary idea of the root seems to be emptiness, nothingness, as of breath or vapor; and, by a natural transition, in a moral sense, wickedness in its active form of mischief, and then, as the result, sorrow and trouble. Hence āwēn denotes a vain, false, wicked thing, and expresses at once the essential nature of idols and the consequences of their worship.

2. A nonentity (Heb. ēlīl, good for “nothing”) is thought by some to have a sense akin to that of “falsehood” and would therefore much resemble no. 1, as applied to an idol. It is used of the idols or “images” of Memphis (Ezek. 30:13). It appears in strong contrast with Jehovah in Pss. 96:5; 97:7.

3. A terrifying thing (Heb. ēmim), so-called from the terror they inspired in their devotees (Jer. 50:38, “fearsome idols,” NASB; “idols that go mad with terror,” NIV). In this respect it is closely connected with no. 4.

4. A horrible thing (Heb. miplešet), rendered “horrid image” and applied to the idol of Maacah, probably of wood, which Asa cut down and burned (1 Kings 15:13; 2 Chron. 15:16; “repulsive Asherah pole,” NIV) and which was unquestionably a phallus, the symbol of the productive power of nature and the nature-goddess Ashera.

5. A shameful thing (Heb. bōshet, “shame,” Jer. 11:13; Hos. 9:10), applied to Baal or Baal-peor, as characterizing the obscenity of his worship.

6. Logs, blocks (Heb. gillūlīm), such as are rolled (gālāl) like helpless logs (Ezek. 30:13). The expression is applied, principally in Ezekiel, to false gods and their symbols (Deut. 29:17; Ezek. 8:10; etc.). It stands side by side with other contemptuous terms in 16:36; 20:8; as, e.g., sheqes, “filth,” “abomination,” “detestable things” (8:10). The NIV renders merely “idols” here.

7. A detestable thing (Heb. shiqqûš, “filth, impurity”), especially applies to that which produced ceremonial uncleanness (Ezek. 37:23; “vile images,” NIV). As referring to the idols themselves, it primarily denotes the obscene rites with which their worship was associated and hence, by metonymy, is applied both to the objects of worship and also to their worshipers (8:10; 16:36; 20:8).

Names of Idols. These terms applied more directly to the images or idols as the outward symbols of the deity who was worshiped through them.

1. A likeness (Heb. semel or sēmel, “semblance”), rendered “idol” (2 Chron. 33:7, 15; Ezek. 8:3, 5); “figure” (Deut. 4:16). It corresponds to the Lat. simulacrum.

2. A representation (Heb. šelem, a “shadow”). It is the “image” of God in which man was created (Gen. 1:27; cf. Wisd. of Sol. 2:23), distinguished from “likeness,” as the “image” from the “idea” that it represents, although it would be rash to insist upon this distinction. But whatever abstract term may best define the meaning of šēlēm, it is unquestionably used to denote the visible forms of external objects and is applied to figures of gold and silver (Num. 33:52; Dan. 3:1), such as the golden image of Nebuchadnezzar, as well as to those painted upon walls (Ezek. 23:14). “Image” perhaps most nearly represents it in all passages. Applied to the human countenance it is rendered “expression” (Dan. 3:19).

3. An appearance (Heb. t̄mûnâ, rendered “form” (Job 4:16; cf. Deut. 4:12) and “likeness” (5:8).

4. Something formed or fashioned (Heb. ʿāšāb, ʿešeb) (Jer. 22:28, KJV) or ʿōšeb (Isa. 48:5), all derived from a root ʿāšab, “to work,” or “fashion,” are terms applied to idols as expressing that their origin was due to the labor of man.

5. A form (Heb. šîr) applied only once to an idol (Isa. 45:16). The word signifies “a form” or “mold,” and hence an “idol.”

6. Stone monument (Heb. maššēbâ), anything “set up,” such as a “pillar” (Gen. 28:18; 31:45; 35:14). Such were the stones set up by Joshua after the passage of the Jordan (Josh. 4:9), at Shechem (24:26), and by Samuel when victorious over the Philistines (1 Sam. 7:12). When solemnly dedicated they were anointed with oil, and libations were poured upon them. The word is applied to the obelisks that stood at the entrance to the temple of the Sun at Heliopolis (Jer. 43:13). The Palladium of Troy, the black stone in the Kaaba at Mecca said to have been brought from heaven by the angel Gabriel, and the stone or “image which fell down from heaven” at Ephesus (Acts 19:35) are examples of the belief, so common in ancient times, that the gods sent down their images to earth.

7. Incense altar (Heb. ḥammānîm from ḥmm, “be hot, stand for heating, brazier”), often mentioned in connection with the statues of Astarte (Lev. 26:30; Isa. 17:8; 27:9; Ezek. 6:4, 6; 2 Chron. 14:5; 34:7); while from 34:4 it appears that they stood upon the altars of Baal.

8. Figured stone (Heb. maškîṭ, with the root apparently from šākâ, “to look at, behold,” Lev. 26:1 [“carved stone,” NIV]; Num. 33:52; cf. Ezek. 8:12). The general opinion appears to be that ʿeben maškîṭ signifies a stone with figures carved upon it.

9. Teraphim. Household deities. See Teraphim.

Material. Terms relating to the material and workmanship of the idol.

1. An artistically executed likeness (Heb. pesel), graven or carved images, rendered “idols” in Judg. 3:19, 26. The verb is employed to denote the fine work of the stone worker (Ex. 34:4; 1 Kings 5:18). The term pesel was applied to images of metal and wood, as well as those of stone (Deut. 7:25; Isa. 30:22; 40:19; Hab. 2:19).

2. A metal-cast idol. Heb. nēsek, nesek, and massēkâ are evidently synonymous in later Hebrew (Isa. 41:29; 48:5; Jer. 10:14) and denote a molten image, the last term often being used in distinction from pesel (Deut. 27:15; Judg. 17:3; etc.).

Forms of Idols. Among the earliest objects of worship regarded as symbols of deity were meteoric stones, then rough, unhewn blocks, and later stone columns or pillars of wood in which the divinity worshiped was supposed to dwell. The Bible does not give us many traces of the forms of idolatrous images. Dagon (which see), god of the Philistines, had a figure partly human, terminating in a fish. See idolatry.

IDOLATRY. In a general sense idolatry is the paying of divine honor to any created thing; the ascription of divine power to natural agencies. Idolatry may be classified as follows: (1) the worship of inanimate objects, such as stones, trees, rivers, etc.; (2) of animals; (3) of the higher powers of nature, such as the sun, moon, stars; and the forces of nature, as air, fire, etc.; (4) hero-worship or of deceased ancestors; (5) idealism, or the worship of abstractions or mental qualities, such as justice. Another classification is suggestive: (1) the worship of Jehovah under image or symbol; (2) the worship of other gods under image or symbol; (3) the worship of the image or symbol itself. Each of these forms of idolatry had its peculiar immoral tendency. See Gods, False; Idol.

Idolatry of Israel's Neighbors. In the course of her history Israel adopted many idolatrous practices from her heathen neighbors.

Egyptian. The Egyptians had a bewildering conglomeration of deities. It is impossible to list all the gods sacred to them. Every aspect of nature, every object looked at, animate as well as inanimate, was viewed as indwelt by a spirit that could select its own form, occupying the body of a cow, a crocodile, a fish, a human being, a tree, a hawk, etc. In their hieroglyphic inscriptions and their tomb paintings ancient Egyptian artists have left impressions of literally thousands of deities. The Pyramid Texts mention some 200. The Book of the Dead catalogs 1,200. The great deity, the sun-god Amun-Re, was one of the principal deities. Many of the pharaohs were believed to incarnate Amun-Re. Akhenaton, around 1380 B.C., switched from the worship of Amun as the state religion to the solar disc, Aton (and approached monotheism). An entire shake-up in the religious constitution of the nation followed. When Tutankhamen went back to Amun worship there was a similar political upheaval. Egypt venerated her fertility gods, and her Isis, a counterpart of Astarte, was adopted as far W as Italy. In Pompeii the ruins of a little temple of Isis is extant. Egyptians venerated Osiris, an agricultural deity, consort of Isis and the father of young Horus, who became successor of Osiris when the latter became the underworld god. Osiris was immensely influential. He was associated with the life-giving waters of the Nile River. At Heliopolis, biblical On, gods worshiped included Nut, Seb, Isis, Set, Osiris, Temu, Tefnut, Shu, and others, besides a lesser group of deities. The sight of animal- and bird-headed Egyptian deities such as Ptah, Knum, Hathor, Set, Sobek, etc., must have been thoroughly repulsive to the Hebrews, and yet the splendor and attraction of Egyptian cults must have been dazzling to the less spiritually minded.

Canaan. Fertility cults nowhere controlled people more completely than in Canaan. When Israel entered Palestine, the Canaanites were in the last stages of degradation as the result of centuries of worshiping degrading deities. The only safe recourse for the Israelites was complete separation and annihilation of the Canaanites and their religion. Orgiastic nature worship, fertility cults in the form of serpent symbols, unbounded license, and moral abandon could only be met with a severe code of ethics. El, a heartless, unbridled tyrant, had three wives or consorts who were patrons of sex and war. Baal was the great NW Semitic god of the storm. At Tyre, Melcarth was honored. Koshar was the Vulcan of the Canaanite; Hauron, the shepherd god. Mot was the god of death. The Ras Shamra texts speak of a sun goddess, Shapash. In the worship of these various deities prostitution was glorified. Veneration of Astarte continued for many centuries until the Christian emperor Theodosius, in the fourth century A.D., destroyed the Venus and the Adonis cult centers. There were also various pillar cults that had a degrading cultic significance, such as at Gezer and Ader in Moab.

Babylonia and Assyria. Early inhabitants of Mesopotamia paid homage to fertility gods. There the famous goddess of propagation, Ishtar, was thought of as descending to the underworld to seek her young husband, Tammuz. Other gods of production were Dagon, who in the W became father of Baal and brother of the virgin goddess of fertility, Anath. Babylonians also worshiped the sky god, Anu; En-lil, the wind god; Enki, earth and water god; Ningal, the mother goddess; Dumuzi (Tammuz of the Bible); Utu, the sun-god; Nannar, the moon god; Marduk, another form of the sun-god who later became the chief god of Babylon; and Ashur, the principal god of the Assyrians. Along with Ishtar, their immoral goddess of love, they worshiped Nabu, patron of learning; Nergal, god of war and the underworld; and Nusqu, the god of fire. The later Chaldeans especially revered the gods of fire and of the heavens as a result of their interest in astrology. Perhaps Babylonia exerted a greater influence upon Israelite religion than either Canaan or Egypt. However, Abraham, by his divine call, was brought out of paganism; and although he knew the many gods at Ur, particularly the moon god Sin, who was also worshiped at Haran, his vision of the “God of glory” (Acts 7:2) purged out the intermixture of idolatry. Along with the moon god, the sun god Shamash was greatly venerated among the Babylonians and Assyrians. Numerous cuneiform tablets depict scenes of Shamash worship. The cuneiform and monumental finds of the Sumerian-Akkadian peoples in Mesopotamia give us richer archaeological information of Mesopotamian religion than the records of Egypt. Stone and clay inscriptions, literary tablets unearthed in such temple libraries as those at ancient Nippur, SE of Babylon, the Tell Farah tablets from central Babylonia, and the thousands of clay tablets from Lagash (twenty-sixth century B.C.) yield a great fund of religious information. Tablets from the royal library of King Sargon II of Assyria (721–705 B.C.), augmented by Sennacherib and Esarhaddon, give further information. The phenomenal finds from the great library of Ashurbanipal (668–633 B.C.) have shown how potent a factor Sumero-Akkadian religion was in the ancient biblical world.

Idoltrous Usages. Mountains and high places were chosen spots for offering sacrifice and incense to idols (1 Kings 11:7; 14:23), and the seclusion of gardens and the thick shade of woods offered great attractions to their worshipers (2 Kings 16:4; Isa. 1:29; Hos. 4:13). The host of heaven was worshiped on the housetop (2 Kings 23:12; Jer. 19:13; 32:29; Zeph. 1:5). The priests of the false worship are sometimes designated Chemarim, a word of Aramaic origin, to which different meanings have been assigned. It is applied to the non-Levitical priests who burned incense on the high places (2 Kings 23:5), as well as to the priests of the calves (Hos. 10:5). In addition to the priests there were other persons intimately connected with idolatrous rites and the impurities from which they were inseparable. Both men and women consecrated themselves to the service of idols: the former as kedêshîm, for which there is reason to believe the KJV (Deut. 23:17; etc.) has not given too harsh an equivalent; the latter as kedêshôth, who wove shrines for Astarte (2 Kings 23:7). The same class of women existed among the Phoenicians, Armenians, Lydians, and Babylonians (Epist. of Jer., v. 43). They are distinguished from the public prostitutes (Hos. 4:14) and are associated with the performances of sacred rites. Besides these accessories there were the ordinary rites of worship that idolatrous systems had in common with the religion of the Hebrews. Offering burnt sacrifices to the idol gods (2 Kings 5:17), burning incense in their honor (1 Kings 11:8), and bowing down in worship before their images (19:18) were the chief parts of their ritual; and from their very analogy with the ceremonies of true worship were more seductive than the grosser forms.

Idolatry Among the Israelites. Although of a family that worshiped strange gods (Josh. 24:2), Abraham still worshiped the one true God when He revealed Himself to him and called him to leave his native land for Canaan (Gen. 12:1). The household idols that Rachel took with her (31:19) were an inferior kind of god, which might be combined with the worship of the one supreme God. Hence we find no idolatry in the strict sense either among the patriarchs or Israelites in Egypt and under Moses, but only solitary traces of idolatry and image worship, whereby the knowledge and worship of God was polluted but not supplanted (30:27; 31:53). The traces of idolatry that have been sought in Ex. 17:7; Num. 25:2; Josh. 24:14; Ezek. 20:7; and Amos 5:25–36 prove nothing more than disturbances of pure Jehovah worship by image worship, heathen superstition, and proneness to fleshly sins. The golden calf (Ex. 32) was intended to be a representation of Jehovah after an Egyptian pattern. Amos (Amos 5:25) in his rebuke seems to have in view image worship but not the service of the Assyrian idols Sikkuth and Kiyyun. The worship of Baal-peor was a temporary apostasy, brought about by the temptations to licentious indulgence offered by the rites of that deity.

The people of Israel were first seduced into apostasy from Jehovah into heathen idolatry by the Canaanites, who had not been rooted out. This apostasy took place during the time of the Judges. The various gods to whose service the Israelites gave themselves were Canaanite; after the invasion of Palestine by the Assyrians, Assyrian idols were added. After the death of Joshua and the elders who outlived him, Israel “forsook the Lord and served Baal and the Ashtaroth” (Judg. 2:13); and from this time its history becomes little more than a chronicle of the inevitable sequence of offense and punishment (2:12–14). Idolatry became the national sin, even Gideon, the judge, giving occasion to, or assisting in, idolatrous worship. In later times the practice of secret idolatry was carried to greater lengths. Images were set up on the grain floors, in the wine vats, and behind the doors of private houses (Isa. 57:8; Hos. 9:1–2); and to check this tendency the statute in Deut. 27:15 was originally proclaimed. Under Samuel’s administration a fast was held and purificatory rites performed to mark the public renunciation of idolatry (1 Sam. 7:3–6), but in the reign of Solomon all this was forgotten. Each of his many foreign wives brought with her the gods of her own nation, and the gods of Ammon, Moab, and Sidon were openly worshiped.

Among the Ten Tribes. Jeroboam, fresh from his recollections of the bovine worship of Egypt, erected golden calves at Bethel and at Dan and by this crafty state policy effectively severed the kingdoms of Judah and Israel (1 Kings 12:26–33). But Jeroboam’s calves were doubtless intended to fasten the worshiper’s attention upon Yahweh, thought of as invisibly represented above the animals, astride their backs. The deity astride a bull was a common conception illustrated by ancient Near-Eastern iconography. The successors of Jeroboam followed in his steps, until Ahab, who married a Sidonian princess, at her instigation (21:25) built a temple and altar to Baal and revived all the abominations of the Amorites (v. 26). Henceforth Baal worship became so completely identified with the Northern Kingdom that it is described as walking in the way or statutes of the kings of Israel (2 Kings 16:3; 17:8), as distinguished from the sin of Jeroboam. The conquest of the ten tribes by Shalmaneser was for them the last scene of the drama of abominations that had been enacted uninterruptedly for upward of 250 years. In the Northern Kingdom no reformer arose to vary the long line of royal apostates; whatever was effected in the way of reformation was done by the hands of the people (2 Chron. 31:1).

Idolatry in Judah. Rehoboam, the son of an Ammonite mother, perpetuated the worst features of Solomon’s idolatry (1 Kings 14:22–24); and in his reign the great schism in the national religion was made. The first act of Hezekiah on ascending the throne was the restoration and purification of the Temple, which had been dismantled and closed during the latter part of his father’s life (2 Chron. 28:24; 29:3). This purging of idols was not confined to Judah and Benjamin but spread throughout Ephraim and Manasseh (31:1), and to all external appearance idolatry was extirpated. But the reform extended little below the surface (Isa. 29:13). With the death of Josiah the last effort to revive a purer ritual, if not a purer faith, among the people ended. Idolatry spread fearfully in the last times of the kingdom of Judah, until it brought down on the people the punishment of captivity in Babylon. This exile bore wholesome fruit, for in captivity the Jews wholly gave up idolatry, with the exception of certain of those who had returned to Palestine, marrying pagan wives and sharing their worship, which departure was corrected by Ezra (Ezra 9–10). Later a new danger presented itself in Greek influence brought into Asia by Alexander, and some place-hunting Jews were base enough to adopt Greek idolatry. The nation was so far from showing any inclination to idolatry that the attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes was utterly rejected by the Jews (1 Macc. 2:23–26). The erection of synagogues has been assigned as a reason for the comparative purity of the Jewish worship after the hatred for images acquired by the Jews in their intercourse with the Persians.

Idolatry and the Law. Israel had entered into a solemn compact with Jehovah, accepting Him as the one true God and pledging themselves faithfully in service to Him (Ex. 19:3–8; 20:2–5). Idolatry, therefore, was a state of offense to an Israelite (1 Sam. 15:23), a political crime of the gravest nature, high treason against his king. It was a transgression of the covenant (Deut. 17:2–5), “evil” preeminently in the eyes of Jehovah (1 Kings 21:25). Idolatry was also a great wrong because of the licentious rites associated with it (Rom. 1:26–32), thus debauching the morals of its adherents. Regarded in a moral aspect, false gods are called a “stumbling block” (Ezek. 14:3), “lies” (Amos 2:4; Rom. 1:25), “abominations” (Deut. 29:17; 32:16), “guilt” (Amos 8:14); and with a profound sense of the degradation consequent upon their worship, they were characterized by the prophets as “shameful” and “shame” (Jer. 11:13; Hos. 9:10); “strange gods” (Deut. 32:16); “new gods” (Judg. 5:8); “demons . . . not God” (Deut. 32:17; 1 Cor. 10:20–21); and as denoting their foreign origin, gods “which were beyond the River” (Josh. 24:14–15). Their powerlessness is indicated by describing them as gods “who cannot save” (Isa. 45:20); “that did not make the heavens” (Jer. 10:11); “nothing” and “no such thing” (Isa. 41:24; 1 Cor. 8:4); “wind and emptiness” (Isa. 41:29); “vain things” (Acts 14:15).

Many customs associated with idolatry were forbidden by the law. Maimonides tells us that the prohibition against sowing a field with mingled seeds and wearing garments of mixed material was because some idolaters attributed a kind of magical influence to the mixture (Lev. 19:19). It was also forbidden to interchange the garments of the sexes (Deut. 22:5); to cut the flesh for the dead (Lev. 19:28; cf. 1 Kings 18:28), or to shave the forehead (Deut. 14:1), these things being associated with the idolatrous rites. Eating of things offered was a necessary appendage to sacrifice (cf. Ex. 18:12; 32:6; 34:15; Num. 25:2). Printing upon one’s person was forbidden to the Israelites (Lev. 19:28), because idolaters branded upon their flesh some symbol of the deity they worshiped, such as the ivy leaf of Bacchus (3 Macc. 2:29).

Penalties. The first and second commandments are directed against idolatry of every form. Individuals and communities were equally amenable to the rigorous code. The individual offender was given over to destruction (Ex. 22:20); his nearest relatives were not only bound to denounce him and deliver him up to punishment (Deut. 13:6–10), but their hands were to strike the first blow when, on the evidence of at least two witnesses, he was stoned (17:2–7). To attempt to seduce others to false worship was a crime of equal enormity (13:6–10). An idolatrous nation shared a similar fate.

Figurative. The term idolatry is used to designate covetousness, which takes mammon for its god (Eph. 5:5; Col. 3:5; cf. Matt. 6:24; Luke 16:13). Appetite or gluttony is also included under idolatry (Phil 3:19; cf. Rom. 16:18; 2 Tim. 3:4). See Gods, False. M.F.U. BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. H. IDOLOMANCY. See Magic: Various Forms.

IDUME'A (id-u-mē'a; Gk. "pertaining to Edom"). This is a term employed by Greeks and Romans for the country of Edom (Mark 3:8 and in KJV only, Isa. 34:5–6; Ezek. 35:15; 36:5). After the fall of Jerusalem (587 B.C.) the Edomites began to advance northward (36:5). By 312 B.C. the Nabataeans, who established themselves in Edom, drove them from Petra. The Edomites were gradually pushed into the southern half of Judea, including the region around Hebron, an area that the Greeks later called Idumea. Judas Maccabaeus warred against them and a half century later John Hyrcanus completely subdued them, imposed the rite of circumcision, and invoked the old Jewish law of assembly (Deut. 23:7–8). Julius Caesar in 47 B.C. appointed an Idumean, Antipater, procurator of Judea, Samaria, and Galilee. Herod, son of Antipater, was crowned king of the Jews in 37 B.C. When Titus besieged Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the Idumeans joined the Jews in rebellion against Rome. Josephus says that 20,000 Idumeans were admitted as defenders of the Holy City. Once within, they proceeded to rob and kill, but these traitors received the same fate as the few surviving Jews when Rome took over Jerusalem. Idumea, or Edom, ceased to be. M.F.U.

IE'ZER (yē'zer; "helpless"; abridged for Abiezer). A son of Gilead of Manasseh (Num. 26:30), elsewhere (Josh. 17:2; etc.) called Abiezer (which see).

IE'ZERITES (yē'zer-īts). The descendants (Num. 26:30) of Iezer.

I'GAL (ī'gal; He [God] redeems).

1. The son of Joseph, and agent from Issachar sent to spy out the land of Canaan (Num. 13:7), 1441 B.C.

2. The son of Nathan of Zobah, and one of David's mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:36), about 962 B.C. In the parallel list (1 Chron. 11:38) the name is given as "Joel the brother of Nathan."

3. One of the sons of Shemaiah, of the descendants of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:22), after 536 B.C.

IGDALI'AH (ig-da-lī'a; "great is the Lord"). The father of Hanan, into whose chamber Jeremiah brought the Rechabites to propose the test of their temperance (Jer. 35:4), about 600 B.C.

I'GEAL. See Igal.

IGNORANCE. The term implies "error, going astray" (cf. Lev. 4:2, "If a person sins unintentionally"). In the NT the Greek means "want of knowledge"; sometimes simple, excusable want of information (Acts 17:30); sometimes inexcusable (Eph. 4:18); sometimes moral blindness or sinful ignorance (Acts 3:17).

I'IM (ī'im; "heaps, ruins"). A city in the extreme S of Judah (Josh. 15:29), and doubtless included within the territory of Simeon, as the associated places were (cf. 19:3). It is probably to be identified with the ruins of Deir el-Ghawi, near Ummin Deimneh. See also Iye-abarim; Iyim.

I'JE-AB'ARIM. See Iye-abarim.

I'JON (ī'jon; "a ruin"). A frontier town in the N of Palestine, in the hills of Naphtali—a store city. It was captured in the days of Asa by Ben-hadad (1 Kings 15:20; 2 Chron. 16:4), and later by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings 15:29). It is thought to be Tell el-Dibbin, in the fertile valley of Merj 'Ayûn ("the meadow of springs"), NW of Dan.

IK'KESH (ik'kesh; "crooked, perverse"). The father of Ira, a Tekoite who was one of David's famous warriors (2 Sam. 23:26; 1 Chron. 11:28), and captain of the sixth regiment of his troops (27:9), 1000 B.C.

I'LAI (ila□-ī). An Ahohite, and one of David's heroes (1 Chron. 11:29), called Zalmon in the parallel list (2 Sam. 23:28), 1000 B.C.

ILLUMINATED. See Enlightened.

ILLYR'ICUM (i-lir'i-kum). A region lying between Italy, Germany, Macedonia, and Thrace, having on one side the Adriatic Sea and on the other the Danube. It answers to the present Dalmatia; by which name, indeed, the southern part of Illyricum itself was known, and where Paul informed Timothy that Titus had gone (2 Tim. 4:10). It is of uncertain dimensions, being understood differently by Greek and Roman writers. It is mentioned only once in the NT and that simply as the extreme limit to which, in the direction of Rome, Paul carried the gospel message (Rom. 15:19). It is difficult to ascertain the exact meaning of this passage. The expression "round about" may be joined with Jerusalem and signify its neighborhood (as Alford); or it may be joined with "as far as Illyricum" and denote the circuit of the apostle's journey, an expression warranted by the indefinite phrase of Luke, "those districts" (Acts 20:2).

IMAGE. See Form, Likeness.

IMAGE, NEBUCHADNEZ'ZAR'S (Heb. šelem, a "resemblance"). Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream a great metallic image that was terrible to look upon. It was not an idol image but a statue and from the description given was evidently in human form. The image appeared divided as to its material into five parts—the head of fine gold, breast and arms of silver, the "belly [the abdomen] and its thighs" (loins) of bronze (i.e., copper), the legs and upper part of the thighs of iron, and the feet of clay (Dan. 2:32–33). Thus it can be seen that the material became inferior from the head downward, finally terminating in clay. While Nebuchadnezzar was contemplating this statue a "stone was cut out without hands" (v. 34), broke loose from the mountain, struck against the lowest part of the image, broke the whole of its pieces, and ground all of its material into powder. The expression "without hands" signifies without human help.

Nebuchadnezzar's dream, as unraveled by Daniel, describes the course and end of "the times of the Gentiles" (Luke 21:24; cf. Rev. 16:19); that is, of the Gentile world power to be destroyed at the second coming of Christ. "The stone ... cut out without hands" symbolizes Christ returning as "King of kings and Lord of lords" to set up His millennial kingdom. The four empires represent Babylon, Media-Persia, Greece under Alexander, and Rome. The latter power is seen divided first into two legs, fulfilled in the eastern and western Roman empires, and then into ten toes (cf. Dan. 7:26). The ten-toed form will be the condition of Gentile world domination at the time of the returning striking stone (2:34–35). The Gentile world system will be destroyed by a sudden crushing blow, not by a gradual process. At the first advent of Christ neither the sudden crushing blow took place nor did the ten-toed condition occur.

In Daniel (chap. 3) is an account of a golden image set up by Nebuchadnezzar in the plain of Dura. It probably represented his patron god, Bel-merodach, and adoration of it was a test of loyalty. As its height was out of proportion to its breadth (six cubits) ten to one, it is probable that a tall pedestal is included in its measurement. M.F.U.

IMAGE OF GOD.

As Borne by Man (Heb. šelem, “resemblance”; accompanied in Gen. 1:26; 5:1 by dīmūt, “likeness”). Attempts have been made by modern as well as ancient writers to base important distinctions upon the use of the two words, but such attempts are regarded generally as instances of overrefined or fantastic exegesis. The double expression is for the purpose of giving strength and emphasis to the idea of godlikeness in man as set forth in these passages. Likeness added to image tells us that the divine image that man bears is one corresponding to the original pattern.

The conception of man as created after the image of God is justly held to be of great importance and fundamental in theology. It is foremost among the Bible representations of man; it is bound up in the account of his creation; it appears in striking relation elsewhere, sometimes with the same, at others with different, expressions (Gen. 9:6; Ps. 8; Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10; James 3:9; cf. Matt. 5:48; Luke 6:36; Acts 17:28–29; 1 Pet. 1:15–16; 2 Pet. 1:4, where the exalted capacity and nature of man are assumed).

Significance of the Idea. This has been a favorite battleground of theologians, partly due to the brevity of the Scripture statements and more largely to the different theological presuppositions with which the subject has been considered. An outline of the history of speculation or of doctrine upon this point cannot be given here. Evidently the Scriptures proclaim resemblance of a most important character between the constitution of man and the divine nature. Man is exalted above all the other creatures of the earth, as the account shows, in that he is a copy of the Creator. And, what is also of great importance according to the representations of Scripture, this image survived the Fall and, though blurred, still exists. The sacredness of human life is based upon this fact (Gen. 9:6). The cursing tongue as well as the violent hand must for the same reason be restrained (James 3:9). As to the effect of the Fall and man’s sinful history upon God’s image in man, the Scriptures are almost wholly silent. Paul (Rom. 3:23) declares that “all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God,” a statement equivalent to saying that the glorious image is, because of sin, less than it once was. There are also recognitions of loss through sin in this respect, where, in the famous passages of Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10, the apostle speaks of the “new self,” or one’s renewal. But, as the best theologians commonly agree, the representations of Scripture are such as to create the impression that in some lofty sense the divine image is inalienable from man. As to what constituted this image originally and as to what it still constitutes, it should be said that a too frequent mistake has been to concentrate attention upon some single feature instead of comprehending all those excellent characteristics that, according to the Scriptures, belonged or belong to man and that constitute his likeness to his Maker. Also the effort has been made to distinguish too sharply between what in the likeness has been lost through sin and what is permanent. Man’s nature has generally suffered loss from sin, but even in those respects in which the loss has been greatest, “in righteousness and holiness,” the loss is not such as to render him incapable of divine renewal. With these preliminaries in view, the chief significance of the idea or the contents of the divine image, may be summarized as follows: (1) Spirituality. Man’s likeness to God is not, as some of the early Latin Fathers fancied, a bodily likeness. God is Spirit, and the first great point of resemblance between man and his Creator is found in man’s spiritual nature. His life is inbreathed from God—a distinguishing fact in his creation (see Gen. 2:7; Job 32:8). With this stands connected the fact of man’s immortal nature and destiny, for God is the Eternal Spirit. The general teaching of Scripture is that this feature survives. (2) Personality. God is a person; He is conscious of His own existence. He is the Supreme Intelligence. He is free. Man is also self-conscious; he is endowed with intelligence, rationality, and freedom. And at this point, despite sin, there still may be discerned in man wonderful vestiges of his inherent greatness and likeness to the divine. (3) Holiness. God is the Holy One. Man was created pure, with no inherent tendency to sin; with such qualities in his nature that he was after the image and likeness of the righteous and holy God. (4) Love. God is love. The cardinal virtue, or moral excellence, proclaimed for man in the Scriptures is love. Man originally bore, and again may bear, the divine likeness in this respect. But here, as elsewhere, we see the necessity for restoration. (5) Dominion. God is sovereign. He created man to rule (see Gen. 1:26; Ps. 8:6; etc.). Whether the place assigned to man in the creation is to be considered a feature of his likeness to the divine or in the consequence of that likeness, is a question that has been much discussed. The latter is the more exact view, as reference here is to his position rather than to his nature. And yet man's royalty in the natural world is still so great that it must suggest his original complete fitness for it. For related topics, see Righteousness; Sin, Original; Grace; Immortality.

Christ the Image of God. In two passages of the NT Christ is thus designated. In Col. 1:15 He is "the image of the invisible God"; in Heb. 1:3 He is "the radiance of His glory," "the exact representation of His nature" (cf. John 1:1; 17:25–26).

Ellicott remarks, "The Son is the Father's image in all things, save only in being the Father." Christ has appeared in the world as the perfect manifestation of God. And that He called Himself "the Son of man" is not opposed to this fact. For if man in his original state bore the divine image, certainly He must bear it who is not only perfect in His human nature but is also the "only begotten Son" of God. What this designation of Christ may convey to us as to the eternal relations between the Father and the Son is a deep matter that cannot be considered here. But it should be noted that this "second man," this "Son from heaven," this eternal "Word," this "image of the invisible God," appears in the NT as the Author of salvation. And the end of this salvation is conformity to His image. In the OT man appears created after the image of God; in the NT "the Son is the prototype of redeemed or renewed humanity" (Rom. 8:29; Col. 3:10–11; cf. Rom. 8:19 with 1 John 3:2; Phil. 3:21; 2 Cor. 3:18; 1 Cor. 15:47, 49). E.MCC.

IMAGES (Heb. maškit, an "image," Lev. 26:1; "picture," Num. 33:52). "The room of his carved images" ("the chambers of his imagery," KJV; NIV has "idol") is an expression found in Ezek. 8:12 in the description given by the prophet of the vision shown him of the Temple. The prophet appears to have been conducted out of the inner court through its northern gate into the outer court and placed in front of the northern gate, which led into the open air. There was a hole in the wall, and on breaking through the wall by the command of God, he came to a door. Entering it, he saw all kinds of figures of animals portrayed on the wall; in front of these, seventy of the elders of Israel were standing and praying reverently to the images of the beasts with burning incense. The vision was a revelation of what was going on throughout the whole of Israel. The secret chamber is figurative of the idolatry secretly practiced by the people; the number seventy represents the whole nation. The pictures on the walls, representing animal worship, showed the great degradation of the nation's religion, which was justified by the elders under the delusion that "the Lord does not see us; the Lord has forsaken the land"; that is to say, not that "He does not trouble Himself about us," but that "He does not know what we do; and has withdrawn His presence and help." Thus they denied God's omniscience and omnipresence. "Room of his carved images" is a term applied to the rooms or closets in the homes of the people in which idolatrous images were set up and worshiped.

IMAGINATION. The image-making, pictorial faculty of the mind, reproducing and recombining former thoughts and experiences. It illustrates, adorns, and illuminates our speech and writing by presenting new views and applications of things, truths, and conceptions. It is the artist's great qualification and the supreme talent of the inventor, finding expression in painting and sculpture, new machinery, architecture, landscape gardening, etc.

In KJV "imagination" is the rendering of the Heb. shrîrût, "firmness," generally in a bad sense; i.e., "hardness of heart" (Deut. 29:19; frequently in Jeremiah); yēšer, "form, conception" (Gen. 6:5; 8:21; Deut. 31:21; etc.); Gk. dialogismos, "deliberating with one's self" (cf. Rom. 1:21); dianoia, "way of thinking" (cf. Luke 1:51).

IMITATOR (Gk. mimētēs). Paul urges Christians to be "imitators of me"; etc., meaning that they were to be like him in all good things (1 Cor. 4:16; 11:1; etc.); also to take God as an example (Eph. 5:1). In Phil. 3:17 he exhorts the brethren to "join in following my example, and observe those who walk according to the pattern you have in us," i.e., to be co-imitators. KJV renders "followers."

IM'LA (im'la; "full"). The father of Micaiah, which latter was the prophet who ironically foretold the defeat of the allied kings of Judah and Israel against Ramoth-gilead (2 Chron. 18:7-8). In the parallel passage (1 Kings 22:8-9) his name is written Imlah. The NIV renders "Imlah" in both passages.

IM'LAH. See Imla.

IMMAN'UEL (i-man'u-el; "God with us"; i.e., "savior"). A name given to Christ by Matthew (1:23) after Isa. 7:14. According to orthodox interpretation the name denotes the same as God-man (theanthrōpos) and has reference to the personal union of the human nature and the divine in Christ.

IMMATERIALITY. Not consisting of matter. This quality is predicated of God and the human soul. "Finite and passive matter, with its divisibility, is not in his essence. The absolute Being is thoroughly one with itself, and is not composite; the composite is divisible, the divisible is finite and material; thus all this cannot be applied to God" (Dorner, Christ. Doctrine, 1:238). God is also free from the limitations to which matter is subject, i.e., from the limits of space and time. The immateriality of God is therefore the basis of the qualities of eternity, omnipresence, and unchangeableness.

The immateriality of the soul includes simplicity as another of its qualities, but it is not superior to the limitations of space and time, since the soul needs the body as a necessary organ of its life.

IM'MER (im'er; "sheep, lamb"). The name of several priests.

1. The father of Meshillemith (1 Chron. 9:12), or Meshillemoth (Neh. 11:13), some of whose descendants took a conspicuous part in the sacred duties at Jerusalem after the Exile. His descendants, to the number of 1,052, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:37; Neh. 7:40). He is probably the same as mentioned in Ezra 10:20, some of whose descendants divorced their Gentile wives, long before 536 B.C. By some he is identified with nos. 4 and 5.

2. A priest in the time of David, and head of the sixteenth sacerdotal division (1 Chron. 24:14).

3. One who accompanied Zerubbabel from Babylon but was unable to prove his Israelite descent (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61), 536 B.C. "It does not clearly appear, however, that he claimed to belong to the priestly order, and it is possible that the name is only given as that of a place in the Babylonish dominions from which some of those named in the following verses came” (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia, s.v.).

4. The father of Zadok, which latter repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:29), before 445 B.C.

5. The father of Pashhur, which latter “had Jeremiah the prophet beaten, and put him in the stocks” (Jer. 20:1–2), before 605 B.C.

IMMORTALITY. “Exemption from death and annihilation”; with reference to man, unending personal existence beyond the grave.

Scripture Doctrine. Viewed strictly, the idea of man’s future life is not altogether identical with that of his immortality. And yet practically the question, “If a man die shall he live again?” covers the whole matter.

The Old Testament. The idea of individual immortality is not as prominently and emphatically set forth in the OT as in the NT. It was the purpose and method of the OT writers to present, not so much the contrast between the present and the future, as that between the chosen people and the heathen nations. It is national life, and not that of individuals, that occupies the foremost place. Nevertheless, the assertion, made even by certain Christian writers, that the doctrine of the future life is not taught in the OT Scriptures, is unwarranted. And the supposition, which has sometimes been entertained, that the patriarchs and prophets and the Jewish people generally held no such doctrine is unreasonable and opposed to fact. It is to ascribe to them lower views of man’s nature and future destiny than prevailed among the nations with which they came in contact. It is to regard the recipients and custodians of special revelation as less enlightened than others to whom such privileges had not been afforded. That the Jews, with the exception of the Sadducees, universally believed in man’s immortal nature when Christ came is beyond dispute. And there is sufficient evidence to show that such had been their belief during the preceding centuries of their history. For example, such common expressions as “was gathered to his people,” along with the prohibition of necromancy, or invocation of the dead, clearly testify to the popular Hebrew belief in continued conscious existence beyond the grave. If the number of passages in the OT explicitly affirming this doctrine is not large, it should not, therefore, be a matter of trivial objection. The fact of life after death is taken for granted. Its recognition pervades the general drift or spirit of these ancient Scriptures. Thus man is represented as created in the image of God and therefore a creature whose chief existence is spiritual, not to be obliterated by the death of the body. His highest good is constantly set before us, as found in the divine favor and fellowship. All temporal good is insignificant in comparison with this. “The prosperity of the wicked” is not to be envied, because of the “end” that is realized in “the sanctuary.” In the same place of clear and holy light is seen the contrasted condition and prospect of the righteous. “I am continually with Thee; Thou hast taken hold of my right hand. With Thy counsel Thou wilt guide me, and afterward receive me to glory” (Ps. 73). Thus the whole drift or tendency is to turn the thoughts of the people from the present toward the future. And besides, there are several places in the OT where the doctrine of a future life is plainly asserted. The sixteenth psalm, especially as connected with the apostolic comments (Acts 2:27; 13:35), is a case in point (see also Ps. 17:15; Isa. 26:19; Dan. 12:2–3).

The New Testament. In 2 Tim. 1:10 Paul speaks of Christ, “who abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel.” Literally the phrase “brought ... to light” means “has illuminated,” or “shed light upon.” It is certainly not implied here that the doctrine of immortality was unknown to the world before Christ came, for some sort of belief in that doctrine had been common, if not universal, among the Gentile nations as well as among the Jews. It means that “the gospel pours light upon and discloses the author, origin, and true nature of life and immortality to our view” (see Whedon, Com., on above passage). It should be added that not only among the Jews had some (particularly the Sadducees) cast away the belief and hope of a future life, but also false philosophy and prevailing corruption had weakened or destroyed the faith of many among the Gentiles. The mission of Christ, therefore, was not only to “shed light upon immortality” by means of definite and authoritative instruction but also by His life and death and resurrection to make it possible for men to attain to an immortality that should be blessed. Accordingly, we find explicit utterances from Christ in large number with respect to this subject. He argued with the Sadducees against their unbelief. And His argument is significant as showing not only His own affirmation of a future deathless life but also His affirmation of that doctrine as taught in the OT (see Luke 20:27–38). He taught the doctrine plainly, illustrating it with parables; it ran as a solemn undertone through all His teachings (see Matt. 5:12; 8:11–12; 12:32; 13:36, 43; 18:8–9; 22:11–13; 25:1–13, 31–46; Mark 8:35–37; Luke 12:4–5; 13:24–29; 16:19–31; 18:29–30; John 3:16; 5:39–40; 6:47–58; 10:28; 11:25; 14:1–6; etc.). It should be noted that, in the passages referred to, Christ speaks of the future, not only of the righteous but also of the wicked; also, that He speaks of a blessed immortality as attainable only through Himself. The teachings of the apostles, as found in other parts of the NT, are as we might expect, equally explicit with those of Christ. It is unnecessary to cite illustrations. As it has well been said, “the obligation which even in this respect the world owes to the Gospel of the Cross is one which cannot be overrated” (Van Oosterzee).

Theological. By immortality theologians frequently mean the survival of the spiritual part of man after physical death. However, it must be clearly kept in mind that immortality is not mere existence after death. Death does not end human life, whether in the case of the saved or unsaved. In fact, the tenet of the immortality of the soul alone is unknown in Scripture. The Bible does not look at this disembodied existence as life or completed happiness. The biblical concept of immortality is a deathlessness of the whole person, the body particularly as united to the soul and spirit. Therefore, it may be said that immortality refers to the body, the material part of man, but as this affects the whole man including soul and spirit. Immortality, then, is not simply a future conscious condition, however prolonged, but a state of deliverance, of bliss, due to redemption and the possession of a glorified body united to the soul and the spirit. It therefore includes resurrection and a perfected life in body, soul, and spirit.

Immortality and Eternal Life. Immortality is not identical with the gift of eternal life, which all believers in Christ possess. Believers who possess eternal life, as well as unbelievers, suffer death. The only possibility of a believer’s not dying is the coming of the Lord and the instantaneous glorification of his human body (1 Cor. 15:51–53; 1 Thess. 4:13–17). The possession of eternal life guarantees a future immortal body either by translation or resurrection, but the body of the saved person is only potentially immortal (Rom. 8:22–23; 2 Cor. 5:1–5). All who have eternal life are thus guaranteed the future immortality of the body, that is, they are promised either resurrection unto life or translation unto glory. In either case the result is the same—namely, a glorified body that is immortal, deathless, painless, and sinless, united to the redeemed soul and spirit. This fully redeemed personality is what the Bible means by immortality. Unsaved people who do not possess eternal life possess a mortal body that will never be immortal. Their soul and spirit will go on existing forever but their body, raised for judgment, will suffer “the second death” at the sinner’s judgment of the white throne (Rev. 20:14). This is not annihilation. This is eternal conscious existence in separation from God, and thus torment and what is called “fire which burns with brimstone.”

Apparently the term “second death” implies the dissolution or corruption of the resurrected body of the unsaved whose personality does not possess immortality. Only those who believe on Christ, “who alone possesses immortality and dwells in unapproachable light; whom no man has seen or can see” (1 Tim. 6:16), obtain that same immortality that Christ, as the Firstfruit, secured by His death and resurrection. Immortality, then, is brought “to light through the gospel” (2 Tim. 1:10). The heathen concept of the immortality of the soul is not biblical. Immortality belongs to the realm of the body as it affects the whole redeemed man.

Immortality and the Believer’s Hope. No believer yet has an immortal body. Christ alone, who did not see corruption (Ps. 16:10; Acts 2:31), possesses such a body as the glorified Son of Man in heaven. He put on immortality over a mortal body, that is, His body that died on the cross. By His redemptive work on the cross and His resurrection He “brought life and immortality to light through the gospel” (2 Tim. 1:10). The cross of Christ guaranteed the glorification of the human body of the believer, whether by translation or resurrection. No unbeliever has this hope. Although the Christian’s body may suffer dissolution, as the body of the unsaved person’s does, yet only the believer in Christ can look forward to an immortal body joined to a deathless soul and spirit. Thus Christ’s redemption extends to the entire personality. It is not a shadowy, disembodied existence in Sheol or Hades. It is a full deliverance. Thus it may be said that immortality cannot be correctly used of the soul. It must be posited of the incorruption or incorruptibility of the body as it affects the whole man. The destiny of the believer is to be transformed “into conformity with the body of His glory” (Phil. 3:21). This body will be suitable for our “citizenship” in heaven (3:20). All Christians will see the dissolution of the human body, except those who will be living at the end of the age when Christ returns. They will be translated without seeing death. This is what the apostle means in 2 Cor. 5:4: “while we are in this tent, we groan, being burdened, because we do not want to be unclothed, but to be clothed, in order that what is mortal may be swallowed up by life.” All other Christians will see corruption, or death (that is, the separation of the body from the soul and spirit). They, however, will receive immortality or be clothed with immortality by resurrection. Resurrection may be defined as the reunion of the soul and spirit with the body in the glorified form; deathless, sinless, painless, fatigueless.

IMMUTABILITY. The divine attribute of unchangeableness. The Scripture declarations of this attribute are most clear and emphatic. It is indicated in the title under which God made Himself known to Moses, “I Am,” “I Am Who I Am” (Ex. 3:14; see Num. 23:19; 32:11; Mal. 3:6; James 1:17).

From this it is to be understood that God is eternally the same in His essence, in the mode of His existence, in His perfections, and in the principles of His administration.

This attribute is essential to deity. To think of God otherwise than as unchangeable is to think of Him otherwise than as perfect.

Immutability is not, however, to be confounded with immobility. God acts, and His actions vary with reference to different ends. His affections toward the same persons change according to the changed attitude of those persons toward Him. Thus, according to the representations of Scripture, the God who “is not a man, that he should repent” (1 Sam. 15:29, KJV) nevertheless does “repent,” an accommodation of language to express the truth above stated. In reality such changes in the divine operations and affections are illustrations of the fact and character of divine immutability (see Num 23:19; Ps. 90:13; Ezek. 33:7–19; Jonah 3:9–10).

The proper conception of God's unchangeableness is to be derived only from the Scriptures, and the sublimity of the conception given there is one of the indications of divine revelations.

IM'NA. The son of Helem, a descendant of Asher (1 Chron. 7:35).

IM'NAH (im'na; cf. Arab. yumnah, "good luck, fortune").

1. The first named of the sons of Asher (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:44; 1 Chron. 7:30), about 2000 B.C. The name is given as Jimnah in the KJV of Gen. 46:17 and as Jimna in the KJV of Num. 26:44.

2. The father of Kore, which latter, a Levite, had charge of the E gate of the Temple and was appointed by Hezekiah over the freewill offerings (2 Chron. 31:14), 715 B.C.

IMPERISHABLE. The rendering in the NASB and NIV of two Gk. words to describe something as ever-enduring, unchanging.

1. Gk. aphtharsia is applied in 1 Cor. 15:42, 50, 53–54 to the body of a man as exempt from decay after the resurrection (the KJV reads "incorruption"). The same Gk. word is rendered "immortality" in Rom. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:10; it is given as "incorruptible" in Eph. 6:24 (NASB; "in sincerity," KJV; "undying," NIV).

2. The "wreath" ("crown," KJV) of the saints is imperishable (Gk. aphthartos, 1 Cor. 9:25; "incorruptible," KJV; "that will last forever," NIV), as is their inheritance (1 Pet. 1:4). See also 1 Cor. 15:52; 1 Pet. 1:23.

IMPORTUNITY (Gk. anaideia). Persistence (Luke 11:8; cf. 18:1; 1 Thess. 5:17).

IMPOSITION OF HANDS. See Hands, Laying on of.

IMPOTENT. In the KJV, a general term indicating disablement. The NASB renders "sick" (John 5:3, 7; Acts 4:9; the NIV has "invalid" and "cripple" respectively) and "without strength" (14:8; NIV, "crippled").

IMPUTATION. One of the major doctrines of Christianity. It has produced a great deal of theological controversy (see Hagenbach and Shedd, History of Doctrine). The actual word impute means to "reckon over unto one's account." The case of the apostle's writing to Philemon concerning whatever his runaway slave Onesimus might owe him gives a perfect scriptural illustration of the meaning of the phrase: "charge that to my account" (Philem. 18). Three major imputations are expounded in Scripture:

Of Adam's Sin to the Race. This is the clear teaching of Rom. 5:12–21. Verse 12 clearly indicates that death has come upon all men "because all sinned." The tense of the verb sinned is the aorist and does not therefore concern the sin of men in their daily experience. But the passage clearly indicates that all men sinned when Adam sinned and thereby incurred upon themselves the penalty of physical death as a consequence. In demonstrating that this passage does not have reference to personal sins, we call attention to the apostle's observation that between the time of Adam and Moses, before the Mosaic law was instituted, all died. Likewise all irresponsible persons such as infants and imbeciles died, although they were never guilty of willful sin as in the case of Adam. Many theologians object to this teaching of real imputation, that is, of reckoning to each person that which is antecedently his own. But Scripture furnishes a close parallel in the record of Levi, who was supported by tithes and is specifically said to have paid tithes while being in the loins of his great-grandfather Abraham (Heb. 7:9–10), that is, when Abraham paid tithes to Melchizedek.

Of the Sin of the Human Race to Christ. This involves a judicial imputation inasmuch as the sin was never antecedently Christ's and when laid upon Him became His in a fearful sense. The truth of the gospel lies in this grand fact. Although the theological term impute is not employed with regard to the laying of the sin of Adam's race upon the Sin Bearer, the idea is obviously contained in such expressions as "caused the iniquity of us all to fall on Him," "He Himself bore our sins," and "made Him who knew no sin to be sin" (Isa. 53:5–6; 1 Pet. 2:24; 2 Cor. 5:21).

Of the Righteousness of God to the Believer. The great theme of the book of Romans has to do with the doctrinal expression of imputation of the righteousness of God to the believer as it pertains to his salvation. It is quite obvious, therefore, that this truth is of great consequence to the Christian's salvation. The Pauline epistles in general clearly show that this phase of imputation is the groundwork of the Christian's acceptance and standing before an infinitely holy God. Only this righteousness can find acceptance for salvation, and through it alone one may enter heaven. The pregnant phrase "the righteousness of God" (Rom. 1:17; 3:22; 10:3) signifies not merely that God Himself is righteous but that there is a righteousness that proceeds from God. Since no human being in God's eyes is righteous (3:10), it is clear that an imputed righteousness, the righteousness of God Himself, is sinful man's only hope of acceptance with the Holy One. Possessing this righteousness is the only thing that fits one for the presence of God (Phil. 3:9; Col. 1:12). When this righteousness is imputed by God to the believer, it becomes his forever by a judicial act, since it was not antecedently the believer's. It is thus patent that this demands a righteousness that is made over to the believer, just as Christ was made to be sin for all men (2 Cor. 5:21). By the believer's baptism by the Spirit "into Christ" this righteousness is made a legal endowment by virtue of the death of Christ. Indeed, imputed righteousness becomes a reality on the basis of the fact that the believer is "in Christ." As hitherto one was "in Adam" (Rom. 5:12–21), so by the Spirit's baptism (6:3–4) he is now placed in the resurrected Christ and is a recipient of all that Christ is, even of the "righteousness of God" that Christ is. It is a transcendent truth that Christ is made to the believer the righteousness "from God" (1 Cor. 1:30), and, being "in Christ," the believer "might become the righteousness of God in Him" (2 Cor. 5:21). The glory of this "in Christ" position is beyond description or human comprehension, "for by one offering He has perfected for all time those who are sanctified" (Heb. 10:14). The "fulness" of Christ (John 1:16; Col. 1:19; 2:9–10) becomes the believer's portion in Christ, "for in Him all the fulness of Deity dwells in bodily form, and in Him you have been made complete." The basis of the legality of such imputation, resulting in such a position for the believer, resides in the fact that Christ offered Himself "without blemish" to God (Heb. 9:14). This means that Christ not only was made a sin offering, but His death (by which remission of sin is made legally possible on the basis that He substituted for those who believe and presented Himself as an offering well-pleasing to God) also made possible a release of all that He is in infinite merit, bestowing this merit on the meritless. When others did not possess and could not gain a standing and merit before God, He released His own self in infinite perfection for them (see 2 Cor. 8:9). As the cross furnishes the legal basis for the remission of sin, so it furnishes likewise the legal basis for the imputation of righteousness. Both aspects of a sweet savor and a non-sweet savor in the estimation of the Father are typically expounded in the five offerings of Lev. 1–5. There was that in the death of Christ that was a non-sweet savor to God manifested in the terrible words "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" (Ps. 22:1; Matt. 27:46). The character of the perfect, sinless Lamb of God (Heb. 9:14) suggests the sweet savor aspect. Thus the sweet savor aspect of Christ's offering, and its accomplishment in the believer by his union with Christ through the work of the Holy Spirit, is the legal ground for the imputation of God's righteousness to the believer. Foundational to essential Christian teaching and the essence of the gospel are these three imputations. They are typical in the Mosaic system; antitypical in the Christian era. M.F.U.

IM'RAH (im'ra; "he, i.e., God, resists"). One of the sons of Zophah, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:36). See Hotham.

IM'RI (im'ri).

1. The son of Bani and father of Omri of Judah (1 Chron. 9:4), before 536 B.C.

2. The father of Zaccur, which latter repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:2), before 445 B.C.

INABILITY. Scripture represents fallen man as utterly lost and unable to please God or to save himself. The divine revelation is that God has "already charged that both Jews and Greeks are all under sin" (Rom. 3:9). God's final verdict is that the whole world is guilty before Him (vv. 10–20). Justification by faith in Christ crucified is the one and only remedy for sinners (3:21–5:11). God enables men to believe; and when they believe they receive a new life and a new nature, in addition to the indwelling Spirit, who imparts the dynamic for holy living and service that is pleasing to God. INCANTATION. See Magic.

INCARNATION (Lat. in and caro, "flesh"). The act of assuming flesh; in theology, the gracious voluntary act of the Son of God in assuming a human body and human nature.

The Christian Doctrine. The doctrine of the incarnation, briefly stated, is that the Lord Jesus Christ is one person with two natures indissolubly united, the one nature being that of the eternal Son of God, the other that of man, in all respects human, "yet without sin." It includes the miraculous conception and birth of Christ. The incarnation is absolutely without parallel in history. The fabled incarnations of pagan religions are at most only indications of the vague longing of humanity for union with the divine and are thus in some sense imaginative anticipations of the Christian reality. The incarnation is also to be distinguished from theophanies, or those appearances of a divine person in human form (often bearing the title "the angel of the Lord," "angel of God"), of which the OT gives instances (see Gen. 16:7; 21:17; Ex. 3:2; 14:19; Judg. 6:11–22; etc.). These are to be regarded as preintimations or occasional prophetic manifestations of that which was to be permanently realized in Christ.

Scripture Teachings. In addition to the gospel record of the miraculous conception and birth of Christ (see Luke 1:26–35; 2:1–14, cf. with Matt. 2:1–15), the Scriptures disclose this doctrine in several ways:

1. In the OT prophecies, which represent Christ as a person both human and divine, He is set forth in "the seed" of the woman, a descendant of Abraham, of Judah, and of David, "a man of sorrows." But He is also called "the Mighty God," "the Eternal Father," "the Son of God," "the Lord [Jehovah] our righteousness." Although these familiar Scriptures do not formally state the doctrine of the incarnation, they logically suggest or lead up to it.

2. Also in the NT there are many passages that present the elements of this doctrine separately—Christ is represented as a man with a human body and a rational human soul; physically and mentally He is truly human. The designation "the Son of man" occurs more than eighty times in the gospels. But elsewhere this same person claims for Himself, and has ascribed to Him, the attribute of deity.

3. There are numerous instances in which these two elements of Christ's personality are combined in the statement, or in which they are brought without hesitation or reserve close together (e.g., Matt. 16:27; 22:42–45; 25:31–46; Mark 14:60–62; Luke 9:43–44; John 3:31; Rom. 5:15, 21; 1 Cor. 15:47).

4. Although the doctrine does not rest for its authority upon isolated proof texts, but rather upon the Scripture revelation as a whole, still there are certain utterances of great weight in which the truth is distinctly, and we may say even formally, stated (see John 1:1–14, cf. 1 John 1:1–3; 4:2–3; Rom. 1:2–5; Phil. 2:6–11; 1 Tim. 3:16; Heb. 2:14). The only way in which the force of these teachings can be set aside or lessened is by proving lack of authority on the part of the Scriptures. It should be added that the only way in which the Scriptures can be understood or intelligently interpreted is in the light of the essential facts of the incarnation.

Theological Development of the Doctrine. The early centuries of the history of the church were marked in an unusual degree by speculations concerning the Person of Christ. The representation of Scripture raised many questions among thinkers and led to numerous attempts to give scientific form and elaborateness to the doctrine of the incarnation. These speculations were affected in some instances by Jewish opinions and prejudices held by members of the Christian community but more frequently by one form or another of pagan philosophy. It is not surprising, therefore, that various styles of error, heresies that became historic, appeared, and were overthrown, during those centuries. Among the prominent heresies were the following, namely:

1. Ebionism, or the doctrine of the Ebionites, a Jewish sect that existed even in the time of the apostles. This error arose from mistaken Jewish preconceptions concerning the Messiah and consisted in the denial of the divine nature of Christ.

2. Gnosticism, a name indicating the assumption of superior capacity for knowledge (Gk. gnōsis, “knowledge”). Gnosticism in its diverse forms received its impulse, and in the main its guidance, from pagan philosophy. In different ways it denied the humanity of Christ, even to the extent of denying the reality of His human body.

3. Sabellianism, which at bottom was a denial of the tri-personality of God, denied, accordingly, the existence of the Son of God as a distinct person before the incarnation. The union between the divine and human natures in Christ was held to be but temporary.

4. Arianism denied that the Son was of the same essence with the Father but held that the essence in both was similar, hence reaching the conclusion that Christ was created, though the greatest of all creatures. In connection with this heresy was the fierce contention over homoousios, “same substance,” and homoiousios, “similar substance,” a discussion to which uninformed persons, who do not realize the importance of the issue involved, sometimes sneeringly refer.

5. Apollinarianism, resting upon the platonic distinction between body, soul, and spirit as three distinct elements in man, viewed Christ as having a human body and soul, or animal life, but not a human spirit having rationality and intelligence, in place of which was the divine nature of Christ. Thus Christ was not completely human.

The study of the heresies of early church history is especially valuable because the errors of modern times, such as Socinianism, Unitarianism, and Rationalism, are simply these ancient and oft-refuted heresies revived. It would be a mistake to suppose that during those centuries the faith of the Christian church was reduced to confusion. As has been said with much force, “the faith of the common people is determined by the word of God, by the worship of the sanctuary, and by the teachings of the Spirit. They remain in a great measure ignorant of, or indifferent to, the speculations of theologians.”

The Importance of the Doctrine. Lewis Sperry Chafer (Systematic Theology [1948], 7:194) correctly places the incarnation as one of the seven greatest events that have occurred in the history of the universe: (1) the creation of the angels, (2) creation of material things, including all life on the earth, (3) the incarnation, (4) the death of the Incarnate One, (5) His resurrection, (6) His coming again, (7) His reign on the earth forever. That God in the Person of the Son should identify Himself completely with the human race, become a kinsman of the human family, and as the Kinsman-Redeemer lay down His life for their redemption from sin, as in the book of Ruth (cf. Lev. 25:49; Isa. 59:20), is in itself an event of immeasurable importance.

Present-Day Thinking. The early twentieth century saw an interest in the humanity of Jesus. Christology was severely neglected. A. Harnack in his What Is Christianity? (1904) apparently differentiated between the gospel about Jesus and that of Jesus. Numerous studies of the human aspects of the Person of our Lord were made. Albert Schweitzer in his Quest of the Historical Jesus (English translation 1910) showed the invalidity of the stress on the humanity of Jesus without the Christological element. Neo-orthodox theologians have also led a strong reaction against the mere human view of our Lord. Emil Brunner as well as Karl Barth held that the revelation of God centers not in the historical coming of Jesus but only in the Christ who is discerned by the eye of faith. Notorious, however, has been neo-orthodox Christology in neglecting the historical words of Jesus as well as His deeds (cf. W. L. Sperry, Jesus Then and Now [1949]). Emil Brunner is of the opinion that to give any adequate statement of the union of the divine and human natures of Christ in one person exceeds man's intellectual capacity.

William Temple (Christus Veritas [1924]) made an attempt to place the incarnation within the realm of the evolutionary idea of the universe. Lionel Thornton in The Incarnate Lord (1928) tried to orientate the doctrine of the incarnation in the framework of the organic philosophy of the period. In these studies, however, Christ is given the place not of a divine Savior from sin but rather the role of a cosmic principle. W. R. Matthews in his The Problem of Christ in the Twentieth Century (1950) has wrestled with the psychological aspects of Christ's Person. John Knox (On the Meaning of Christ [1947]) regards the ancient creeds as metaphysically inaccurate and believes that they are to be correctly evaluated as attempts to set forth in symbol the divine revelatory act in Christ. Both Reinhold Niebuhr and Paul Tillich question the orthodox statements of Christ's Person and His atoning work on the ground that they come close to logical nonsense. Only in symbolical terms can the presence of the Eternal from beyond the historical context be expressed historically (cf. Paul Tillich, The Interpretation of History [1936]; id., Systematic Theology 1 [1951]; Reinhold Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man [1943]). M.F.U.

INCENSE (Heb. usually qittoret, once applied to the “fat” of rams, the part always burned in sacrifice; once qittēr, Jer. 44:21, marg., both from the Hebrew, to “smoke”; sometimes bōnâ, Isa. 43:23; 66:3; Jer. 17:26; 41:5). Frankincense (Isa. 60:6; Jer. 6:20; NIV, “incense” in both passages), an aromatic compound that gives forth its perfume in burning. Its most general use in Scripture is that perfume that was burned upon the Jewish altar of incense (see Tabernacle). Among both the Hebrews and Egyptians we find no other trace of incense than in its sacerdotal use, but in Persian sculptures we see it burned before the king.

Material. The incense employed in the service of the Tabernacle was called “incense of the aromas” (Heb. q̄tôret sammûm), the ingredients of which are given in Ex. 30:34–35. These consisted of: (1) stacte (Heb. naṭāp), i.e., “not the juice squeezed from the highly fragrant myrrh tree, but probably a species of gum storax resembling myrrh”; (2) onycha (Heb. shāḥēlet, lit., a “scale”), the shell of the perfumed mollusk, blatta byzantina, found in the Mediterranean and Red seas and yielding a musky odor when burned; (3) galbanum (Heb. ḥelbānâ, lit., “fat”), a gum that is obtained by making incisions in the bark of a shrub growing in Syria, Arabia, and Abyssinia; and (4) pure frankincense (Heb. lābōnâ, lit., “white”), a pale yellow, semitransparent, pungent resin, which, when burned, is fragrant; it is grown in Arabia and Judea.

Preparation. The KJV says “of each there shall be a like weight,” i.e., equal parts of the various ingredients, but Abarbanel, Ibn Ezra, and others think that the meaning is that each ingredient was, in the first place, to be pounded by itself, and then mixed with the rest, for it is possible that the ingredients were not all pounded to the same extent. Besides, it was to be salted (KJV, “tempered”), was to be “pure, and holy,” i.e., unadulterated with any foreign substance, and was to be reserved exclusively for sacred use, any other application of it being forbidden on pain of being “cut off from [one’s] people.”

Sacred Use. The person selected to burn incense upon the altar of incense was Aaron, but in the daily service of the second Temple the office devolved upon the inferior priests, from among whom one was chosen by lot (Luke 1:9). King Uzziah was punished for presuming to infringe upon this prerogative of the priests (2 Chron. 26:16, 21). The times of offering incense were in the morning, at the time of trimming the lamps, and in the evening, when the lamps were lighted (Ex. 30:7–8). On the Day of Atonement (see Festivals) the high priest offered the incense.

Figurative. Incense in Scripture is the symbol of prayer; “May my prayer be counted as incense before Thee” (Ps. 141:2; see Isa. 60:6). In Rev. 5:8; 8:3–4 we meet with the same idea. But “it is not prayer alone that is expressed by incense.... A good or evil savor was to Israel the symbol of a good or godless life; and when, therefore, the sanctuary of God was kept continually filled with fragrance, they beheld in this the sweet savor, not of prayer alone, but of that life to which, as a priestly nation, they were called” (W. Milligan, Bib. Ed., 3:226). See Tabernacle; Temple.

INCEST. The crime of cohabitation with a person within the degrees forbidden by the Levitical law (Lev. 18:1–18). The prohibition of incest and similar sensual abominations is introduced with a general warning as to the licentious customs of the Egyptians and Canaanites and an exhortation to walk in the judgments and ordinances of Jehovah. Intercourse is forbidden (1) with a mother; (2) with a stepmother; (3) with a sister or half-sister; (4) with a granddaughter, the daughter of either son or daughter; (5) with the daughter of a stepmother; (6) with an aunt, sister of either father or mother; (7) with the wife of an uncle on the father’s side; (8) with a daughter-in-law; (9) with a sister-in-law, or brother’s wife; (10) with a woman and her daughter, or a woman and her granddaughter; (11) with the sister of a living wife. No special reference is made to sexual intercourse with a daughter, being a crime regarded as not likely to occur; with a full sister, i.e., the daughter of one's father and mother, being included in number 3; or with a mother-in-law, included in number 10. Those mentioned in nos. 1, 2, 3, 8, and 10 were to be followed by the death of the criminals (20:11–12, 14, 17), on account of their being accused crimes (Deut. 23:1; 27:20, 22–23); whereas the punishment of those guilty of nos. 6, 7, and 9 was to bear their iniquity and die childless (Lev. 20:19–21). See Marriage.

INCONTINENCY (Gk. akrasia, “want of self-control”). A KJV term referring to an inability to restrain sexual indulgence. The NASB and NIV render “lack of self-control” (1 Cor. 7:5; cf. 2 Tim. 3:3).

INCORRUPTIBLE. This word appears in both the KJV and the NASB but in different places.

In the NASB the term is the translation of Gk. aphthartos in Rom. 1:23 (NIV, “immortal”) and of Gk. aphtharsia in the benediction to the Ephesians (6:24): “Grace be with all those who love our Lord Jesus Christ with a love incorruptible.” The NIV here has “undying.”

In the KJV the term appears in 1 Cor. 9:25; 15:52; 1 Pet. 1:4, 23 as the rendering of Gk. aphthartos; it is replaced in the NASB by imperishable (which see).

INCORRUPTION. See Imperishable.

INDEPENDENCE OF GOD. God is absolute and not dependent upon any thing or person outside of Himself for His existence. “His being and perfections are underived, and not communicated to him, as all finite perfections are by him to the creature.” He is independent (1) as to His knowledge (Isa. 40:13–14); (2) in power (Job 36:23); (3) as to His holiness, His bounty, and His goodness (Rom. 9:18).

INDIA (Heb. hōdû). The limit of the territories of Ahasuerus in the East (Esther 1:1; 8:9). The country so designated is not the peninsula of Hindustan, but the region through which the Indus River flowed—the Punjab.

INFANT BAPTISM. See Baptism.

INFANT SALVATION. See Salvation.

INFINITY. Unlimited extent of space or duration or quantity. As designating an essential attribute of God the term refers to His unlimited existence, capacity, energy, and perfections.

The word infinity does not occur in the Scriptures, and yet, properly understood, it is an appropriate term and necessary to express certain revelations of Scripture concerning God. God is not subject to the limitations of time or space. Thus infinity expresses both His eternity and His immensity. His power and knowledge and other perfections also exist in unlimited fullness.

This idea of God, necessary to our conception of Him, can be held by us only in a negative form, this being due to the finite nature of our understanding. It is nevertheless a positive idea and represents the actual fact that God in His being and attributes transcends not only our comprehension, but also all limits that must everywhere else be recognized. God is the only infinite existence.

Care must, however, be exercised not to conceive of the infinity of God in a material manner. God is the infinite Spirit. His presence pervades and fills all space, but not necessarily to the exclusion of other and finite existences. The mistake of Spinoza, and Pantheists generally, has been that of applying to God the material conception of infinity. And upon the principle of the impenetrability of matter, or that two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time, the conclusion has been reached that the being of God includes all things, or that all things are parts or manifestations of God. The idea of infinity brought forward by Mansel in The Limits of Religious Thought is also essentially of the same character, although he avoids the Pantheistic conclusion by appealing from philosophy to faith for the right conception of God. It must be borne in mind that the infinity of God is that of spirit, and to spirit the ideas of extension and impenetrability do not apply, as they do to matter. And further, the infinite Spirit is necessarily one capable of creating finite existences. And withal there must ever be the proper acknowledgment of the incapacity of the human mind to argue adequately upon this and certain other subjects. E.MCC.

INFIRMITY (Gk. astheneia), NASB, KJV, NIV; Gk. astheneia, nosos; Heb. maḥāleh and others, KJV). This word is used once in the NASB and NIV in a passage referring to Jesus: “In order that what was spoken through Isaiah the prophet might be fulfilled, saying ‘He Himself took our infirmities, and carried away our diseases’” (Matt. 8:17; cf. Isa. 53:4). The term (Heb. makōb) encompasses not only disease but also suffering and sorrow.

The expression is much more common in the KJV and is used there to denote a disability of one kind or another. It is most often replaced in the NASB and NIV by the term weakness, but other terms (diseases, sickness, menstruation, and grief) appear also. The Gk. nosos is rendered “sickness, disease” (Luke 7:21; etc.). Romans 15:1 states that those “who are strong ought to bear the weaknesses of those without strength.” The KJV often renders this word “infirmity.”

INHERITANCE. The following laws prevailed among several nations:

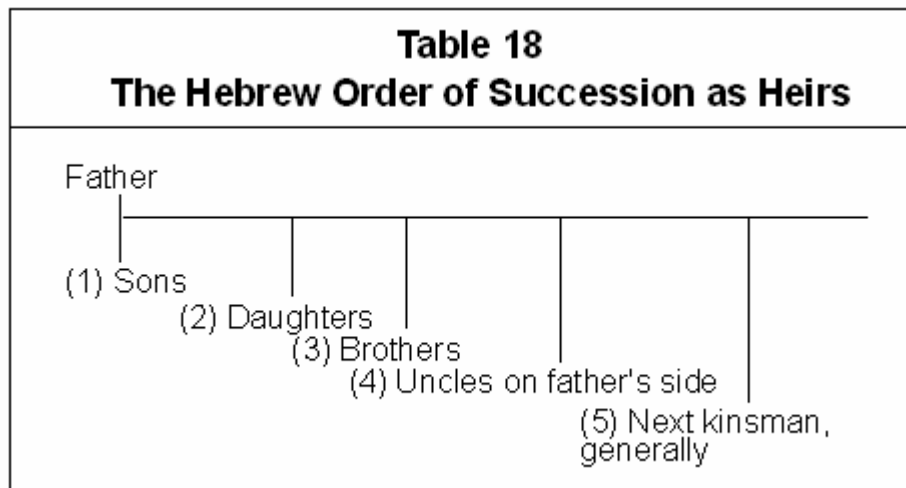

Greek. If a person died without a will, leaving sons, all of equal birthright and none of them disinherited, the sons inherited the property in equal parts, the eldest probably receiving the same as the rest. Daughters were provided with dowries, which went back to the remaining heirs in case the daughter was divorced or left childless after marriage. If a man had no son, he usually adopted one to continue the family and its religious worship; and if he had daughters he would marry one of them to the adopted son, in which case the chief share of the inheritance fell to his daughter and her husband, the rest receiving dowries. If only daughters survived, the succession passed to them, and the next of kin had a legal right to one of the heiresses and could claim to marry her, even though she had married another before receiving the inheritance. A man marrying an heiress was bound by custom and tradition, if he had sons, to name one as heir to the property coming with his wife and thus restore the house of his son’s maternal grandfather. Children born out of wedlock were illegitimate and had no claim to the estate of the father. If a man died without a will, leaving no biological or adopted heirs, his nearest relatives in the male line inherited and, in default of these, those in the female line as far as children of first cousins.

Roman. If a man died without a will, leaving a wife and biological or adopted children, they were his heirs. This did not apply, however, to daughters who had passed into the hands of their husbands, or of children who had been freed by emancipation from the power (potestas) of their father. If a man left no wife or children, the agnati, or relatives of the male line, inherited, according to the degree of their kinship. If there were no agnati, and the man was a patrician, the property went to his gens. The relatives in the female line (cognati) were generally not entitled to inherit by the civil law.

Hebrew. The Hebrew institutions relative to inheritance were of a simple character. Under the patriarchal system the property was divided among the sons of the legitimate wives (Gen. 24:36; 25:5), a larger portion being assigned to one, generally the eldest, on whom devolved the duty of maintaining the females of the family. The sons of concubines were portioned off with presents (25:6). At a later period the exclusion of the sons of unlawful wives was rigidly enforced (Judg. 11:1–2).

The possession of land, which Israel received by lot from God, was to remain the inalienable property of the several families. According to an old-standing custom, the father's property went to his sons, the firstborn receiving a double portion, the other sons single and equal portions—i.e., of five sons the firstborn got two-sixths, and each of the others one-sixth of the father's entire property. In consideration of this division, the firstborn, as head of the family, had to provide food, clothing, and other necessities in his house, not only for his mother but also for his sisters until they married. This custom was more precisely defined by Moses: the father could not deprive his firstborn of his birthright by mere whim (Deut. 21:15–17), but it might be taken away because of a trespass against the father, as in the case of Reuben (Gen. 49:4; 1 Chron. 5:1). See Firstborn.

If there were no sons, the property went to the daughters (Num. 27:8) on the condition that they did not marry out of their own tribe (Num. 36:6–9; Tobit 6:12; 7:13), otherwise the patrimony was forfeited. If there were no daughters, it went to the brother of the deceased; if no brother, to the paternal uncle; and, failing these, to the next of kin (Num. 27:9–11). In the case of a widow's being left without children, the nearest of kin on her husband's side had the right of marrying her, and in the event of his refusal, the next of kin (Ruth 3:12–13); with him rested the obligation of redeeming the property of the widow (4:1–10) if it had been either sold or mortgaged. If none stepped forward to marry the widow, the inheritance remained with her until her death and then reverted to the next of kin. The land being thus so strictly tied up, the notion of heirship, as we understand it, was hardly known to the Jews. See Table 18, "The Hebrew Order of Succession as Heirs."

If the deceased possessed what we call personal property—i.e., flocks and herds, garments, precious metals, or jewels, which last, in oriental countries, is still the favorite mode of investment—the portions of the younger children, as well as gifts or dowers for the daughters, were usually provided from this source. The strict law of entail with regard to land did not at all restrain the deceased in the disposition of his personal property. It was to this latter that the request of the younger son in Jesus' parable referred. He asked that the third part of the movable property, which would naturally come to him at his father's death, should be granted him now (Luke 15:12).

INHERITANCE, SPIRITUAL. “The metaphor of the spiritual ‘inheritance’ is peculiarly, though not exclusively, Pauline. St. Peter employs it twice (1 Pet. 1:4; 3:9), St. James once (2:5, KJV; NASB, “heirs”), but St. Paul in a multitude of instances. It is closely interwoven with the substance of the longest and most intricate arguments in his epistles; it appears in the reports of his sermons in the Acts; he alone of all the sacred writers employs it in what may be described as the most daring of all theological conceptions—that which is embodied in the celebrated definition of believers as ‘heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ.’ To our minds heirship involves no more than the idea of the acquisition of property by succession, and the idea of succession is manifestly inapplicable with reference to the eternal God. That the heirship to which St. Paul alludes is Roman and not Hebrew is evident not only from the accompanying reference to adoption, but also from the fact that it is a joint and equal heirship.”

Sir Henry Maine writes (Ancient Law): “The notion (among the Romans) was that though the physical person of the deceased had perished, his legal personality had survived and descended unimpaired to his heirs or co-heirs, in whom his identity (so far as the law was concerned) was continued” (p. 181). “The testator lived on in his heir or in the group of his co-heirs. He was in law the same person with them” (ibid., p. 188). “In pure Roman jurisprudence the principle that a man lives on in his heir—the elimination, so to speak, of the fact of death—is too obvious for one to mistake the center round which the whole law of testamentary and intestate succession is circling” (ibid., p. 190). Contrary to the well-known maxim of English law, Nemo est heres viventis (“No one is heir of the living”), according to Roman law, the moment a child was born he was his father's heir. Paul the Jurist (third century A.D.) observes that there is a species of copartnership between a father and his children; “when, therefore, the father dies, it is not so correct to say that they succeed to his property, as that they acquire the free control of their own.”

“In the light of the theories of Roman jurisprudence incongruity disappears from the great Pauline metaphor, and we discern in it a new sublimity. Instead of the death of the ancestor being essentially connected with the idea of inheritance, we find this circumstance ‘eliminated.’ The heir has not to wait for the moment of his father's decease. In and through his father he is already a participator in the family possessions. The father does not die, but lives on forever in his family. Physically absent, he is spiritually present, not with so much as in his children. In this phrase, ‘the heirs of God,’ there is presented a most vivid view of the intimate and eternal union between the believer and God, and of the faithful soul's possession in present reality, and not merely in anticipation of the kingdom of God on earth and in heaven” (W. E. Ball, Mag. of Christ. Lit., p. 344).

INIQUITY. The translation of several Gk. and Heb. terms.

1. Heb. awôn, perversity, depravity, sin (Gen. 4:13, “punishment,” etc.); guilt contracted by sinning (Ex. 20:5; etc.); anything unjustly acquired (Hos. 12:8); penalty of sin (Isa. 5:18); calamity, misery (Ps. 31:10).

2. Heb. awel (Job 34:10, “commit iniquity,” KJV; “do wrong,” NASB and NIV) and Heb. awlâ (2 Chron. 19:7, “iniquity,” KJV; “unrighteousness,” NASB; “injustice,” NIV) means perverseness.

3. In the NT the Gk. words are very expressive. Thus adikia, rendered “unrighteous,” “unrighteousness,” “iniquity,” “iniquities,” “wickedness” (and other similar terms) in the NASB means that which is not just (Acts 8:23; Heb. 8:12); anomia (Matt. 23:28, “iniquity,” KJV; “lawlessness,” NASB; “wickedness,” NIV; see also 2 Thess. 2:7) and paranomia (2 Pet. 2:16, “iniquity,” KJV; “transgression,” NASB; “wrongdoing,” NIV) mean “without law” and “transgression of the law”; whereas ponēria (Matt. 22:18; Luke 11:39; Rom. 1:29; 1 Cor. 5:8; etc.) signifies depravity, wickedness, malice.

In ordinary usage the term iniquity means absence of equity, wickedness, sin. See Lawlessness; Transgression.

INJURIES. See Law; Offenses.

INK (Heb. dfyô, Jer. 36:18; Gk. melan, “black,” 2 Cor. 3:3; 2 John 12; 3 John 13). The ink of the ancients was composed of powdered charcoal, lampblack, or soot mixed with gum and water. It was intensely black and would retain its color for a long time but was easily erased from the parchments with sponge and water (see Num. 5:23). When needed for use, some of the dry preparation was mixed with water until about the consistency of modern printer’s ink. Both the Egyptians and the Hebrews made use of different colors for writing, some of the books of the latter having been written, according to Josephus, in red, blue, purple, gold, and silver tints.

INKHORN (Heb. qeset, a round “vessel”). This consists of a long tube for holding pens, sometimes made of hard wood but generally of metal—brass, copper, or silver. It is about nine or ten inches long, one and a half or two inches wide, and half an inch deep. To the upper end of this case the inkstand is attached. This is square or cylindrical, with a lid moving on hinges and fastening with a clasp. The inkhorn was carried in the girdle.

INN (Heb. mālôn, Gen. 42:27; 43:21; Ex. 4:24, NASB and NIV, a “lodging place”; the Gk. kataluma is used for an “inn,” Luke 2:7; or “guest room” as in Mark 14:14; Luke 22:11). In the East hospitality was religiously observed, and therefore, in our sense of the term, inns were not known. Khans, or caravansaries, are the representatives of European inns and were only gradually established. It is doubtful whether there is any allusion to them in the OT, the meaning of “lodging place” in Gen. 42:27, Ex. 4:24, and Jer. 9:2 being only the station, the place of rest for the night, either under a tent or in a cave. The first place of an inn may be found in Jer. 41:17, KJV, “the habitation of Chimham” (Heb. gērût; NASB, marg., “the lodging place of Chimham”). The NIV describes the place itself as Geruth Kimham. The pandocheion (Luke 10:34) probably differed from the kataluma (2:7) in having a “host” or “innkeeper” (10:35), who supplied a few of the necessary provisions and attended to the needs of travelers left to his charge. In these inns, bazaars and markets were held, animals killed and meat sold, along with wine and cider; so that they were much more public places than might at first be imagined.

The origin of inns is unknown. Perhaps they were established at first by traders who regularly passed the same road. Now they are spread over the whole of the East, being found in cities, villages, and even the open highway. They consist of large buildings of stone arranged in a square, which enclose a spacious court. They are frequently of two stories, the lower containing stores and vaults for goods and stalls for cattle, the upper being used for travelers. They also contain a well or a large reservoir.

It appears that houses of entertainment were sometimes, as in Egypt (Herodotus History 2:35), kept by prostitutes. But the inference that the women mentioned in Josh. 2:1; Judg. 16:1; 1 Kings 3:16 were innkeepers seems rather forced.

INNOCENCE (Heb. niqqāyôn, lit., “clearness,” Gen. 20:5; Pss. 26:6; 73:13; Hos. 8:5; zākû, “purity,” Dan. 6:22). The Hebrews considered innocence as consisting chiefly in an exemption from external faults, but this is a different standard of morality from that of the gospel (see Matt. 5:28; John 3:25) or even of the OT (Ps. 51:7). Innocence is sometimes used as an exemption from punishment, as in Jer. 46:28, where the expression “I shall ... by no means leave you unpunished” is more literally rendered “I will not treat you as one innocent” (from Heb. nāqî, “blameless,” “innocent”; cf. Nah. 1:3; Ps. 18:26).

INNOCENTS, SLAUGHTER OF (see Matt. 2:16). The slaying of the young children of Bethlehem, by order of Herod, in the hope of killing Jesus. See Herod I.

“INQUIRE OF THE LORD” A phrase often found in early Scripture history. Rebekah is represented as going “to inquire of the Lord” (Gen. 25:22). During Jethro’s visit to Moses we find the lawgiver vindicating his judicial office in these words: “Because the people come to me to inquire of God,” etc. (Ex. 18:15–16). In the tribal war against the Benjamites “the sons of Israel inquired of the Lord” (Judg. 20:27). We read also of this being done in the times of Saul, David, and Samuel (1 Sam. 9:9; 10:22; 2 Sam. 2:1; 5:19, 23; 1 Chron. 14:10, 14). This longing of humanity for some material representation of divine direction and decision was responded to by Jehovah, who in different ways made known His counsel and guidance to those who “inquired” of Him. This was done through the pillar of cloud, the Shekinah, the Urim and the Thummim, and prophecy.

INSCRIPTION (Gk. epigraphē, “written upon”). A superscription, title, in the NT referring to writing in black letters upon a lighter tablet, perhaps surfaced with wax. Pilate wrote a trilingual inscription and had it placed on the cross (Luke 23:38; John 19:19). Inscriptions also appeared on coins (Matt. 22:20; Mark 12:16; Luke 20:24). See also Writing.

INSPECTION GATE (Heb. mipqād; “appointment, census”). The name of a gate of Jerusalem, opposite the house of the Temple servants and the merchants, between the Horse Gate and the angle of the old wall near the Sheep Gate (Neh. 3:31 “the gate Miphkad,” KJV); probably identical with the Gate of the Guard (12:39 “the prison gate,” KJV). Some identify it with the upper Benjamin Gate (Jer. 20:2) and locate it at the W end of the bridge; but that gate was probably situated elsewhere. In Ezek. 43:21 mipqād is rendered “the appointed place” of the house, referring to the place set apart for burning the sin offering.

INSPIRATION. The doctrine of the inspiration of Scripture is of immense importance. This is at once apparent when one considers that all evangelical Christian doctrines are developed from the Bible and rest upon it for authority. L. Boettner is correct when he calls the biblical teaching of inspiration “the mother and guardian of all the others” (Studies in Theology [1947], p. 48). An unsound view of inspiration of Scripture is bound to countenance unsound views, produce distorted teachings or serious gaps in essential doctrinal systematization, or offer a temptation to too easy subscription to plausible but unsound scientific or philosophic theorizings.

The Scriptural Definition of Inspiration. In defining divine inspiration in the distinctive sense in which it is employed in the Holy Scriptures, the difference in meaning of this expression from revelation and illumination must be carefully comprehended.

Revelation. Revelation, which may be oral or written, may be defined as an operation of God communicating to man truth that otherwise man could not know. Since man was created in God’s image and endowed with capacity to know God, it is rational to expect that God would communicate Himself and His mind to man. If unfallen man, being a finite creature, needed divine revelation and instruction (Gen. 2:16–17; 3:8), how much more is fallen man completely incapacitated by sin.

Inspiration. “A supernatural influence exerted on the sacred writers by the Spirit of God, by virtue of which their writings are given Divine trustworthiness” (B. B. Warfield, “Inspiration,” Int. Stand. Bible Ency., p. 1473). In defining scriptural inspiration three factors must be kept in mind: first, the primary efficient Cause, the Holy Spirit, who acts upon man; second, the subject of inspiration, man, the agent upon whom the Holy Spirit acts directly; third, the result of inspiration, a written revelation, given once for all, thoroughly accredited and tested by miracle and fulfilled prophecy (cf. J. E. Steinmueller, Companion to Scripture Studies [1941], 1:5, 14).

Illumination. Illumination is a ministry of the Holy Spirit that enables all who are in right relation with God to understand the objective written revelation. Thus, revelation involves origin, inspiration, reception and recording, and illumination, understanding or comprehending the written objective revelation. In other words, revelation comprehends God’s giving truth. Inspiration embraces man under divine control accurately receiving the truth thus given. Illumination deals with man’s understanding the God-given, inspired revelation (1 Cor. 2:14). Revelation as it concerns Holy Scripture had a specific time period involving the inspiration of certain sovereignly chosen individuals as the recipients of the revelation. It is plain that both of these divine operations have ceased. In contrast, illumination is continuously operative in all those who qualify for this ministry of the Holy Spirit.

The Scriptural Doctrine of Inspiration.

The Fact of Inspiration Stated. Second Tim. 3:16–17 says, “All Scripture is inspired by God and profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for training in righteousness; that the man of God may be adequate, equipped for every good work.” Five great truths of inspiration are herein taught: first, the plenary inspiration of the Bible, “all”; second, the plenary inspiration specifically of the OT, plainly implying the entire NT as well, that is, “all Scripture”; third, the divine authorship of Scripture—“inspired by God” (“God-breathed”); fourth, the supreme value of all Scripture to the spiritual life, “profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for training in righteousness”; fifth, the holy purpose of Scripture, “that the man of God may be adequate, equipped for every good work.”

The Fact of Inspiration Implied. The sacred authors were prophets and apostles of God’s Word in the highest sense of the term. Scripture is filled with such expressions as “Now the Word of the Lord came ... saying” (1 Kings 16:1); “Thus the Lord said to me ...” (Jer. 13:1); “The word of the Lord came expressly to Ezekiel” (Ezek. 1:3). The apostle Paul and others claimed to speak by direct revelation (Eph. 3:1–10; etc.). Prophets spoke of future events (such as Moses’ foretelling the coming of the great Prophet, Christ) and have had their predictions verified during succeeding centuries. David (Ps. 22) and Isaiah (Isa. 53) minutely prophesied the sufferings, death, and resurrection of Christ. Daniel previewed the rise of Persia, Greece, and Rome (Dan. 2:37–40; 7:4–7). Some prophets, such as Moses, Elijah, and Elisha, had their messages authenticated by miracle. Others had an irresistible compulsion to speak, such as Jeremiah (20:9). They were often commanded to write their utterances or wrote under divine leading (Ex. 24:4; Deut. 27:8; Isa. 30:8; Jer. 30:2; Luke 1:1–3; etc.).

Nature of Inspiration. “But know this first of all, that no prophecy of Scripture is a matter of one’s own interpretation, for no prophecy was ever made by an act of human will, but men moved by the Holy Spirit spoke from God” (2 Pet. 1:20–21). This pivotal passage deals with the question of how Scripture was inspired. First, it declares how it did not originate—it is not “a matter of one’s own interpretation,” that is, it is not the result of human research nor the product of the writer’s own thought. It did not come into being by the will of man. Man did not propose to write it, decide its subject matter, or outline its arrangement. Second, this passage tells how the Scriptures did originate. “Men,” that is, certain divinely selected men, “spoke from God,” the source. These inspired men were borne, or carried along, by the Holy Spirit, the message being His, not theirs. Accordingly, if it can be demonstrated that we have the words they spoke and wrote transmitted substantially in identical form with the original documents, and the science of textual criticism enables this to be done, then a charge of error is a charge against God, not against men except, of course, where the supposed “error” may be due to textual corruption in the long course of transmission. Where the text has unquestionably suffered in transmission, the labors of devoted scholars are directed to its restoration. This is done through ancient versions, textual variants, and other linguistic and historical evidence continuously being made available by archaeology and various other phases of sound biblical research.

Other Scriptural Proofs of the Inspiration of the Scriptures. God spoke through OT prophets (Heb. 1:1–2). The OT Scriptures are inviolable (John 10:34–36). The indefectibility and certainty of promise and prophecy are clearly seen in the oft-recurring expression “that what was spoken . . . might be fulfilled” (Matt. 1:22; 2:15, 23; 8:17; 12:17; etc.) and in such Scriptures as 24:35, “Heaven and earth will pass away, but My words shall not pass away.” Jesus quoted the OT as authoritative (4:4, 7, 10). The Holy Spirit in the prophets equipped them for their ministry (1 Pet. 1:10–11), and the Spirit of God spoke through David (2 Sam. 23:1–2) and other prophets. Besides the scriptural proofs, unbroken Jewish and Christian tradition attest the inspiration of Scripture.

The True Biblical Doctrine of Inspiration. Scripture nowhere fully explains the precise modus operandi of inspiration, yet it is possible to formulate a doctrine that is in agreement with all the plain and sufficient scriptural revelation vouchsafed to us. This doctrine, almost universally rejected today on the basis of alleged philosophic, scientific, historical, archaeological, and linguistic difficulties involved, is called verbal, plenary inspiration. It is sometimes called the dynamic view. This view holds that the superintendency of the Holy Spirit rendered the writers of Scripture infallible in their communications of truth and inerrant in their literary productions. Yet it leaves room for the fullest play of the personality, style, and background of the individual authors. By verbal inspiration is signified that in the original writings the Holy Spirit led in the choice of each word used (cf. 1 Cor. 2:13; John 10:34–36). Compare Gal. 3:16, where the problem turns upon the singular or plural of a word. By plenary inspiration is meant that the accuracy that verbal inspiration insures is extended to every portion of the sacred revelation, so that it is as a whole and in all its constituent parts infallible as to truth and final as to divine authority. This is the traditional teaching of the church and is that doctrine set forth by Christ and the apostles. This teaching preserves the dual authorship of Scripture (the divine and the human) in perfect balance, ascribing to each the consideration that is accorded in the Bible.

Results of Inspiration. The Bible having been brought into existence by the supernatural action of the Holy Spirit upon the sacred writers, the question is, What is the result of this divine process in the product itself?

The Absolute Inerrancy of the Autographa. Absolute freedom from error must be attributed to the original copies of the inspired writings. It is unthinkable that inaccuracy and mistake can coexist with inspiration. Can God who is Supreme Truth speak that which is untrue? The claim of verbal, plenary inspiration for the original writings, however, does not extend to the multitudinous transcriptions and various translations, both ancient and modern. Inerrancy applies to transcriptions such as the Masoretic-Hebrew text, the Greek NT text, and the translations such as the Septuagint, Vulgate, Syriac, Luther's Bible, and various English versions only insofar as they reproduce exactly the original autographic manuscripts. Since none of the original manuscripts are in existence, critics commonly reject the inerrancy of the autographa as "an assumption for which there is no warrant in sound reason" (G. Maines, Divine Inspiration, p. 109). But the fact and the truth rest not upon "reason" but upon the clear revelation of the Scriptures themselves (2 Tim. 3:16; 2 Pet. 1:20–21).

Providential Preservation of Scripture with Regard to Its Substance. The Holy Spirit, it is reasonable to conclude, also had a definite ministry in preserving the inspired Scriptures through millennia of transmission. Possible errors that have crept in as a result of copyists' slips, glosses, etc., are the domain of lower criticism and here the Christian scholar may find a worthy task for his labors. The high development of NT textual criticism as the result of many manuscript finds has given us the transmitted text in a high degree of purity. Lack of manuscript evidence in the OT field has seriously curtailed textual criticism and hence there are many more unresolvable textual difficulties in the OT than in the NT. Recent phenomenal manuscript finds such as the Dead Sea Scrolls (notably the Isaiah Manuscript) are tending to alleviate this condition regarding the OT text.

Scriptural Inerrancy Embraces Scientific Features. In this realm, although serious problems exist, there are no proved facts of science that necessitate abandonment of the scriptural doctrine of inspiration. Many scientific theorizings would seem to suggest this; but when the Bible is correctly placed in the prescientific era in which it had its birth, its alleged scientific inaccuracies are much less formidable than the liberal or neo-orthodox interpreter would have us believe.

Scriptural Inerrancy Embraces Historical and Literary Features. In no field has the Bible been more seriously challenged than in the historical. While it is true that many serious historical problems still remain, such as the existence of the Philistines in patriarchal times, the date of the Exodus, and the identity of Darius the Mede in the book of Daniel, archaeology has made colossal contributions toward resolving many of these problems. The existence of Sargon II, the Hittites and the Horites (the Hurrians), the religion of the Canaanites, the historicity of the patriarchs, and many other serious problems have been cleared up. Although there is almost universal rejection of a thoroughly sound teaching of biblical inspiration in our day, the conservative scholar with an abundance of this new apologetic material at his disposal may well hesitate before abandoning this solid foundation of true biblical exposition and theological systematization.

INSTANT, INSTANTLY. In addition to the usual use of the word (i.e., a particular point of time), several Gk. words are used in the NT. These words imply to be urgent, urgently, or fervently, as will be seen from the NASB and NIV of the following passages (Luke 7:4; 23:23; Acts 26:7; Rom. 12:12). In 2 Tim. 4:2 (KJV) we find “be instant in season, out of season.” The literal sense is “stand ready”—“be alert” for whatever may happen—and is translated “be ready” in the NASB. The NIV, close to the KJV, translates, “be prepared in season and out of season.”

INSTRUCTION. See Education; Children; Schools.

INSTRUMENT (Heb. klî, something “prepared”). A general term for any apparatus, such as an implement, utensil, weapon, vessel, article of furniture, etc. The expression “instruments of unrighteousness” (Rom. 6:13; Gk. hopla adikias) is a part of a figure in which sin as a ruling power would employ the members of the body as weapons against holiness.

INSULT. Such treatment of another, in word or deed, as expresses contempt. It is not definitely noticed in the Mosaic law; only the reviling of a ruler was forbidden (Ex. 22:28, “curse”) but without any special penalty attached. The severity with which disrespect toward sacred persons was regarded appears from 2 Kings 2:23–24.

INTEGRITY (Heb. tôm, “completeness”). The term has various shades of meaning: simplicity or sincerity (Gen. 20:5; Pss. 25:21; 78:72); entirety as represented by Job when under grievous trial (Job 2:3, 9; 27:5; 31:6; cf. Pss. 26:1; 41:12; etc.).

INTENTION. Purpose, design. The deliberate exercise of the will with reference to the consequences of an act attempted or performed.

It is one of the fundamental principles of ethics that the moral quality of an action is in the intention. This is a general principle, however, to be guarded by the fact that no one is at liberty to do evil that good may come.

In the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church the idea of intention plays a peculiarly important part in connection with the efficacy of the sacraments. Thus the efficacy of baptism depends upon the intention of the priest. “He must have the intention to baptize indeed, i.e., to do what the Church does, or what Christ has ordained” (Deharbe, Catechism, p. 251). Also, more generally, in the decrees of the Council of Trent (eleventh canon, sec. 7) it is stated: “If anyone shall say that in ministers, while they effect and confer the sacraments, there is not required the intention at least of doing what the Church does, let him be anathema.” In opposition to this is the 26th Article of Religion of the Church of England, which declares that the unworthiness or wickedness of ministers “hinders not the effect of the sacraments ... which be effectual because of Christ’s institution and promise, although they be ministered by evil men.” See Sacraments.

INTERCESSION (Heb. pāga, to “come upon”; Gk. entunchanō, to “meet with, to come between”).

Intercession of Christ. This belongs to the office of Christ as Priest (see Jesus Christ, Offices of) and refers generally to the aid that He extends as mediator between God and mankind (see Mediation). In a particular sense Christ is represented as drawing near to God and pleading in behalf of men (Rom. 8:27; Heb. 7:25), and thus, in harmony with the idea of intercession, He is called our Advocate (1 John 2:1). The prayers and praises of believers are acceptable to God through Christ’s intercession (see Heb. 4:14–16; 13:15; 1 Pet. 2:5; Rev. 8:3).

The objects of Christ's intercession are (1) the world, the whole of humanity, which He represents. On no other ground can we understand how a guilty race could be permitted to extend its existence upon the earth under the moral government of God. In the broadest meaning of the term Isaiah says He "interceded for the transgressors" (Isa. 53:12). (2) The great body of His people. In a special and peculiarly appropriate and emphatic sense Christ pleads the cause of those who are savingly united to Him. He prays for them as "not of the world" (see John 17). (3) Individuals, and particularly those who penitently put their trust in Him. "Christ is the head of every man" (1 Cor. 11:3). "If anyone sins, we have an Advocate with the Father" (1 John 2:1).

Intercession of the Holy Spirit. In one important and moving passage (Rom. 8:26) the Spirit's intercession is mentioned in particular and refers to the aid of the Holy Spirit given to believers that their prayers may be received by God.

Intercession of Christians. Roman Catholics believe in the intercession of the saints, i.e., of canonized departed spirits. This is rejected by Protestants as unscriptural because it derogates from the character of Christ, who is the only and sufficient mediator between God and man, and also because of the supposition involved that there exists a class of glorified human beings who have personal merits of their own, on account of which they may plead effectually for others. A great truth is to be recognized, however, in that it is the privilege and duty of all Christians to pray effectively for others. This is intercession in a subordinate although still important sense. The propriety and validity of such human intercession is illustrated in the Scriptures of both Testaments (see 1 Sam. 12:23; 1 Kings 18:36–37; Matt. 5:44; 1 Tim. 2:1; etc.).

INTERMEDIATE STATE. A phrase employed in theology in two ways: first, it is sometimes used to designate the interval between the death and resurrection of Christ. This is Van Oosterzee's exclusive use of the term. Second, the use that is by far more general refers the term to the condition of mankind after death and before the resurrection and final judgment. The following discussion, therefore, embraces these two distinct though importantly related subjects.

Of Christ. The condition or situation of the God-man during the period in which His body lay in the grave may be a matter for reverent inquiry but not one for dogmatic statement, as there is not sufficient Scripture basis for the latter.

1. We may look upon our Lord at this point as affording another illustration of His acceptance of human conditions in that He existed for a time as a disembodied spirit and for a time awaited His resurrection and glorification. The words spoken to Mary, "I have not yet ascended to the Father" (John 20:17), would seem to indicate that His spirit, which had been disembodied, had not attained the final blessedness. On the other hand, His promise to the penitent thief certainly had a glorious meaning (Luke 23:43; cf. 2 Cor. 12:2–4; Rev. 2:7).

2. At the same time the intermediate state may be regarded as the transition between our Lord's humiliation and exaltation. In one sense, it was the beginning of His exaltation, for though He "died ... and ... was buried" (1 Cor. 15:3, 4), even in death He triumphed over death, in that His body "did not undergo decay" (Acts 2:27; 13:37). Also, it is held that in entering the world of spirits our Lord did so triumphantly and took possession of the kingdom of the dead. Reference is made to this in Rom. 10:7; 14:9; Eph. 4:8–10; Col. 2:15; 1 Pet. 3:18–19; but the precise character of Christ's activity during this interval is one of those obscure matters upon which speculation has been abundant and has often gone beyond the proper warrant of Holy Scripture.

3. Christ's descent "into hell" is a phrase the proper meaning of which has been a subject of endless controversy. That the phrase should continue to be used is, in view of its ambiguity and liability to abuse, at least open to question.

The Apostles' Creed contains in its fifth article the words "He descended into hell." But it is universally conceded that they did not appear in that creed or any other before the fourth century. The purpose for which the clause was introduced is in dispute. It remains in the Apostles' Creed as used by the Roman, Greek, and Lutheran churches and the Church of England. The Protestant Episcopal church prefaces the creed with a note permitting the substitution of the words "He went into the place of departed spirits," as meaning the same as the words of the creed. The Methodist church omits the words altogether. See Creeds; also Westminster Catechism, answer to question 50.

The phrase "descended into hell," or any proper equivalent, does not appear in the NT. The words quoted by Peter (Acts 2:25–31), and much relied upon, are quoted also by Paul (13:34–35), but in such a way as to show that both apostles had in mind solely the resurrection of our Lord as preceded by His actual death and burial. But for the exposition of these and other passages (as Eph. 4:8–10; 1 Tim. 3:16, and especially 1 Pet. 3:18–21; 4:6), the meanings of which are disputed, reference must be made to the works of Scripture exegetes.

It would be vain to attempt to outline here the history of speculation in connection with this subject. It should be said, however, that the view that Christ's activity during His intermediate state embraced the preaching of His gospel was held by quite a considerable number of the early church Fathers. The advantages of this preaching were regarded as offered to both Jews and Gentiles in Hades. This view, as is well known, has been revived and brought into considerable prominence within recent years. But that this gospel proclamation by our Lord in the world of spirits has ever been repeated (if it ever existed), or that others have been commissioned to similar work, must certainly remain a matter of pure and perilous conjecture. Upon the inference taken from this view of probation and the offer of salvation beyond the grave, further remark will be made in the second part of this article.

The Roman Catholic view of the descent is interwoven with the peculiar ideas of the Roman church as to the various divisions of the world of spirits. The purpose of Christ in the descent was to deliver the saints of Israel and others from the limbus patrum and conduct them to heaven (see Cat. Council Trid., art. v.).

The doctrine of the Greek church represents Christ as descending into Hades for the purpose of offering redemption "to those who were subject to Satan on account of original sin, releasing believers, and all who died in piety under the Old Testament dispensation."

The Lutheran doctrine has presented considerable variations. But prominent amid the conflict of opinions is the view of the later Lutheran theologians, which regards the "descent into hell" as taking place not before but immediately after the resurrection. The period of the intermediate state was passed in Paradise. Early on Easter morning before the risen Lord manifested Himself to men, He went soul and body to hell, the abode of the lost, and there proclaimed His power over the devil and his angels. The "descent," according to this view, belonged emphatically to Christ's exaltation. The greatest extravagance of opinion upon this subject was that taught by Johannes Hoch in the sixteenth century, namely, that the soul of Christ descended into hell to suffer punishment while His body lay in the grave. That such a thought could find any measure of acceptance is, as has been said, "the opprobrium of one of the darkest chapters of historical theology."

Without going further, sufficient example has been presented to illustrate the sentence quoted by Van Oosterzee: "On this subject also it is wiser, after David's fashion (Ps. 139:18) to meditate on one's couch than to write thereupon." See Hell.

Of Mankind. This likewise is a subject upon which the light of the Scripture is not abundant. There is, however, a progress to be noted when we compare the revelations of the NT with those of the OT. That the human spirit continues to exist consciously after the death of the body is a fact most clearly established upon a biblical basis, to say nothing of the strength of philosophical arguments upon the matter (see Immortality). That a most powerful contrast is declared between the state of the righteous and that of the wicked, not only after the final judgment but also during the interval between that event and the death of the body, should also be regarded as beyond question. But still the precise condition or situation in which the departed spirit finds itself immediately after death is another matter, upon which even the teachings of the NT are not full or always explicit. Accordingly speculation has been rife and has frequently illustrated the peril of attempting to be “wise above that which is written.” It is not feasible here to do more than to indicate by the most general outline the various theories that have found their advocates and, besides this, to suggest the conclusions that may be derived fairly from the Scriptures.

1. The belief has been held by many at different times in the history of the church that during the intermediate state the soul is unconscious. Strictly speaking, the theory has sometimes gone beyond this and denied the existence of any spiritual principle in man that may survive the disorganization of the body. A modification of the theory of the unconscious state, or sleep of the soul, has appeared in the speculation that the soul, while disembodied, can take no note of the succession of events, and thus no note of time; and therefore, so far as consciousness is concerned, the moment of death is practically identical with that of resurrection. In criticizing these speculations upon philosophic grounds, it may be sufficient to say that in all its forms the theory in question is opposed to the picture of conscious life given by our Lord in the account of the rich man and Lazarus, as well as to the general representations of the Apocalypse. The fact upon which stress is often laid, that in the NT the dead are sometimes spoken of as sleeping, and the saints as “asleep in Jesus” (1 Thess. 4:14), proves nothing in favor of the theory. For this is simply a figurative expression with reference to the resemblance that death bears to sleep; and, besides this, sleep is one thing and utter unconsciousness is another.

2. In contrast with the preceding is the theory that obliterates the intermediate state by representing human beings as entering at the moment of their death upon their final condition. Redemption, according to this condition (that of Gnosticism), accomplishes its final triumph in the deliverance of the spirit from the body, whereas Paul represents the final triumph as the resurrection, the “redemption of our body” (Rom. 8:19–23; 1 Cor. 15). This theory also ignores the final judgment as represented in the Scriptures.

3. The theory of a purgatory, or the intermediate state of suffering between heaven and hell for the discipline and purification of those who finally are to enter heaven, belongs to the Roman church. It is part of an elaborate system of doctrine concerning the souls of the departed developed by medieval theology. It has no foundation in Scripture and is even opposed by such Scriptures as pronounce those “who die in the Lord” as “blessed” or “with Christ.” It dishonors the perfect atonement of our Lord and has led to the great abuse of the sale of masses for the dead.

4. Within recent years has been presented, sometimes with great apparent force, the theory that regards the intermediate state as one of probation and opportunity to choose the righteous way of life, particularly for those who, from no fault of their own, have not in the present world known the gospel. This theory rests for its Scripture support mainly upon 1 Pet. 3:19–21; 4:6, those controversial passages to which reference has already been made. Interwoven with this theory are what may be regarded as overstrained conceptions of the necessity of probation in every case for the development of moral life, and of the necessity of an intellectual apprehension of the historic Christ in order to secure salvation (see Faith; also Arminian view of the application of the benefits of atonement in article on Election). It should be said that many, if not most, of the advocates of this view guard it, or attempt to guard it, in such a way as not to encourage men in the rejection of the gospel, for they admit, as all must, that the whole tone of Scripture, at least for those who hear the gospel, is to this effect: "Behold, now is 'the acceptable time,' behold, now is 'the day of salvation'" (2 Cor. 6:2; see also Luke 16:25–31).

5. From what is revealed in the Scriptures it may reasonably be concluded (a) that the intermediate state is not for the wicked that of their final misery, nor for the righteous that of their completed and final blessedness. They await the resurrection and the judgment of the great day (see Matt. 25:31–46; John 5:28–29) (see Resurrection; Judgment). (b) The state of those "who die in the Lord" is, even for this period, pronounced "blessed." It is so, for the reason that though they wait for the final consummation, they are "with Christ" (Rev. 14:4, 13; see Phil. 1:23; John 14:1, 3; Luke 23:43; etc.). (c) For those who have willfully rejected the offer of salvation through Christ there is no ground of hope based upon Scripture that after death that offer will be renewed. It is proper to emphasize this statement in view of the spirit of presumption fostered by conjectural dealing with this most awful of all themes. See Hell; Hades; Gehenna; Lake of Fire; Punishment. INTERPRETATION OF SCRIPTURE. See Inspiration.

IOB (yo□b). The third named of the sons of Issachar (Gen. 46:13; "Job," KJV), called Jashub (Num. 26:24; 1 Chron. 7:1). See Jashub.

IPHDEI'AH (if-dē'ya; "Jehovah redeems"). One of the "sons" of Shashak, and a leader of the tribe of Benjamin, resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:25), before 588 B.C.

IPH'TAH (if'ta; "he will open"). A city in the lowland district of Judah (Josh. 15:43), not positively identified, but located by some at Tarqumiya, about six miles NW of Hebron.

IPH'TAHEL (if'ta-el; "God will open"), Iph'tah El (NIV). A valley located at the intersection of the line between Asher and Naphtali, with the northern boundary of Zebulun (Josh. 19:14, 27). It is probably "no other than the large Wady Abilîn, which takes its rise in the hills in the neighborhood of Jefât" (Robinson, Bib. Res., p. 107).

IR (ir; a "city"). The father of Shuppim (Shephupham) and Huppim (Hupham), of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:12); probably identical with one of the sons of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21) and, therefore, not as is often supposed, the same as "Iri" (1 Chron. 7:7).

I'RA (ī'ra). The name of three of David's favorite officers.

1. A Jairite, and "a priest to David" (2 Sam. 20:26), after 1000 B.C.

2. A Tekoite, son of Ikkesh, and one of David's thirty warriors (2 Sam. 23:26; 1 Chron. 11:28). He was afterward placed in charge of the sixth division of troops, 993 B.C.

3. An Ithrite, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:38; 1 Chron. 11:40), about 993 B.C.

I'RAD (ī'rad). One of the antediluvian patriarchs of the Cainite line, son of Enoch and father of Mehujael (Gen. 4:18).

I'RAM (ī'ram). The last named of the Edomite chiefs in Mt. Seir, apparently contemporary with Horite kings (Gen. 36:43; 1 Chron. 1:54).

IR-HAHA RES. See City of Destruction.

I'RI (i'ri) The last named of the five sons of Bela, son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:7).

IRI'JAH (i-rī'ja; "Jehovah sees or provides"). Son of Shelemiah, and a captain of the guard at the Gate of Benjamin. He arrested the prophet Jeremiah on the pretense that he was deserting to the Chaldeans (Jer. 37:13–14), about 597 B.C.

IR-NA'HASH (ir-na'hash; "city of a serpent," 1 Chron. 4:12, marg., "the city of Nahash")
Ir Na'hash (NIV). Thought by some to be a city founded (rebuilt) by Tehinnah. It apparently would be better rendered "city of copper" (cf. 4:14) and connected with Nahas (Copper Ruin), located near the N end of the 'Arabah.

IRON. See Mineral Kingdom.

Figurative. Iron is used in Scripture as the symbol of strength (Dan. 2:33; etc.), of stubbornness (Isa. 48:4); of severe affliction (Deut. 4:20; Ps. 107:10, marg.); of a hard, barren soil (Deut. 28:23); of harsh exercise of power (Ps. 2:9; Rev. 2:27).

I'RON. See Yiron.

IR'PEEL (ir'pe-el; "God will heal"). A city of the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. 18:27). From the associated names it would seem to have been located in the district W of Jerusalem.

IRRIGATION. There is a reference to artificial irrigation by conduits in the statement "who has cleft a channel for the flood" (Job 38:25; Prov. 21:1). Besides, they were well known to the Israelites from Egypt (Deut. 11:10), for there water is brought from the Nile, its canals and reservoirs, to the higher-lying regions in various ways: sometimes by draw wells with a long lever (now called shaduf); sometimes by large dredge wheels moved by the foot, over which passes a long endless rope with earthen jars fixed to it such as are still in use (11:10), though the phrase "water it with your foot" may refer to pushing aside the soil between one furrow and another, so as to allow the flow of water; sometimes by more complex machines moved by oxen; sometimes by carrying it on the shoulder in buckets.

IR-SHE'MESH (ir-she'mesh; "city of the sun"), Ir She'mesh (NIV). A city of Dan, on the border between Eshtaol and Shaalabbin (Josh. 19:41), the same as Beth-shemesh (1 Kings 4:9).

I'RU (i'ru). The first named of the sons of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (1 Chron. 4:15), after 1440 B.C.

I'SAAC (i'zak; Heb. yīṣḥāq, "laughter," i.e., "mockery"). The only son of Abraham by Sarah. The name Isaac was fitly chosen by Jehovah in commemoration of the child's miraculous birth (Gen. 17:19) and of the laughing joy it occasioned.

Early Life. The birth of Isaac occurred (about 2061 B.C.) when Abraham was a hundred years old and Sarah ninety (Gen. 21:5; cf. 17:17). He was circumcised when he was eight days old, and his mother's skeptical laughter was turned into exultation and joy. The next event recorded of Isaac is his weaning, probably (according to Eastern custom) when he was two years old (21:8). In honor of the occasion Abraham made a great feast, as an expression, no doubt, of his joy. This happiness was naturally shared by the mother and the friends of the parents. But Ishmael (which see) saw no occasion for gladness to him—being supplanted in the more peculiar honor of the house by this younger brother. He mocked Isaac and so angered Sarah that she insisted upon his being sent away (vv. 9–14).

Offering. We are next informed of the event connected with the command of God to offer Isaac up as a sacrifice on a mountain in the land of Moriah (chap. 22), perhaps 2045 B.C. He was probably about sixteen years of age; according to Josephus (Ant. 1.13.2), twenty-five. It appears from the narrative that Isaac was not aware that he was to be offered until the act was in process of being accomplished (see vv. 7–8) and then offered no resistance. His conduct proved him to be a fitting type of Him who came to do not His own will but the will of Him that sent Him.

Marriage. A long gap occurs in the narrative of Isaac's life, and we hear nothing of him until his marriage to Rebekah. We may reasonably infer that a period of twenty years or more elapsed since the last event recorded concerning him; for his marriage took place after his mother's death, which occurred when Isaac was thirty-seven years old. In obedience to the command of Abraham, a trusted servant went to Mesopotamia to take, under divine direction, a partner from among his own kin for Isaac. Rebekah was chosen and became the wife of Isaac when he was forty years of age (chap. 24), about 2021 B.C.

Death of Abraham. Previous to his death Abraham made a final distribution of his property, leaving to Isaac his possessions, whereas the sons of Hagar and Keturah were sent away with presents into the E country (Arabia). Isaac and Ishmael buried their father in the cave of Machpelah, and Isaac took up his residence "by Beer-lahai-roi" (25:5-11).

Children. After about twenty years (about 2001 B.C.), and in answer to prayer, Rebekah gave birth to two sons, Jacob and Esau (25:21-26). As the boys grew, Isaac "loved" Esau, perhaps for his robust character, while Jacob, "a peaceful man, living in tents," was the favorite of his mother.

Denies His Wife. Although a famine in the land compelled Isaac to seek food in some foreign land, he was admonished by God not to go down to Egypt but to continue in the Promised Land. At this time the Lord renewed His promise to Isaac and to his seed and confirmed the promise made to his father, Abraham. Isaac did not fully trust the divine protection, though, but was led by his fears into a lie. While dwelling in the neighborhood of Gerar he had the weakness to call Rebekah his sister, afraid that the people might kill him if they knew her to be his wife. Upon learning the truth Abimelech, the Philistine king, rebuked Isaac for his lie but allowed him to remain in the land (26:1-11).

Later Life. Isaac remained in the land of the Philistines, cultivated a portion of ground, and in the same year reaped "a hundredfold." His flocks and herds grew so large that he became rich, which so excited the envy of the Philistines that they drove him from their territory. He then reopened the wells that his father had dug and that the Philistines had filled up, digging also several new ones, which they claimed as theirs. Withdrawing from one after another, he finally dug one that he was allowed to keep unmolested; and, in token of his satisfaction at the peace he enjoyed, he called it Rehoboth, "broad places" or "room" (26:12-22). He then returned to Beersheba, where the Lord appeared to him and repeated the covenant blessing. Abimelech also sought and obtained from Isaac a covenant of peace (26:24-31). It was when Esau was forty years of age, and Isaac a hundred, that the former married Judith and Basemath, daughters of Canaan, "and they brought grief to Isaac and Rebekah" (vv. 34-35).

Isaac's Blessing. The last prominent event in the life of Isaac is the blessing he gave to his sons (27:1-40). Being old and dim of sight and supposing that his death was near at hand, Isaac called Esau and requested him to take venison and to make him "a savory dish" that he might eat and bless him before he died. Rebekah, hearing his request, sought to frustrate his intention and to secure the blessing for Jacob. While Esau was absent, Rebekah prepared the dish, and Jacob, disguised so as to resemble his hairy brother, deceived his father and obtained the blessing. Upon discovering the deception Isaac, remembering, no doubt, the prediction that "the older shall serve the younger," declined to revoke the words he had uttered but bestowed an inferior blessing upon Esau. This so angered Esau that he seems to have looked forward to Isaac's death as affording an opportunity for taking vengeance upon his brother. The aged patriarch was therefore induced, at his wife's entreaty, to send Jacob into Mesopotamia, that he might take a wife "from the daughters of Laban" (27:41-28:6).

Death. After some time Jacob returned and found his father “at Mamre of Kiriath-arba (that is, Hebron), where Abraham and Isaac had sojourned.” Here Isaac died at the age of 180, “and was gathered to his people, . . . and his sons Esau and Jacob buried him” (35:27–29), about 1881 B.C.

As a Type. Many Bible students teach that Isaac in his various relations presents a type of Christ. Those who hold such a view see Isaac in his surrender and submission to the sacrifice on Moriah (Gen. 22) as a type of Christ “obedient to the point of death” (Phil. 2:5–8). Abraham is set forth as a type of the Father who “did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all” (John 3:16; Rom. 8:32). The ram miraculously caught in the thicket and sacrificed instead of Isaac is a type of substitutionary atonement—Christ offered as a burnt offering in the place of sinners (Heb. 10:5–10). Abraham saying, “I and the lad will go yonder; and we will worship and return to you” (Gen. 22:5) prefigures resurrection (Heb. 11:17–19). In Gen. 24 Isaac again appears as a type of Christ as the bridegroom, Rebekah being a type of the church, the ecclesia, the virgin bride of Christ (Gen. 24:16; 2 Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:25–32). Again, Abraham appears as a type of the Father, and the unnamed servant a type of the Holy Spirit, who “will not speak on His own initiative” but takes the gifts of the bridegroom to woo the bride (John 16:13–14). Thus the servant enriches the bride (cf. 1 Cor. 12:7–11; Gal. 5:22) and conducts her to the bridegroom.

Isaac and Archaeology. The name Isaac, like that of Jacob, is an abbreviated name whose full form would be Yitshaq-’el (cf. Ya’qub’el). These names belong to types now well known in the environment from which the early Hebrews sprang. The name Abraham has also been found in Mesopotamia, showing that it was a name actually in use at the time. The name Jacob occurs in tablets of the eighteenth century B.C. from Chagar Bazar in northern Mesopotamia and also as a place name in Palestine in the fifteenth century B.C. in Thutmose III’s list. The Nuzi Letters, excavated between 1925 and 1941 not far from modern Kirkuk, not only illustrate patriarchal customs and life in general but give an example of the circumstances of the birth of Ishmael (Gen. 16:1–6). Nuzi marriage regulations stipulate that if a wife is barren she must furnish her husband with a slave wife. Later, when Sarah had herself given birth to Isaac and determined that Hagar and her child be disinherited, the patriarch’s reluctance to comply with her demand was readily comprehensible in the light of the common practice at Nuzi. There the law stipulated that in case the slave wife should bear a son, that son must not be expelled. It is clear in the light of Nuzian parallels why Abraham was loath to agree with Sarah’s illegal demand, and doubtless he would have refused to do so, despite his concern for Isaac, had not a divine dispensation overridden the law. ISA’IAH (ī-zā’ya; “Jehovah saves”). Little information has come to us respecting the history of Isaiah. His father’s name was Amoz (Isa. 1:1), but we do not know of what tribe. Isaiah is thought to have lived in Jerusalem, near the Temple (chap. 6) and to have married a prophetess, by whom he had a son named Maher-shalal-hash-baz (8:3); another son, Shear-jashub, being mentioned in 7:3. His dress was suitable to his vocation (20:2), probably a coarse linen or hairy overcoat of a dark color, such as was worn by mourners.

1. Time of the Prophet. Isaiah prophesied under the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah. The first period of his ministry was in the reigns of Uzziah (792– 740 B.C.) and Jotham (750–738 as regent, 738–732 as sole ruler), in which he called for repentance without success, and consequently had to announce judgment and banishment. The second period extended from the commencement of the reign of Ahaz (735–715) to that of the reign of Hezekiah; the third from the accession of Hezekiah (c. 715) to the fifteenth year of his reign. After this Isaiah took no further part in public affairs, but he lived till the commencement of Manasseh's reign when, according to a credible tradition, he suffered martyrdom by being sawn apart. To this Heb. 11:37 is supposed to be an allusion.

2. Writings. Isaiah was the author of a biography of King Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:22) and of Hezekiah (32:32), as well as of the sublime prophecies that bear his name. Both biographies have been lost, together with the annals of Judah and Israel into which they had been inserted. He is by general consent the greatest of all Hebrew writers, and so fully does he describe the Person and offices of the Messiah, that from the time of Jerome he has been known as the evangelical prophet.

3. Position. Isaiah appears to have held a high rank in Jerusalem, for Hezekiah, when sending a deputation to him, chose his highest officers and the elders of the priests (2 Kings 19:2). It is exceedingly probable that he was the head of the prophetic order, holding in Jerusalem the same rank that Elisha had held in the prophetic schools in Israel. His authority greatly increased after the fulfillment of his prophecies by the Babylonian Exile, the victories of Cyrus, and the deliverance of the covenant people. Even Cyrus was induced (Josephus Ant. 40.1.1 and 2) to set the Jews at liberty by the prophecies of Isaiah concerning himself.

Concerning the opinion of a "second Isaiah," see Isaiah, Book of. See Jesaiah.

ISAIAH, BOOK OF. Isaiah (Heb. Yšhaçyāhû, "Jehovah is salvation") was the greatest of the Hebrew prophets. His general prophecies are without equal as far as beauty of style, versatility of treatment, brilliance of imagery, and splendor of diction are concerned. He has often been called "the Prince of OT Prophets" (cf. B. A. Copass, Isaiah, Prince of O.T. Prophets [1944]). His book is the first among the so-called "latter prophets," and his name has been given to his prophetic collection.

Time of Prophecy. He resided and ministered in Jerusalem from c. 740 B.C., in "the year of King Uzziah's death," until c. 700 B.C. or somewhat later. He thus prophesied during the kingships of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah (1:1). He was married to a prophetess (8:3) and had two sons: Shear-jashub (7:3), "a remnant will return," and Maher-shalal-hash-baz (8:3), "swift is the booty, speedy is the prey." Thus the name of the first child held a promise of mercy; the second, one of judgment.

The Purpose. Isaiah in his ministry emphasized the spiritual and the social. He struck at the root of the nation's trouble in its apostasy and idolatry and sought to save Judah from its moral and political and social corruption. He failed, however, to turn the nation Godward. His divine commission carried the warning that this would be the case (6:9–12). Thereupon he boldly declared the inevitable crash of Judah and the preservation of a small godly remnant (6:13). However, gleams of hope radiate throughout his prophecy. Through this small remnant worldwide redemption would eventuate through the Messiah at His first advent (9:2, 6; 53:1–12; etc.). At the second advent national salvation and restoration for Israel would result (2:1–4; 9:7; 11:1–16; 35:1–10; 54:11–17). The theme that Israel would one day be a messianic nation to the world and a medium of universal blessing (yet to be fulfilled), with which the prophecies of Isaiah are imbued, has given him the name of messianic prophet.

Outline.

I. Prophecies from the standpoint of the prophet's own time (1:1–35:10)

A. Prophecies concerning Judah and Jerusalem (1:1–13:6)

General introduction (1:1–31)

Millennial blessing through cleansing (2:1–4:6)

Israel's reproof for her sins (5:1–30)

The prophet's call and commission (6:1–13)

Immanuel's prophecy (7:1–25)

Prophecy of Assyrian invasion (8:1–22)

Messianic prediction (9:1–21)

Assyrian punishment (10:1–34)

Millennial restoration (11:1–16)

Millennial worship (12:1–6)

B. Prophecies against foreign nations (13:1–23:18)

Babylon (13:1–14:23)

Assyria (14:24–27)

Philistia (14:28–32)

Moab (15:1–16:14)

Damascus (17:1–14)

Land beyond the rivers of Ethiopia (18:1–7)

Egypt (19:1–25)

Assyria's conquest (20:1–6)

Desert areas (21:1–22:25)

Tyre (23:1–18)

C. Prophecy of kingdom establishment (24:1–27:13)

The Great Tribulation (24:1–23)

Character of the kingdom (25:1–12)

Restored Israel (26:1–27:13)

D. Prophecies concerning Judah and Assyria (28:1–35:10)

Danger and deliverance (28:1–33:24)

The Day of the Lord (34:1–17)

Full millennial blessing (35:1–10)

II. Historical interlude (36:1–39:8)

A. Sennacherib's invasion (36:1–37:38)

B. Hezekiah's sickness and recovery (38:1–22)

C. Arrival of Babylonian envoys; prophecy and captivity (39:1–8)

III. Prophecies of redemption and restoration from the idealistic standpoint of the Babylonian Exile (40:1–66:24)

A. Comfort to the exiles, the promise of restoration (40:1–48:22)

Message of comfort: promise of messianic restoration (40:1–11)

Basis of comfort: God's character (40:12–31)

The reason for comfort: Jehovah's vindication against idolators by raising up Cyrus, the deliverer (41:1–29)

The comforter—Jehovah's servant (42:1–25)

The result of the comfort: a nation restored (43:1–45:25); the downfall of the Babylonian idols (46:1–12) and Babylon itself (47:1–15)

Exhortation of comfort to those yet to be delivered from captivity (48:1–22)

B. Comfort to the exiles in the prophecy of the Messiah-Redeemer (49:1–57:21)

His call and work (49:1–26)

His obedience (50:1–11)

His redemption (51:1–52:12)

His atonement and exaltation (52:13–53:12)

His guarantee of Israel's restoration (54:1–17)

Worldwide salvation (55:1–13)

His warnings and promises (56:1–57:21)

C. Comfort in the prophecy of Israel's future glory (58:1–66:24)

Obstacles to Israel's restoration removed (58:1–59:21)

Jerusalem's exaltation in the messianic age (60:1–22)

Messiah's ministry for Israel and the world (61:1–11)

God's concern for Jerusalem (62:1–12)

Messiah's conquest of Israel's enemies (63:1–14)

The remnant's prayer (63:15–64:12)

Jehovah's response (65:1–25)

Kingdom blessing (66:1–24)

Date and Authorship. Until about the middle of the eighteenth century the traditional view that Isaiah wrote the entire prophecy was almost universally held. However, since 1775, when J. C. Doederlein denied Isaiah's authorship of chaps. 40–66, it has been common for critics to speak of a "second Isaiah." This unknown writer allegedly wrote in the period immediately before the end of the Babylonian captivity (c. 550–539 B.C.). B. Duhm went a step further and denied the unity of chaps. 40–66, and he invented a "third Isaiah" for chaps. 55–66. Duhm is followed notably by K. Elliger and E. Sellin. Other critics divide the third Isaiah into a school of writers, rather than attribute it to an individual. In 1928 C. C. Torrey, in his book entitled The Second Isaiah, advanced the hypothesis that chaps. 34–66 (36–39 excluded) were by one author living in Palestine. He thus presented strong evidence for the unity of this section.

Rejection of Three Critical Claims. The critical view, that Isaiah could not have written the entirety of the book that bears his name, is summarized in three claims, each of which can be refuted. The first critical claim is that the standpoint of the writer of chaps. 40–66 is exilic and consequently precludes Isaiah's authorship on the basis of the historic function of prophecy. The argument is not that the standpoint of the writer is exilic. This is freely admitted. The question is whether under the influence of the spirit of prophecy, a prophet might not be naturally transported into the future to describe coming events to a future generation. Critics who rule out the supernatural and admit at most a premonition or "brilliant intuition" (cf. Robert Pfeiffer, Introduction, p. 423) are compelled to deny the possibility of such an occurrence as supernatural projection into the future and, accordingly, must refuse Isaiah's authorship of the second part of the book. But the critical arguments are inconclusive, and to therefore reject the unity of the book on the basis of the analogy of prophecy (see S. R. Driver, Introduction, 9th ed., pp. 236–43), maintaining that a prophet never projects himself into an ideal standpoint in the future except when the transference to that state is transient (for example Isa. 5:13–15; 9:1–6; 23:1, 14), is not correct. Actually examples occur in Ezekiel (Ezek. 40:2). This prophet was transported from Babylon during the captivity "into the land of Israel" to behold from the idealistic future standpoint of the Millennium the extended vision of the millennial Temple and Israel in the land during the future Kingdom age (Ezek. 40–48). Similarly, Ezekiel is brought out "by the Spirit of the Lord" and set down in the midst of a valley "full of bones" (37:1). In this case the prophet is projected into the ideal standpoint of Israel's final worldwide dispersion and regathering. John was evidently similarly projected into the future Day of the Lord (Rev. 1:10) to behold the protracted events of that future period (4:1–19:21). Paul was caught up to the third heaven (2 Cor. 12:2–4). Accordingly, to reject the unity of chaps. 40–66 on the basis that Isaianic authorship violates the "historic function of prophecy" is unsustainable. The prophet, says Driver (ibid., p. 237), "speaks always, in the first instance, to his own contemporaries; the message which he brings is intimately related to the circumstances of his time; his promises and predictions, however far they reach into the future, nevertheless rest upon the basis of the history of his own age, and correspond to the needs which are then felt." However, it is open to serious doubt whether the words of consolation of the so-called “second Isaiah” were not appropriate for the faithful, persecuted believers in the early reign of Manasseh. The fall of Jerusalem and Sennacherib’s invasion were events that brought the possibility of exile close and for all that was revealed, such an exile may have taken place almost immediately. Critics fail to see that the essential notion of prophecy involving the direct operation of the Holy Spirit upon the faculties of man cannot be circumscribed by time or space or comprehended to any extent apart from the supernatural. If critics admit a transient projection into the future, why may there not be an extended projection?

The second critical claim is that the differences in style between the two sections of the book preclude Isaiah’s authorship of chaps. 40–66. This argument is extremely precarious and highly subjective, failing to take into consideration that an author of Isaiah’s versatility may change his style in the course of a long literary career of possibly over forty years. Then too, critics are impressed by similarities of style between the two. Some even assert that the similarities led later redactors to append this second section to Isaiah’s genuine prophecy.

The third critical claim is that differences in theological concepts of the two sections indicate separate authorship. This is the weakest of all. In the first Isaiah, God’s majesty is supposedly emphasized; by the second Isaiah, God’s infinity. Also the prominent idea of a remnant in the first part is supposedly unemphasized in the second part. But such arguments reveal the essential unsoundness of the entire critical view.

Argument from the Unity of the Book. To the weakness of the critical arguments must be added other reasons supporting the unity of the book of Isaiah that commend themselves to conservative scholars.

The NT witness. The weight of this argument cannot be dismissed by contending that biblical writers do not concern themselves with points of technical introduction. This may be true, but the manner of quotation, as in John 12:38–41, is so direct and personal that the actual author is indicated. (See also Luke 3:4–6; John 1:23, also Matt. 8:17; 12:18–21; John 12:38–41; and Paul’s quotation, Rom. 9:27–33; 10:16–21).

Implicit reference to Isaiah. Illustrations in the exilic prophets that are taken from the second part of Isaiah point to Isaiah’s authorship (cf. Nah. 1:15 with Isa. 52:7; Jer. 31:35 with Isa. 51:15; Jer. 10:1–16 with Isa. 41:7 and 44:12–15; Zeph. 2:15 with Isa. 47:8, 10).

The voice of tradition. The Isaiah Manuscript, the Dead Sea Scrolls, the LXX evidence, Jewish tradition, Josephus, the Apocrypha, the church Fathers, and the general witness of Christians down to the middle of the eighteenth century are against the idea of a second and third Isaiah. The general testimony of the greatness of the second Isaiah from a literary and prophetic point of view involves the critical contention in difficulty. If this writer was the greatest of the prophets, why did his reputation dwindle so rapidly that by the second century B.C. he was almost an anonymity and his great prediction confused with that of a much lesser light, Isaiah the son of Amoz, whose stature had so phenomenally increased that Ecclesiasticus gives him such high praise?

Palestinian authorship. Evidence that the author of Isa. 40–66 was a native Palestinian favors Isaianic unity of the entire prophecy. C. C. Torrey’s second Isaiah, although arguing for a different author for the second section, presents a favorable defense of the unity of chaps. 40–66 and its Palestinian authorship.

IS'CAH (is'ka). The daughter of Haran and sister of Milcah and Lot (Gen. 11:29; cf. v. 31). Jewish tradition, as in Josephus (Ant. 1.6.5), Jerome, and the Targum Pseudo-Jonathan, identifies her with Sarah (which see).

ISCAR'OT (is-kar'i-ot; probably from Heb. ish qri'oth, “man of Kerioth”). A surname of Judas (which see) the traitor, to distinguish him from others of the same name (Matt. 10:4; etc.).

ISH'BAH (ish'ba; “he will praise”). A descendant of Judah and founder (“father”) of Eshtemoa (1 Chron. 4:17). He is perhaps the same as Ishi (v. 20).

ISH'BAK (ish'bak; “leaving”). A son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chron. 1:32); after 2030 B.C., and the progenitor of a tribe of northern Arabia.

ISH'BI-BE'NOB (ish'bi-be'nob). One of the Rephaim, a gigantic warrior “the weight of whose spear was three hundred shekels of bronze,” and who attacked David but was slain by Abishai (2 Sam. 21:16), about 970 B.C.

ISH-BO'SHETH (ish-bo'sheth; “man of shame”). The youngest of Saul's four sons (2 Sam. 2:8; 1 Chron. 8:33; 9:39; in the two later passages his name is given as Eshbaal, “the man of Baal”). The name evidently offers an example of rendering the “Baal” element by ḥbōshet, Heb. for “shame,” showing the abhorrence with which heathen gods were held.

Succeeds Saul. Ishbosheth was the only son who survived his father, his three brothers being slain with Saul in the battle of Gilboa, about 1000 B.C. Being the oldest of the royal family, he was, according to the law of oriental succession, the heir to the throne. His uncle Abner loyally espoused his cause, but the whole kingdom was in ruins, and hardly a single city W of the Jordan either could or would acknowledge the rule of the house of Saul. Abner, therefore, took Ish-bosheth beyond the Jordan to the city Mahanaim and announced him as Saul's successor (2 Sam. 2:8–9). Abner appears to have first undertaken to reunite under his protection the country of the east and then reconquer the territory subdued by the Philistines. The order in which these districts were retaken seems to be indicated in v. 9. While Abner was making these efforts some five years probably elapsed, leaving the length of Ish-bosheth's reign two years (v. 10). He was forty years old when he began to reign. Even the semblance of authority that he possessed he owed to the will and influence of Abner, who kept the control of affairs in his own hands, carrying on all wars and negotiations with David (2:12; 3:6–12).

Breaks with Abner. At length Ish-bosheth accused Abner (whether justly or not is not stated) of cohabiting with Rizpah, his father's concubine, which according to oriental custom, was considered treason. When Ish-bosheth accused him of this, Abner fell into a rage and announced his intention of handing over the kingdom to David. Ish-bosheth made no reply, “because he was afraid of him” (2 Sam. 3:7–11). Soon after, Abner made proposals to David, and the latter demanded Michal, his former wife. Ish-bosheth forced Paltiel to give her up (vv. 12–16). While carrying on negotiations with David, Abner fell a victim to the resentment of Joab for the death of Asahel (v. 17–27).

Death. When Ish-bosheth heard that Abner was dead, “he lost courage”; he was soon after murdered by Rechab and Baana while taking his midday rest, probably to revenge a crime of his father or in the hope of obtaining a reward from David. They met with a stern reaction from that king, who rebuked them for the cold-blooded murder and ordered them to be executed. The head of Ish-bosheth was buried in the sepulcher of Abner in Hebron (4:1–12), about 996 B.C.

I'SHHOD (i'shod; “man of renown”). A son of Hammolecheth and, from his near connection with Gilead, probably an important person (1 Chron. 7:18; “Ishod,” KJV).

ISH'I (ish'i; “salutary”).

1. The son of Appaim and father of Sheshan, and a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 2:31).

2. Another descendant of Judah, but through what line is not known (1 Chron. 4:20); his sons were Zoheth and Ben-zoheth.

3. A Simeonite, four of whose sons led their brethren in the invasion of Mt. Seir and the dispossession of the Amalekites (1 Chron. 4:42), before 715 B.C.

4. One of the chiefs of Manasseh east, who were “mighty men of valor, famous men, heads of their fathers' households” (1 Chron. 5:24), about 720 B.C.

ISHI'AH. See Isshiah, no. 1.

ISHI'JAH. See Isshijah.

ISH'MA (ish'ma). A descendant of Judah, given as one of the “sons of Etam” (1 Chron. 4:3).

ISHMAEL (ish'ma-el; “God will hear”). The name of the eldest son (which see) of Abraham and of several other men.

1. Son of Azel, a descendant of Saul through Merib-baal, or Mephibosheth (1 Chron. 8:38; 9:44), before 588 B.C.

2. A man of Judah, whose son (or descendant), Zebadiah, was “ruler of the house of Judah” under Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 19:11), about 875 B.C. The office of “ruler,” etc., was that of lay president of the supreme court in Jerusalem.

3. Son of Johanan of Judah, and captain of “hundreds,” who assisted Jehoiada in restoring Joash to the throne (2 Chron. 23:1), 836 B.C.

4. One of the “sons” of Pashhur, who relinquished his Gentile wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:22), 456 B.C.

5. Murderer of Gedaliah, who was the superintendent, under the king of Babylon, of the province of Judea. His full description is “Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, the son of Elishama, of the royal family” of Judah (Jer. 41:1; 2 Kings 25:25). “Whether he was actually a son of Zedekiah or a king, or more generally, that he had royal blood in his veins—we cannot tell.”

During the siege of Jerusalem he, like many others of his countrymen (cf. Jer. 40:11), fled across the Jordan, where he found a refuge at the court of Baalis, then king of Bene-Ammom (Josephus Ant. 10.9.2). Gedaliah had taken up his residence at Mizpah, a few miles N of Jerusalem, where the prophet Jeremiah resided with him (Jer. 40:6). Ishmael had been instigated by Baalis to slay Gedaliah (v. 14), and his intention was made known by Johanan, who offered to put Ishmael to death. To this Gedaliah would not consent (vv. 15–16), and a short time later Ishmael and ten companions, “princes of the king” (KJV), came and were entertained by him at a feast. He returned the kindness shown him by murdering Gedaliah and all his attendants, including some Chaldean soldiers (41:1–3). So secretly was the deed executed that for two days it remained undiscovered. On the second day Ishmael saw a party of eighty devotees bringing incense and offerings to the Temple, who, at his invitation, turned aside to the residence of Gedaliah. As they passed into the city he closed the gates and killed all but ten, who escaped by the offer of heavy ransoms. He then carried off the daughters of King Zedekiah and the people of the town, and started for the country of the Ammonites. The massacre was soon made known, and Ishmael was quickly followed by Johanan and his companions, who “found him by the great pool that is in Gibeon” (vv. 4–12), 588 B.C. Ishmael, with eight of his men, escaped and went to the Ammonites. Nothing more is recorded of him.

ISHMAEL (ish'ma-el; “God will hear”). The eldest son of Abraham by Hagar, his Egyptian concubine (Gen. 16:15–16). He was born when the patriarch was eighty-six years old, fourteen years before the birth of Isaac (21:5), c. 2076 B.C. The place of his birth was Mamre.

Circumcision. The next recorded event of his life is his circumcision, which occurred when he was thirteen years of age (Gen. 17:25). It was at this time that the Lord renewed to Abraham in more definite terms the promises made respecting Ishmael (v. 20). Up to this time Abraham appears to have considered Ishmael as the heir of promise and to have had great affection for him (vv. 17–18).

Expulsion. Ishmael is not mentioned again until the weaning of Isaac, when Ishmael was probably between fifteen and sixteen years of age (Gen. 21:8; see further comment below). During the festivities of the occasion, Ishmael, doubtless angered by his blighted hopes, apparently mocked Isaac. Sarah, overhearing him, became angry and said to Abraham, “Drive out this maid and her son, for the son of this maid shall not be an heir with my son Isaac.” Grieved at the demand of Sarah, Abraham yielded only when influenced by a divine admonition. The beautiful and touching picture of Hagar’s departure and journey is recorded in vv. 14–16: “So Abraham rose early in the morning, and took bread and a skin of water, and gave them to Hagar, putting them on her shoulder, and gave her the boy, and sent her away. And she departed, and wandered about in the wilderness of Beersheba. And the water in the skin was used up, and she left the boy under one of the bushes. Then she went and sat down opposite him, about a bowshot away, for she said, ‘Do not let me see the boy die.’ And she sat opposite him, and lifted up her voice and wept.” The Lord appeared to Hagar, opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water, and thus saved the life of the boy. Again the cheering promise was renewed to her of her son, “I will make a great nation of him” (v. 18).

Age at the Time of the Expulsion. The age of Ishmael at the time of his expulsion has given occasion to considerable discussion. He was doubtless thirteen years of age (Gen. 17:25) at the time of his circumcision, and the time of his expulsion was about two or three years later (21:5–8). The translation of 21:14, which seems to speak of Ishmael as an infant, is not an appropriate expression. It is unnecessary to assume that the child was put on Hagar’s shoulder, the construction of the Hebrew not requiring it; and the sense of the passage rendering it highly improbable. Hagar carried “them,” i.e., the bread and the skin of water, on her shoulder. The fact of the lad’s being overcome by thirst and fatigue before his hardy Egyptian mother is not remarkable, especially when we remember God’s miraculous interposition in her behalf.

Marries. Thus miraculously preserved, Ishmael grew and dwelt in the wilderness (Paran) and became an archer. It would seem to have been his mother’s wish to return to Egypt, but this being prevented, she took him an Egyptian wife (21:21), who gave him twelve sons (25:13–15) and one daughter. This daughter being called the “sister of Nebaioth” (28:9), the limitation of the parentage of the brother and sister seems to point to a different mother for Ishmael’s other sons.

Later Life. Of this we know little. Ishmael was present with Isaac at the burial of Abraham (Gen. 25:9). We are given a list of his twelve sons and told that Esau married his daughter, Mahalath (28:9). Ishmael died when he was “one hundred and thirty-seven years; and he breathed his last ... and was gathered to his people. And they settled from Havilah to Shur which is east of Egypt as one goes toward Assyria; he settled in defiance of all his relatives” (25:17–18).

Character. Ishmael appears to have been a wild and wayward child, and doubtless the perfect freedom of desert life and interaction with those who looked upon him as heir-apparent of their great chief tended to make him impatient of restraint and overbearing in his temper. His harsh treatment by Sarah, his disappointment in not becoming the heir of Abraham, and the necessity of earning a scanty living by his sword and bow would naturally wound his proud spirit and make him what the angel had predicted: “a wild donkey of a man; his hand will be against everyone, and everyone’s hand will be against him” (16:12).

ISH’MAELITE (ish’ma-el-īt). A descendant of Abraham’s son Ishmael. The term is probably sometimes used as a general name for all the Abrahamic peoples from Egypt to the Euphrates and perhaps to the Persian Gulf, their headquarters being in W Arabia. In Gen. 37:25, 27–28 the name Ishmaelites may have been applied in general to the caravan, which included a body of Midianite traders. The same relation may exist in Judg. 8:22, 24; in v. 24 that kind of traders may have been called “Ishmaelites” in the same way that the name Canaanites (which see) was used for merchants, since the Ishmaelites were caravan traders from the remotest times.

Muhammad claimed descent from Ishmael. Although in the confusion of the Arab genealogies the names are lost beyond the twenty-first generation before the prophet, the claim is probable enough, since the pre-Muhammadan law of blood revenge, which required everyone to know his ancestors for four generations back, would prevent all confusion in regard to race. And, after making due allowance of mixture with Joktanites and Keturahites, we may fairly regard the Arabs as essentially an Ishmaelite race.

In 2 Sam. 17:25 Amasa, Absalom’s commander-in-chief, was the son of “Ithra the Israelite,” but in 1 Chron. 2:17 “the father of Amasa was Jether the Ishmaelite.” “Ishmaelite” is more likely the correct reading (so NIV), inasmuch as the fact of Amasa’s father being an Israelite would be too common to demand special mention. But, “according to Jardri, Jether was an Israelite, dwelling in the land of Ishmael, and thence acquired his surname, like the house of Obed-edom the Gittite.” Or, as there were Israelites who bore the name of Ishmael (see especially 1 Chron. 8:38; 9:44; also 2 Chron. 19:11; 23:1; Ezra 10:22; 2 Kings 25:23–25; Jer. 40:8, 14–16; 41:1–15), it might well be that Jether or Ithra was descended from some Israelite named Ishmael. W.H.

ISHMA’IAH (ish-ma’ya; “Jehovah hears,” or “Jehovah will hear”).

1. A Gibeonite, and one of the chiefs of the warriors who joined themselves to David when he was at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:4; “Ismaiah,” KJV), about 1000 B.C. He is called “a mighty man among the thirty, and over the thirty,” i.e., David’s bodyguard, but his name does not appear in the lists of the guard in 2 Sam. 23 or 1 Chron. 11. Possibly he was killed in some encounter before David reached the throne (Smith).

2. Son of Obadiah, and ruler of the tribe of Zebulun in the time of David (1 Chron. 27:19), 1000 B.C.

ISH’MEELITE. See Ishmaelite.

ISH’MERAİ (ish’mē-rī). One of the family of Elpaal, a chief Benjamite residing at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:18), before 588 B.C.

I’SHOD. See Ishhod.

ISH´PAH (ish´pa). One of the “sons” of Beriah, a chief Benjamite (originally from the neighborhood of Aijalon) living in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:16; “Ispah,” KJV), before 588 B.C.

ISH´PAN (ish´pan). One of the “sons” of Shashak, a chief Benjamite residing at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:22), before 588 B.C.

ISH-TOB. This proper name in the KJV of 2 Sam. 10:6, 8 is more correctly “men [from Heb. ish] of Tob.” See Tob.

ISH´UA, ISH´UAH. See Ishvah.

ISH´UAI. See Ishvi.

ISH´UI. See Ishvi.

ISH´VAH (ish´va). The second named of the sons of Asher (Gen. 46:17; “Ishuah,” KJV; 1 Chron. 7:30; “Isuah,” KJV). He appears to have left no descendents (cf. Num. 26:44).

ISH´VI (ish´vi).

1. The third son of Asher (Gen. 46:17; “Isui,” KJV; 1 Chron. 7:30; “Ishuai,” KJV), and founder of the Ishvites (Num. 26:44; “Jesui,” KJV).

2. The second named of Saul’s sons by Ahinoam (1 Sam. 14:49–50; “Ishui,” KJV). In the list of Saul’s genealogy, in 1 Chron. 8–9, his name is omitted. Some, therefore, claim that he died young. In 1 Sam. 31:2 his place is occupied by Abinadab, with whom others identify him.

ISLAND, ISLE. (Heb. islet). Although island is a word commonly found in KJV, the Heb. islet is usually rendered “coastlands” by the NASB and NIV; Isa. 11:11, where it is said that “the Lord will again recover ... the remnant of His people ... from the islands of the sea,” is an exception in the NASB and NIV. See Coastland.

ISMACHI´AH, or Ismaki´ah (is-ma-kī´a; “Jah will sustain”). One of the Levites charged by Hezekiah with overseeing the sacred offerings under the general direction of the high priest and others (2 Chron. 31:13), about 719 B.C.

ISMAKI´AH. See Ismachiah.

ISMA´IAH. See Ishmaiah.

IS´PAH. See Ishpah.

IS´RAEL (iz´rā-el; “having power with God, or God’s fighter”).

1. Jacob, the name conferred by the angel of Jehovah upon Jacob (which see) at Peniel (Gen. 32:28); “for you have striven with God and with men and have prevailed.”

2. Israelites, i.e., the whole people of Israel, the twelve tribes; called all Israel (Josh. 3:17; 7:25; Judg. 8:27) the sons of Israel (Jer. 3:21); the house of Israel (Ex. 16:31; 40:38); in Israel (1 Sam. 9:9); and the land of Israel (1 Sam. 13:19; 2 Kings 6:23). Sometimes the whole nation is represented as one person: “Israel is My son” (Ex. 4:22); My servant (Isa. 41:8, cf. 42:1; 44:1; 49:3); your brother (Num. 20:14). Cf. also Isa. 42:24; 43:1, 15; 44:5. Israel is sometimes put emphatically for the true Israelites, the faithful, those distinguished for piety and virtue (Ps. 73:1; Isa. 45:17; John 1:47; Rom. 9:6; 11:26; Gal. 6:16). In the expression (Isa. 49:3) “You are My Servant, Israel,” Christ is undoubtedly referred to.

Israelites was the name used for the twelve tribes, from their leaving Egypt until after the death of Saul, but after their defection, the ten tribes arrogated to themselves the name of the whole nation, Israel, i.e., the Northern Kingdom, in contrast with Judah, the Southern Kingdom (2 Sam. 2:9–10, 17, 28; 3:10, 17; 1 Kings 12:1; etc.). The kings of the ten tribes were called kings of Israel, and the descendants of David, who ruled over Judah and Benjamin, were known as kings of Judah; and in the prophets of that period Judah and Israel are put in opposition (Hos. 4:15; 5:3, 5; 6:10; 7:1; 8:8–9; Amos 1:1; 2:4–6; Mic. 1:5; Isa. 5:7). Yet in Isa. 8:14 the two kingdoms are called the “houses of Israel.”

After the Babylonian captivity the returned exiles, though mainly of Judah, resumed the name of Israel as the designation of their nation, but as individuals they are called Jews in the Apocrypha and NT. The expression “to all Israel in Judah and Benjamin” (2 Chron. 11:3) characterizes all who had remained true to the house of David as Israel, i.e., those who walked in the footsteps of their progenitor Israel (Jacob) (Keil, Com., ad loc.).

Israel is a term that seems to have been used to distinguish laymen from priests, Levites, and other ministers (Ezra 6:16; 9:1; Neh. 11:3).

ISRAEL, CLASSIFICATION. See Israel, Constitution of.

ISRAEL, CONSTITUTION OF. To properly understand this subject it must be remembered that the Israelites are sometimes spoken of as one of the nations, with a civil constitution, while at other times they are mentioned as the people adopted into covenant with Jehovah, when reference is made to the theocratic constitution.

The Civil Constitution. This had respect to the classification of the people, succession and right of inheritance (which see) land and property (which see).

Classification. The nation, in virtue of its descent from the twelve sons of Israel, formed a great family called “the house of Israel.” Genealogically it was divided (Josh. 7:14, 16–18) into:

1. Tribes (Heb. maṭṭeh, or shēbet, both meaning “branch,” the former term being applied to the tribe in its genealogical branches, the latter as being under one scepter). Tribal divisions are found among many ancient peoples, such as the Edomites, Ishmaelites, Arabs, etc. The Hebrew tribes were founded by the twelve sons of Jacob (which see) as the tribal fathers of the people. An exception to this rule was made in the case of Joseph’s sons Ephraim and Manasseh, they being raised to the position of heads of tribes, having been adopted by Israel as his sons (Gen. 48:5). This would make, strictly speaking, thirteen tribes, but only twelve are uniformly reckoned (see Ex. 24:4; Josh. 4:2; etc.), because Levi, as entrusted with the service of worship, occupied a mediatorial position between Jehovah and Israel; consequently no special tribal territory was allotted to them (13:14, 33), but they dwelt in towns scattered throughout all the other twelve tribes. When the Levites were so reckoned, Ephraim and Manasseh were included together as the tribe of Joseph (Num. 26:28; cf. v. 57; Josh. 17:14, 17). This tribal organization was still further established and completed by the giving of the land of Canaan to the Israelites according to their tribes, clans, and fathers’ houses. Such a firm root did this organization take that it survived the troublesome times of the judges and was not dissolved by the introduction of the monarchy. We find the heads of tribes exercising great influence on the election of kings (1 Sam. 8:4–5; 10:20–24; 2 Sam. 3:17; 5:1–3), consulted by them on all important state affairs (1 Kings 8:1; 20:7–8; 2 Kings 23:1), and sometimes asserting their influence with great energy (1 Kings 12). Though the tribal organization lost its firm basis with the carrying away of the people into exile, the elders maintained the internal administration and guidance of the people both in and after the Exile (Jer. 20:1; Ezek. 14:1; 20:1). In the prophetic vision that Israel had of the future condition of his sons (Gen. 49:3–28), he thus enumerates them: Reuben, the “first-born”; Simeon and Levi, “implements of violence”; Judah, whom his “brothers shall praise”; Zebulun, dwelling “at the seashore”; Issachar, “a strong donkey”; Dan, the “judge”; Gad, whom “raiders shall raid”; Asher, whose “food shall be rich”; Naphtali, a “doe let loose,” giving “beautiful words”; Joseph, “a fruitful bough”; Benjamin, “a ravenous wolf.” In this enumeration it is remarkable that the subsequent division of the tribe of Joseph into the two branches of Ephraim and Manasseh is not yet alluded to. Respecting the question of the territory occupied by the several tribes, see Land; Palestine.

2. Families or Clans (Heb. mishpāhôt, “circle of relatives”), the first subdivision under tribes, founded from the beginning by Jacob’s grandchildren (the sons of his own or adopted sons) and also by grandchildren and great-grandchildren of the twelve heads of the tribes. Of the fifty-seven families into which the twelve tribes were divided in the last year of their wilderness travels (Num. 26), two belonging to Judah were formed by his grandchildren (v. 21); to Manasseh one family founded by his grandson Gilead, and six by Gilead’s sons or Manasseh’s great-grandsons (vv. 29–34); to Ephraim, a family founded by his grandson Eran (v. 36); to Benjamin, two families by his grandchildren, the sons of Bela (v. 40); and to Asher, two families by his grandchildren, the sons of Beriah (v. 45). The principle according to which not only sons but grandsons and great-grandsons were raised to be founders of families is unknown.

3. Households (Heb. bayit, “house”; bêth-āb, “house of father”), a technical expression denoting the larger subdivisions or family groups into which the “families” (clans) fell. “Father’s house” also denotes that family having the primacy in every tribe or family, or that house belonging to the father of a tribe or his representative in each division of the people.

4. Men (Heb. geber, a “person”), fathers with wife and children.

Government. “According to patriarchal custom, the fathers, standing by right of birth (primogeniture) at the head of the several tribes and divisions of tribes, regulated the relations of the tribes and clans, directed their common affairs, settled disputes as they arose, punished offenses and crimes, and administered law and equity. By founding clans grandchildren were often put on an equality with sons; the heads of clans and fathers’ houses gradually attained to almost equal authority and standing with the heads of tribes, for each governed within his own circle, as far as was possible in that state of servitude to which the Israelites were gradually reduced in Egypt. Thus from the heads of tribes, clans, and families proceeded elders (which see), who, even before the time of Moses, formed the superiors of the people” (Keil, Arch., 2:312).

Theocratic Constitution. As we have already seen, the Israelites possessed the elements of a state in their tribal constitution, and it was not until their adoption into covenant with Jehovah, the Lord of the whole earth (Ex. 19:5), that they received through Moses the laws and ordinances for the kingdom that they were to establish in Canaan. This constitution is called a theocracy (Gk. theokratia, “rule of God”) and has its root in the peculiar relation into which Jehovah entered with the people of Israel, whom He chose to carry out His purposes of redemption (Ps. 44:4; Isa. 43:14–15). According to Keil (Arch., pp. 320–21), the theocracy “consists essentially in these three things: (a) God himself, as Lawgiver, orders or modifies the relations of the religious and common life of the people by immediate revelation given to Moses. (b) He takes into his own hand the control and government of the Israelitish state or kingdom, in that he is ever really present to his people, makes known his will in important state affairs by the Urim and Thummim, by prophets, and, when necessary, interposes in a miraculous way, judging, punishing, blessing. (c) Finally he raises up for the people the needed leaders and rulers, and furnishes them with the power required for their office. Thus all the human superiors of the Israelites were, in the strictest sense of the word, servants and representatives of God, who had only to carry out his law, to execute his will. The one Lord and sovereign as Jehovah, the covenant God, who, as Lawgiver, supreme Judge and Ruler of his people, united in himself all the powers constituting the state, and directed them by his servants.”

Under the theocracy we find that Jehovah called Moses to be the instrument of His will in the giving of the law; that the judicial power was entrusted to the leaders of the tribes and elders of the congregation (see Classification, above; Elders); the executive was held sometimes by the leaders of the tribes, sometimes by men called by Jehovah in extraordinary cases to lead and govern the people, and invested with sovereign power; the priesthood, with the high priest at its head, stood between the congregation or its individual members and Jehovah in religious matters; and, last, as a check to the overstraining of priestly power and to all hierarchal ambition, were the prophets, who, with divine authority and power, and without respect of persons, admonished all ranks to keep within the limits of the law.

ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF. An earthly kingdom was not incompatible with the theocracy (which see), if the kings submitted unconditionally to the will of Jehovah and, as earthly representatives of His sovereignty, wished only to execute His laws and judgments. It was not the original intention of Jehovah to leave His people as sheep without a shepherd, but to set over them a man who should lead them (Num. 27:16–17), as He gave them Moses and Joshua and afterward judges from Othniel to Samuel. Knowing that Israel would long for a king, God gave a promise to the patriarchs that “kings shall come forth from you” (Gen. 17:6, 16; 35:11); this promise was renewed by Moses (Deut. 28:36), along with a law given relating to the king (17:14–20), whereby the earthly kingdom was incorporated in the theocracy.

Law of Kingdom. This law (Deut. 17:14–20) does not prescribe an earthly kingdom but only arranges for such if desired by Israel. It provides that (1) one of their own people, and not a stranger, shall be chosen; (2) he shall not “multiply horses,” i.e., strengthen his power by a standing army; (3) “neither shall he multiply wives,” which would serve to gratify lust and give splendor to his court (cf. 1 Kings 11:3); (4) he shall carefully study the law, a copy of which was to be given him, and guide his rule by it. This law “of the kingdom” was proclaimed by Samuel, written “in the book and placed ... before the Lord” (1 Sam. 10:25).

Still further, the king set by Jehovah over His people was not a constitutional prince elected by the people, but was independent. He owed his selection to God, was dependent upon Him alone, and was bound to carry out the Mosaic law, and follow the will of Jehovah as made known by His prophets (1 Sam. 10:24; 13:13; 15:26, 28–29, 35; 16:1, 13). Thus Saul and afterward David were chosen by Jehovah to be princes over Israel, and anointed by Samuel to their office.

The kingdom was not firmly established under truly theocratic meaning by Saul. He unduly exalted himself and was rejected because of his opposition to the will of Jehovah (see Saul). David (which see), on the contrary, was always faithful to the theocratic idea and carefully watched over its institutions. Thus the earthly kingdom became the visible representation of Jehovah’s sovereignty over Israel.

The kingdom, although intended to be hereditary as among other peoples (Deut. 17:20; cf. 1 Sam. 13:13), first became so under David in virtue of the divine promise (2 Sam. 7:12–16). The law of succession was that the eldest, or firstborn, son followed his father on the throne (2 Chron. 21:3), though not without exceptions (2 Kings 23:34; 2 Chron. 11:22). If the successor was a minor, a regency intervened, or the queen mother acted as sovereign (1 Kings 15:13), or the high priest became guardian (2 Kings 12:2).

Administration. Kings, as “the Lord’s anointed,” were considered by the people to be holy persons (1 Sam. 24:6–10; 26:11, 16, 23; 2 Sam. 1:16) without being deified or becoming inaccessible to their subjects. In the highest cases of appeal they pronounced sentence personally (15:2; 1 Kings 3:9, 16–28), usually led the army in war (2 Sam. 5:6; etc.), and publicly arranged for and conducted festivals (1 Sam. 6; 1 Kings 8).

Officials. As a bodyguard the kings had the Cherethites (which see) and Pelethites (which see), who also executed the sentences pronounced by them (2 Sam. 15:18; 20:7; etc.). They were supported in their administration by many officials (1 Kings 4:2) who served as counselors. In 2 Sam. 8:16–18, 20:23–26, 1 Chron. 27:32–34, and 1 Kings 4:1–6 the following officials are named: (1) the head of the army, or commander-in-chief; (2) the commander of the Cherethites and Pelethites; (3) the recorder, probably the keeper of the state archives; (4) the secretary, or scribe; (5) the high priest; (6) privy counselors (Cohanim, or friends of the king), called also “chiefs at the king’s side” (1 Chron. 18:17), “elders who had served his father Solomon” (1 Kings 12:6), “the king’s advisors” (2 Kings 25:19; Jer. 52:25); (7) the overseers, or “deputies,” of public works (1 Kings 5:16); (8) those having charge of the royal storehouses, of agriculture, vineyards, flocks, herds, etc. (1 Chron. 27:25–31) besides deputies who acted as chief tax collectors (1 Kings 4:7–19); (9) the person placed over the deputies (v. 5). There were also the cupbearers (10:5), the keeper of the wardrobe (2 Kings 10:22), and inferior servants.

In addition, although at variance with the law, (Deut. 17:17), there were a large number of wives and concubines (2 Sam. 5:13; 1 Kings 11:3; 2 Chron. 11:21), who, on the death of the king, became the property of his successor (2 Sam. 12:8).

Revenue. Revenue was derived from the following sources: (1) voluntary gifts from subjects (1 Sam. 10:27; 16:20) and from foreign visitors (1 Kings 10:10, 25; 2 Chron. 32:23); (2) regular contributions made by subjects (1 Kings 4:7; cf. 1 Sam. 17:25, marg.); (3) tribute paid by subject peoples (2 Sam. 8:2; 2 Kings 3:4; Isa. 16:1); (4) the share of spoil taken in war (2 Sam. 8:10; 12:30); (5) the produce of the royal domains, i.e., of the fields, vineyards, flocks, etc. (1 Chron. 27:25–31; 2 Chron. 26:10), and the gain by commerce, etc. (1 Kings 10:11, 14–15, 22).

Continuance. Israel, as the legitimate kingdom, lasted until the destruction of the state by the Chaldeans, but the apostate ten tribes, revolting under the lead of Jeroboam, perished much earlier (see Chronology). Respecting Israel as a separate kingdom, see History, OT.

ISSACHAR (is’a-kar; “he will bring reward”). The name of the ninth son of Jacob (see article immediately below) and also the name of one of the Korahite Levites, who was the seventh son of Obed-edom and one of the gatekeepers of the house of the Lord (1 Chron. 26:5).

IS’SACHAR (is’a-kar; “he will bring reward”). The ninth son of Jacob and the fifth of Leah (Gen. 30:18), about 1925 B.C. He was born at Paddan-aram, and but little is recorded of him.

The Tribe of Issachar. At the descent into Egypt four sons are ascribed to Issachar; these sons founded the four chief families of the tribe (Gen. 46:13; Num. 26:23–25; 1 Chron. 7:1). The number of fighting men, when the census was taken at Sinai, was 54,400, ranking the tribe fifth (Num. 1:28–29); at the second census the number had increased to 64,300, ranking it third (26:25).

Position. Issachar’s place during the journey to Canaan was on the E of the Tabernacle, with his brothers Judah and Zebulun (2:3–8). At this time the captain of the tribe was Nethanel the son of Zuar (1:8). He was succeeded by Igal the son of Joseph, who went as one of the spies (13:7), and he again by Paltiel the son of Azzan, who assisted Joshua in apportioning the land of Canaan (34:26).

Territory. The allotment of Issachar lay above that of Manasseh. The specification of its boundaries and contents is contained in Josh. 19:17–23.

Subsequent History. Jacob’s prophecy “Issachar is a strong donkey, lying down between the sheepfolds. When he saw that a resting place was good . . . he bowed his shoulder to bear burdens, and became a slave at forced labor” (Gen. 49:14–15) was fulfilled by Issachar’s paying tribute to the various marauding tribes attracted to its territory by the richness of the crops.

ISSHI’AH (is-shī’a; “lent by Jehovah”). The name of three men.

1. One of the sons of Izrahiah, and a great-great-grandson of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:3). The KJV renders “Ishiah.”

2. The first of the sons of Rehabiah, and great-grandson of Moses (1 Chron. 24:21; cf. 26:25, where he is called Jeshaiah).

3. The second son of Uzziel (grandson of Levi), and father of Zechariah (1 Chron. 23:20; “Jesiah,” KJV; 24:25).

ISSHI’JAH (ish-ī’ja; Heb. same as above). One of the “sons” of Harim, who renounced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:31; “Ishijah,” KJV and NIV), 456 B.C.

ISSUE.

1. In Isa. 22:24 this term carries the meaning of anything ignoble, worthless, and is applied to the large and hitherto ignoble family of Eliakim, who would “hang on him all the glory of his father’s house.”

2. The emission of a horse (stallion), to whom the idolatrous paramours of Judah are compared (Ezek. 23:20).

3. In the KJV, the term has the meaning of offspring (Gen. 48:6; Matt. 22:25), as it is rendered in NASB. The NIV translates “children.”

4. A KJV term used medically to describe hemorrhage (Lev. 12:7; Matt. 9:20) and other discharges (Lev. 15:2) rendering the victims unclean. See Diseases.

IS’UAH. See Ish’vah.

IS’UI. See Ishvi, no. 1.

ITAL’IAN (ital’i-an; “of or from Italy,” Acts 10:1). This only mention of the name in Scripture is in connection with the cohort to which Cornelius belonged. It was probably composed of Italians separate from the legionary soldiers and not of the Italian Legion.

IT’ALY (it’a-li). The name occurs five times in Scripture (Acts 18:2; 27:1, 6; Heb. 13:24). From these passages we have testimony respecting the Jewish colony in Italy, the commerce between it and Asia, and the Testament denotes the whole natural peninsula between the Alps and the Straits of Messina.

ITCH. See Diseases.

ITH’AI (ith’ī; 1 Chron. 11:31). See Ittai.

ITH’AMAR (ith’a-mar; “palm-coast,” Gesenius). The fourth and youngest son of Aaron (Ex. 6:23; Num. 3:2; 1 Chron. 6:3), before 1440 B.C. He was consecrated to the priesthood along with his brothers (Num. 3:3); after the death of Nadab and Abihu, who left no children (3:4), he and Eleazar took the places they had held in the priestly office (Lev. 10:6, 12; Num. 3:4; 1 Chron. 24:2). We learn nothing more of Ithamar, save that the property of the Tabernacle (the curtains, hangings, pillars, cords, and boards) was under his charge (Ex. 38:21) and that he superintended its removal by the Gershonites and Merarites (Num. 4:28, 33). Ithamar and his descendants occupied the position of common priests until the high priesthood passed into his family in the person of Eli, under circumstances of which we are ignorant. Abiathar, whom Solomon deposed, was the last high priest of that line, and the pontificate reverted to the elder line of Eleazar in the person of Zadok (1 Kings 2:27, 35). A priest by the name of Daniel, of Ithamar's posterity, returned from Babylon (Ezra 8:2).

ITH'IEL (ith'i-el; perhaps, "God with me").

1. The son of Jeshaiiah and father of Maaseiah, a Benjamite, one of whose posterity returned from Babylon (Neh. 11:7), long before 536 B.C.

2. A person mentioned along with Ucal in Prov. 30:1, to whom the words of Agur's prophecy were addressed.

ITH'LAH (ith'la; "a hanging of lofty place"). A city on the borders of the tribe of Dan, mentioned only in Josh. 19:42 ("Jethlah," KJV). It is probably Beithul, three miles E of Yalo (Aijalon).

ITH'MAH (ith'ma; bereavement, "orphan-hood"). A Moabite and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:46), 950 B.C.

ITH'NAN (ith'nan). One of the cities of S Judah (Josh. 15:23), not identified.

ITH'RA (ith'ra). An Israelite (but more correctly an Ishmaelite, according to 1 Chron. 2:17, where he is called Jether), and father of Amasa (David's general) by Abigail, David's sister (2 Sam. 17:25; 1 Kings 2:5), before 1000 B.C. The NIV renders the name as Jether in all three passages.

ITH'RAM (ith'ran; "abundance, excellence").

1. One of the sons of Dishon, grandson of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:26; cf. v. 30; 1 Chron. 1:41).

2. One of the sons of Zophah, the great-grandson of Asher (1 Chron. 7:37). Perhaps the same as Jether in v. 38.

ITH'REAM (ith're-am; "residue of the people"). David's sixth son, born of Eglah at Hebron (2 Sam. 3:5; 1 Chron. 3:3), about 1000 B.C.

ITH'RITE (ith'rīt). The descendants of a Jether living in Kiriath-jearim (1 Chron. 2:53). Two of David's mighty men, Ira and Gareb (11:40; 2 Sam. 23:38), belonged to the family of Jether (which see).

IT'TAH-KA'ZIN. See Eth-kazin.

IT'TAI (it'i).

1. "Ittai the Gittite," i.e., a native of Gath, a Philistine in the army of David who first appeared on the morning of David's flight from Absalom and Jerusalem. The king saw him coming with those who remained faithful, and recognizing him as "a foreigner and also as an exile," and as one who had but recently joined his service, urged him to return and not ally himself to a doubtful cause. But Ittai declared, "As the Lord lives, and as my lord the king lives, surely wherever my lord the king may be, whether for death or for life, here also your servant will be." He was allowed to proceed and passed over the Kedron with the king and his company (2 Sam. 15:18–23), 970 B.C. When David organized and numbered the army at Mahanaim, Ittai was given command of a third part of the force, and seems to have enjoyed equal rank with Joab and Abishai (18:2, 5, 12).

2. The son of Ribai, a Benjamite of Gibeah, one of David's thirty mighty men (2 Sam. 23:29; the NIV reads "Ithai"). In the parallel list of 1 Chron. 11:31 the name is given as Ithai.

ITURAE'A, ITURE'A (it-ū-rî'a). A small province on the northeastern border of Palestine, lying along the base of Mt. Hermon and a portion of the tetrarchy of Philip (Luke 3:1). It lies NE of the Sea of Galilee, E of the sources of the Jordan River.

Jetur, the son of Ishmael, gave his name, like the rest of his brethren, to the little province he colonized (see Gen. 25:15–16). Ituraea, with the adjoining provinces, fell into the hands of a chief called Zenodorus; but about 20 B.C. they were taken from him by the Roman emperor and given to Herod the Great, who bequeathed them to his son Philip (see Luke 3:1). Caligula gave Ituraea to Herod Agrippa I. When Herod Agrippa died, Ituraea was incorporated into the province of Syria under procurators.

I'VAH. See Ivvah.

IVORY. Imported into Tyre by "sons of Dedan" (Ezek. 27:15) and "ships of Tarshish" (1 Kings 10:22), ivory was used in ornamenting houses, constructing furniture, etc., as in the present day in the East. "Ivory tusks" are mentioned in Ezek. 27:15.

A considerable amount of ivory has been found in Near Eastern excavations. For example, at Megiddo in a stratum dating to the thirteenth century B.C. Canaanite carvings of figurines, plaques, combs, and small boxes came to light. Innumerable pieces of ivory used for inlay were found in the excavation of Samaria, illustrating Amos's condemnation of the luxury of the place. Excavations at Calah (Nimrud) turned up a fine collection of carved ivory pieces produced in the Assyrian Empire during the ninth century B.C.

The Canaanites, Phoenicians, and Syrians were especially skilled in the carving of ivory and the use of it in inlay. Their sources of supply were the elephant herds of the upper Euphrates region and, by trade, Africa and India. Hiram of Tyre and Solomon cooperated in commercial ventures launched from Ezion-geber to Ophir through the Red Sea. Their ships returned with ivory in their holds (cf. 1 Kings 9:26–28; 10:22; and 2 Chron. 9:21). H.F.V.

IV'VAH (ī'va). One of the cities of the Assyrians (2 Kings 18:33–34; 19:13; Isa. 37:13) from which they brought colonists to repopulate Samaria (2 Kings 17:24, where it is rendered Avva, [which see]; the KJV is "Ava").

IVY. See Vegetable Kingdom.

I'YE-ABARIM (ī'ye-ab'a-rim; "ruins of Abarim"). The forty-seventh station of the Israelites in the wilderness, "at the border of Moab" (Num. 33:44; "Ije-abarim," KJV) or "opposite Moab, to the east" (21:11; "toward the sunrising," KJV).

I'YIM (ī'yim). A contracted form (Num. 33:45; "Iim," KJV) of Iye-abarim (which see).

IZ'EHARITES. See Izharites.

IZ'HAR (iz'har; "anointing").

1. The son of Helah, wife of Ashhur, the father (founder) of Tekoa (1 Chron. 4:7; "Jezoar," KJV; "Zohar," NIV).

2. The second son of Kohath, the son of Levi and father of Korah (Ex. 6:18, 21; Num. 3:19; 16:1; 1 Chron. 6:2, 18, 38; 23:12, 18). His descendants are called Izharites (which see), about 1440 B.C.

IZ'HARITES (iz'har-its). A family of Kohathite Levites descended from Izhar the son of Kohath (Num. 3:27; 1 Chron. 24:22; 26:23, 29).

IZLI'AH (izlī'a; cf. Arab. yazalīy, “eternal; unceasing”). One of the “sons” of Elpaal, and apparently a chief Benjamite living in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:18; “Jezliah,” KJV); probably about 588 B.C.

IZRAHI'AH (iz-ra-hī'a; “Jehovah will bring forth”). The son of Uzzi and great-grandson of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:3).

IZ'RAHITE (iz'ra-hīt). A patronymic epithet of Shamhuth, one of David's commanders (1 Chron. 27:8); probably so called as being descended from Zerah, Judah's son.

IZ'RI (iz'ri; the “Jezerites”). The leader of the fourth division of Levitical singers under David (1 Chron. 25:11); probably the same as Zeri (which see), of the sons of Jeduthun, mentioned in v. 3, 1000 B.C.

IZZI'AH (iz-ī'a; “whom Jehovah sprinkles”). An Israelite of the “sons” of Parosh, who put away his Gentile wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:25; “Jeziah,” KJV), 456 B.C.

J

JA'AKAN (ja'a-kan). The son of Ezer and grandson of Seir (1 Chron. 1:42; "Jakan," KJV). The ancestor of the Bene-jaakan, around whose well the children of Israel encamped after they left Moseroth (Num. 33:30–32) and again in a reverse direction after they left Kadesh-barnea, before they reached Mt. Hor or Moserah (Deut. 10:6), before 1440 B.C. In Gen. 36:27 the name appears in the simple form Akan.

JAA'KANITES. See Jaakan.

JAAKO'BAH (ja-a-kō'ba; another form of Jacob). One of the prosperous descendants (nšūm, "princes") of Simeon that emigrated to the valley of Gedor in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:36), about 710 B.C.

JA'ALA (jā'a-la; "wild goat"). One of "Solomon's servants," whose descendants (or perhaps a place whose former inhabitants) returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:58); called (by the KJV and the NASB) in the parallel passage (Ezra 2:56) by the equivalent name Jaalah, before 536 B.C.

JA'ALAH (ja'a-la; Ezra 2:56). See Jaala.

JA'ALAM. See Jalam.

JAANAI. See Janai.

JA'AR (jā'ar). According to the NIV margin of Ps. 132:6, a short form of Kirjath-Jearim (which see).

JA'ARE-OR'EGIM (ja'a-rā-ōr'e-jim). The father of Elhanan (which see), a Bethlehemite, who killed Goliath the Gittite (2 Sam. 21:19), but in 1 Chron. 20:5 it is stated that "Elhanan the son of Jair killed Lahmi the brother of Goliath." The reading in Chronicles is probably the correct one, the word Oregim having crept in from the next line through oversight of the copyist.

JAARESHI'AH (ja'a-re-shi'a; origin uncertain). One of the "sons" of Jeroham, a chief man of the Benjamites residing at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:27).

JAA'SIEL (ja-a'si-el; "God makes").

1. A Mezobaite and one of David's bodyguards (1 Chron. 11:47); about 1000 B.C.

2. The son of Abner and leader of the tribe of Benjamin in the time of David (1 Chron. 27:21). He is identified by some with no. 1.

JA'ASU (ja'a-su; "they will do"). An Israelite of the "sons" of Bani who renounced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:37), 456 B.C.

KJV King James Version

NASB New American Standard Bible

NIV New International Version

JAAZANI'AH (ja-az-a-ni'a; "Jehovah hears").

1. The son of Jeremiah (not the prophet) and a chief man of the Rechabites, whom the prophet tested as to their obedience to Jonadab, their founder, by offering them wine (Jer. 35:3–19), 606 B.C.

2. A Maacathite, son of Hoshaiiah, and one of the "captains" who accompanied Johanan when he paid his respects to Gedaliah at Mizpah (2 Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8) and after his assassination asked for Jeremiah's advice (42:1). He appears to have assisted Johanan in recovering the prey from Ishmael (41:11–16) and to have gone to Egypt with the rest (43:4–5). In Jer. 40:8; 42:1 the name is changed to Jezaniah. He is doubtless the person called Azariah in Jer. 43:2, 588 B.C.

3. The son of Shaphan and leader of the seventy elders of Israel, seen by Ezekiel in his vision offering idolatrous worship at Jerusalem (Ezek. 8:11), 592 B.C.

4. The son of Azzur, one of the leaders among the twenty-five men seen (in a vision) by Ezekiel at the E gate of the Temple devising mischief and giving "evil advice" (Ezek. 11:1–2), 592 B.C.

JA'AZER. See Jazer.

JAAZI'AH (ja-a-zī'a; "comforted by Jehovah"). Apparently the third son or descendant of Merari the Levite and founder of an independent house in that family (1 Chron. 24:26–27). Neither he nor his descendants are mentioned elsewhere (see 23:21–23; Ex. 6:19). The word Beno, which follows Jaaziah, should probably be translated "his son," i.e., the son of Merari (McC. and S.).

JAA'ZIEL (ja-a'zi-el; "comforted by God"). A Levitical musician among those of the "second rank" (1 Chron. 15:18); the same as the Aziel who was one of those "with harps tuned to alamoah" (v. 20), after 1000 B.C.

JA'BAL (jā'bal). The son of Lamech and Adah and the brother of Jubal (Gen. 4:20–21). He is described as "the father of those who dwell in tents and have livestock." This obviously means that Jabal was the first to adopt the nomadic life still followed by many Arabian and Tartar tribes in Asia.

JAB'BOK (jab'ok). A stream E of the Jordan, which empties into that river nearly midway between the Dead Sea and the Sea of Galilee, or about forty-five miles S of the latter. Its headwaters rise on the edge of Moab, only about eighteen miles E of the Jordan. The river flows at first toward the desert under the name of Ammân, past Rabbath-Ammon; there turns N, fetches a wide compass NW, cuts the Gilead range in two, and flows in a very winding channel WSW to the Jordan. Its whole course, counting its windings, is over sixty miles. It is shallow and always fordable, except where it breaks between steep rocks. Its valley is fertile and has always been a frontier and a line of traffic. It was once the border of the Ammonites (Num. 21:24; Deut. 2:37; 3:16) and afterward became the boundary between the kingdoms of Sihon and Og (Josh. 12:2, 5). The earliest notice of it precedes the accounts of the mysterious struggle of Jacob with Jehovah and the interview with his brother, Esau (Gen. 32:22), both of which took place on Jabbok's southern bank. The Jabbok is now called Zerka, "the blue river."

JA'BESH (ja'bish; "dry, parched").

1. The father of Shallum (which see) who killed Zechariah, king of Israel, and reigned only a month (2 Kings 15:10, 13–14), before 742 B.C.

2. The short form of Jabesh-gilead (which see).

JA BESH-GIL EAD (ja-besh-gil'e-ad; "Jabesh of Gilead"). A town of Gilead beyond Jordan, a night's journey from Bethshan (1 Sam. 31:11; 2 Sam 2:4) and lying within the territory assigned to the eastern half tribe of Manasseh (Num. 32:29, 40). Its inhabitants were severely punished because they did not respond to the call against Benjamin (Judg. 21:8–14), every man being put to the sword and 400 virgins being given to the Benjamites.

The city survived the loss of its males and is next heard from as being besieged by Nahash the Ammonite. He offered to spare its inhabitants if they would agree to have their right eyes put out (to render them unfit for military service). Being allowed seven days to ratify the treaty, they appealed to Saul, who raised a large army and defeated the Ammonites (1 Sam. 11:1–11).

This service was gratefully remembered, and when Saul and his sons were slain on Mt. Gilboa (1 Sam. 31:8) the men of Jabesh, after a night march, took down their corpses, burned them, and buried their ashes "under the tamarisk tree at Jabesh" (v. 13). For this act David sent his blessing (2 Sam. 2:5).

Its site is not defined in Scripture. Josephus (Ant. 6.5.1) calls Jabesh the metropolis of Gilead. Robinson (Bib. Res., p. 320) supposed it to be the ruins of ed-Deir in the Wadi Yabis.

Nelson Glueck however, located it about ten miles SE of Bethshan on twin mounds, Tell el-Meqbereh and Tell Abu Kharaz, on the Wadi Yabis (Jabesh) flowing into the Jordan S of the Sea of Galilee.

JA BEZ (ja'bez; "son of pain").

1. A descendant of Judah, but of what family is not apparent. The only mention made of him is this remarkable account: "And Jabez was more honorable than his brothers, and his mother named him Jabez saying, 'Because I bore him with pain.' Now Jabez called on the God of Israel, saying, 'Oh that Thou wouldst bless me indeed, and enlarge my border, and that Thy hand might be with me, and that Thou wouldst keep me from harm, that it may not pain me! And God granted him what he requested'" (1 Chron. 4:9–10). Keil (Com., ad loc.) supposes that this is a record of a vow made by Jabez, the conditions only being given. "The reason of this is, probably, that the vow had acquired importance sufficient to make it worthy of being handed down only from God's having so fulfilled his wish that his life became a contradiction of his name, the son of pain having been free from pain in life, and having attained to greater happiness and reputation than his brothers."

2. A place inhabited by "the families of scribes" (1 Chron. 2:55), apparently in Judah. It is not mentioned anywhere else.

JA BIN (ja'bin; "he [God] understands"). Probably a royal title at Hazor, like Agag among the Amalekites.

1. A king of Hazor who organized a confederacy of the northern kings against the Israelites. These assembled with their hosts near the waters of Merom, where Joshua surprised this vast army and overthrew it. He then took Hazor and killed Jabin (Josh. 11:1–14), about 1370 B.C.

2. Another king of Hazor and probably a descendant of the former. He is called "king of Canaan" (Judg. 4:2) in distinction from the kings of other nations, such as Moab, Mesopotamia, etc. (Keil, Com.). He seems to have had unusual power, as he is credited with 900 iron chariots. The idolatry of the Israelites lost them divine protection, they became subject to Jabin, who "oppressed the sons of Israel severely for twenty years" (4:3). From this they were delivered by the great victory won by Barak over the forces of Jabin, commanded by Sisera (vv. 3–16), about 1215–1195 B.C. The war still continued until it ended in the overthrow of Jabin. His name is mentioned in Ps. 83:9.

JAB'NEEL (jab'nîl; “God builds, causes to build”).

1. A town on the northern boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:11), probably the same as Jabneh (which see). Known as Jamnia during the Hellenistic period, it was renamed Ibelin by the Crusaders and is the modern Israeli town of Yebna. At this site in A.D. 90 a Jewish assembly met to make decisions concerning the canon.

2. A city on the border of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33), probably the modern Yemma, about four miles SW of the Sea of Galilee. H.F.V.

JAB'NEH (jab'ne; “he [God] causes to be built”). Probably the same as Jabneel no. 1, a point on the northern boundary of Judah between Mt. Baalah and the Mediterranean Sea. There was a constant struggle between the Danites and the Philistines, and it is not surprising that we find Jabneh in the hands of the latter. Uzziah captured this place along with Gath and Ashdod (2 Chron. 26:6). Josephus calls it Jamnia. It still exists as a good-sized village under the name of Jebuah, about two miles from the sea, seven miles S of Joppa.

JA'CAN (ja'kan). One of seven chief Gadite “kinsmen” living in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:13).

JA'CHIN, JA'KIN (ja'kin; “he [God] establishes”).

1. The fourth son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Ex. 6:15), called Jarib in 1 Chron. 4:24. He was the founder of the Jachinites (Num. 26:12).

2. One of the priests residing in Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:10; Neh. 11:10).

3. Head of the twenty-first division of priests in the time of David (1 Chron. 24:17).

4. Jachin and Boaz were the names of two pillars of bronze set in the porch of Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 7:15–22; 2 Chron. 3:17). See Temple. It has been convincingly shown that the names of these two columns stood for the initial words of dynastic oracles that were inscribed upon them (R. B. Y. Scott, Journal of Biblical Literature 58 [1939]: 143f.; cf. Paul Garber, Biblical Archaeologist [Feb. 1951]: 8f.). The Jachin formula may have been, “Yahweh will establish (yakin) thy throne forever,” or something similar, and the “Boaz” oracle may have run, “In Yahweh is the king's strength.” Frequently Jachin and Boaz have been interpreted as sacred obelisks similar to those erected beside great Egyptian temples at Thebes and Heliopolis or beside the temple of Melcarth at Tyre. This view is possible, since Solomon did, apparently, make concessions to the architectural fads of his day. Sometimes they have been viewed as stylized trees or again as cosmic pillars, like the Pillars of Hercules. The best interpretation seems to be that put forth by Robertson Smith, who viewed them as “gigantic cressets or fire altars.” W. F. Albright adopted Robertson Smith's essential view that Jachin and Boaz were immense fire altars, adducing proof from the painted tombs of Marisa in southern Palestine, where similar incense burners appear. Albright presented added evidence from the Egyptian Djed Pillar, a sacred emblem of Osiris that bears certain affinities to these structures. The most important fact is that each of the shafts of the two pillars is represented as being crowned with an oil basin or a lampstand, Heb. gūllâ (1 Kings 7:41; cf. Zech. 4:3) (W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel, pp. 144–48; id., Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 85 [1942]: 18–27). Thus imitating Phoenician models, these immense incense stands illuminated the facade of the Temple. They doubtless caught the first glint of the Jerusalem sunrise or were wrapped in mists of the Kidron Valley. With their blazing, smoking wicks, they recalled to worshipers the fiery, cloudy pillar that led Israel of old through the wilderness. The N Syrian shrine uncovered at Tell Tainat, like Solomon's edifice, had two columns situated at its portico. Such pillars flanking the main entrance of temples were common in Syria, Phoenicia, and Cyprus in the first millennium B.C. Spreading eastward, they came into vogue in Assyria. They are to be found in Sargon's temple at Khorsabad, late eighth century B.C., and westward to the Phoenician colonies in the western Mediterranean. (See Boaz.) M.F.U.

JACOB (ja'kob). The name of the father of Joseph the husband of Mary the mother of Jesus (Matt. 1:15–16), before 40 B.C.; and of the patriarch (see article below).

JA'COB (ja'kob; "heel-catcher, supplanter"; by popular etymology, but perhaps "he whom God protects," from Arab. and Ethiopic akaba, "guard, keep").

The second born of the twin sons of Isaac and Rebekah, their conception being supernatural in answer to Isaac's prayer. Jacob was born when his father was sixty years old, probably at Beer-lahai-roi (Gen. 25:21–26; cf. v. 11), about 2001 B.C.

Personal History. It is recorded that Jacob grew up to be "a peaceful man, living in tents," preferring the quiet of a homelife to the active, dangerous career of a hunter. He was the favorite of his mother, whereas Isaac showed partiality toward Esau.

Buys Esau's Birthright. The first incident mentioned is his purchase of Esau's birthright for the paltry sum of a pot of stew, thus making use of his brother's hunger to advance his own interests. "The birthright consisted afterward in a double portion of the father's inheritance (Deut. 21:17); but with the patriarchs it embraced the chieftainship, rule over the brethren and the entire family (Gen. 27:29), and the title to the blessing of promise (27:4, 27–29), which included the future possession of Canaan and of covenant fellowship with Jehovah (28:4)" (K. & D., Com.).

Obtains Isaac's Blessing. Isaac, now aged, was about to pronounce his blessing upon Esau, his elder son, but was thwarted by the deception practiced upon him by Rebekah and Jacob. Jacob impersonated Esau and added direct falsehood to the fraud. Thus Jacob received his father's blessing (27:1–29).

Flight from Esau. Esau hated his brother because of his deception and its success and resolved to slay him, only delaying until a sufficient time after the probably near death of his father. Rebekah, informed of Esau's purpose, advised Jacob to flee to her brother Laban in Haran, obtaining Isaac's consent by saying that she wished Jacob to marry one of his kinswomen and not a daughter of Canaan. Isaac blessed Jacob again and sent him away (27:41–28:5). Jacob's age is arrived at as follows: Joseph was thirty years old when introduced to Pharaoh, and, allowing for seven years of plenty and two of famine (45:6), Joseph was 39 years old when Jacob went to Egypt, at which time Jacob was 130 years of age. Therefore Joseph was born before Jacob was 91. His birth occurred in the fourteenth year of Jacob's sojourn in Mesopotamia (30:25; 29:18, 21, 27), which would mean Jacob's flight took place in his seventy-seventh year.

Dream at Bethel. On his journey to Laban he stopped at Luz for the night and was given the vision of the ladder and the ascending and descending angels. God there confirmed to him the promises given to his fathers and promised him protection on his journey and a safe return to his home. In recognition of the divine presence Jacob called the place Bethel and made a vow dedicating to Jehovah a tenth of all God gave him (28:10–22). See Ladder.

Serves Laban. Arriving at Haran, Jacob met Rachel, Laban’s daughter, by whom Jacob’s coming was made known to her father. After a month Laban inquired what wages Jacob desired for his services, and he asked for Rachel on the condition of seven years’ service. At the expiration of the time, which seemed to Jacob “but a few days because of his love for her,” Laban availed himself of the customs of the country and substituted his elder daughter, Leah, for Rachel. Upon the discovery of the deception, Laban excused himself saying: “It is not the practice in our place, to marry off the younger before the first-born.” Another seven years’ service gained for Jacob his beloved Rachel. Leah became the mother of Jacob’s firstborn, Reuben, and three other sons, Simeon, Levi, and Judah, following in succession. Rachel, having borne no children, gave to Jacob her maid, Bilhah, who bore Dan and Naphtali. Two other sons, Gad and Asher, were born of Leah’s maid, Zilpah. Leah then bore two more sons, Issachar and Zebulun, and a daughter, Dinah. At length Rachel became the mother of a son, whom she called Joseph (29:1–30:24). A number of years later Benjamin was born. (See table 19, “The Children of Jacob.”) After Jacob’s fourteen years had expired he was induced by Laban to remain six years longer, and, by a hardly honorable artifice, he increased greatly in wealth. This displeased Laban, so that a separation was deemed advisable (30:25–31:16).

Flees from Laban. Gathering together his family and property, he set out for Canaan, about 1900 B.C. On the third day Laban learned of Jacob’s departure and followed after him but was warned by God not to hinder his return. After much reproach and recrimination peace was restored, and Laban returned to his home (31:17–55). Shortly after the departure of Laban, Jacob met a company of angels and called the place, in honor of them, Manhanaim (“two hosts”).

News from Esau. Jacob sent messengers to Esau with a friendly greeting. They returned with word that his brother was on the way to meet him with 400 men. Greatly alarmed and distressed, he divided his people, with the flocks and herds, into two companies, so that if one was attacked the other might escape. Jacob also prepared a present for Esau, sending it ahead; hoping thus to pacify his brother (32:1–23).

Wrestling. Then came a night of prayer, during which the angel of the Lord wrestled with him. In attestation of his power with God, through faith, his name was changed from Jacob to Israel (“wrestler with God”). His request, that he might know the name of the person with whom he wrestled, was denied him, but Jacob named the place Peniel, “the face of God” (32:24–30).

Reconciled to Esau. In the morning Jacob saw Esau approaching with his army and sent forward first his women servants, then Leah and her children, and last Rachel and Joseph. Esau’s bitter feelings gave way at the sight of his brother, his liberal gifts, and earnest entreaties. They embraced as brothers, and, for all we know, maintained friendly relations for the rest of their lives. Jacob remained for a while on the other side of Jordan, at Succoth. He then came to Shechem, camped there, and, purchasing a plot of ground, “erected there an altar, and called it El-Elohe-Israel,” i.e., “Mighty one, God of Israel” (33:1–20). Here is located “Jacob’s well” (John 4:6).

Goes to Bethel. Having been brought into collision with the people of Shechem because of the violation of Dinah and the revenge taken by her brothers, Jacob was commanded to go and dwell in Bethel. He took the strange gods found in his family and buried them “under the oak which was near Shechem.” There God appeared to Jacob again and blessed him, renewing the Abrahamic covenant (Gen. 34:1–35:15).

Bereavement. While journeying from Bethel to Ephrath his beloved wife Rachel died giving birth to her second son, Benjamin (35:20). Not long after that Jacob lost his beloved son Joseph, who was sold by his brothers to Midianite traders (chap. 37).

Egypt. With the great famine predicted by Joseph being felt in Canaan, Jacob sent his sons down into Egypt to purchase grain. He retained Benjamin, his youngest son, afraid that harm might come to him. His sons returned with a good supply of food and told him that they had been taken for spies and could only disprove the charge by carrying Benjamin to the “lord of the land.” Jacob’s credulity was greatly tested when his sons came home the second time with the news that “Joseph is still alive.” Convinced, however, of the truth of their story, he decided to go and see him before he died. On his way he was encouraged by a vision at Beersheba. He came to Egypt and was affectionately received by Joseph (chaps. 42–46), about 1871 B.C. Joseph presented his father to Pharaoh, and he and his family located in Goshen (42:1–47:1-12). This pharaoh was doubtless one of the powerful rulers of the splendid Twelfth Dynasty (2000–1780 B.C.).

Death. After living seventeen years in Egypt “the time for Israel to die drew near,” and, calling Joseph to him, Jacob acquainted him with the divine promise of the land of Canaan and took from him a pledge that he would bury him with his fathers. He then adopted Joseph’s sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, as his own and pronounced his benediction upon his sons. And when Jacob had finished blessing his sons, he “drew his feet into the bed and breathed his last” (49:33), dying at the ripe age of 147 (47:27–49:33) about 1854 B.C. His body was embalmed, carried with great care and pomp into the land of Canaan, and deposited with his fathers and his wife Leah in the cave of the field of Machpelah (50:1–13). His descendants were led out from Egypt by Moses and entered Canaan under the leadership of Joshua. The twelve tribes of which the nation was composed were named after his sons, with the exception that Joseph was represented by his sons Ephraim and Manasseh. The list of Jacob’s descendants (46:8–27) was probably made up at the time of his death, as we find mentioned sons of Benjamin, who was a mere youth when he went to Egypt.

Scripture References. “Hosea, in the latter days of the kingdom, seeks (12:3–4, 12) to convert the descendants of Jacob from their state of alienation from God, by recalling to their memory the repeated acts of God’s favor shown to their ancestor. And Malachi (1:2) strengthens the desponding hearts of the returned exiles by assuring them that the love which God bestowed upon Jacob was not withheld from them. Besides the frequent mention of his name in conjunction with those of the other two patriarchs, there are distinct references to events in the life of Jacob in four books of the history of Jacob’s birth to prove that the favor of God is independent of the order of natural descent. In Heb. 12:16, and 11:21, the transfer of the birthright and Jacob's dying benediction are referred to. His vision at Beth-el and his possession of land at Shechem are cited in John 1:51, and 4:5, 12. And Stephen in his speech (Acts 7:12, 16) mentions the famine which was the means of restoring Jacob to his lost son in Egypt, and the burial of the patriarch in Shechem" (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

Character. Jacob appears to have inherited the gentle, quiet, and retiring character of his father along with a selfishness and a prudence that approached cunning. These showed themselves in his reprehensible deception of his father, his dealings with Esau, and the means that he employed to make his bargain with his uncle (Laban) work to his own enrichment. We must remember, however, that he was accustomed to caution and restraint in the presence of a more vigorous brother, that he was secretly stimulated by a belief that God designed for him some superior blessing, that he was compelled to leave home to preserve his life, and that he was obliged to cope with an avaricious and crafty uncle. But "God revived the promise over which he had brooded for sixty years, since he learned it in childhood from his mother. Angels conversed with him. Gradually he felt more and more the watchful care of an ever-present spiritual Father. Face to face he wrestled with the representative of the Almighty. And so, even though the moral consequences of his early transgressions hung about him, and saddened him with a deep knowledge of all the evil of treachery, and domestic envy, and partial judgment, and filial disobedience, yet the increasing revelations of God enlightened the old age of the patriarch; and at last the timid 'supplanter,' the man of subtle devices, waiting for the salvation of Jehovah dies, the 'soldier of God,' uttering the messages of God to his remote posterity" (Smith, Bib. Dict.).

Figurative. The "God of Jacob" (Ex. 3:6; 4:5; 2 Sam. 23:1; Ps. 20:1; Isa. 2:3); simply "Jacob" (Ps. 24:6) where the term ʾēlōhê, God, appears to have been dropped from the text, and "Mighty One of Jacob" (132:2), are titles of Jehovah as the national deity. For the house or family of Jacob, i.e., the Israelites, we have the "house of Jacob" (Ex. 19:3; Isa. 2:5-6; 8:17; etc.), "offspring of Jacob" (Isa. 45:19), "descendants of Jacob" (Jer. 33:26), "sons of Jacob" (1 Kings 18:31; Mal. 3:6), "assembly of Jacob" (Deut. 33:4), and simply "Jacob" (Num. 23:7, 10, 23; 24:5, 17, 19; etc.), and the expression "in Jacob" (Gen. 49:7; Lam. 2:3), i.e., among the Jewish people.

Archaeological Light. The Nuzi Letters, excavated 1925-41 on the ancient site of Nuzi, SE of Nineveh, shed great light on the patriarchs, particularly Jacob. One of the tablets parallels to some extent the relationship between Jacob and Laban (Gen. 29-31). Although the element of adoption, which is present in the Nuzi document, is absent in the biblical story, in the case from Nuzi a man adopts another as his son, giving him his daughter for a wife and making him and his children heirs, unless the adopter should later have a son of his own. In the Nuzi account, the adopted son was to receive an equal share of the estate with the actual son. However, the son's children would in this instance forfeit any right (C. H. Gordon, Biblical Archaeologist 3 [Feb. 1940]: 2f.). It is also specified that the adopted son would not be entitled to take another wife in addition to the daughter of his adopted father.

Esau's selling of his birthright to Jacob (Gen. 25:27-34) is also illustrated by the rites of primogeniture at Nuzi. There a legal arrangement existed whereby the privileges of the first-born could be transferred to another. In one case they were transferred to one who was not actually a brother but was adopted as a brother. In another case, actual brothers were involved, as Esau and Jacob, and the one who surrendered his rights received three sheep in return, to some extent at least comparable to the meal that Esau got.

The household gods that Rachel stole from Laban (Gen. 31:34) are also illustrated from the Nuzi information. These implied leadership of the family and, in the case of a married daughter, ensured her husband the right of the property of her father (Gordon, Revue Biblique 44 [1935]: 35f.). Since Laban evidently had sons of his own when Jacob left him, they alone had the right to their father's gods, and the theft of these household idols by Rachel was a serious offense (31:19, 30, 35) aimed at preserving for her husband, Jacob, the chief title to Laban's estate (cf. Jack Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past [1946], p. 55). It is also interesting to note that Jacob, which stands evidently for Ya-qub-ēl, "May El protect," occurs in tablets of the eighteenth century B.C. from Chagar Bazar in N Mesopotamia (C. J. Gadd, Iraq [1949], p. 38, n. 5). The name Jacob likewise occurs as a Palestinian place-name in Thutmose III's list of the fifteenth century B.C. Subsequent scholarship has questioned the nature and importance of the teraphim ("household gods"). M.F.U.; R.K.H.

JA'DA (ja'da; "knowing"). The last named of the two sons of Onam, a descendant of Judah through Jerahmeel; his two sons are likewise mentioned (1 Chron. 2:28, 32).

JA'DAH (ja-da). The NIV reading for Jarah (which see).

JA'DAI (ja'dī; "knowing"). One of the sons of Nebo who divorced his Gentile wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:43).

JA'DDAI (ja'dī). See Jadai.

JADDU'A (ja-dū'a; "knowing").

1. One of the leaders of the people who signed the covenant made by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:21), 445 B.C.

2. The son of Jonathan (Neh. 12:11) and the last high priest mentioned in the OT (v. 22). This is all that we learn of him from Scripture, but we gather that he was a priest in the reign of the last Persian king, Darius Codommanus, and that he was still priest after the Persian dynasty was overthrown, i.e., in the reign of Alexander the Great. Josephus (Ant. 11.8.3–6) makes Jaddua high priest when Alexander invaded Judea, but the balance of his story does not deserve credit.

JA'DON (ja'don; "judge"). A Meronothite who assisted in reconstructing the walls of Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. 3:7), 445 B.C.

JA'EL (jā'el; "ibex, wild goat"). The wife of Heber the Kenite and slayer of Sisera. Sisera took refuge, after the defeat of the Canaanites by Barak, in the tent of Jael, there being peace between the house of Heber and Jabin, king of Hazor. He probably would not have so openly violated all ideas of oriental propriety by entering a woman's apartments but for Jael's earnest invitation. She covered him with a rug and gave him milk to drink. Fearing discovery by his pursuers, he exacted a promise from her to preserve the secret of his concealment and fell into a heavy sleep. Jael took one of the great wooden pegs that fastened down the cords of the tent and "drove the peg into his temple.... So he died." Barak, coming up in his pursuit of Sisera, was met by Jael, who showed him the deed she had performed (Judg. 4:17–22), about 1195 B.C.

JA´GUR (ja´ger). A town of southern Judea on the border of Edom, mentioned (Josh. 15:21) as part of the portion of Judah. Probably Tell Gur, ten miles E of Beersheba.

JAH. See Yah.

JA´HATH (ja´hath).

1. Son of Reaiah (or Haroeh), of the posterity of Hezron, and father of two sons, Ahumai and Lahad (1 Chron. 4:2).

2. A son of Shimei, grandson of Gershom, and great-grandson of Levi (1 Chron. 23:10). Considerable confusion occurs respecting Shimei (which see) and his sons. In v. 9 the three sons of Shimei are by some error (probably the transposition of the latter clause) attributed to his brother Laadan, whereas in v. 11 Jahath is stated to have been “first” (i.e., most numerous in posterity) of the four sons of Shimei. A similar disagreement appears in the parallel passage (1 Chron. 6) where Jahath (v. 43) occurs as the son of Gershom, and again (v. 20) as a son of Libni (i.e., Laadan), instead of Shimei.

3. One of the sons of Shelomoth, an Izharite of the family of Kohath appointed by David to a prominent place in the sacred services (1 Chron. 24:22), about 960 B.C.

4. A Merarite Levite, and one of the overseers of the Temple repairs carried on by King Josiah (2 Chron. 34:12), 639 B.C.

JA´HAZ (ja´haz). A town in the tribe of Reuben, mentioned in connection with Moab (Josh. 13:18; 21:36; Isa. 15:4). It was called Jahzah in 1 Chron. 6:78. Sihon the Amorite was defeated here (Num. 21:23–24; Deut. 2:32–34). On the Moabite stone, lines 19 and 20, the name is spelled like the shorter Heb. form and the place is given as a fortress, seemingly near Dibon, although its exact location is not known. In the KJV it was also called Jahaza (Josh. 13:18) and Jahazah (21:36; 48:21).

JA´HAZA, JAHA´ZAH. See Jahaz.

JAHAZI´AH. See Jahze´iah.

JAHA´ZIEL (ja-haz´i-el; “God sees”).

1. One of the Benjamite warriors who deserted Saul and came to David when he was at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:4), shortly before 1000 B.C.

2. One of the priests in the reign of David, appointed with Benaiah to blow the trumpet before the Ark when it was brought to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 16:6), about 986 B.C.

3. The third “son” of Hebron, the grandson of Levi through Kohath (1 Chron. 23:19; 24:23).

4. Son of Zechariah, a Levite of the family of Asaph who was inspired by Jehovah to prophesy to Jehoshaphat his victory over the Moabites and others who were invading the country (2 Chron. 20:14–18), about 875 B.C.

5. The father of a son who was head of “the sons of Shecaniah,” and returned with Ezra from Babylon with 300 males (Ezra 8:5), 457 B.C.

JAH´DAI (ja´dāi). A descendant, apparently of Caleb, of the family of Hezron; his sons’ names are given, but his own parentage is not stated (1 Chron. 2:47).

JAH´DIEL (ja´di-el). One of the heroes of the tribe of Manasseh E of Jordan (1 Chron. 5:24).

JAH´DO (ja´dō). A Gadite, son of Buz and father of Jeshishai, of the descendants of Abihail, resident in Gilead (1 Chron. 5:14), before 771 B.C.

JAH´LEEL (ja´līl). The last named of the three sons of Zebulun (Gen. 46:14; Num. 26:26). His descendants are called Jahleelites (26:26), before 1640 B.C.

JAH'LEELITES (ja'lîl-its). The descendants of Jahleel (which see).

JAH'MAI (ja'mî). One of the “sons” of Tola, grandson of Issachar (1 Chron. 7:2).

JAH'ZAH (1 Chron. 6:78; Jer. 48:21). See Jahaz.

JAH'ZEEL (ja'ze-el; “allotted by God”). The first named of the sons of Naphtali (Gen. 46:24). His descendants are called Jahzeelites (Num. 26:48). In 1 Chron. 7:13 and Gen. 46:24 (NIV) the name is written Jahziel (which see).

JAH'ZEELITES (ja'zîl-its; Num. 26:48). The descendants of Jahzeel (which see).

JAHZE'IAH (ja'ze-î-a). Son of Tikvah, apparently a priest who, along with Jonathan the son of Asahel, opposed the proposal that the Jews who had married foreign wives during the Exile appear before the assembly in order to appease “the fierce anger of our God” (Ezra 10:14–15), 457 B.C.

JAH'ZERAH (ja'ze-ra). The son of Meshullum and father of Adiel, a priest (1 Chron. 9:12), long before 536 B.C. He is probably the same as Azarel (Neh. 11:13).

JAH'ZIEL (ja'ze-el; 1 Chron. 7:13; Gen. 46:24 [NIV]). See Jahzeel.

JAILER (Gk. desmophulax, Acts 16:23). A keeper of a prison (which see).

JA'IR (jā'ir; “he enlightens”).

1. The son of Segub, who was descended from Judah on his father's side (1 Chron. 2:22) and from Manasseh on his mother's side. Moses reckons Jair as belonging to Manasseh (Num. 32:41; Deut. 3:14; see also 1 Kings 4:13), probably because of his exploits and possessions in Gilead (1 Chron. 2:23). He settled in the part of Argob bordering on Gilead, where we find the small towns taken (retaken) by him named collectively Havvoth-jair, or “the towns of Jair” (Num. 32:41; Deut. 3:14; 1 Kings 4:13; 1 Chron. 2:22). They are said to have numbered twenty-three (1 Chron. 2:22), thirty (Judg. 10:4), and sixty (Josh. 13:30; 1 Kings 4:13; 1 Chron. 2:23). Perhaps the entire sixty were captured by Jair and his relatives, and twenty-three of them were assigned to him, others being added afterward (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia).

2. The eighth judge of Israel, a Gileadite in Manasseh (Josephus Ant. 5.7.6) and probably a descendant of the preceding. He ruled twenty-two years, and his opulence is thus recorded: “And he had thirty sons who rode on thirty donkeys, and they had thirty cities in the land of Gilead that are called Havvoth-jair to this day.” The twenty-three villages of the more ancient Jair were probably among the thirty that this Jair possessed. He was buried in Kamon, probably in the same region (Judg. 10:3–5).

3. The father of Elhanan, who killed Lahmi, the brother of Goliath (1 Chron. 20:5), before 1018 B.C. In the parallel passage (2 Sam. 21:19) we find Jaare-oregim.

4. A Benjamite, son of Shimei and father of Mordecai, Esther's uncle (Esther 2:5), before 518 B.C.

JA'IRITE, THE (jā'ir-ît; 2 Sam. 20:26). See Ira.

JA'IRUS (ja'i-rus). A ruler of a synagogue, probably at Capernaum, whose only daughter Jesus restored to life (Mark 5:22–23, 35–42; Luke 8:41–42, 49–55; cf. Matt. 9:18), A.D. 27. Some have wrongfully inferred from our Savior's words “The child has not died, but is asleep,” that the girl was only in a swoon (H. Olshausen, Biblical Commentary on the Gospels and on the Acts of the Apostles 1:321; Neander, Leben Jesu, p. 347; McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia).

JA'KAN. See Jaaken.

JA´KEH (ja´ke; “pious,” cf. Arab. waka, “preserve, be pious”). The father of Agur, whose sayings are given in Prov. 30. Beyond the mention in v. 1 we have no clue as to the existence of either person. There is great difference of opinion as to the person intended. The traditional view gives the word a figurative import (y□qāhâ, “obedience”) and applies it to David. Others understand a real name of some unknown Israelite to be intended, which seems most likely.

JA´KIM (ja´kim; “God sets up”).

1. One of the “sons” of Shimei, a Benjamite living in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:19).

2. Head of the twelfth division of priests as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:12), about 970 B.C.

JAKIN. See Jachin.

JA´LAM (ja´lam). The second named of Esau’s three sons by Oholibamah (Aholibamah, KJV) in Canaan (Gen. 36:5, 14; 1 Chron. 1:35; “Jaalam,” KJV).

JA´LON (ja´lon). The last named of the four sons of Ezrah, of the tribe of Judah and, apparently, of a family related to that of Caleb (1 Chron. 4:17).

JAM´BRES (jam´bres). A person mentioned by Paul as opposing Moses (2 Tim. 3:8). See Jannes.

JAMES (jāmz), more correctly Jacobus (jä-kō;būs; Gk. Iakōbos—Jacob).

1. The son of Zebedee (Matt. 4:21; Mark 1:19; Luke 5:10) and Salome (cf. Matt. 27:56; Mark 15:40; 16:1), and the elder brother of John the evangelist (Mark 5:37).

James appears first in the sacred narrative as a fisherman, he and his brothers being partners with Simon Peter (Luke 5:10). When called by our Lord to be His followers in the spring or summer (A.D. 27), James and his brother responded with an eagerness that renders them models of obedience (Matt. 4:21–22; Mark 1:19–20). We find him named among the twelve who received (A.D. 28) a call to apostleship (Matt. 10:2; Mark 3:14, 17; Luke 6:13–14; Acts 1:13). These brothers and Peter seemed for some reason to be especially fitted to live in close intimacy with the Master and were with Him on several interesting occasions. They alone were present at the transfiguration (Matt. 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28), at the raising of Jairus’s daughter (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51), and at the Garden of Gethsemane during our Lord’s agony (Matt. 26:37; Mark 14:33). With Andrew they listened to the Lord’s private discourse on the fall of Jerusalem (13:3). Through mistaken views of the Messiah’s kingdom and an ambition to share in its glory, they joined in the request made to Jesus by their mother (Matt. 20:20–23; Mark 10:35–40). James was the first of the apostles to suffer martyrdom, being slain with a sword at the command of Herod (Acts 12:2), A.D. 44.

From the desire to punish the inhabitants of a certain village in Samaria because they declined to receive Jesus (Luke 9:52–54), we infer that James and John were warm and impetuous in temperament. They were called by our Lord (Mark 3:17) “Boanerges”—sons of thunder—probably because of their boldness and energy in discharging their apostleship.

2. James the Less (another of the twelve apostles.) He was the son of Alphaeus (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13) and Mary, the sister of our Lord’s mother (Matt. 27:56; Mark 15:40; Luke 24:10; John 19:25), and was called James the Less (hō mikros, “the little”), either because he was younger than James the son of Zebedee or on account of his short stature (Mark 15:40; see marg.). His mother is supposed by some to have been called sister, i.e., sister-in-law, of Mary the mother of Jesus, because of their marriage to two brothers, Clopas and Joseph (see John 19:25; Clopas, or Cleopas, KJV, is believed by scholars to be the same person as Alphaeus). It has also been supposed that Alphaeus died without offspring and that his wife was espoused by Joseph, on which account James is perhaps the legal son of Alphaeus and the reputed half brother of our Lord. James had a brother, Joses or Joseph (Matt. 27:56). In KJV Luke 6:16 mentions “Judas the brother of James,” whereas NASB and NIV render “the son of James.”

3. The brother of the Lord. The natural interpretation of the passages Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3 indicates that James and his brothers and sisters were sons and daughters of Joseph and Mary, the mother of Jesus. He was not one of the twelve apostles (Matt. 10:2–4), or at first a believer in Jesus (John 7:5). From Acts 1:13–14 we conclude that his former skepticism had passed away, as it is stated there that “His brothers” continued with the apostles and others in the “upper room” after the ascension. Although he was not one of the twelve, he was included among those who saw a vision of the risen Lord (1 Cor. 15:5, 7). Like Paul and Barnabas, he received the title of apostle (Gal. 1:19) and was recognized by the zealots of the law as their leader (2:12). He occupied a prominent, if not the chief, place in the church at Jerusalem (v. 9), was president of the first council (Acts 15:13), and, with the elders, received Paul upon his return from his third missionary tour (21:18), A.D. 57. He was the author of the epistle that bears his name. Eusebius tells us that James was surnamed “the Just” by the ancients on account of his eminent virtue.

JAMES, EPISTLE OF. The chief of the five epistles called “catholic” or “general” in their titles (James, 1 and 2 Peter, 1 John, and Jude). These epistles were addressed not to individual churches, as were most of the Pauline epistles, but to Christians in general.

Nature and Purpose. The book is a homily written to the twelve tribes “who are dispersed abroad,” that is, to Jewish Christians of the Dispersion. The author’s aim was to rally Christians from their worldliness to the practical privileges of their profession. The epistle has been called the most Jewish book in the NT. Some would even go so far as to ascribe it to a non-Christian Jew and maintain that it was later adapted to Christian use by two or three phrases containing the name of Christ (1:1; 2:1). However, the Christianity of the epistle is seen not so much in its subject matter as in its spirit. It is an interpretation of the OT law and the Sermon on the Mount in the light of the Christian gospel. The author shows acquaintanceship with the books of the Apocrypha and was evidently especially influenced by two, Ecclesiasticus and the Wisdom of Solomon.

Attestation. Not until toward the end of the fourth century (the Third Council of Carthage, A.D. 397) did the epistle of James become generally recognized as canonical. Eusebius classed it among the antilegomena, yet quotes 4:11 as Scripture. It is omitted in the Muratorian canon, yet the epistle was more widely known in the first three centuries than has been supposed. The Old Syriac Version included it. Hermas evidently used it. James is frequently referred to in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. Ignatius evidently knew it, as well as Polycarp, but none of these shows certain dependence upon James. However, Origen, Cyril of Jerusalem, Athanasius, Jerome, and Augustine recognized the epistle as Scripture. The internal evidence is stronger than the external. The epistle thoroughly harmonizes with what we know of this James from Josephus (Ant. 20.9.1) and the book of Acts (15:13–21; 21:17–25) and from Galatians (1:19; 2:9–10), as well as with the well-known circumstances of Jewish Christians in the Dispersion. The supposed opposition to Paul is purely imaginary. Properly interpreted, the opposition disappears. In the absence of doctrinal content, if there had been a forger, he would most assuredly have chosen the name of some well-known apostle and not the more or less obscure name of James, the Lord's brother.

Authorship. See James, no. 3.

Destination. James evidently intended his epistle for the large number of Christian Jews scattered throughout the Roman Empire. He may have slanted it with particular reference to the eastern Dispersion, since Peter addresses the Diaspora in Asia Minor where the epistle of James, it is conjectured, would be less likely known. The book of Acts records that there were Jews in almost every city where Christianity was planted, as at Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:9–11). Many of these were converted to Christianity and carried the message back home with them. It was to these Jewish believers that James addressed his letter.

The Date. The epistle of James may be presumed to be very early, possibly the first epistle to Christians. This is indicated by the early martyrdom of James, according to tradition in the year A.D. 62. Much more substantial reasons, however, are adduced from the internal evidence. The epistle shows no trace of the distinctive references concerning the new age, the outcalling of the church, the features of grace, or of the relationship of Gentile converts to the law of Moses, which resulted in the Jerusalem Council of Acts 15, over which James presided. The general absence of doctrine in the epistle, its Palestinian atmosphere, and its OT flavor combine to substantiate this view. The epistle shows no evidence of the fall of Jerusalem.

The Plan. The apostle undertakes to deal with the needs of his fellow Christian believers in the Dispersion. After a brief greeting (1:1) he (1) exhorts his readers to take the proper attitude toward testings and trials (1:2–18); and (2) warns them to react properly toward the Word of God (1:19–27); (3) he rebukes a demonstration of carnal partiality (2:1–13); (4) he expounds the uselessness of faith apart from works (2:14–26); (5) he speaks strongly against the sin of an uncontrolled tongue (3:1–12); (6) he expounds true and false wisdom (3:13–18); (7) he advises them against quarrelsomeness, worldiness, and pride (4:1–10); (8) he emphasizes brotherly consideration (4:11–12); (9) he criticizes the spirit of their business activity (4:13–5:6); (10) he calls them to patient endurance of life's misfortunes (5:7–12); (11) he shows them what to do when afflicted (5:13–18); and (12) he stresses the need for restoring a person who has gone astray (5:19–20).

Outline. James deals with the mature believer (3:2).

- I. Salutation (1:1)
- II. The mature believer's reaction toward trials (1:2–18)
- III. His reception of the Word (1:19–27)
- IV. His treatment of others (2:1–13)
- V. His genuine faith (2:14–26)
- VI. His control of the tongue (3:1–12)
- VII. His attitude toward true wisdom (3:13–18)
- VIII. His amiableness, spirituality, humility (4:1–10)
- IX. His concern for his fellows (4:11–12)
- X. His discretion in business (4:13–5:6)
- XI. His patient endurance (5:7–12)
- XII. His conduct when afflicted (5:13–18)
- XIII. His concern for a straying brother (5:19–20) M.F.U.

JAMIN (ja'min; "right hand").

1. The second son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Ex. 6:15; 1 Chron. 4:24), about 1871 B.C. He was founder of the family of the Jaminites (Num. 26:12).

2. The second son of Ram, the fourth in descent from Judah (1 Chron. 2:27).

3. One of the priests who expounded the law to the people when read by Ezra (Neh. 8:7), about 445 B.C.

JAMINITES, THE (jā'min-īts). The descendants of Jamin, the son of Simeon (Num. 26:12).

JAMLECH (jam'lek; "whom God makes king"). A leader of the tribe of Simeon, apparently one of those whose family invaded the valley of Gedor in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:34), about 715 B.C.

JANAI (ja'nī). One of the chief Gadites living in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:12; the name is given as Jaanai in the KJV).

JANGLING. A KJV expression replaced in the NASB by "fruitless discussion" and in the NIV by "meaningless talk" (1 Tim. 1:6); the phrase "empty talkers" (Titus 1:10, NASB) comes from a similar Gk. word.

JANIM (ja'nim). NIV for Janum (which see).

JANAI (jan'ī; "Janna," KJV). The son of Joseph and father of Melchi, the sixth in ascent from Christ on His mother's side (Luke 3:24), about 200 B.C.

JANNES (jan'ez). Jannes and Jambres are two of the Egyptian magicians who attempted by their enchantments to counteract the influence on Pharaoh's mind of the miracles wrought by Moses (2 Tim. 3:8; cf. Ex. 7–8).

JANOAH, JANOHAH (ja-nō'a; "quiet"). Jano'hah (ja-nō'ha; Heb. same as Janoah).

1. A place apparently in the N of Galilee, or the "land of Naphtali," one of those taken by Tiglath-pileser in his first incursion into Palestine (2 Kings 15:29).

2. A place on the boundary of Ephraim (Josh. 16:6–7; "Janohah," KJV). Eusebius gives it as twelve miles E of Neapolis. A little less than that distance from Nablus, and about SE in direction, two miles from Akraheh, is the village of Yanûn, seven miles SE of Shechem, doubtless the ancient Janoah, but now a small village with extensive ruins of antiquity.

JANUM (ja'num; "asleep"). A town of Judah in the mountain district, apparently not far from Hebron (Josh. 15:53), possibly Beni Na'im, four miles E of Hebron.

JAPHETH (jā'feth; "widespreading"). One of the three sons of Noah (Gen. 5:32; 6:10; 7:13; 9:18; 10:1; 1 Chron. 1:4–5). Although he is mentioned last in these passages, we learn from Gen. 10:21 (cf. 9:24) that he was the eldest of the three. He and his wife were among those who entered the Ark (Gen. 7:7; 1 Pet. 3:20). He had seven sons (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5), and his descendants occupied the "coastlands of the nations" (Gen. 10:5), i.e., of the Mediterranean Sea in Europe and Asia Minor. His act of filial piety when with Shem he covered his father's nakedness is recorded in 9:20–27.

JAPHIA (ja-fi'a; "may he [i.e., God] cause to be bright").

1. The king of Lachish who, with three other kings, joined Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem, against Joshua, but was defeated and slain after hiding in the cave of Makkedah (Josh. 10:3–27), about 1395 B.C.

2. One of the sons of David, born to him at Jerusalem by one of his wives, whose name is not given (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chron. 3:7; 14:6), after 1000 B.C.

3. A town on the eastern part of the southern boundary of Zebulun, situated on the high ground between Daberath and Gath-hepher (Josh. 19:12). Robinson (Researches, 3:194) identifies it with modern Yafa, about 1½ miles SW of Nazareth. This undoubtedly is the correct site.

JAPH'LET (jaf'let; "he [i.e., God] will rescue"). A son of Heber and great-grandson of Asher, and father of three sons and a daughter (1 Chron. 7:32–33). Some think it to have been a branch of his descendants (Japhletites) that are mentioned in Josh. 16:3 as having settled along the border between Ephraim and Dan, but that is improbable.

JAPH'LETITES (jaf'le-tīts). Their territory is mentioned (Josh. 16:3) as one of the landmarks on the S boundary of Ephraim. Although some consider the name to be representative of the descendants of Japhlet (which see), Smith (Bib. Dict.) believes that the name perhaps preserves the memory of some ancient tribe who at a remote time dwelt on these hills.

JA'PHO. See Joppa.

JAR. A general description of vessels made of fired clay, although applied infrequently to mineral, stone, or metal containers. Several Heb. terms are translated by "jar" in the NASB and NIV, probably indicating several different sizes and shapes of containers.

The kad (Gen. 24:14–18, 20, 43–46) was a small water jug that could also be used for storing flour (1 Kings 17:12). A larger container of the same variety was the nēbel (Jer. 13:12; Lam. 4:2), which probably stood about two feet in height and had a capacity of about five gallons. It was probably twice the size of the kad and could be closed with some form of stopper. The baqbūq (1 Kings 4:3; Jer. 19:1, 10) may have been a type of decanter that produced a gurgling noise when being emptied. The āsūk (2 Kings 4:2), mentioned only once in the Heb. Bible, was apparently a storage jar for oil with a special spout for filling small vessels such as lamps. Another rare word, šinṣenet (Ex. 16:33), described a container for manna.

The term ṣappahat probably denoted two vessels of quite different sorts. In 1 Sam. 26:11–16, the reference is to a water canteen, whereas in 1 Kings 17:12 a small jug seems to be indicated. Of uncertain shape and size are the klī of 1 Kings 17:10; Jer. 32:14 and the merqāhâ of Job 41:31. The latter has been interpreted as a container for ointment (so KJV, NASB, RSV, NIV). The rare term æṣeb (Jer. 22:28) has been rendered "jar" or "vessel" by some translators, and "idol" by others.

Slōhît, another rare word, probably describes a flat cooking pan (see Cruse).

In the NT the Gk. term hudria described a water jar that could be either large (John 2:6) or small (4:28). The keramion was evidently a portable water jar, whereas the alabastron (Matt. 26:7) was a small alabaster jug containing expensive perfume. R.K.H.

JA'RAH (ja'ra; "honey"; 1 Chron. 9:42). See Jehoadah and Jadah.

JA´REB (ja´reb; “he will contend; contentious”). Occurs as a proper name in Hos. 5:13; 10:6, where a “King Jareb” is spoken of as the false refuge and final subjugator of the kingdom of Israel. It is a figurative title for the king of Assyria. The NIV renders the word yāreb (Jareb) as “great king.”

JA´RED (ja´red; perhaps “descent”). A pre-Flood patriarch, the fifth from Adam. He was the son of Mahalalel and father of Enoch (Gen. 5:15–20; 1 Chron. 1:2; Luke 3:37).

JARESI´AH. See Jaareshiah.

JAR´HA (jar´ha). The Egyptian slave of Sheshan, a descendant of Jerahmeel. He was married to the daughter of his master, and, in consequence, obtained his freedom. Because Sheshan had no sons, his descendants were traced through this connection (1 Chron. 2:34–41).

JA´RIB (ja´rib; “he will contend, contender”).

1. A son of Simeon (1 Chron. 4:24), given in Gen. 46:10 as Jachin (which see) or Jakin (NIV).

2. One of the leading men sent by Ezra to secure a priest “for the house of our God” on the return from Jerusalem (Ezra 8:16–17), about 457 B.C.

3. A priest of the “sons” of Jeshua, who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:18), 456 B.C.

JAR´MUTH (jar´muth; “elevation, height”).

1. A town in the low country of Judah (Josh. 15:35), and the seat of the Canaanite king Pirim. He was one of the five who conspired to punish Gibeon for having made an alliance with Israel (10:3, 5), and who were routed at Beth-horon and put to death by Joshua at Makedah (v. 23). It is identified with the modern Yarmuk (about eight miles NE of Beit Jibrin), a village with the remains of walls and cisterns of early date.

2. A Levitical (Gershonite) city in the tribe of Asher (Josh. 21:29), also called Remeth (19:21) and Ramoth (1 Chron. 6:73).

JARO´AH (ja-rō´a; cf. Arab. wariha, “to be soft”). A chief man of the tribe of Gad living in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:14), before 740 B.C.

JA´SAU. See Jaasu.

JA´SHAR, BOOK OF. See Jasher, Book of.

JA´SHEN (ja´shen; “sleeping”). A person several of whose “sons” are named as among David’s famous bodyguard (2 Sam. 23:32), called (1 Chron. 11:34) Hashem the Gizonite. The discrepancies between the two passages may, perhaps, best be reconciled by understanding the two brave men referred to as being Jonathan Ben-shammah (or Ben-shagee) and Ahiam Ben-sharar (or Ben-sacar), grandsons of Jashen (or Hashem) of Gizon, in the mountains of Judah—hence called Hararites, before 1000 B.C.

JA´SHER, BOOK OF (ja´sher; RV and RSV, Ja´sher, the “book of righteous”; NASB and NIV, “book of Jashar” [Josh. 10:13; 2 Sam. 1:17–18]). The book of the upright or righteous man, that is to say, of the true members of the theocracy, or godly men. From the two references given it has been justly inferred that the book was a collection of odes in praise of certain heroes of the theocracy, interwoven with historical notices of their achievements. That the passage in Joshua quoted from this work is extracted from a song is evident enough, both from the poetical form of the composition and also from the parallelism of the sentences. The reference in 2 Sam. 1:18 is to an elegy upon Saul and Jonathan in the book of Jasher. Some suppose the book of Jasher to have perished in the captivity.

JASHO'BEAM (ja-shō'be-am; "let the people return").

1. A Hachmonite, one of David's warriors, and the first named in the two lists given of them (2 Sam. 23:8, "Josheb-basshebeth a Tahchemonite"; "The Tachmonite," KJV; 1 Chron. 11:11, "the son of a Hachmonite"). The former passage attributes to him the defeat of 800 Philistines, the latter of 300. This is accounted for by Kennicott (Diss., 1:95–96) as follows: "... the initial letter of the Hebrew words for three and eight, being used as an abbreviation, a mistake arose." Strong (J. McClintock and J. Strong, Cyclopedia, s.v.) inclines to the supposition that "Jashobeam, or Josheb-bash-shebeth (2 Sam. 23:8) was the name or title of the chief, Adino and Eznite being descriptive epithets, and Hachmonite the patronymic of the same person." The exploit of breaking through the host of the Philistines to procure water from the well of Bethlehem is ascribed to the three chief heroes, and therefore to Jashobeam, the first of the three (23:13–17), before 1000 B.C.

2. One of the Korhites who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:6), before 1000 B.C.

3. One who commanded 24,000 and did duty in David's court in the month Nisan (1 Chron. 27:2). He was the son of Zabdiel.

JA'SHUB (ja'shub; "he returns").

1. The third son of Issachar and founder of the family of the Jashubites (Num. 26:24; 1 Chron. 7:1). He is called Iob (Gen. 46:13; "Job," KJV), perhaps by contraction, corruption, or substitution, before 1871 B.C.

2. One of the sons of Bani, a layman in the time of Ezra who had to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:29), 456 B.C.

JASHU'BI-LE'HEM (ja-shu'bi-le'hem; "returner of bread"). Either a person or a place named among the descendants of Shelah, the son of Judah (1 Chron. 4:22). It is probably a place, and we should infer that it lay on the western side of the tribe, in or near the Shefelah.

JA'SHUBITES, THE (ja'shu-bīts). The family founded by Jashub, the son of Issachar (Num. 26:24).

JA'SIEL. See Jaasiel.

JA'SON (jā'sun; "healing"). He was the man of Thessalonica who entertained Paul and Silas in that city. The mob, in consequence, assaulted his house and, not finding his guests, dragged Jason before the ruler, who released him on security (Acts 17:5–9). He is probably the same as the Jason mentioned in Rom. 16:21 as a kinsman of Paul, and probably accompanied him to Corinth (A.D. 54).

JASPER. See Mineral Kingdom.

JATH'NIEL (jath'ni-el; "God bestows"). The fourth son of Meshelemiah, a Korhite Levite, one of the gatekeepers of the Temple (1 Chron. 26:2), about 960 B.C.

JAT'TIR (jat'ir). A city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:48), and, with its pasturelands, assigned to the priests (Josh. 24:14; 1 Chron. 6:57). David was accustomed to visiting Jattir and sent to his friends gifts taken from his enemies (1 Sam. 30:27). According to Eusebius and Jerome it was in their time a large place inhabited by Christians, twenty miles from Eleutheropolis; now known as Khirbet 'attin, thirteen miles SW of Hebron.

JA'VAN (ja'van; Heb. yāwān; Arab. yunan; "Greece, Greeks").

The fourth named of the sons of Japheth and father of Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim (Gen. 10:2, 4; 1 Chron. 1:5, 7).

The name appears in Isa. 66:19 (as Greece in the NIV), where it is coupled with Tarshish, Put, Lud, Meshech, and Rosh, and more particularly with Tubal and the “distant coastlands,” as representatives of the Gentile world; in Ezek. 27:13 (Greece, NIV) as being among the places where the Syrians obtained articles of trade; and in the Heb. text of Dan. 8:21; 10:20 (cf. 11:2; Zech. 9:13). The English translation of the term in Daniel and Zechariah is “Greece,” and a comparison of the passages where the Heb. word occurs leaves no doubt that Javan was the name given to Greece by the Hebrews and believed to be the country settled by Javan’s posterity. Javan refers more precisely to the Ionians who inhabited the coasts of Lydia and Caria and whose cities were important commercial centers two centuries before those on the Peloponnesus. Sargon II (721–705) first mentions them in Assyrian records as the result of an encounter with them in naval battle.

JAVELIN. See Armor, Arms.

JAW (Heb. usually lĥî, rendered “jaws,” Ps. 22:15; “jaw teeth,” Prov. 30:14; “teeth,” Joel 1:6). The jawbone of a donkey was the weapon with which Samson performed great slaughter (Judg. 15:15). See Cheek.

JA’ZER (ja’zer; “helpful”; sometimes “Jaazer,” KJV). A town E of Jordan, in or near Gilead (Num. 32:1, 3). It was taken by Israel from the Amorites (21:32), was assigned to the tribe of Gad (32:1, 3, 35), and was constituted a Levitical city (Josh. 21:39; 1 Chron. 26:31). It must have been a place of importance, as it gave its name to a district and its dependent towns (Num. 21:32). From its being mentioned as lying between Dibon and Nimrah, it would seem to have been located on the high plain of Heshbon. Jazer is mentioned in connection with the census taken under David (2 Sam. 24:5; 1 Chron. 26:31), and also in the prophecies of Isaiah (16:8–9) and Jeremiah (48:32). It has been identified with Khirbet Jazzir, about ten miles W of Amman.

JA’ZIZ (ja’ziz). A Hagrite and overseer of David’s flocks (1 Chron. 27:31), which were probably pastured E of Jordan where the forefathers of Jaziz had lived for ages (cf. vv. 19–22).

JEALOUSY (Heb. qin’â; Gk. zēlos). Properly, suspicion of a wife’s purity (Num. 5:14–15); often used of Jehovah’s sensitive regard for the true faith of His people (Ex. 20:5; etc.; 2 Cor. 11:2); used for anger or indignation, or intense interest for the welfare of another (Ps. 79:5; Zech. 1:14; 8:2; 1 Cor. 10:22). “I, Jehovah thy God, am a jealous God, who will not transfer to another the honor that is due to himself (Isa. 42:8; 48:11), nor tolerate the worship of any other god (Ex. 34:14), but who directs the warmth of his anger against those who hate him (Deut. 6:15) with the same energy with which the warmth of his love (Song of Sol. 8:6) embraces those who love him, except that love in the form of grace reaches much farther than wrath” (K. & D., Com., ad loc.). When speaking of the jealousy of God, we are to understand this language to be employed to illustrate rather than represent the emotions of the divine mind. The same causes operating upon the human mind would produce what we call anger, jealousy, repentance, grief, etc.; therefore, when these emotions are ascribed to the mind of God, this language is used because such emotions can be represented to us by no other.

JEALOUSY, IDOL OF (Heb. sēmel haqqin’â). The image seen by Ezekiel in the vision of the abominations of Jewish idolatry (Ezek. 8:3, 5). The idolatrous object was such as to excite the jealousy (which see) of Jehovah; probably Baal or Asherah, whose image had already been placed in the Temple by Manasseh (2 Kings 21:7). “As the God of Israel, Jehovah cannot tolerate the image and worship of another god in his temple. To set up such an image in the temple of Jehovah was a practical renunciation of the covenant, a rejection of Jehovah on the part of Israel as its covenant God” (Keil, Com., ad loc.).

JEALOUSY OFFERING (Heb. minḥat qīnāwōt, lit., “offering of jealousies,” an intensive plural). If a man suspected his wife of adultery without her having been caught in the act, or without his having witnesses to prove her supposed guilt, then he was required to bring her to the priest, along with an offering (Num. 5:12–31). It consisted of a tenth of an ephah of barley meal, without oil or incense, called “a grain offering of jealousy, a grain offering of memorial.” The priest set her before Jehovah, poured holy water (Ex. 30:18) into an earthen basin, and put dust into it from the floor of the sanctuary. Uncovering her head, he put the offering into her hand; and holding the water in his hand, he pronounced a solemn oath of purification before her, to which she responded, “Amen, Amen.”

The dust was strewn upon the water as an allusion to the fact that dust was eaten by the serpent as a curse of sin (Gen. 3:14) and therefore as a symbol of a state deserving a curse, a state of the deepest humiliation and disgrace (Ps. 72:9; Isa. 49:23; Mic. 7:17). On the very same ground an earthen vessel was chosen, that is to say, one quite worthless in comparison with a copper one. The loosening of the hair of the head is to be regarded here as a removal or loosening of the female headdress and a symbol of the loss of the proper ornament of female morality and marital fidelity. The priest, as a representative of God, held the vessel in his hand, with the water in it, which was called the “water of bitterness that brings a curse,” inasmuch as, if the crime imputed to her was well-founded, it would bring upon the woman bitter suffering as the curse of God.

The priest wrote these curses, those contained in the oath, in a roll, and washed them with the bitter water, i.e., washed the writing in the vessel, so that the words of the curse should pass into the water, and be imparted to it; a symbolical act intended to set forth the truth that God imparted to the water the power to act injuriously upon a guilty body, though it would do no harm to an innocent one.

After all this was done he gave her the water to drink (Num. 5:11–31), although, according to v. 26, not till after the presentation of the sacrifice and the burning of the memorial upon the altar.

It cannot be determined with any certainty what the nature of the disease threatened in the curse was; but the idea of the curse seems to have been properly enunciated by Theodoret, who said, “The punishment shall come from the same source as the sin.” The punishment was to answer exactly to the crime and to fall upon those bodily organs that had been the instruments of the woman’s sin, namely, the organs of child-bearing.

JEALOUSY, WATERS OF. See Jealousy Offering.

JE’ARIM (je’a-rim; “forests”). A mountain named in specifying the northern boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:10), having Chesalon (which see), modern Kesla (ten miles W of Jerusalem), upon it as a landmark.

JEATH’ERAI (je-ath’e-rī). A Levite of the family of Gershom (1 Chron. 6:21), generally thought to be the same called Ethni in v. 41.

JEBERECHI’AH, JEBEREKI’AH (je-ber-e-kī’a; “Jehovah blesses”). The father of Zechariah (not the prophet), which latter Isaiah took as one of the witnesses of his marriage with “the prophetess” (Isa. 8:2), or, as Delitzsch thinks (Com., ad loc.), as witnesses of the writing upon the tablet, about 742 B.C.

JE’BUS (je’bus). The name of Jerusalem under Jebusite control (Judg. 19:10; also “Jebusi,” KJV, Josh. 18:16, 28). Jebusite Jerusalem, which David captured (2 Sam. 5:8; 1 Chron. 11:4–5), has been shown by archaeological excavation to have been the SE hill, and to have been fortified by stout walls, which have been uncovered. The Jebusite city was S of the Temple area on Moriah. See Jerusalem.

JEB'USITE, JEB'USITES (jeb'ū-sīt; Heb. always sing. haybūsî, 2 Sam. 5:6; 24:16, 18; 1 Chron. 21:18, and ybūsî in 2 Sam. 5:8; 1 Chron. 11:6; Zech. 9:7). One of the Canaanite peoples who were to be dispossessed by Israel. In the list of the doomed nations the Jebusites always come last, except in Ezra 9:1; Neh. 9:8. But this was not because they were of no account. They were mountaineers, living in the “hill country” (Num. 13:29; Josh. 11:3). Their city was Jerusalem (15:63), “that is, Jebus” (1 Chron. 11:4), which was also known as “the Jebusite” (Josh. 15:8; 18:16, 28). Their warlike character is seen throughout their entire history. It was Adonizedek, king of Jerusalem, who raised the confederacy against Gibeon (10:1–4). The Jebusites were summoned to take part in the confederacy headed by Jabin, king of Hazor (11:1, 3). The king of Jerusalem was among those smitten by Joshua (12:10), and from 12:7 we might infer that Israel had taken their territory. But they still retained at least their royal city (Judg. 1:21) until the time of David (2 Sam. 5:6–8; 1 Chron. 11:4–6). Living on the border between Judah and Benjamin, the Jebusites dwelt with Judah (Josh. 15:63) and with Benjamin (Judg. 1:21), to which tribe Jerusalem belonged (Josh. 18:28). It is presumably implied that neither tribe was able to dislodge them.

The only appearance of Jebusites after this is in the story of Araunah (2 Sam. 24:16–24), or Ornan (1 Chron. 21:14–28), the Jebusite. Neh. 9:8 is a historical reminiscence, and probably Zech. 9:7; but Ezra 9:1 certainly seems to imply the existence of the Jebusites as a distinct heathen tribe.

JEBUSITES AND ARCHAEOLOGY. Archaeology has shown that Jebusite Jerusalem lay on the eastern hill S of the higher ground that in the tenth century B.C. became Solomon's Temple area. The Jebusites did not select the better location because this high place above the Kidron was already occupied by a Canaanite temple, which the Jebusites did not care to displace. The site they developed as an impregnable stronghold was a tiny triangle bounded by the Kidron, Tyropoeon, and Zedek valleys. Its bold rock escarpments made an ideal fortification site, and its water supply from the Gihon spring made it secure. When David took the city of the Jebusites, it was named Davidsburg, or city of David. As a result of the labors of such persons as Sir Charles Warren, Clermont-Ganneau, Hermann Guthe, F. Bliss, Capt. R. Weill, John Garstang, J. W. Crowfoot, and Kathleen Kenyon, the ancient limits of the city of David have been determined. Portions of the Jebusite city wall and fortifications were uncovered, including the great western gate. In part these probably go back to 2000 B.C. Evidence brought to light shows that the city that David captured was shaped like a huge human footprint with a total area of about eleven acres. Its stout walls and elevated position and perennial water supply made it virtually impregnable. David's prowess, however, took it by storm.

JECAMIAH. See Jekamiah.

JECHILÍÁH, JECHOLIÁH. See Jecoliah.

JECHONI'AS. See Jeconiah.

JECOLI'AH (jek-ō-li'a; “able through Jehovah”). Wife of Amaziah, king of Judah, and mother of Azariah, or Uzziah (2 Kings 15:2), about 797 B.C. In 2 Chron. 26:3 her name is Jechiliah (Jecoliah in the NIV). In the KJV she is known as Jecholiah and Jecoliah.

JECONI´AH (jek-ō-nī´a). An altered form of the name of King Jehoiachin (which see), found in some versions in 1 Chron. 3:16–17; Esther 2:6; Jer. 24:1; 27:20; 28:4; 29:2; Matt. 1:11–12.

JEDA´IAH (je-da´ya; “Jehovah has been kind,” cf. Arab. yadā, “to do good”).

1. (Heb. $y\bar{\imath}d\bar{a}y\bar{a}$). The son of Shimri and father of Allon, of the ancestors of Ziza, a chief Simeonite who migrated to the valley of Gedor (1 Chron. 4:37), before 715 B.C.

2. (Heb. same as no. 1). Son of Harumaph and one of those who repaired the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:10), 445 B.C.

3. (Heb. $y\bar{\imath}d\bar{a}y\bar{a}$; “Jehovah knows”). The chief of the second division of priests as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:7), about 960 B.C.

4. (Heb. same as no. 3). A priest officiating in Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:10; Neh. 11:10); in the latter passage called the son of Joiarib (probably a corrupt reading). He seems to have belonged to the family of Jeshua; 973 of his relatives accompanied him from Babylon (Ezra 2:36; Neh. 7:39). A Jedaiah is mentioned in Neh. 12:6–7, 19, 21, but whether it is the same person or not is difficult to decide, some (Smith, Bib. Dict.) holding that there were two priestly families of this name. He is probably identical with the Jedaiah whom the prophet was directed to crown with the symbolical wreath (Zech. 6:10–14), 536–517 B.C.

JEDI´AEL (je-di´a-el; “known of God”).

1. One of the “sons” of Benjamin, ancestor of many Benjamite families, numbering, according to David’s census, 17,200 warriors (1 Chron. 7:6, 10–11). He is usually identified with Ashbel (1 Chron. 8:1) but may have been a later descendant of Benjamin, who reached the first rank by reason of the fruitfulness of his house and the decadence of older branches.

2. The son of Shimri and one of David’s heroes (1 Chron. 11:45), and, perhaps, the chief of Manasseh who joined David at Ziklag (12:20), before 1000 B.C.

3. The second son of Meshelemiah and a Korhite of the Levitical family of “the sons of Asaph.” He was appointed a gatekeeper of the Tabernacle by David (1 Chron. 26:2), about 960 B.C.

JEDI´DAH (je-di´da; “beloved”). The daughter of Adaiah of Bozkath, wife of King Amon and mother of Josiah (2 Kings 22:1), 640 B.C.

JEDIDI´AH (je-di-dī´a; “beloved by Jehovah”). The name given by God through Nathan to Solomon (2 Sam. 12:25).

JEDU´THUN (je-du´thun; “praise, praising”). A Merarite, and one of the masters of the sacred music appointed by David (1 Chron. 16:42; 25:1, 3; etc.), about 960 B.C. From a comparison of 15:17, 19 with 16:41–42; 25:1, 3, 6; 2 Chron. 35:15, some identify him with Ethan. In 35:15 he is called the “king’s seer.” His sons appear sometimes as exercising the same office (1 Chron. 25:1, 3), at others as gatekeepers (16:38). His descendants are mentioned (2 Chron. 29:14) as taking part in purifying the Temple in the reign of Hezekiah, and later still (Neh. 11:17; 1 Chron. 9:16) as involved in the singing. His name is used (2 Chron. 35:15) instead of Jeduthunites (sons of Jeduthun). Jeduthun also appears in the titles of Pss. 39, 77.

JEEZER. See Iezer.

JEEZERITES. See Iezerites.

JE´GAR-SAHADU´THA (je´gar-sa-had-ū´tha; Aram., “heap of testimony”). The Aramean name given by Laban the Syrian to the heap of stones that he erected as a memorial of the compact between Jacob and himself, whereas Jacob commemorated the same by setting up a pillar (Gen. 31:47), as was his custom on several other occasions, and naming it Galeed, a “witness heap.”

JEHALE’HEEL, JEHAL’ELEL. See Jehall’elel.

JEHALL’ELEL (je-hal’e-lel; “praiser of God”).

1. Descendants of Judah whose own immediate parentage is not known. Four of his sons are enumerated (1 Chron. 4:16).

2. A Merarite Levite whose son, Azariah, took part in the restoration of the Temple in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:12), 719 B.C.

JEHDE’IAH (je-dē’ya).

1. A descendant of Shubael, or Shebuel, of the family of Gershom, and head of a division of the Levitical Temple attendants arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:20; cf. 23:16), about 960 B.C.

2. A Meronothite who had charge of the royal donkeys under David (1 Chron. 27:30), 1000 B.C.

JEHEZ’KEL (je-hez’kel; “God will strengthen”). The head of the twentieth division of priests under David (1 Chron. 24:16). See Ezekiel.

JEHI’AH (je-hī’a; “Jehovah liveth”). A Levite associated with Obed-edom as “gatekeepers for the ark” when brought by David to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:24), 982 B.C. Called Jeiel in v. 18.

JEHI’EL (je-hī’el).

1. A Levite “of the second rank,” appointed by David to play “with harps tuned to alamoth” on the occasion of the removal of the Ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:18, 20). In the former passage he and those with him are called “gatekeepers.” He is apparently the Jehiah (which see) of v. 24. By some he is identified as the Gershonite leader of the “sons of Ladan” in the time of David (23:8) who had charge of the treasurers (29:8). If so, his descendants were called Jehielites (26:21), 982 B.C.

2. Son of Hachmoni (or a Hachmonite), who “tutored the king’s sons” (1 Chron. 27:32). The mention of Ahithophel (v. 33) seems to fix the date before the revolt, perhaps about 976 B.C.

3. The second named of the six brothers of Jehoram, and son of King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 21:2). These brothers were all murdered by Jehoram upon his accession (v. 4), 850 B.C.

4. One of the descendants (“sons”) of Heman the singer, who assisted King Hezekiah in his reformatations (2 Chron. 29:14), and probably the same person who was appointed one of the overseers of the sacred offerings (31:13), 719 B.C.

5. One of the “officials of the house of God” who contributed liberally toward the Temple sacrifices in the time of King Josiah (2 Chron. 35:8), 639 B.C.

6. The father of Obadiah, which latter returned with 218 males of the sons of Joab from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:9), before 457 B.C.

7. A priest, one of the “sons” of Harim, who divorced his Gentile wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:21), 457 B.C.

8. One of the “sons” of Elam, who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:26), and probably the father of Shecaniah, who proposed that measure (v. 2), 457 B.C.

See also Jeiel.

JEHI’ELI (je-hī’e-li; “Jehielite”). A Gershonite Levite of the family of Ladan. His sons had charge of the treasures of the Lord’s house (1 Chron. 26:21–22), before 960 B.C.

JEHI’ELITES (je-hī’e-lits). The descendants (1 Chron. 26:21) of Jehiel, no. 1 (which see).

JEHIZKI'AH (je-hiz-kī'a; same as Hezekiah, "Jehovah strengthens"). The son of Shallum, one of the leaders of Ephraim, who, at the insistence of Oded the prophet, demanded the liberation of the captives brought into Samaria by the army under Pekah in the campaign against Judah (2 Chron. 28:12; cf. vv. 8, 13, 15), about 741 B.C.

JEHO'ADAH, JEHOADDAH (je-hō'a-da; "whom Jehovah adorns"). Son of Ahaz, the great-grandson of Jonathan, the son of Saul (1 Chron. 8:36), called Jarah (which see) in 1 Chron. 9:42.

JEHOAD'DAN (je-hō-ad'an). Jehoah'din (je-hō-ad'in; perhaps "Jehovah delights"). A woman of Jerusalem, queen of Joash and mother of Amaziah (2 Kings 14:2; 2 Chron. 25:1), 825 B.C.

JEHO'AHAZ (je-hō'a-haz; "Jehovah has laid hold of," abbrev., Jo'ahaz).

1. The son and successor of Jehu, the twelfth king of Israel after the division of the kingdom (2 Kings 10:35). He reigned seventeen years, 814–798 B.C. Following the sins of Jeroboam his forces were defeated by the Syrians until they were reduced to fifty horsemen, ten chariots, and ten thousand footmen. In his humiliation he besought Jehovah, and a deliverer was granted to Israel, probably in the person of Jehoash (which see), his son, who expelled the Syrians and re-established the affairs of the kingdom (13:1–9, 25).

2. The third son of Josiah by Hamutal, called Shallum (which see) in 1 Chron. 3:15, where he is given as the fourth son, but by a comparison of 2 Kings 23:31 and 2 Chron. 36:11, we find that Zedekiah was the younger. After his father had been slain in resisting the progress of Pharaoh Neco, Jehoahaz was raised to the throne, at the age of twenty-three, in preference to his elder brother, Jehoiakim (2 Kings 23:31, 36). He was anointed at Jerusalem (v. 30) and found the land full of trouble but free from idolatry (cf. v. 24). He is described as an evildoer (v. 32) and an oppressor (cf. Ezek. 19:3), but seems to have been lamented by the people (Jer. 22:10; Ezek. 19:1). Pharaoh Neco, upon his return from the Euphrates, removed him from the throne, and put Jehoiakim in his place. Jehoahaz was taken first to Riblah in Syria, and then to Egypt, where he died. His reign lasted only three months, 609 B.C.

3. The name given (2 Chron. 21:17; 25:23) to the youngest son of Jehoram, king of Judah; usually called Ahaziah (which see).

JEHO'ASH (je-hō'ash; "Jehovah has given," cf. Arab. ʾasa, ʾawasa, "to bestow"; sometimes called Joash).

1. The eighth king of Judah and son of King Ahaziah (2 Kings 11:2), by Zibiah (12:1; 2 Chron. 24:1). He was born about 843 B.C. His aunt, Jehosheba, saved him from the massacre by Athaliah (which see), hiding him "with her in the house of the Lord six years." At the age of seven years he seems to have been the only living descendant of Solomon and was then brought into the Temple and anointed king. Jehoiada (which see), the high priest, thought the time ripe for overthrowing the power of Athaliah, the usurper, and secured the cooperation of the royal bodyguard. The noisy greeting that was accorded Jehoash brought Athaliah to the Temple, where she was seized and slain, about 835 B.C. Jehoash behaved well as long as Jehoiada, his uncle, lived. Excepting that the high places were still resorted to for incense and sacrifice, pure religion was restored, and the Temple was repaired. But after the death of his aged counselor, evil advisers led him into sin; the law was neglected, idolatry prevailed, and God's anger kindled against him. Prophets were sent to warn him, but the ungrateful king responded by putting to death Zechariah, the son and successor of his benefactor Jehoiada. In about a year Hazael, king of Syria, came against him, overcame his forces, and, appearing before Jerusalem, was bought off with the treasures of the Temple. Jehoash also suffered from a painful malady and was at length slain by his own servants, about 796 B.C. He was buried in the city of David, but not in the sepulcher of the kings (2 Kings 11–12; 2 Chron. 24). He is one of the three kings omitted in the genealogy of Christ (Matt. 1:8). He is called Joash consistently in the NIV.

2. The son and successor of Jehoahaz, king of Israel. He became viceroy to his father (2 Kings 13:10), reigning thirteenth over the separate kingdom sixteen years, including his viceroyship, 798–782 B.C. According to the scriptural account, Jehoash “did evil in the sight of the Lord; he did not turn away from all the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, with which he made Israel sin, but he walked in them” (2 Kings 13:11). Josephus says (Ant. 9.8.6) that “He was a good man, and in disposition was not at all like his father.” The statement in Kings is supposed by some to refer to the first part of his reign, while that of Josephus relates to the latter part, after a restoration.

Jehoash held Elisha in great respect, and when he heard of the prophet’s last illness he went to his bedside, wept over him, and said, “My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and its horsemen!” The prophet promised him deliverance from the Syrian yoke in Aphek, and bade him strike the ground. The king struck three times and then stopped, whereupon the prophet rebuked him for stopping and limited his victories over Syria to three. These promises were accomplished after the prophet’s death, Jehoash in three successive victories overcoming the Syrians and retaking from them the towns that Hazael had torn from Israel (2 Kings 13:14–25).

The success of Jehoash appears to have made Amaziah, king of Judah, jealous, and he sought a quarrel with him. Jehoash replied with a parable, but Amaziah was determined in his purpose, and a war ensued in which Jehoash was victorious. Having defeated Amaziah in Beth-shemesh in Judah, he advanced against Jerusalem, broke down the walls to the extent of 400 cubits, and carried away the treasures both of the Temple and the palace, together with hostages for the future good behavior of Amaziah (2 Kings 14:8–14; 2 Chron. 25:17–24). Jehoash, soon after his victory, died in peace and was buried in Samaria.

JEHOHA‘NAN (je-hō-ha‘nan; “Jehovah is favorable”). Jehohanan and Johanan appear in the KJV, NIV, and NASB but not always in the same verses. Jehohanan is in the KJV, NIV, and NASB of Ezra 10:28; Neh. 12:13, 42; it is in the NASB and NIV of Ezra 10:6; Neh. 6:18, where it replaces KJV Johanan; and it is in the KJV and NIV of 1 Chron. 26:3; 2 Chron. 17:15; 23:1, where it is replaced in the NASB by Johanan (which see). The material below follows the NASB usage.

1. A priest, the “son” of Eliashib, into whose chamber Ezra retired to mourn over the marrying of Gentile wives by the Jews (Ezra 10:6). He is identified with the Johanan mentioned in Neh. 12:22–23.

2. An Israelite of the family of Bebai who divorced his Gentile wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:28), 456 B.C.

3. The son of Tobiah the Ammonite, and married to the daughter of Meshullam, the priest (Neh. 6:18), 445 B.C.

4. A leading priest, descendant of Amariah, who later returned with Zerubbabel. He was contemporary with Joiakim (Neh. 12:13; cf. vv. 2, 12), considerably after 536 B.C.

5. A priest who took part in the musical services at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem by Nehemiah (Neh. 12:42), 445 B.C.

Jehoiachin (je-hoy'a-kin; "Jehovah will establish"). Son of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, and Nehushta, daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem; called also Jeconiah.

He succeeded his father as the nineteenth king over the separate kingdom and reigned three months and ten days, 597 B.C. His age at his accession was eighteen years, according to 2 Kings 24:8, but eight years according to 2 Chron. 36:9. (The usual explanation of this difference is that he reigned ten years in conjunction with his father. This would make him eight at the beginning of his joint reign and eighteen when he began to reign alone.) Jehoiachin "did evil in the sight of the Lord" and probably opposed the interests of the Chaldean empire, for in three months after his accession we find Nebuchadnezzar laying siege to Jerusalem, as Jeremiah had predicted (Jer. 22:18–30). Immediately after Jehoiachin's succession the Egyptians were completely driven out of Asia, the fortresses S of Jerusalem were encircled, and numbers of the inhabitants of the lowlands carried away as prisoners. Jerusalem was at the time quite defenseless, and in a short time Jehoiachin surrendered (with the queen-mother and all his servants, captains, and officers) to Nebuchadnezzar, who carried them, with the eunuchs and harem, to Babylon (24:1). The number of captives is given in 2 Kings 24:14 as 10,000, including warriors, craftsmen, and others. Nebuchadnezzar also took the treasures found in the palace and Temple (v. 13) and placed Mattaniah, the only surviving son of Josiah, on the throne, changing his name to Zedekiah (24:14–17).

Jehoiachin was placed in prison in Babylon, where he remained for thirty-six years until the death of Nebuchadnezzar, when Evil-merodach not only released him but gave him a seat at his own table and an allowance for his support (2 Kings 25:27–30; Jer. 52:31–34), 561 B.C. We learn from 28:4 that four years after he had gone to Babylon there was an expectation at Jerusalem of Jehoiachin's return, but Jeremiah accuses Hananiah, who thus prophesied, of falsehood (v. 15). The tenor of Jeremiah's letter to the elders of the captivity (chap. 29) would seem to indicate that there was a party among the captivity who were looking for the overthrow of Nebuchadnezzar and the return of Jehoiachin. Neither Daniel nor Ezekiel makes any further allusion to him, except that Ezekiel dates his prophecies by the year "of King Jehoiachin's exile" (1:2; 8:1; 24:1; etc.), the latest date being the twenty-seventh year (29:17).

The archaeologist's spade has given remarkable minute corroboration of the biblical notices of Jehoiachin's captivity. In excavations near the Ishtar Gate of Babylon almost 300 clay tablets dating from 595–570 B.C. were recovered from some fourteen rooms. These important documents contain receipts of barley, oil, and other supplies that had been rationed to captive artisans and workmen exiled from many lands. King Jehoiachin appears as "Yaukin, king of the land of Yahud [Judah]" as the recipient of some of these rations. Moreover, the cuneiform tablets carry the names of Jehoiachin's five sons and their Jewish attendant, named Kenaiah. These tablets, discovered by E. F. Weidner, point to the fact that several of the sons were born before 592 B.C., with the eldest, Shealtiel, father of Zerubbabel, born c. 598 B.C. at the latest, which makes Zerubbabel at the time of the reconstruction of the second Temple (c. 520–516 B.C.) older than had been commonly supposed. In addition, three clay jar handles dug up at Beth-shemesh and Kiriath-Sepher (see Debir) were impressed with a seal in old Phoenician script "belonging to Eliakim, steward of Yaukin." This indicates that the crown property was in charge of Eliakim during Jehoiachin's exile and that Zedekiah, expecting a possible return of his royal nephew, did not seize the property of the rightful ruler (Biblical Archaeologist 5, no. 4, [Dec. 1942]).

JEHOI'ADA (je-hoyā-da; “Jehovah knows”).

1. The father of Benaiah, one of David's chief warriors (2 Sam. 8:18; 20:23; 23:20, 22; 1 Kings 1:8, 26, 32; etc.), before 1000 B.C. He is probably the same person mentioned as leader of 3,700 Aaronites who assisted David at Hebron (1 Chron. 12:27). In 27:34 his name seems to have been transposed with that of his son, although Keil (Com., ad loc.) suggests that the Jehoiada mentioned there was a grandson of this Jehoiada.

2. The high priest at the time of Athaliah's usurpation, about 842 B.C., and during most of the reign of Jehoash. He married Jehosheba, daughter of King Jehoram and sister of King Ahaziah. When Athaliah (which see) killed the royal family, Jehoiada with his wife stole and secreted Jehoash and after six years placed him on a throne. In this revolution Jehoiada showed great tact and ability. He waited until public sentiment seemed ripe for a change and then entered into secret alliance with the chief partisans of the house of David and of the true religion. He gathered at Jerusalem the Levites from the different cities and concentrated a large concealed force in the Temple by the expedient of not dismissing the old divisions of priests and Levites when their successors came to relieve them. These were armed by means of the shields and armor deposited in the Temple treasury by David, divided into three bands, and posted at the principal entrances. The courts were filled with people favorable to the cause, and then Jehoiada produced the young king, crowned and anointed him, and presented him with a copy of the law, according to Deut. 17:18–20. Nor did Jehoiada forget the sanctity of the Temple. None but the priests and ministering Levites were allowed to enter, and strict orders were given that Athaliah should not be slain within its precincts. The new reign was inaugurated by a solemn covenant between himself, as high priest, and the people and king to renounce the worship of Baal, which was followed by the destruction of the altar and temple of Baal and the death of his priest, Mattan. His influence over the young king was beneficial, and Jehoash ruled well and prosperously during Jehoiada's lifetime. The restoration of the Temple in the twenty-third year of Jehoash's reign was carried on under Jehoiada's supervision. For an account of this work see 2 Kings 11–12 and 2 Chron. 22:11–24:14. At length he died at the age of 130 (24:15–16) and, as a signal honor, was buried “in the city of David among the kings,” perhaps 798 B.C. He is, doubtless, the same as Berechiah (Matt. 23:35); his son, Zechariah, was slain by command of the king (2 Chron. 24:20–22).

3. The son of Paseah, apparently one of the chief priests who, with Meshullam, repaired the Old Gate of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:6), 446 B.C. The NIV renders the name Joiada (which see).

4. A priest who was in Jerusalem when the Jews were led into captivity, but who was displaced. Zephaniah was put in his stead (Jer. 29:26).

JEHOI'AKIM (je-hoy'a-kim; “Jehovah raises up”). The eighteenth king of the separate kingdom of Judah. His original name was Eliakim, but its equivalent, Jehoiakim, was given him by Pharaoh Neco, the Egyptian king. He was the second son of Josiah by Zebidah, the daughter of Pedaiah of Rumah (2 Kings 23:36), born about 633 B.C.

Made King. Jehoiakim's younger brother, Jehoahaz, or Shallum (Jer. 22:11), was made a king at the death of his father, Josiah. The intention, probably, was for him to follow up his father's policy in siding with Nebuchadnezzar against Egypt. Pharaoh Neco, having overcome all resistance with his victorious army, deposed Jehoahaz, made him a prisoner in Riblah, and afterward took him to Egypt. He set Eliakim upon the throne, 609 B.C., changing his name to Jehoiakim, and charged him with collecting a tribute of one hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold (nearly $200,000; 2 Kings 23:33–35; 2 Chron. 36:3–4).

Made a Vassal. After the battle of Carchemish, Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem and, taking the king prisoner, “bound him with bronze chains to take him to Babylon.” He also took “some of the articles of the house of the Lord” and carried them to the temple of Bel (his god) in Babylon (2 Chron. 36:6–7). Nebuchadnezzar for some reason seems to have abandoned his intention of conveying Jehoiakim to Babylon, and restored him to his throne as a vassal (2 Kings 24:1; Jer. 25:1).

Destroys the Roll. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim’s reign the prophet Jeremiah caused a collection of his prophecies to be written out by Baruch and publicly read in the Temple. This came to the knowledge of the king. He sent for it and had it read before him. He listened to only a small portion of it, then took the roll, and, cutting it in pieces, burned it in the fire. But Jeremiah was bidden to take another roll and write upon it the same words, with the addition of another and an awful denunciation (Jer. 36).

Rebellion and Death. After three years of subjection Jehoiakim, deluded by the Egyptian party in his court (cf. Josephus Ant. 10.6.2), withheld his tribute and rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings 24:1). This step was taken against the earnest protestation of Jeremiah and in violation of his oath. We are not informed as to what moved Jehoiakim to rebel, but it may be that seeing Egypt entirely severed from the affairs of Syria since the battle of Carchemish and Nebuchadnezzar wholly occupied with distant wars, he hoped to make himself entirely independent. His reign was now turbulent and unhappy. Bands of Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites came against him and cruelly harassed the country. It was perhaps at this time that the great drought occurred, as described in Jer. 14 (cf. chap. 15 with 2 Kings 24:2–3). In the closing years of his reign the Ammonites appear to have overrun the land of Gad (Jer. 49:1), and other nations ravaged Israel (Ezek. 25). Jehoiakim came to his end, as was predicted, in a violent manner, and his body was thrown over the wall, perhaps to convince the enemy of his death. It was afterward taken away and given an unhonored burial (Jer. 22:18–19; 36:30; 2 Kings 24:3–4), 597 B.C.

Character. Jehoiakim was a vicious and irreligious man, and one who encouraged the abominations of idolatry (Jer. 19, supposed to refer to his reign). The vindictive pursuit of Uriah (which see) and the indignities offered to his corpse by the king’s command are samples of his irreligion and cruelty (26:20–23). His daring impiety is shown by his treatment of the roll containing Jeremiah’s prophecy; and his selfishness is shown by his spending large sums in building magnificent palaces for himself when the land was impoverished by the tributes laid upon it by Egypt and Babylon (22:14–15).

JEHOI’ARIB (je-hoy’a-rib; “Jehovah will contend”). Head of the first of the twenty-four divisions of priests, as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:7), about 961 B.C. Some of his descendants returned from the Babylonian captivity (1 Chron. 9:10; Neh. 11:10, “Joiarib”). Jewish tradition asserts that only four of the divisions returned from Babylon, namely, Jedaiah, Immer, Pashhur, and Harim, and that they were subdivided into six each, to keep up the old number of twenty-four. But we find that other of the priestly divisions are mentioned as returning (Neh. 10:2–8), and in the list (12:1–7) that of Jehoiarib, or Joiarib (which see), as the name is abbreviated, is expressly mentioned.

JEHON’ADAB (je-hon’a-dab), Jonadab (jon’a-dab; “Jehovah is magnanimous”).

1. The son of Shimeah, nephew of David, and a friend of Amnon. He gave the latter the wicked advice that resulted in the ensnaring of Amnon's sister, Tamar (2 Sam. 13:3–5), about 974 B.C. When Amnon was murdered by Absalom, and the exaggerated report reached David that all the princes were slaughtered, Jonadab was aware of the facts, and, being with the king, assured him that Amnon alone was slain (vv. 32–33, 35).

2. A son (or descendant) of Rechab, the founder of a peculiar tribe who bound themselves to abstain from wine and never to relinquish the nomadic life. This mode of life, partly monastic, partly Bedouin, was adhered to from generation to generation, and when, many years after the death of Jehonadab, the Rechabites were forced to take refuge from the Chaldean invasion within the walls of Jerusalem, nothing would induce them to transgress the rule of their ancestor (Jer. 35:19). The single occasion in which Jehonadab appears before us in the historical narrative is in 2 Kings 10:15–16, about 842 B.C. Jehu was advancing, after the slaughter of Beth-eked, on the city of Samaria, and met Jehonadab. Upon being assured that he was in sympathy with the king, he was taken up into the chariot and entrusted with the king's secret, namely, the destruction of the Baalites. He then proceeded to Samaria in the royal chariot. It may be that Jehonadab had been commissioned by the people of Samaria to meet the king on the road and appease him. If so, his venerable character, his rank as head of a tribe, and his neutral position well qualified him for the task. No doubt he acted with Jehu throughout, but the only occasion in which he is expressly mentioned is when he went with Jehu through the temple of Baal to turn out any "servants of the Lord" who might happen to be in the mass of pagan worshipers (10:23).

JEHO'NATHAN (je-hō'na-than; "Jehovah has given"). The full Heb. form of the name Jonathan (which see), the eldest son of King Saul, and the name of several other biblical characters.

1. The name of one of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat through the cities of Judah to teach the law to the people (2 Chron. 17:8), 875 B.C.

2. The name of a priest (Neh. 12:18), and a representative of the family of Shemaiah (v. 6) in the days of Joiakim, after 536 B.C.

3. In the KJV of 1 Chron. 27:25, the name of the son of Uzziah, and superintendent of certain of King David's storehouses. The NASB and NIV read "Jonathan."

JEHO'RAM (je-hō'ram), Jo'ram (jo'ram; "Jehovah is high").

1. The son of Ahab and Jezebel, and successor of his brother Ahaziah, who died childless. He was the ninth king on the separate throne of Israel and reigned twelve years (2 Kings 1:17; 3:1), about 852–841 B.C. In 2 Kings 8:16 (NASB, KJV, NIV) and elsewhere in the KJV he is called Joram the son of Ahab king of Israel.

After the death of Ahab the Moabites, who had been tributary to Israel, asserted their independence; and their king, Mesha (which see), withheld his tribute of 100,000 lambs and the wool of 100,000 rams. Thereupon Jehoram asked and obtained the help of Jehoshaphat (king of Judah) in a war against the revolting Moabites. While marching through the wilderness of Edom the armies were in great danger due to lack of water. Jehoshaphat suggested an inquiry of some prophet of Jehovah, and Elisha was found. He severely rebuked Jehoram, and bade him inquire of the prophets of Baal, but afterward predicted a great victory over the Moabites. The king was directed to have many ditches dug in the valley and was assured that they would be filled immediately with water. The Moabites, advancing, saw the water reddened like blood with the rays of the morning sun, and concluding that the allies had fallen out and slain each other, advanced incautiously. They were put to rout, and their land utterly ravaged (2 Kings 3:1–25).

A little later war again broke out between Syria and Israel, and we find Elisha befriending Jehoram. The king was made acquainted with the secret counsels of the Syrian king and was thus enabled to defeat them; and the blinding of the Syrian soldiers by God stopped the invasion (2 Kings 6:8–23).

When the Syrian inroads ceased, it seems probable that Jehoram felt less dependent upon the aid of the prophet and relapsed into idolatry. He was most likely rebuked by Elisha and threatened with a return of the calamities from which he had escaped. When he refused to repent, a fresh invasion by the Syrians and a close siege of Samaria actually came to pass, according, probably, to the word of the prophet. Hence, when the terrible incident arose in consequence of the famine of a woman's boiling and eating her own child, the king immediately attributed the evil to Elisha, the son of Shaphat, and determined to take away his life. The providential interposition by which both Elisha's life was saved and the city delivered is narrated in 2 Kings 7, and Jehoram appears to have restored his friendship with Elisha (8:4).

It was soon after the events mentioned above that Elisha went to Damascus and predicted the revolt of Hazael and his accession to the throne of Syria. Jehoram seems to have thought the revolution in Syria, which immediately followed Elisha's prediction, a good opportunity to pursue his father's favorite project of recovering Ramoth-gilead from the Syrians. He accordingly made an alliance with his nephew Ahaziah, who had just succeeded Joram on the throne of Judah, and the two kings proceeded to occupy Ramoth-gilead by force. The expedition was an unfortunate one. Jehoram was wounded in battle and obliged to return to Jezreel to be healed of his wounds (2 Kings 8:29; 9:14–15), leaving his army under Jehu to hold Ramoth-gilead against Hazael. Jehu and the army under his command, however, revolted from their allegiance to Jehoram (chap. 9) and, hastily marching to Jezreel, surprised Jehoram, wounded and defenseless as he was. Going out to meet him, Jehoram fell pierced by an arrow from Jehu's bow on the very piece of ground that Ahab had wrested from Naboth the Jezreelite, thus fulfilling to the letter the prophecy of Elijah (1 Kings 21:21–29). The death of Jehoram ended the dynasty of Omri. Jehoram, like his father, was an idolater, laying aside his worship of Baal, probably after his rebuke by Elisha, but still clinging to the abominations of Jeroboam (12:26, 31–32).

2. Eldest son and successor of Jehoshaphat, and fifth king on the separate throne of Judah. He was crowned at the age of thirty-two; his sole regency lasted about eight years, 849–841 B.C. (2 Kings 8:16; 2 Chron. 21:1–6). Jehosheba, his daughter, was wife to the high priest Jehoiada. As soon as he was fixed on the throne he put his six brothers to death, with many of the chief nobles of the land. He then, probably due to the influence of his wife, Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab, proceeded to establish the worship of Baal (2 Kings 8:18–19). A prophetic writing from the aged prophet Elijah (2 Chron. 21:12–15) failed to produce any good effect upon him. This was in the first or second year of his reign. The remainder of it was a series of calamities. First the Edomites, who had been tributary to Jehoshaphat, revolted from his dominion and, according to old prophecies (Gen. 27:40), established their permanent independence. Next Libnah, one of the strongest fortified cities in Judah (2 Kings 19:8), rebelled against him. Then followed invasions by armed bands of Philistines and Arabians, who stormed the king's palace, put his wives and all his children except his youngest son, Ahaziah, to death (2 Chron. 22:1), or carried them into captivity, and plundered all his treasures. He died of a terrible disease (21:19–20) early in the twelfth year of his brother-in-law Jehoram's reign over Israel.

Jehoram was an impious and cruel tyrant, manifesting his impiety by the setting up of Baal worship in the high places and prostituting the daughters of Judah to the infamous rites of Ashteroth; and showing his cruelty by the murder of all his brothers—the first example of that abominable practice of avoiding a disputed succession.

3. One of the priests sent by Jehoshaphat to instruct the people in the law (2 Chron. 17:8), after 875 B.C.

JEHOSHAB'EATH (je-hō-shab'e-ath; "Jehovah is an oath"). The form in which the name of Jehosheba (which see) is given in 2 Chron. 22:11. It is stated here, but not in Kings, that she was the wife of Jehoiada, the high priest.

JEHOSH'APHAT (je-hosh'a-fat; "Jehovah judged"). The name of a king (see article below) of Judah and of other persons in the Bible.

1. Son of Ahilud, who filled the office of recorder or annalist in the courts of David (2 Sam. 8:16; 20:24; 1 Chron. 18:15) and Solomon (1 Kings 4:3), 985–984 B.C.

2. Son of Paruah, one of the twelve deputies of King Solomon (1 Kings 4:17). His district was Issachar, about 960 B.C.

3. Son of Nimshi and father of King Jehu (2 Kings 9:2, 14), before 842 B.C.

4. One of the priests appointed to blow trumpets before the Ark when it was carried from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:24), about 982 B.C. See Joshaphat.

JEHOSHAPHAT (je-hosh'a-fat; "Jehovah judged"). The fourth king of the separate kingdom of Judah, the son of Asa (by Azubah), whom he succeeded on the throne when he was thirty-five years old, and reigned twenty-five years (about 873–848; 1 Kings 22:42; 2 Chron. 20:31). His history is to be found among the events recorded in 1 Kings 15:24; 2 Kings 8:16, or in the continuous narrative in 2 Chron. 17:1–21:3. He was contemporary with Ahab, Ahaziah, and Jehoram.

Strengthens Himself. Jehoshaphat first strengthened himself against Israel by fortifying and garrisoning the cities of Judah and the Ephraimite conquests of Asa (2 Chron. 17:1–2). But soon afterward the two Hebrew kings, perhaps appreciating their common danger from Damascus and the tribes on their eastern frontier, formed an alliance. Jehoshaphat's eldest son, Jehoram, married Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel.

Resists Idolatry. In his own kingdom Jehoshaphat showed himself a zealous follower of the commandments of God; he tried, although it would seem not quite successfully, to put down the high places and groves in which the people of Judah burned incense (1 Kings 22:43; 2 Chron. 17:6; 20:33). In his third year he sent out certain officials, priests, and Levites to go through all the cities of Judah, teaching the people out of the book of the law (17:7–9). Riches and honors increased around him. He received tribute from the Philistines and Arabians, and kept up a large standing army in Jerusalem (17:10–19).

Alliance with Ahab. He went to Samaria to visit Ahab and become his ally against the Syrians. Desirous of consulting the Lord, Jehoshaphat had the prophet Micaiah sent for; but he did not make the impression upon Jehoshaphat that might have been expected, or else the king felt bound in honor not to recede. He came very near falling a victim to the plan that Ahab had laid for his own safety, but instead he escaped and returned to Jerusalem in peace (1 Kings 22:1–44; 2 Chron. 18:1–19:1). There he met the just reproaches of the prophet Jehu and went himself through the people, "from Beersheba to the hill country of Ephraim," reclaiming them to the law of God (2 Chron. 19:2–4).

Further Reforms. He tried to remedy the many defects in the local administration of justice. He appointed judges in every city, and a supreme council at Jerusalem composed of priests, Levites, and "the heads of the fathers' households," to which difficult cases were referred and appeals brought from the provincial tribunals (2 Chron. 19:5–11).

Commerce. Turning his attention to foreign commerce, he built at Ezion-geber, with the help of Ahaziah, a navy designed to go to Ophir; but it was wrecked at Ezion-geber. He afterward, through the advice of Eliezer the prophet, declined the cooperation of the king of Israel, and the voyage prospered. The trade was, however, soon abandoned (2 Chron. 20:35–37; 1 Kings 22:49).

Wars. After the death of Ahaziah king of Israel, Jehoram, his successor, persuaded Jehoshaphat to join him in an expedition against Moab. The allied armies were saved by a miraculous supply of water and were afterward victorious over the enemy (2 Kings 3:4–27). Another war, and to Jehoshaphat a much more dangerous one, was kindled by this. The Moabites turned their wrath against him and induced the Ammonites, the Syrians, and the Edomites to unite with them. Jehoshaphat, believing that his help was to come from God, proclaimed a fast, and the people assembled in Jerusalem to implore divine assistance. “Then Jehoshaphat stood in the assembly of Judah and Jerusalem, in the house of the Lord before the new court, and he said, ‘O Lord, the God of our fathers, . . . O our God, wilt thou not judge them? For we are powerless before this great multitude who are coming against us; nor do we know what to do, but our eyes are on Thee.’” After he ceased praying Jahaziel, a Levite, pronounced deliverance in the name of the Lord, assuring Judah of the overthrow of the enemy without a blow from them. And so it happened; the allies quarreled among themselves and destroyed each other. This great event was recognized by the surrounding nations as the act of God, and they allowed Jehoshaphat to close his life in quiet (2 Chron. 20). During the last years of his reign his son Jehoram (which see) was associated with him in the government. His name occurs in the ancestral list of our Lord (Matt. 1:8).

Character. The character of Jehoshaphat is summed up thus: “Jehoshaphat, who sought the Lord with all his heart” (2 Chron. 22:9). His good talents, the benevolence of his disposition, and his generally sound judgment are shown not only in the great measures of domestic policy that distinguished his reign, but by the manner in which they were executed. No trace can be found in him of the pride that dishonored some and ruined others of the kings who preceded and followed him.

JEHOSHAPHAT (je-hosh’a-fat), Valley of. The name given to the valley situated between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives, which in modern times has been used by the Jews as a burying ground. This is a typical use of the word, in a sense of divine judgments upon the enemies of God and His people (Joel 3:2, 12). In this valley Jehoshaphat overthrew the united enemies of Israel (2 Chron. 20:26, “valley of Beracah”).

From about the fourth century A.D. the valley of Jehoshaphat has been identified with the Kidron. This identification is based on Joel 3:2, 12 and particularly Zech. 14, but since no actual valley bore this name in pre-Christian antiquity, Joel’s prophetic employment of it is figurative of the place where the judgment of the nations will take place prior to Christ’s second advent and the setting up of the millennial kingdom.

JEHOSH’EBA (je-hosh’e-ba; “Jehovah her oath,” that is, worshiper of Jehovah). The daughter of Joram, sister of Ahaziah, aunt of Joash, all kings of Judah, and wife of Jehoiada the high priest (2 Kings 11:2). Her name in the Chronicles (2 Chron. 22) is sometimes given as Jehoshabeath. As she is called (2 Kings 11:2) “the daughter of King Joram, sister of Ahaziah,” it has been conjectured that she was the daughter, not of Athaliah, but of Joram by another wife. By her the infant Joash was rescued from the massacre of the royal seed by Athaliah, and he and his nurse hid in the palace and afterward in the Temple (2 Kings 11:2–3; 2 Chron. 22:11–12).

JEHOZ'ABAD (je-hoz'a-bad; "Jehovah endowed").

1. The son of Shomer (or Shimrith), a Moabitess, and one of the two servants who assassinated King Jehoash of Judah in that part of Jerusalem called Millo (2 Kings 12:21; 2 Chron. 24:26), about 797 B.C.

2. A Korahite Levite, second son of Obed-edom, and one of the gatekeepers of the S gate of the Temple and of the storehouse appointed by David (1 Chron. 26:4, 15), about 967 B.C.

3. The last named of Jehoshaphat's generals, who had the command of 180,000 troops (2 Chron. 17:18), about 875 B.C.

JEHOZ'ADAK (je-hoz'a-dak; "Jehovah has justified," contracted "Jozadak" in Ezra and Nehemiah and as "Josedeck" in the KJV of Haggai and Zechariah). Son of the high priest Seraiah at the time of the Babylonian captivity (1 Chron. 6:14), 588 B.C. Whether he succeeded to the high priesthood after the slaughter of his father (2 Kings 25:18–21) is not known, but if he did he had no opportunity of performing the functions of his office, as he was carried to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar (1 Chron. 6:15). He probably died in exile, as his son Joshua (Jeshua) was the first high priest who officiated after the return from captivity (Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; 10:18; Neh. 12:26; Hag. 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2, 4; Zech. 6:11).

JE'HU (jē'hū; Gesenius, "Jehovah is He"). A king of Israel (see article below) and four other persons in the Bible.

1. The son of Hanani; a prophet of Judah, but whose ministrations were chiefly directed to Israel. His father was probably the seer who rebuked Asa (2 Chron. 16:7). He must have begun his career as a prophet when young. He first denounced Baasha (1 Kings 16:1, 7) and then, after an interval of thirty years, reappeared to reprove Jehoshaphat for his alliance with Ahab (2 Chron. 19:2–3). He survived Jehoshaphat and wrote about his life (20:34), about 879–850 B.C.

2. The son of Obed and father of Azariah, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:38).

3. A Simeonite, son of Joshibiah, and one of the leading Simeonites who moved into the valley of Gedor in search of pasture during the reign of Hezekiah. They attacked and dispossessed the original inhabitants (1 Chron. 4:35, 39–41), about 713 B.C.

4. An Anathothite, one of the chief of the slingers of Benjamin, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:3), before 1000 B.C.

JEHU (jē'hū; Gesenius, "Jehovah is He"). The eleventh king of the separate kingdom of Israel. He was the son of Jehoshaphat (2 Kings 9:2) and the grandson of Nimshi, although sometimes called the latter's son (1 Kings 19:16). The first appearance of Jehu is his memory of riding with Bidkar, now his officer, behind Ahab on the journey from Samaria to Jezreel (2 Kings 9:25). Elijah was commanded at Horeb to anoint him king, but, for unknown reasons, did not do so (1 Kings 19:16–17).

Anointed King. Jehu meantime, in the reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram, had risen to importance. He was under the last named king, captain of the armed forces in the siege of Ramoth-gilead. While Jehu was in the midst of the officers of the besieging army, a wild-looking youth suddenly entered and insisted on a private interview with him. They retired into a secret chamber. The youth uncovered a vial of sacred oil, poured it over Jehu's head, and after announcing to him the message from Elisha—that he was appointed to be king of Israel and destroyer of the house of Ahab—rushed out of the house and disappeared. Jehu's countenance as he reentered the assembly of officers showed that some strange tidings had reached him. He tried at first to evade their questions but then revealed the situation in which he found himself placed by the prophetic call. In a moment the enthusiasm of members of the army took fire. They threw their garments under his feet so as to form a rough carpet, then blew the royal salute on their trumpets, and thus ordained him king (2 Kings 9:1–13), c. 841 B.C.

Slays the Kings. Jehu accepted the kingdom and immediately began to make it secure. He cut off all communication between Ramoth-gilead and Jezreel and set off at full speed with Bidkar, whom he had made captain of his army. Jehoram was there (suffering from wounds received at the hands of the Syrians), as well as Ahaziah, king of Judah, who had come to see him. The watchman told of the coming of a company, and as it neared the city he announced to the kings that “the driving is like the driving of Jehu, ... for he drives furiously.” When near the city the alarm was taken, and the two kings hastened out and met Jehu in the field of Naboth. In answer to the question of Jehoram, “Is it peace, Jehu?” the latter replied, “What peace, so long as the harlotries of your mother Jezebel and her witchcrafts are so many?” Then he drew his bow and shot Jehoram, while his followers pursued and mortally wounded Ahaziah. Jehu advanced to Jezreel and fulfilled the divine warning on Jezebel. The queen appeared at the palace window as if to welcome Jehu, but he shouted, “Who is on my side? Who?” Two eunuchs appeared, and at his command they threw her from the window (2 Kings 9:14–37).

Destroys House of Ahab. Jehu then sent a letter to the rulers, challenging them to set up one of the young princes as king and fight out the matter. They replied that they were ready to submit to him; whereupon he ordered them to appear the next day with the heads of all the royal princes of Samaria, which they did. He explained that he must be regarded as the appointed minister of the divine decrees against the house of Ahab and proceeded to slay all the officers of the late government who would most likely disturb his own reign (2 Kings 10:1–11). Proceeding to Samaria he met forty-two sons (or nephews) of Ahaziah, king of Judah, and put them to the sword (10:12–14; 2 Chron. 22:8).

Destroys Baalites. On his way to Samaria he met Jehonadab, the Rechabite, to whom he confided his purpose of exterminating the Baalites. Arriving at Samaria, he announced that he was to be even more enthusiastic in the service of Baal than Ahab had been and summoned the Baalites to come and sacrifice to that god. When they were assembled in the temple, clad in their sacerdotal garments, Jehu offered the chief sacrifice; Jehonadab joined in the deception. At a concerted signal the eighty trusted guards fell upon and massacred the worshipers and thus at one blow exterminated the heathen population of Israel. The temple and image of Baal were demolished, and the sanctuary became a latrine (2 Kings 10:15–28).

Sin and Punishment. Jehu sinned against God in not overturning the golden calves worshiped in Bethel and Dan, and thus continued in the sin of Jeroboam. For this it was foretold that his dynasty should only extend to four generations.

His Wars. After his violent political and religious purge in Israel, Jehu incurred the implacable hatred of Hazael (which see) of Damascus by submitting to Shalmaneser III, king of Assyria, in the Assyrian invasion of 841 B.C., rather than joining Syria in a coalition against the encroachments of “the giant of the Semites.” The Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III, which Austen Layard found in the imperial palace at Nimrod, displays Jehu, or his deputy, actually prostrating himself before the Assyrian emperor. The accompanying inscription reads: “Tribute of Iaua (Jehu), son of Omri. Silver, gold, a golden bowl, a golden beaker, golden goblets, pitchers of gold, lead, staves for the hand of the king. Javelins I received from him” (D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, (1927), vol. 1, sec. 590). But Assyrian withdrawal for the time from the west and Hazael’s growing power must have made Jehu lament his Assyrian appeasement policy. The Aramaeans began to thresh Gilead and Bashan “with implements of sharp iron” (2 Kings 10:32–33; Amos 1:3–4) before Jehu died, around 814 B.C. M.F.U.

Character. Jehu was a positive and ambitious character; quick to decide upon a plan of action and equally ready in execution. He was prudent, calculating, and passionless. The narrative justifies us, we think, in judging that his zeal for God was regulated much by God's zeal for him. "He must be regarded, like many others in history, as an instrument for accomplishing great purposes rather than as great or good in himself. In the long period during which his destiny, though known to others and perhaps to himself, lay dormant; in the ruthlessness with which he carried out his purposes; in the union of profound silence and dissimulation with a stern, fanatic, wayward zeal, he has not been without his likenesses in modern times" (Smith, Dict., s.v.).

JEHUB'BAH (je-hub'a; "hidden"). A man of Asher, son of Shemer, or Shomer, of the house of Beriah (1 Chron. 7:34). The NIV reads Hubbah for Jehubbah.

JEHU'CAL (je-hū'kal; "Jehovah is able"). The son of Shelemiah, and the person who was sent with Zephaniah by King Hezekiah to Jeremiah to request that he would pray to the Lord on behalf of the kingdom (Jer. 37:3). He afterward joined with his associates in requesting the death of the prophet because of his unfavorable response (38:4), in which verse he is called one of the "officials." In 38:1 his name is given in the abbreviated form Jucal.

JE'HUD (jē'hud; "praise"). A town on the border of Dan, named between Baalath and Bene-berak (Josh. 19:45). The modern site is Yazūr, five miles SE of Joppa.

JEHU'DI (je-hū'di; "a man of Judah, a Jew"). The son of Nethaniah, sent by the officials of Jehoiakim's court to bring Baruch to read Jeremiah's denunciation (Jer. 36:14), and then by the king to fetch the volume itself and read it to him (vv. 21, 23), 608 B.C.

JEHUDI'JAH (je-hū-di'ja; "Jewess"). Probably the wife of Mered (1 Chron. 4:18). The KJV renders this word as a proper name, whereas it most likely refers merely to the fact that she was a Jewess (NASB, "his Jewish wife"). She is the mother of Jered, Heber, and Jekuthiel.

JE'HUSH. See Jeush, no. 3.

JEI'EL (je-i'-el).

1. A Reubenite of the house of Joel at the time of the taking of some census, apparently on the deportation of the trans-Jordanic tribes by Tiglath-pileser (1 Chron. 5:7), about 740 B.C.

2. A Benjamite, apparently the founder ("father"), as well as a resident, of Gibeon, and the husband of Maacah. A number of his sons are named (1 Chron. 8:29–31, where the name is supplied by the NASB and NIV translators; 9:35–37, where the name replaces KJV Jehiel).

3. The son of Hothan, an Aroerite, and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:44; the name replaces KJV Jehiel), 993 B.C.

4. A Merarite Levite appointed by David to assist in the removal of the Ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 16:5). He is probably the same as the one mentioned in the same verse as a performer on "instruments of music, harps, lyres," and identical with the gatekeeper (15:18) and musician (v. 21), about 982 B.C.

5. A Levite, and great-grandfather of Jehaziel, who predicted success to Jehoshaphat against the Ammonites and Moabites (2 Chron. 20:14), considerably before 875 B.C.

6. The scribe who, with others, kept the account of the numbers of King Uzziah's troops (2 Chron. 26:11), about 769 B.C.

7. A Levite of the sons of Elizaphan who assisted in the restoration of the Temple under King Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:13), 719 B.C.

8. One of the chief Levites in the time of Josiah who assisted in the rites of the great Passover (2 Chron. 35:9), about 639 B.C.

9. An Israelite of the “sons” of Nebo who had taken a foreign wife and had to relinquish her (Ezra 10:43), 457 B.C.

10. In the KJV of Ezra 8:13, one of those who returned with Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem. See Jeuel.

JEKAB´ZEEL (je-kab´zēl; “God will gather”). A town in Judah (Neh. 11:25), probably identical with Kabzeel (which see).

JEKAME´AM (jek-a-mē´am; “the people will rise”). A Levite, the fourth in rank of the “sons” of Hebron in the Levitical arrangement established by David (1 Chron. 23:19; 24:23), about 960 B.C.

JEKAMI´AH (jek-a-mī´a; “Jehovah will rise”).

1. The son of Shallum and father of Elishama, of the descendants of Sheshan of Judah (1 Chron. 2:41), probably about 588 B.C.

2. The fifth named of the sons of King Jeconiah (1 Chron. 3:18; “Jecamiah,” KJV), born to him during the captivity, after 597 B.C.

JEKU´THIEL (jekū´thi-el; “God will support,” cf. Arab. qata, to “sustain, nourish”). A man recorded in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. 4:18) as the son of Mered by his Jewish wife (see Jehudijah), and in his turn the father, or founder, of the town of Zanoah.

JEMI´MA (je-mī´ma; a “pigeon, dove”), Jemimah (NASB and NIV). The name of the first of the three daughters born to Job after his restoration to prosperity (Job 42:14).

JEM´UEL (jem´ū-el; “day of God”). The eldest son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Ex. 6:15); elsewhere (Num. 26:12) called Nemuel.

JEPH´THAH (jef´tha; “he will open”). The ninth judge of Israel, the illegitimate son of Gilead.

A Marauder. In consequence of his illegitimacy, he was banished from his father’s house and took up his residence at Tob, a district of Syria, not far from Gilead (Judg. 11:1–3). It was here that he became head of a marauding party, and when a war broke out between the Israelites and the Ammonites, he probably made a name for himself.

Leader of Israel. This induced the Israelites to seek his aid as commander; and though at first he refused in consequence of their ill-treatment of him, yet on their solemn covenant to regard him as their leader, he consented. In this capacity he was successful and, in a war that soon followed, the Ammonites were defeated with great loss (11:3–33). On the eve of the battle he made a vow (vv. 30–31) that whatever should come forth from his house first to meet him on his return home he would devote to God. This turned out to be his daughter, an only child, who welcomed his return with music and dancing (see below).

Quarrel with Ephraimites. His victory over the Ammonites was followed by a quarrel with the Ephraimites, who challenged his right to go to war without their consent and used threatening language toward him. Jephthah remonstrated with them and then, gathering his forces, fought and defeated them in battle. The Gileadites then seized the fords of Jordan and made those attempting to cross pronounce the word Shibboleth; but if anyone pronounced it “Sibboleth,” they knew him to be an Ephraimite and killed him on the spot (12:1–6).

Rule and Death. The remainder of Jephthah’s rule seems to have been peaceful, lasting about six years (c. 1105–1099 B.C.). He was buried in his native region, in one of the cities of Gilead (12:7).

Character. Jephthah appears to have been a daring, fearless man, skilled in war, quick to avenge injuries, and ready to defend the helpless as well as to forgive wrong. He does not seem to have been rash and impetuous, notwithstanding his vow, for he did not take up the sword at once, but waited until negotiations with the king of the Ammonites had been without effect.

His Vow. Volumes have been written on what is generally termed “Jephthah’s rash vow”; the question is whether, in doing to his daughter according to his vow, he actually offered her as a sacrifice. That he really did so is a horrible conclusion but one that it seems impossible to avoid. The following may be taken as a summary of the arguments on both sides.

In favor of actual sacrifice, the following arguments are urged: (1) The express terms of the narrative, “I will offer it up as a burnt offering,” and he “did to her according to the vow.” (2) The fact that Jephthah was half heathen and that the circumstances took place where the heathen dwelt in great numbers and where human sacrifices were not unknown. (3) That Jephthah’s excessive grief on seeing his daughter come forth to meet him can only be accounted for on the supposition that he considered her devoted to death. (4) That the mourning for Jephthah’s daughter for four days in the year can be reconciled only with the supposition that she was an actual sacrifice. (5) That there is nothing in the history to show that his conduct was sanctioned by God.

In opposition it is urged: (1) By translating the Heb. prefix (which is rendered and in our version) to or, all difficulty will be removed. His words would then read, “shall be the Lord’s, or I will offer it up as a burnt offering”; and not infrequently the sense requires that the Heb. should be thus rendered (Lev. 27:28) where there is a similar meaning of the conjunctive waw. (2) He cannot be understood as declaring an intention to offer a burnt offering whatever might come forth to meet him, since he might have been met by what no law or custom permitted to be so offered. (3) The sacrifice of children to Molech is expressly forbidden and declared an abomination to the Lord (Lev. 20:2–3); and it would be a yet higher insult to offer them to the Lord. (4) There is no precedent for such an offering. (5) No father by his own authority could put even an offending child to death, much less one that was innocent (Deut. 21:18–21; 1 Sam. 14:24–45). (6) It is said he did to her “according to the vow which he had made,” and “she had no relations with a man,” which conveys the idea that she was devoted to a life of celibacy; and that what the daughters of Israel bewailed was not her death, but her celibacy, for she “wept on the mountains because of her virginity” (Judg. 11:38–40). There appears to have been a class of women devoted exclusively to the Temple service who were Nazirites (Ex. 38:8); to this company of females reference is made in 1 Sam. 2:22 (see also Luke 2:37). To such a company of devoted women Jephthah’s daughter might be set apart. One of the strongest points on this side of the argument is that the Heb. word lethanoth, rendered “wept,” rather meant “to celebrate.” Therefore, these daughters of Israel went yearly, not to lament, but with songs of praise to celebrate the daughter of Jephthah. The prominence given to the daughter’s virginity, as an argument against Jephthah’s sacrifice, we think is hardly warranted. It is probably mentioned to give greater force to the sacrifice, as it would leave him without descendants, which in the East was considered a special misfortune (G. H. A. von Ewald, Hist. of Israel; K. & D., Com.; Robertson, Early Religion of Israel; McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia; Smith, Bib. Dict.; and others).

JEPHUN'NEH (je-fun'e; "he is ready").

1. The father of Caleb, which latter was a faithful explorer of Canaan with Joshua, and a Kenizzite (Num. 13:6; 14:6, 30, 38; 26:65; 32:12; 34:19; Deut. 1:36; Josh. 14:6, 13–14; 15:13; 21:12; 1 Chron. 4:15; 6:56), before 1414 B.C.

2. One of the sons of Jether, of the descendants of Asher (1 Chron. 7:38), probably before 1017 B.C.

JE'RAH (je'ra; "moon, month"). The fourth son of Joktan (Gen. 10:26; 1 Chron. 1:20). "God will" be "compassionate."

JERAH'MEEL (je-ra'mēl; "God will" be "compassionate").

1. The firstborn son of Hezron, son of Perez, son of Judah (1 Chron. 2:9). His descendants were called Jerahmeelites (1 Sam. 27:10; 30:29).

2. A Merarite Levite, the representative of the family of Kish, probably the son of Mahli (1 Chron. 24:29; cf. 23:21), about 960 B.C.

3. In the NASB and NIV, "the king's son" employed by Jehoiakim, after he had burned the roll of Jeremiah's prophecy, to make Jeremiah and Baruch prisoners (Jer. 36:26), about 608 B.C. In the KJV this person is described as the son of Hammelech.

JERAH'MEELITE (je-ra'mēl-īt; 1 Sam. 27:10; 30:29). Descendants of Jerahmeel, no. 1.

JE'RED (je'red; "descent"). A son, apparently, of Mered, of the tribe of Judah, by his Jewish wife (see Jehudijah). He is named as the father (founder) of Gedor (1 Chron. 4:18), perhaps about 1640 B.C.

See also Jared, for the person named in 1 Chron. 1:2.

JER'EMAI (jer'e-mī; "high"). One of the "sons" of Hashum who divorced his wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:33), 457 B.C.

JEREMI'AH (jer-e-mī'a; "Jehovah will lift up, exalt," or "will rise"). The name of the great prophet (see article below) and of eight other persons in the Bible.

1. An inhabitant of Libnah, the father of Hamutal, wife of Josiah, and mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah (2 Kings 23:31; 24:18; Jer. 52:1), before 608 B.C.

2. One of the chief men of the tribe of Manasseh E, apparently about the time of its deportation by the Assyrians (1 Chron. 5:24), about 727 B.C.

3. One of the Benjamite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:4), before 1000 B.C.

4 and 5. The fifth and tenth in rank of the Gadite adventurers who joined David's troops in the wilderness (1 Chron. 12:10, 13), before 1000 B.C.

6. One of the priests who signed the sacred covenant along with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:2); probably the same as one of those who followed the princes in the circuit of the newly repaired walls with the sound of trumpets (12:34), 445 B.C.

NASB New American Standard Bible

NIV New International Version

KJV King James Version

7. A priest who accompanied Zerubbabel from Babylon to Jerusalem (Neh. 12:1). It is probably himself or his division that is mentioned in v. 12, 536 B.C.

8. The son of Habazziniah and father of Jaazaniah, which last was one of the Rechabites whom the prophets tested with the offer of wine (Jer. 35:3), before 626 B.C.

JEREMIAH (jer-e-mī'a; "Jehovah will lift up, exalt," or "will rise").

The second of the greater prophets of the OT. He was the son of Hilkiah, a priest of Anathoth, in the land of Benjamin (Jer. 1:1). Many writers, both ancient and modern, have supposed that his father was the Hilkiah mentioned in 2 Kings 22:8. Against this hypothesis, however, there have been urged (Keil, Ewald, Orelli, and others) the following facts: (1) that the name is too common to be a ground of identification; (2) that the manner in which Hilkiah is mentioned is inconsistent with the notion of his having been the high priest of Israel; (3) that neither Jeremiah himself nor his opponents allude to him; and (4) that the priests who lived at Anathoth (1 Kings 2:26) were of the house of Ithamar, while from Zadok down they were of the line of Eleazar.

Early Life. The word of the Lord came to Jeremiah while he was still young (Jer. 1:6) and happened in the thirteenth year of the reign of King Josiah (626 B.C.), while the prophet still lived in Anathoth. He appears to have remained in his native city until he was obliged to leave in order to escape the persecution of his fellow townsmen (11:21) and even of his own family (12:6). He then took up his residence at Jerusalem.

Under Josiah. He probably assisted King Josiah in the reformation effected during his reign (2 Kings 23:1–2). The movement on behalf of true religion ceased as soon as the influence of the court was withdrawn, and the prophet bewailed the death of this prince as the precursor of the divine judgments for the national sins (2 Chron. 35:25).

Under Jehoahaz. The short reign—three months—of this king gave little scope for prophetic action, and we hear nothing of Jeremiah during this period.

Under Jehoiakim. The king (608–597 B.C.) had come to the throne as the vassal of Egypt, and for a time the Egyptian party was dominant in Jerusalem. Jeremiah appeared as the chief representative of the party that favored the supremacy of the Chaldeans as the only way of safety. In so doing he had to expose himself to the suspicion of treachery, and was interrupted in his ministry by "the priests and the prophets," who, with the populace, brought him before the civil authorities, urging that capital punishment should be inflicted on him for his prophecies (Jer. 26). The officials of Judah endeavored to protect him and appealed to the precedent of Micah the Moresheth, who had uttered a similar prophecy in the reign of Hezekiah; and so for a time he escaped. Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, seems to have had some influence in securing the prophet's safety. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim Jeremiah was commanded to write the predictions that he had been given (chap. 36). Probably as a measure of safety he was, as he says, "restricted," and could not himself go to the house of the Lord. He therefore enlisted Baruch to write the predictions and to read them publicly on the fast day. Baruch was summoned before the officials, who advised that both he and Jeremiah should conceal themselves while they endeavored to influence the mind of the king by reading the roll to him. Jehoiakim read the three or four leaves and then destroyed the roll. He gave orders for the immediate arrest of Baruch and Jeremiah, who, however, were preserved from the angry king. The prophet, at the command of God, rewrote the roll, adding "many similar words" (v. 32). To this period is assigned the prophecy in the valley of Ben-hinnom (chap. 19) and his ill treatment at the hand of Pashhur (which see).

Under Jehoiachin. We still find Jeremiah uttering his voice of warning during the closing days of the reign of Jehoiakim and the short reign of his successor, Jehoiachin (598 B.C.; Jer. 13:18; cf. 2 Kings 24:12; Jer. 22:24–30). He sent a letter of counsel and condolence to those who shared the captivity of the royal family (chaps. 29–31).

Under Zedekiah. In the fourth year (594 B.C.) of this monarch's reign Hananiah prophesied that the power of the Chaldeans would be destroyed and the captives restored from Babylon (Jer. 28:3); he corroborated his prophecy by taking off from the neck of Jeremiah the yoke that he wore by divine command (v. 10; cf. 27:2). Jeremiah was told to "go and speak to Hananiah, saying, 'Thus says the Lord, 'You have broken the yokes of wood, but you have made instead of them yokes of iron.'" For thus says the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, "I have put a yoke of iron on the neck of all these nations, that they may serve Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon" "' (28:13–14). It was probably not until the latter part of the reign of Zedekiah that the prophet was put in the confinement, as we find that "they had not yet put him in the prison" when the army of Nebuchadnezzar commenced the siege of Jerusalem (37:4–5). Jeremiah had declared what the fatal issue would be (chap. 24) and was incarcerated in the court of the prison adjoining the palace, where he predicted the certain return from the impending captivity (32:37). Jeremiah's suffering reached its climax under this king, especially during the siege of Jerusalem. The approach of the Egyptian army and the consequent withdrawal for a time of the Chaldeans brightened the prospects of the Jews, and the king entreated Jeremiah to pray to the Lord for them. The answer received from God was that the Egyptians would go to their own land and that the Chaldeans would return and destroy the city (37:7–8). This irritated the officials, who made the departure of Jeremiah from the city the pretext of accusing him of deserting to the Chaldeans. In spite of his denial, he was cast into prison where he would doubtless have perished but for the intervention of Ebed-melech, one of the royal eunuchs (37:12–38:13). The king seems to have been favorably inclined toward the prophet, but, for fear of the officials, consulted with him secretly (38:14–28). In one of these secret interviews Jeremiah obtained a milder imprisonment in the guardhouse belonging to the royal citadel where he was given "a loaf of bread daily from the baker's street, until all the bread in the city was gone" (37:17–21). While in prison he bought, with all requisite formalities, the field at Anathoth that his kinsman Hanamel wished to get rid of (32:6–9), thus showing his faith in his country's future.

Under Nebuchadnezzar. Nebuchadnezzar took the city (586 B.C.; Albright's date, 587), and gave a special charge to his captain, Nebuzaradan, to free Jeremiah and to obey his request (39:11–12). He was, accordingly, delivered from the prison and the choice given him either to go to Babylon or remain with his own people. He chose the latter and went to Mizpah with Gedaliah, who had been appointed governor of Judea. After the murder of Gedaliah he advised Johanan, the recognized leader of the people, to remain in the land (42:7–22). The people refused to heed his advice under the plea that he was acting in the interest of the Chaldeans, went to Egypt "as far as Tahpanhes," and took Jeremiah and Baruch with them (43:6–7). While there he still sought to turn the people who had so long rebelled against the Lord back to Him (chap. 44). His writings give us no further information respecting his life, but it is probable that he died in Egypt soon after.

Traditions. There is a Christian tradition that Jeremiah was stoned to death by the Jews at Tahpanhes. An Alexandrian tradition reported that his bones had been brought to that city by Alexander the Great. On the other hand, there is the Jewish statement that, on the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, he, with Baruch, made his escape to Babylon and died there in peace.

Archaeology. In 1935 J. L. Starkey discovered eighteen ostraca with Heb. writing in the ancient Phoenician script in a guardroom adjoining the outer gate of the city of Lachish (cf. Harry Torczyner, Lachish I: The Lachish Letters, 1938; W. F. Albright, Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 70 [April 1938]: 11–17). Additional ostraca were found in the last campaign in 1938. These letters were written by a certain Hoshaiiah, who was at some military outpost, to a man named Jaosh, evidently the high commanding officer at Lachish. Nebuchadnezzar had attacked and partly burned Lachish about a decade previously in Jehoiachin's reign. These letters, however, belong to the layer of ashes representing the final destruction of the city and are to be dated early in 588 B.C. when Nebuchadnezzar was beginning his final siege of Jerusalem together with that of Lachish and Azekah. These so-called Lachish Letters have immense paleographic value and shed much historical light on the time of Jeremiah. The Heb. names and expressions used, such as "weakening the hands of the people," remind us of Jer. 38:4. M.F.U.

Character. "In every page of Jeremiah's prophecies we recognize the temperament which, while it does not lead the man who has it to shrink from doing God's work, however painful, makes the pain of doing it infinitely more acute, and gives to the whole character the impress of a deeper and more lasting melancholy. He is preeminently 'the man that hath seen afflictions'" (Lam. 3:1). He reveals himself in his writings "as a soul of gentle nature, yielding, tenderhearted, affectionate, with almost a woman's thirst for love, with which certainly the iron, unbending firmness, and immovable power of resistance belonging to him in his prophetic sphere are in strange contrast" (Orelli, Com., p. 11).

JEREMIAH, BOOK OF. The prophecies of Jeremiah are named after the prophet himself, Yirmeyahu or Yirmeyah. His ministry extended over the last tragic forty years of the kingdom of Judah to the destruction of Jerusalem and the deportation of its inhabitants to Babylon.

Purpose. The prophetic oracles of Jeremiah constitute a stern warning to Judah and its capital city, Jerusalem, to abandon idolatry and apostasy in order to escape the inevitable consequence of the seventy-year Babylonian captivity (25:1–14). The prophet's sermons met with intense opposition from a society fanatically addicted to idolatry. The brave prophet, however, discharged his ministry despite continual persecution and danger of death. The tense three-sided contest for world dominion between Assyria, Egypt, and Babylon forms the background of his prophetic career. Because he predicted the triumph of Babylon and the consequent captivity of Judah, with repeated warning against a useless alliance with Egypt, he incurred almost universal disfavor. A note of doom dominates his message. Against this dark background, passages setting forth messianic hope flash through his prophecies. These great foregleams of a better day (cf. 23:5–7; 30:4–11; 31:31–34; 33:15–18) point to the final restoration of Israel. This is not to be confused, however, with the restoration from Babylon, but points to a period of unparalleled tragedy (30:3–10) and the manifestation of David's "righteous Branch ... The Lord our Righteousness" (23:5–6; 30:9). These great messianic prophecies are yet to be fulfilled (Acts 1:7; 15:14–18) in the future millennial kingdom (Rom. 11:15–29).

Outline.

- I. Introduction: The prophet's call (1:1–19)
- II. Prophetic oracles against Jerusalem and Judah (2:1–45:5)

A. In the reign of Josiah and Jehoiakim (1:1–20:18)

First oracle—national sin and ingratitude (2:1–3:5)

Second oracle—destruction from the north (3:6–6:30)

Third oracle—threat of exile (7:1–10:25)

Fourth oracle—the broken covenant and the sign of the waistband (11:1–13:27)

Fifth oracle—the drought (14:1–15:21); the sign of the unmarried prophet (16:1–17:18); warning regarding the Sabbath (17:19–27)

Sixth oracle—sign of the potter's house (18:1–20:18)

B. During various periods until Jerusalem's destruction (21:1–39:18)

- Zedekiah and the people's punishment (21:1–29:32)
- Future messianic kingdom (30:1–33:26)
- Sin of Zedekiah; the loyalty of the Rechabites (34:1–35:19)
- Jehoiachin's opposition (36:1–32)
- Jerusalem's experiences during the siege (37:1–39:18)
- C. After the fall of Jerusalem (40:1–45:5)
 - Jeremiah's ministry to the remnant in the land (40:1–42:22)
 - Jeremiah's ministry in Egypt (43:1–44:30)
 - Jeremiah's message to Baruch (45:1–5)

III. Prophecies against the nations (46:1–51:64)

- A. Against Egypt (46:1–28)
- B. Against Philistia (47:1–7)
- C. Against Moab (48:1–47)
- D. Against Ammon (49:1–6)
- E. Against Edom (49:7–22)
- F. Against Damascus (49:23–27)
- G. Against Arabia (49:28–33)
- H. Against Elam (49:34–39)
- I. Against Babylon (50:1–51:64)

IV. Historical appendix

- A. Judah's fall and captivity (52:1–30)
- B. Jehoiachin's liberation (52:31–34)

Authorship and Authenticity. Numerous arguments support the fact that Jeremiah, “the son of Hilkiah, of the priests who were in Anathoth in the land of Benjamin” (Jer. 1:1), is the author of the book.

Internal Evidence. The prophet dictated to his secretary, Baruch, all his prophecies in the beginning of his ministry to the fourth year of Jehoiakim. This material consists of well over half the prophet's ministry. When this roll was destroyed by King Jehoiakim (36:23), the prophet dictated another edition, which included much new material (36:32). This is not the present book, because many portions of the book of Jeremiah bear a later date in his prophetic career (e.g., 21:1; 24:1; etc.), and still others show evidence of being composed in the later portion of his ministry. Internal evidence demonstrates that the prophet wrote the entire book. Chapter 52 is a possible exception. This was possibly appended to his prophecies from 2 Kings 24:18–25:30, with which it is practically identical.

External Proof. OT references to the prophecies are explicit (cf. Daniel's allusion to the prediction of the seventy years' captivity, Dan. 9:2; Jer. 25:11–14; 29:10). Second Chron. 36:21 and Ezek. 1:1 confirm this prophecy and the general period of Jeremiah. Extracanonical evidence adds its voice. Ecclus. 49:6–7 traces the destruction of Jerusalem to the rejection of Jeremiah's warning and the prophecies. Josephus (Ant. 10.5.1) and the Talmud confirm the same fact. In the NT, Matt. 2:17–18 quotes Jer. 31:15; Matt. 21:13, Mark 11:17, and Luke 19:46 quote from Jeremiah 7:11; Rom. 11:27 has reference to Jer. 31:33–34, and Heb. 8:8–13 also quotes from this passage. Christian tradition also adds its testimony to the Jeremian authenticity of the prophecy.

Apparent Composite Character of the Book. This is explained by the fact that the book was written in stages. The earlier edition was destroyed. It was reissued later with additions. Subsequent prophecies were collated and doubtless edited by Baruch. For this reason the contents are not always in systematic order or chronological sequence. The wide divergence between the LXX and the Masoretic Heb. is difficult to account for and seems to comprehend two different forms of the book.

Modern Criticism Fails to Disprove Jeremian Authenticity. Critical theories are to a large extent subjective. Robert Pfeiffer conjectures that Baruch combined the prophet's book with his own, redoing many of the prophetic speeches in his own "deuteronomistic style" (Intr. [1940], p. 55). It is contended that even Baruch's book was later extensively revised with both prose and poetic editions. But such a procedure on the part of a pious disciple like Baruch is unreasonable. A. Bentzen rejects the idea that Baruch wrote the "deuteronomistic sections." Bentzen thinks that Jeremiah was used by "deuteronomistic zealots" (Intr. [1949], p. 119). H. Birkeland assumes that the book contains several complexes of traditions (Zum hebraeischen Traditionswesen [1938], p. 42), but the old idea of a nucleus of traditions subsequently expanded is without factual foundation. Critical theories are bereft of any valid substitute for Jeremian authorship of the prophecy.

JEREMIAS (je-re-mī'as). A Gk. form of the name Jeremiah, the prophet, and the KJV rendering in Matt. 16:14.

JER'EMOTH (jer'e-mōth; "tall"; cf. Arab. warima, "to be thick, tall, swollen").

1. One of the "sons" of Becher (1 Chron. 7:8) and head of a Benjamite house that existed in the time of David, about 1017 B.C. The KJV renders "Jerimoth."

2. A Benjamite chief, a son of the house of Beriah and Elpaal (1 Chron. 8:14). His family dwelt at Jerusalem, apparently about 588 B.C.

3. A Merarite Levite, son of Mushi (1 Chron. 23:23), called Jerimoth in 1 Chron. 24:30, about 960 B.C.

4. Son of Heman, head of the thirteenth division of musicians in the divine service (1 Chron. 25:22); called Jerimoth in v. 4 (and by the NIV in v. 22), about 960 B.C.

5. Son of Azriel, leader of the tribe of Naphtali in the reign of David (1 Chron. 27:19), about 1000 B.C. The KJV and NIV render "Jerimoth."

6. One of the "sons" of Elam, who put away his foreign wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:26), 456 B.C.

7. One of the "sons" of Zattu who had taken Gentile wives and put them away after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:27), 456 B.C.

8. One of the "sons" of Bani, who also put away his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:29), 456 B.C. The KJV renders "Ramoth."

JERI'AH (jer'í'a). The eldest son of Hebron (1 Chron. 23:19; 24:23). He is called Jerijah in the KJV and NASB of 1 Chron. 26:31.

JER'IBAI (jer'í-bī; "Jehovah contends"). The second named of the sons of Elnaam, and one of David's bodyguard (1 Chron. 11:46), after 1000 B.C.

JER'ICHO (jer'í-kō; possibly "place of fragrance" or "moon city"). An ancient city in the wide plain where the Jordan Valley broadens between the Moab mountains and the western precipices, and situated on the route of Israel after they crossed the Jordan under Joshua (Josh. 3:16). The first mention of Jericho in Scripture is in connection with the advance of Israel to Canaan; they “camped in the plains of Moab beyond the Jordan opposite Jericho” (Num. 22:1). From the manner and frequency in which it is referred to it would seem to have been the most important city of the Jordan Valley at that time (31:12; 34:15; 35:1; etc.). The spies sent by Joshua were entertained in Jericho by Rahab (which see), for which they promised her protection when the city would be destroyed (Josh. 2:1–21; 6:25). The miraculous capture of Jericho, the sin and punishment of Achan, and the curse pronounced upon anyone who should attempt to rebuild it are graphically recorded (6:1–7:26). Jericho was given to the tribe of Benjamin (18:21), “and from this time a long interval elapsed before Jericho appeared again upon the scene. It is only incidentally mentioned in the life of David in connection with his embassy to the Ammonite king (2 Sam. 10:5). And the solemn manner in which its second foundation under Hiel, the Beth-elite, is recorded (1 Kings 16:34) would certainly seem to imply that up to that time its site had been uninhabited. It is true that mention is made of ‘a city of palm trees’ (Judg. 1:16; 3:13) in existence apparently at the time when spoken of. However, once actually rebuilt, Jericho rose again slowly into consequence. In its immediate vicinity the sons of the prophets sought retirement from the world: Elisha ‘healed the spring of the waters;’ and over against it, beyond Jordan, Elijah ‘went up by a whirlwind into heaven’ (2 Kings 2:1–22). In its plains Zedekiah fell into the hands of the Chaldeans (25:5; Jer. 39:5). In the return under Zerubbabel the ‘children of Jericho,’ three hundred and forty-five in number, are comprised (Ezra 2:34; Neh. 7:36); and it is even implied that they removed thither again, for the ‘men of Jericho’ assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding that part of the wall of Jerusalem that was next to the sheep-gate (3:2). The Jericho of the days of Josephus was a distant one hundred and fifty stadia from Jerusalem and fifty from the Jordan.”

In the NT Jericho is mentioned in connection with Jesus’ restoring sight to the blind (Matt. 20:29–30; Mark 10:46; Luke 18:35) and His being entertained by Zaccheus (19:1–8). And finally, it was introduced in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:30), which, if not a real occurrence, derives interest from the fact that robbers have ever terrorized the road from Jerusalem to Jericho.

The ancient strategic fortress commanding the entrance to Canaan from the E is represented by the modern mound known as Tell es-Sultan. The springs at this site yield a plentiful supply of water. Through the excavations of Ernst Sellin and the Deutsche Orientgesellschaft (1907–9), those of John Garstang (1930–36), and of Kathleen Kenyon (1952–58) the occupational history of the ancient city has been determined.

The site was occupied in Mesolithic times during the eighth millennium B.C. Kathleen Kenyon dated a great defense tower and houses of the earliest village to that millennium. Garstang assigned alphabetic names to later cities that occupied the site. City A was dated about 3000–2500 B.C.; City B, 2500–1700; City C, belonging to the Hyksos period, 1700–1500; City D, captured by Joshua, 1500–1400. Garstang claimed that the walls of Joshua’s day were double. The outer wall was six feet thick and the inner one twelve feet thick, and there was a rubble-filled space of about fifteen feet between them. He believed that the outer wall slid down the slope of the mound and caused the inner wall to collapse as well. The destruction he dated to about 1400 B.C.. Then City E belonged to the time of Ahab (c. 860 B.C.) when Hiel the Bethelite rebuilt the town (1 Kings 16:34). Advocates of the late date of the Exodus and the conquest, who would put the fall of Jericho around 1250 B.C., tried to repudiate Garstang’s conclusions; but he stood by them.

When Kathleen Kenyon took up her work at Jericho, she concentrated on the Neolithic and Mesolithic levels at Jericho, but she did give some attention to the Joshua question. She concluded that there never was a double wall at Jericho. The inhabitants had moved the wall farther down the slope to give more protected space and had left the foundation of the inner wall, giving the appearance of a double wall. Moreover, this wall she dated to the Early Bronze Age (3000–2000 B.C.) and suggested that the wall of Joshua’s day had probably eroded away during the half millennium when Jericho had been uninhabited between the time of Joshua and Hiel. Probably it had been made of mud brick. The city of Joshua’s day (measuring about 8½ acres) she believed fell about 1350–1325 B.C. On the basis of the work done, it seems necessary to conclude that Garstang was in error about the walls of Jericho, but it is not necessary to abandon his dating of the fall of the city because he worked with quantities of material from the Late Bronze (1500–1200 B.C.) tombs of Jericho. These do not seem to have been used after about 1400.

NT or Herodian Jericho stood on both sides of the Wadi Qelt almost two miles SW of Tell es-Sultan; there Herod the Great built his winter palace. Work was begun at the site by James L. Kelso and Dimitri Baramki in 1950 for the American Schools of Oriental Research and Pittsburgh-Xenia Theological Seminary and continued by James Pritchard in 1951 and by Ehud Netzer for the Hebrew University since 1974. South of the Wadi Qelt stood an artificial mound with a pavilion on top of it. South of the artificial mound was a wing of the palace, which is now covered over. Steps led from the artificial mound to the Wadi Qelt. At the foot of the mound on the E was a large pool, and on the W was a sunken garden backed by a grand facade with forty-eight statuary niches. A bridge led across the Wadi Qelt to the N wing of the palace, which consisted of a reception hall, two open courtyards, a bath complex, and other rooms. Nearby, Hasmonaean palaces and a monumental swimming pool have been discovered but are only partially excavated. H.F.V.

JER’IEL (jer’i-el; “God sees”). A man of Issachar, one of the six heads of the house of Tola mentioned in the census in the time of David (1 Chron. 7:2), perhaps after 1000 B.C.

JERI’JAH (jer’i’ja). A different form (1 Chron. 26:31, KJV, NASB) of the name Jeriah (which see).

JER’IMOTH (jer’i-moth; cf. Jeremoth).

1. The fourth named of the four sons of Bela, son of Benjamin and founder of a Benjamite house that existed in the time of David (1 Chron. 7:7; cf. v. 2), after 1689 B.C.

2. One of the Benjamite archers and slingers who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:5), before 1000 B.C.

3. The last named of the sons of Mushi, the son of Merari (1 Chron. 24:30); elsewhere called Jeremoth.

4. One of the sons of Heman, head of the fifteenth ward of musicians (1 Chron. 25:4, 22); called Jeremoth in the latter verse, about 960 B.C.

5. Son of King David, whose daughter Mahalath was the first wife of Rehoboam, her cousin Abihail being the other (2 Chron. 11:18), before 974 B.C. He is not named in the list of David's children (1 Chron. 3; 14:4–7), and it is probable that he was the son of a concubine. The passage 2 Chron. 11:18 is not quite clear, since the word daughter is a correction of the qere; the original text had bēn, i.e., “son.”

6. A Levite and one of the overseers of the Temple offerings in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:13), 729 B.C.

7. In the KJV, one of the sons of Becher (1 Chron. 7:8); the NASB and NIV give Jeremoth.

8. In the KJV and NIV, a son of Azriel (1 Chron. 27:19); the NASB gives Jeremoth.

JE'RIOTH (je'ri-oth; “tent curtains”). Apparently the second wife of Caleb, the son of Hezron (1 Chron. 2:18), about 1440 B.C. The Vulg. renders this as the son of Caleb by his first-mentioned wife, and father of the sons named; but this is contrary to the Heb. text, which is closely followed by the LXX. Perhaps the connective waw should be rendered by even, thus making Jerioth another name for Azubah.

JEROBO'AM I (jer-o-bō'am; “the people multiplied”). Jeroboam was the name of the first (this article) and fourteenth (see article below) kings of Israel. The first king of Israel by this name was the son of Nebat, an Ephraimite, by a woman named Zeruah (1 Kings 11:26).

Noticed by Solomon. At the time when Solomon was constructing the fortifications of Millo underneath the citadel of Zion, he discovered the strength and activity of the young Ephraimite who was employed on the works, and he raised him to the rank of superintendent over the taxes and labors exacted from the tribe of Ephraim (1 Kings 11:28), after 960 B.C.

Future Foretold. On one occasion when leaving Jerusalem, he encountered Ahijah, “the prophet” of the ancient sanctuary of Shiloh. Ahijah stripped off his new outer garment and tore it into twelve pieces, ten of which he gave to Jeroboam with the assurance that, on obedience to His laws, God would establish for him a kingdom and dynasty equal to that of David (vv. 29–39).

Flight into Egypt. Jeroboam probably began to form plots and conspiracies, for Solomon sought to take his life. He fled to Egypt, where he received the protection of Pharaoh Shishak. He remained there until the death of Solomon (v. 40), about 926 B.C.

Revolt of Israel. Upon the accession of Rehoboam, Jeroboam appears to have headed a deputation that asked for a redress of grievances. The harsh answer of Rehoboam inevitably caused a revolution, and Jeroboam was called to be “king over all Israel” (12:1–20).

As King. He selected Shechem as his capital, but for some unknown reason moved the seat of government to Penuel, E of Jordan. He later returned to the W of Jordan and took up his permanent residence at Tirzah (1 Kings 12:25; cf. 15:21, 33; 16:6–8; Josh. 12:24). The policy of Jeroboam was to bring about a religious as well as political disruption of the kingdom. He therefore sought to discourage the yearly pilgrimages to the Temple at Jerusalem. To this end he established shrines at Dan and Bethel, sanctuaries of venerable antiquity, and at the extremities of the kingdom. He set up “two golden calves,” doubtless thought of, according to a widespread Semitic custom of viewing deities enthroned on the backs of animals, as representing Jehovah's invisible presence, and established a priesthood for his crown (1 Kings 12:26–33). While he was officiating at the altar, a man of God appeared and prophesied the coming of King Josiah, who would one day burn the bones of its ministers upon that altar. Jeroboam attempted to arrest the man. When the arm that he stretched forth was dried up, in answer to the prayer of the man of God he was healed (13:1–10). Jeroboam continued his idolatrous practices, making “priests of the high places from among all the people” (13:33), and his rebellion soon brought about the extinction of his dynasty. His son Abijah fell sick, and Jeroboam sent his wife in disguise to the prophet Ahijah, who, however, recognized her and predicted her son's death. She returned to Tirzah, and “as she was entering the threshold of the house, the child died.” Jeroboam never recovered from the blow and died soon after, having reigned about twenty-two years (14:1–20), c. 931–909 B.C. Jeroboam waged constant war with the house of Judah, but the only act distinctly recorded is a battle with Abijah, the son of Rehoboam, in which he was defeated. For the time being he lost the important cities of Bethel, Jeshanah, and Ephron of Ephraim (2 Chron. 13:1–19).

Character. Although he was the founder of a new kingdom, Jeroboam was a less remarkable man than we might expect. His government exhibited one idea—that of raising a barrier against the reunion of the tribes. He was a slave and victim to that idea; and although the barrier that he raised was effective, it only showed his weakness in needing such a barrier for his protection.

JEROBOAM II. This Jeroboam was the son of the successor of Jehoash and the fourteenth king of Israel, c. 793–753 B.C. Even though he followed the example of the first Jeroboam in keeping up the idolatry of the golden calves, the Lord had pity upon Israel. Jeroboam brought to a successful end the wars that his father had undertaken and delivered Israel from the Syrian yoke (cf. 2 Kings 13:4; 14:26–27). He took the chief cities of Damascus (14:28; Amos 1:3–5) and Hamath, and he restored the ancient eastern limits, from Lebanon to the Dead Sea, to Israel (2 Kings 14:25; Amos 6:14). He reconquered Ammon and Moab (1:13; 2:1–3) and restored to the trans-Jordanic tribes their territory (2 Kings 13:5; 1 Chron. 5:17–22). But it was merely an outward restoration. The sanctuary at Bethel was kept up in royal state (Amos 7:13), but drunkenness, licentiousness, and oppression prevailed in the country (Hos. 4:12–14; Amos 2:6–8; 4:1; 6:6). Idolatry was united with the worship of Jehovah (Hos. 4:13; 13:6). Amos prophesied the destruction of Jeroboam and his house by the sword (Amos 7:9, 17), and Hosea (Hos. 1:1) denounced the crimes of the nation.

Excavations at Samaria, the capital of the Northern Kingdom, have confirmed its popularity and splendor in the eighth century B.C. Jeroboam II refortified the city with a double wall. In exposed sections, this reached as much as thirty-three feet in width, constituting fortifications so substantial that the mighty Assyrian army took three years to capture the city (2 Kings 17:5). The splendid palace of limestone with a strong rectangular tower and extensive outer court, hitherto assigned to the Ahab era, almost certainly belongs to Jeroboam II (J. Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past [1946], p. 55). The jasper seal discovered by Schumacher at Megiddo and inscribed “Shema, servant of Jeroboam,” is to be connected with Jeroboam II rather than Jeroboam I, as is now epigraphically certain. The blossoming of art in this prosperous era is demonstrated by the lifelike and magnificently executed lion that appears on the seal.

Amos’s prophecies shed light on the increase of commerce and wealth in Jeroboam’s realm and its consequent luxury and moral deterioration. Increased tribute poured in, creating a wealthy class that was utterly selfish and unscrupulous (Amos 2:6; 8:6). Simple dwellings of unburned brick gave way to “houses of well-hewn stone.” Ahab’s ivory palace (evidently referring only to decorations) was imitated by many of the wealthy landowners (1 Kings 22:39; Amos 3:15; 5:11). Loose feasting was the order of the day (6:4–6). Religion degenerated into mere ritualism devoid of righteousness and morality (4:4; 5:5; 8:14). The evils of the time called for divine retribution. Jeroboam’s house was to be visited with the sword (7:9). Somewhere around 753 B.C. Jeroboam died a natural death, but his son and successor, Zechariah, after a six-month reign, was assassinated by a usurper, inaugurating a period of decline and civil strife. M.F.U.

JEROHAM (je-ro'ham; "compassionate").

1. The son of Elihu and father of Elkanah, the father of Samuel (1 Sam. 1:1; 1 Chron. 6:27, 34), before 1171 B.C.

2. The father of several Benjamite leaders residing at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:27), before 536 B.C.

3. The father of Ibneiah, a Benjamite leader who was a resident of Jerusalem (1 Chron. 9:8), probably before 536 B.C. Perhaps the same as no. 2.

4. A priest whose son Adaiah was one of the priests residing at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 9:12), before 536 B.C. The same names are given as father and son in Neh. 11:12 and are probably identical.

5. An inhabitant of Gedor and father of Joelah and Zebadiah who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:7), before 1000 B.C.

6. A Danite whose son (or descendant) Azarel was ruler over his tribe in the time of David (1 Chron. 27:22), before 1000 B.C.

7. Father of Azariah, which latter was one of the "captains of hundreds" by whose assistance Jehoiada placed Joash on the throne of Judah (2 Chron. 23:1), before 836 B.C.

JERUBBAAL (jer-ub-bā'al; "Baal will contend"). A surname given by his father to Gideon, the judge of Israel, because he destroyed the altar of Baal (Judg. 6:32; 7:1; 8:29, 35; 9:1-2, 5, 16, 19, 24, 28, 57; 1 Sam. 12:11).

JERUBBESHETH (jer-ub-be'sheth; "contender with shame," i.e., "idol"). A name for Jerubbaal in which Baal is branded bōshet (beshet), the Heb. word for "shame." This epithet of Gideon (2 Sam. 11:21) was given to avoid pronouncing the name of the false god Baal.

JERUEL (je-rū'el; "founded by God"). "The wilderness of Jeruel" is mentioned (2 Chron. 20:16) by Jahaziel as the place where Jehoshaphat would meet the Moabites and Ammonites and overcome them. This "wilderness" was, doubtless, a part of the great stretch of flat country, bounded on the S by Wadi el Ghâr and extending from the Dead Sea to the neighborhood of Tekoa. It is now called el Hasasah.

JERUSALEM (je-rū'sa-lem). The first city of Palestine, and the "holy city" for three great world religions: Christianity, Judaism, and Islam.

Name. The etymology of the name is not certain; it is apparently of Semitic origin. An Egyptian notice from the third quarter of the nineteenth century B.C. mentions Urusalimum. The Tell el Amarna correspondence of the fourteenth century B.C. refers to the town as Urusalim. The Assyrians called it Ursalimmu. Modern scholars take these names to mean "founded by the god Shalem," a god of the Amorites (Jerusalem is said to have been founded by Amorites and Hittites; Ezek. 16:3, 45). In time, however, the second part of the name became associated with shalom ("peace") in Hebrew minds, and Jerusalem came to mean "city of peace." Romans and Greeks called it Hierosolyma. To the Arabs it is El Kuds, meaning "holy town."

Location. The "holy city" is located fourteen miles W of the Dead Sea, thirty-three miles E of the Mediterranean. Bethlehem lies about five miles to the SE. The city is situated on an uneven rocky plateau at an elevation of 2,550 feet. It is 3,800 feet above the level of the Dead Sea. It is poetically called "beautiful in elevation, the joy of the whole earth" (Ps. 48:2). Its location has helped to give it prestige. It was exclusive, with no river frontage like Babylon, Thebes, Rome, or Memphis, and with no harbor like Tyre, Sidon, or Alexandria. It was off the main highways between Asia Minor and Egypt. It possessed a good water supply from the ancient Gihon spring (which see) (The Virgin's Fountain) in the Kidron and En Rogel (which see) or Job's well at the junction of the Kidron and the Hinnom valleys. It was centrally located and ideal for the capital of the united kingdom of Israel, in the Davidic-Solomonic era (c. 1000–930 B.C.), and Judah (c. 930–587 B.C.). Jerusalem stands at a point where three steep-sided little wadis join to form one valley. They are the Kidron, Tyropoeon, and Hinnom valleys. The Kidron runs N and S and lies on the E of the city. Between it and the Tyropoeon Valley (also N-S) a long, narrow spur extends southward; on this stood the Jebusite town conquered by David. Then a western hill (now known as Zion) stands between the Tyropoeon and the Hinnom, which runs N and S and then curves in an easterly direction to join the other two valleys. To the E of the Kidron rises the Mount of Olives.

Climate. Being high in elevation and fanned by the afternoon breeze from the Mediterranean, Jerusalem has a mean annual temperature of 63 degrees. However, the temperature can mount to 100 degrees in summer and drops to 25 degrees in the winter. Snow occasionally falls, sometimes to a depth of one foot, but does not last long.

General Boundary of David's City. Jebusite Jerusalem of David's day was located on the SE hill and was shaped somewhat like a gigantic human footprint. The enclosed area was about eleven acres, as excavations by Kathleen Kenyon (1961–67) have demonstrated. David built northward, constructing a new palace for himself in the area known as Ophel and buying the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite (2 Sam. 24:18). On the latter Solomon was later to build the Temple. Then, as Nahman Avigad has shown in his excavations in the Jewish Quarter since 1969, Israelite settlement expanded onto the western hill in the eighth–seventh centuries B.C. After Nebuchadnezzar's destruction of Jerusalem (586 B.C.), Nehemiah rebuilt the walls in 444 B.C. These evidently encompassed the Temple area, Ophel, and most of the old City of David. But excavations have shown that the eastern wall followed the crest of the hill instead of standing partway down the slope, as the Jebusite wall had. The western part of the city was not included in Nehemiah's reconstruction.

The walls and gates of Jerusalem of Nehemiah's time are minutely described. The gates at Jerusalem include the following: Sheep Gate, Fish Gate, Old Gate, Valley Gate, Refuse Gate, Fountain Gate, Water Gate, Horse Gate, and East Gate. Towers include that of Hammeah, of Hananel, and of Furnaces. The walls include the Broad Wall, the wall of the Pool of Shelah (i.e., Siloam), and the wall of Ophel. Jerusalem again spread to the western ridge in the second century B.C., and a new N wall was built in the second or first century B.C. It is now known that there was a jog in that wall and that the area covered by the Church of the Holy Sepulcher lay outside that wall. Thus Calvary could have been located there. A new N wall, N of the modern wall, was begun by Herod Agrippa I (A.D. 41–44) and finished just before the outbreak of the Jewish war in A.D. 66.

The walls and gates as seen in Jerusalem today are due in large part to the construction of Suleiman the Magnificent, sixteenth century A.D. The present walls of Jerusalem have thirty-five towers and eight gates: the Damascus Gate, Herod's Gate, Stephen's Gate, the Refuse Gate, the Zion Gate, the Jaffa Gate, the New Gate, and the Golden Gate.

History. The history of Jerusalem from the time of Joshua to its destruction by Titus—a period of fifteen centuries—is a succession of changes, revolutions, sieges, surrenders, and famines. Each is followed by restoration and rebuilding. The city's greatest glory was reached under the reign of King Solomon, who built the Temple and a royal palace besides greatly enlarging and strengthening the walls of the city. Jerusalem's possibly greatest humiliation was reached under the reign of Antiochus Epihanes, 175–165 B.C., when the most violent and cruel efforts were made to destroy the Jews and their religion.

For the earliest record of Jerusalem we must go to the description of the boundaries of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 5, 18). Until David captured the entire city from the Jebusites (2 Sam. 5:7; 1 Chron. 11:5), these ancient inhabitants had always been in possession of a part of it. From the time when David brought the Ark of God into the city (2 Sam. 6:2–17) until the destruction by Nebuchadnezzar, the metropolis was continually added to and embellished.

Notable improvements included Hezekiah's vast structures for aqueduct and water supply and the enclosing with an outside wall of Zion and the City of David. During the years immediately succeeding the capture of the city by Nebuchadnezzar, it lay in ruins. Cyrus the Great decreed the return of the captive Jews to their city and the rebuilding of the walls, which by Nehemiah's time had been broken down for 140 years (Neh. 4:7–22). Under Nehemiah the city regained much of its former glory. Alexander the Great in 332 B.C. showed much favor to the Jews, exempting them in some degree from tribute. In 320 B.C., because the Jews refused to fight and defend themselves on the Sabbath day when Ptolemy Soter attacked the city, it was captured, and many of its inhabitants were removed to Africa. The Seleucids (Syrians) wrested control of Palestine from the Ptolemies in 198 B.C. Their campaign against Jewish religion, as ordered by Antiochus Epiphanes, terminated in an order for the cessation of Jewish worship and their observance of the Sabbath and in the desecration of the Temple in 168 B.C. A Maccabean revolt launched in that year was ultimately successful in erecting an independent Jewish state, which continued from 142 to 63 B.C. Eventually, bickering among factions in the Jewish state led to an invitation to the Roman general Pompey to intervene to settle the quarrel in 63 B.C. In this way the Romans gained control of Palestine. During the civil wars involving Pompey and Julius Caesar and Mark Antony and Octavian, Palestine was caught in the cross fire. After Octavian (Augustus) established himself as ruler of the Roman world and restored order to the Empire and after Herod the Great established himself as king in Jerusalem, the city soon again became restored to much of its former grandeur. Under Herod the Temple was enlarged and beautified. It was in this state that Christ found the city. Under Herod the city was given a better water supply. Under Herod's grandson, Herod Agrippa, in A.D. 41, the area inside the city wall was doubled. Bad government by Roman procurators, appointed over Judea as a Roman province, led to discontent and rebellion, however; and finally Titus laid siege to the city and destroyed it in A.D. 70, sacrificing one million lives.

The Early Church. After the death and resurrection of Christ, Jerusalem became the scene of the most stirring events connected with Christianity, beginning with the Day of Pentecost and including much of the history contained in Acts. The gospel was first proclaimed in strict obedience to the command of Christ (Acts 1:4). The church increased rapidly (chap. 5). Stephen, the first martyr, was sacrificed (chap. 7). Paul sat at the feet of Gamaliel and later preached. He was taken to Caesarea and Rome. In Jerusalem the great council was held, at which the question of the rite of circumcision was discussed, and during which addresses were made by Peter, Barnabas, Paul, and James, the half brother of Jesus. James was the president of the council, occupying a prominent place, if, indeed, not the first place in the church (chap. 15). Herod Agrippa killed the apostle James, the brother of John, by beheading him (12:1–2). The extreme severity of the persecutions tended to scatter the Christians, which resulted in the dissemination of the gospel throughout the world.

The City After A.D. 70 In A.D. 70 the Romans destroyed the city and massacred its inhabitants. Under Hadrian the Romans began to refortify Jerusalem as a Gentile city and hold it against its former inhabitants. The Jewish revolt (A.D. 132–35) under Bar Cocheba was evidently due to this circumstance. It was suppressed, and the rebuilding of the city resumed and completed. The new city was called Colonia Aelia Capitolina. This name described it as a Roman colony. Aelia was in honor of Hadrian, whose first name was Aelius, and Capitolina indicated that it was dedicated to Jupiter Capitolinus. A temple was dedicated to this heathen god where the former Jewish Temples had stood on Mt. Moriah. The name of Aelia continued for several centuries. Constantine removed the ban against Jews entering the Holy City. Both Constantine and his mother built churches in the city. In A.D. 614 the Persians under Chosroes II captured Jerusalem and massacred the inhabitants. From 637 to 1917 the city remained in Muslim hands except for the brief periods when the Crusaders held Jerusalem.

Archaeology. An account of scientific exploration of Jerusalem normally begins with Captain Charles Warren, a British mining engineer. From 1867 to 1870 he tried to follow the line of the ancient wall by excavations, shafts, and tunnels. He is especially known for the discovery of “Warren’s Shaft,” the means that he identified as being used by Joab in the conquest of Jerusalem from the Jebusites (2 Sam. 5:8). This was the ancient water system of Jerusalem. It consisted of a horizontal tunnel leading from the spring Gihon into the hill on which the Jebusite city was built. The tunnel ended in a cave that served as a cistern. Above the cave rose a 32-foot vertical shaft, which connected with a sloping passageway 127 feet long. The entrance to this passageway was inside the city wall. Women could then descend the sloping passage to the vertical shaft and lower their water skins into the cave to procure a water supply. Joab supposedly discovered this water system, ascended the passageway, and entered the city at night, delivering it into the hands of David. At the SE corner of the Temple area Warren found what he believed was the wall of Ophel, which continued S along the eastern slope. Thus he turned the attention of archaeologists to the area of the city of David and the Jebusite city, presently S of the Temple area. Because this region was outside the walls and largely unoccupied, it could be investigated more easily than other parts of Jerusalem.

Numerous others were to engage in archaeological or exploratory work during subsequent decades. A partial list would include Clermont-Ganneau and H. Guthe (1881), F. J. Bliss and A. C. Dickie (1894–97), Montague Parker and L.-H. Vincent (1909–11), Raymond Weill (1913–14, 1923–24), R. A. S. Macalister and J. Garrow Duncan (1923–25), J. W. Crowfoot and G. M. Fitzgerald (1927–28), E. L. Sukenik and L. A. Mayer (1925–27), and C. N. Johns (1934–40). There is not room here to note the discoveries or theses of these men; moreover, many of their views have had to be modified by more recent discoveries.

A new chapter in the rediscovery of Jerusalem began in 1961 when Kathleen Kenyon and Roland de Vaux directed annual campaigns (until 1967) to investigate a number of areas in the city, using the most up-to-date stratigraphic techniques. They were especially interested in the Jebusite wall and the size of Davidic Jerusalem. They showed that the wall stood farther down the slope than previously thought and that the Jerusalem of David was about eleven acres in size.

Since the Six-Day War in 1967, Israeli archaeologists have had access to the entire Jerusalem area. A team under the leadership of Benjamin Mazar has been working S and SW of the Temple. It is now known that “Robinson’s Arch” was not a bridge between the Temple Mount and the Upper City but a span supporting a monumental stairway leading down from the Temple Mount. It is now known too that there was only one bridge across the Tyropoeon Valley—that of “Wilson’s Arch,” N of the Western Wall plaza. Mazar also found remains of a paved street that ran along the Temple’s southern wall. From this street a monumental stairway some 64 meters (210 feet) wide led up to the Huldah Gates.

Excavations also were conducted in the Jewish Quarter of the Old City (SW of the Temple Mount) from 1969 to the present under the leadership of N. Avigad for the Hebrew University and the Israel Department of Antiquities. This work has been possible because large parts of the Jewish Quarter were destroyed during the 1948 war; and since the 1967 reunification, demolition and rebuilding of some areas has taken place. Houses of the Herodian period, some with fine mosaic floors and wall frescoes with geometric patterns, were found to be built directly over the Israelite strata. Among Avigad’s most significant discoveries are the main street of Byzantine Jerusalem and the Nea Church, built by the emperor Justinian in 543.

Excavations in the Armenian Garden (S of the Citadel) under the leadership of D. Bahat and M. Broshi (1970–71) and in the Jerusalem Citadel by Ruth Amiran and A. Eitan uncovered part of the foundation platform on which Herod's palace had been built. In 1971 and 1972 M. Broshi, E. Netzer, and Mrs. Yael Yisrael, on behalf of the Armenian Patriarchate, excavated in the courtyard of the Armenian Monastery at the "House of Caiaphas" just outside the Zion Gate. Excavations at the Pool of Bethesda (John 5:2–4) since 1956 show that the traditional pools went out of use before Jesus' day. The miracle performed at this pool by Jesus is now ascribed to a cave E of the traditional pools. A restudy of the fortress of Antonia by P. Benoit has led him to the conclusion that the fortress was not a large structure with four towers as previously thought. Moreover, he has come to believe that the pavement identified as the Gabbatha (John 19:13) had nothing to do with the crucifixion but was a pavement from a forum laid by Hadrian when he rebuilt Jerusalem in the second century. The arch over the pavement in the Sisters of Zion Convent is certainly Hadriatic. Benoit thinks the Antonia stood in the narrow area between the Temple Mount and the Via Dolorosa. A. Mazar and Y. Cohen carried out a survey of the ancient aqueducts of Jerusalem in 1969 on behalf of the Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities.

Especially exciting in recent years has been the work of Yigal Shiloh, who began excavating the city of David in 1978. He traced the history of the city from the Chalcolithic period to the days of the Maccabees. Among his more interesting discoveries is a stepped-stone structure used by David and Solomon as a supporting rampart for the citadel of the monarchy period and the walls of the second century B.C., built along the crest of the hill and on the same line as Nehemiah's wall. For a report on Shiloh's successes, one should consult Yigal Shiloh, Excavations at the City of David, 1978–1982 Interim Report of the First Five Seasons. Other important works on Jerusalem archaeology include Nahman Avigad, Discovering Jerusalem; Kathleen Kenyon, Digging Up Jerusalem and Jerusalem, Excavating 3000 Years of History; Benjamin Mazar, The Mountain of the Lord; an Israel Exploration Society publication entitled Jerusalem Revealed—Archaeology in the Holy City 1968–1974, and Michael Avi-Yonah, ed., Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land, vol. 2.

The Modern City. The modern city occupies the site of the ancient ruin and extends far beyond it to the N and W. The site of the former magnificent Temples (of Solomon, Zerubbabel, and Herod) is occupied by a Muslim mosque, the Dome of the Rock, built by Abd el-Melik in A.D. 686. In World War I Palestine was conquered by the British under General Allenby, and Jerusalem surrendered Dec. 9, 1917. Since that time Palestine has undergone remarkable growth. Zionism has flourished, the State of Israel has emerged (1948) as a result of United Nations action, and Jerusalem is a flourishing city. Jerusalem was divided by Jew and Arab from 1948 to 1967 and has since been united under Israeli control.

Prophecy. Prophetic Scripture outlines a brilliant future for Jerusalem. During the Millennium it is to be the capital of the earth (Isa. 60; Zech. 14; Ezek. 40–48). The second coming of Christ will eventuate in the destruction of Israel's enemies, the judgment of the nations, the deliverance of the Israelite remnant, and the establishment of the kingdom. But before that great event Israel will go through the time of the Great Tribulation (Jer. 30:7) under the terrible rule of the Antichrist. Only as the remnant looks upon Him whom they have pierced will they be converted (Zech. 12:10–13:1) and at last recite the penitential strains of Isa. 53. M.F.U.; H.F.V.

JERU'SALEM, NEW. This is the city of God that comes down out of heaven, as described in Rev. 21:2, 10. This city is the one “which has foundations” and that Abraham saw by faith (cf. Heb. 11:8–10). It is described in Heb. 12:22–24. Christ makes mention of it in His message to the church in Philadelphia (Rev. 3:12). In full correspondence with the description as given in Heb. 12:22–24, the church is present; the angels are present; a company of “righteous men made perfect,” to which Israel would belong, is present; and Christ the Mediator and God the Father are present. Taking the measurements of the city literally, the breadth and height are equal, being 12,000 furlongs, which would be 1,500 miles each way. The glory of the eternal city is described in terms of being pure gold. The city descends from heaven and is doubtless to be considered as something distinct from heaven. It is named for the bride of Christ, the church, evidently because she has some superior right to it or forms the chief body of redeemed humanity to occupy it. However, other peoples and beings enter her gates, making it clearly a cosmopolitan center. It must be clearly remembered that when the last two chapters of the Bible describe the future eternal state of all things, they differentiate at least four different abodes: (1) the new heaven, (2) the new earth, (3) the bridal city, and (4) “outside,” which is evidently identical with the lake of fire, or the second death (Rev. 22:15, cf. 20:14–15; 21:8). But in this changed situation with its different dwelling places the place of residence is no longer subject to change. This is the consummation of revelation in which time merges into eternity. JERU'SHA (je-rū'sha; “taken in marriage, possessed”). The daughter of Zadok and queen of Uzziah. She was the mother of Jotham, king of Judah (2 Kings 15:33), 738 B.C. Also called Jerushah (which see).

JERU'SHAH (je-rū'sha). Another form (2 Chron. 27:1) of the name Jerusha (which see).

JESAI'AH. See Jeshaiiah.

JESARE'LAH. See Jesharelah.

JESHA'IAH (je-shā'ya; “Jehovah saves”).

1. The second named of the sons of Hananiah, the son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:21), after 536 B.C. The KJV renders “Jesaiah.”

2. One of the sons of Jeduthun, appointed to play the harp (1 Chron. 25:3) at the head of the eighth division of Levitical musicians (v. 15), after 1000 B.C.

3. The son of Rehabiah, of the Levitical family of Eliezer. His descendant Shelomoth was over the sacred treasury in the time of David (1 Chron. 26:25; cf. 24:21, where he is called Isshiah), after 1000 B.C.

4. Son of Athaliah, and head of the family of Elam. He returned from Babylon with seventy males (Ezra 8:7), about 457 B.C.

5. A Levite of the family of Merari, who, in company with Hashabiah, met Ezra at Ahava, on the way from Babylon to Palestine (Ezra 8:19), about 457 B.C.

6. Father of Ithiel, a Benjamite, whose descendant Sallu resided in Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh. 11:7), before 445 B.C. The KJV renders “Jesaiah.”

JESH'ANAH (jesh'a-na; “old”).

1. One of the cities of Israel that was taken with its suburbs from Jeroboam by Abijah, king of Judah (2 Chron. 13:19). It is probably to be identified with Burj el-Isaneh, three miles N of Jifneh.

2. One of the gates of Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time, referred to as the "Old Gate" by the NASB (Neh. 3:6; 12:39).

JESHARE'LAH (jesh-a-rē'la; perhaps, "upright toward God"). Head of the seventh division of the Levitical musicians (1 Chron. 25:14). He was a son of Asaph (v. 2, where his name is given as Aharelah). The NIV renders Jesarelah.

JESHEB'EAB (je-sheb'e-ab; perhaps, "father's seat"). The head of the fourteenth division of priests as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:13), before 960 B.C.

JE'SHER (je'sher; "uprightness"). One of the sons of Caleb, the son of Hezron, by his wife Azubah (1 Chron. 2:18), about 1440 B.C.

JESHIAH. See Isshiah.

JESH'IMON (jesh'i-mon; "a waste, a desolation," Num. 21:20; 23:28, KJV, NIV, and NASB marg.; 1 Sam. 23:19; etc.). "In the OT the wilderness of Judea is called the Jeshimon, a word meaning devastation, and no term can better suit its haggard and crumbling appearance. It covers some thirty-five miles by fifteen ... short bushes, thorns, and succulent creepers were all that relieved the brown and yellow barrenness of the sand, the crumbling limestone, and scattered shingle. Such is Jeshimon, the wilderness of Judea. It carries the violence and desolation of the Dead Sea Valley right up to the heart of the country, to the roots of the Mount of Olives, to within two hours of the gates of Hebron, Bethlehem, and Jerusalem" (Smith, Hist. Geog.).

JESHI'SHAI (je-shi'shī; "aged"). The son of Jahdo and father of Michael, one of the ancestors of the Gadites who dwelt in Gilead (1 Chron. 5:14), long before 740 B.C.

JESHOHA'IAH (je-shō-ha'ya). A leader of the Simeonites and one of those who emigrated to Gedor (1 Chron. 4:36), about 715 B.C.

JESH'UA, JESH'UAH (jesh'ū-a; a later form of Joshua, "Jehovah is salvation").

1. A priest in the reign of David, to whom the ninth division fell by lot (1 Chron. 24:11; "Jeshuah," KJV), about 960 B.C. Perhaps the same as the one mentioned in Ezra 2:36 and Neh. 7:39, whose descendants returned from Babylon.

2. A Levite appointed with others by Hezekiah to distribute the sacred offerings among their brothers (2 Chron. 31:15), 719 B.C.

3. Son of Jehozadak, first high priest of the third series, namely, of those after the Babylonian captivity, and ancestor of the fourteen high priests who were his successors down to Joshua or Jason, and Onias or Menelaus, inclusive. Jeshua, like his contemporary Zerubbabel, was probably born in Babylon, where his father, Jehozadak, had been taken captive while young (1 Chron. 6:15). He came up from Babylon in the first year of Cyrus with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7; 12:1, 7, 10) and took a leading part with him in the rebuilding of the Temple and the restoration of the Jewish commonwealth (Ezra 3:2, 8–9; 4:3; 5:2), 536–446 B.C. Besides the great importance of Jeshua as a historical character from the critical times in which he lived and the great work that he accomplished, his name Jesus, his restoration of the Temple, his office as high priest, and especially the two prophecies concerning him in Zech. 3 and 6:9–15, point him out as an eminent type of Christ. He is also called Joshua (Hag. 1:1, 12; 2:2, 4; Zech. 3:1, 3, 6, 8–9; 6:11).

4. A descendant (or native) of Pahath-moab, mentioned with Joab as one whose posterity, numbering 2,812 (Ezra 2:6) or 2,818 (Neh. 7:11), returned from Babylon, before 536 B.C.

5. A Levite named along with Kadmiel as one whose descendants (“sons of Hodaviah”), numbering 74, returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:40; Neh. 7:43), before 436 B.C.

6. The father of Jozabad, which latter was appointed by Ezra as one of the receivers of the offering for the sacred service (Ezra 8:33), about 457 B.C.

7. A Jew whose son, Ezer, repaired the part of the wall (“in front of the ascent of the armory”) under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:19), 445 B.C.

8. A Levite, probably a son of Azaniah (Neh. 10:9), who assisted in explaining the law to the people under Ezra (Neh. 8:7; 9:4–5; 12:8), about 445 B.C.

9. Joshua, the son of Nun (Neh. 8:17, KJV).

10. Son of Kadmiel, one of the Levites who served in the Temple, “to praise and give thanks” after the restoration in the time of Eliashib (Neh. 12:24), about 406 B.C. Perhaps, however, “son” here is a transcriber’s error for “and,” in which case this Jeshua will be the same as no. 5 (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopaedia).

11. A city of Judah inhabited after the captivity (Neh. 11:26), perhaps Tell es-Sa‘weh.

JESH’URUN (jesh’ū-run; “upright”). An honorable surname given to Israel (Deut. 32:15; 33:5, 26; Isa. 44:2; in the latter, “Jesurun” in the KJV) and representing Israel as a nation of just or upright men. The epithet righteous nation, as we may render Jeshurun, was intended to remind Israel of its calling and involved the severest reproof of its apostasy.

JESI’AH. See Isshiah.

JESIM’IEL (je-sim’i-el; “God will place”). One of the thirteen Simeonite leaders who, in the time of Hezekiah, migrated to the valley of Gedor for purposes of conquest (1 Chron. 4:36).

JES’SE (jes’e). A son (or descendant) of Obed, the son of Boaz and Ruth (Ruth 4:17, 22; 1 Chron. 2:12; Matt. 1:5–6; Luke 3:32). He had eight sons (1 Sam. 17:12), the youngest of whom was David. Jesse’s wealth consisted chiefly of sheep, for whom David acted as shepherd (16:11; 17:34–35). The last historical mention of Jesse is in relation to the asylum that David procured for him from the king of Moab (1 Sam. 22:3–4), before 1000 B.C.

Although Jesse was of prominent lineage, yet he himself was unknown and of modest station in life. In such great messianic passages as Isa. 11:1, 10, allusion is made to this fact. After Saul had become estranged from David, he contemptuously called him “the son of Jesse,” thereby displaying his scorn toward him (1 Sam. 20:31; 22:7; 25:10). M.F.U.

JEST. The expression “Against whom do you jest?” (Isa. 57:4; “sport,” KJV) may well be rendered, “Against whom do you make yourselves merry?”

JESTING (Gk. eutrapelia, “pleasantry, humor, facetiousness”). This term is used in a bad sense (Eph. 5:4), as scurrility, ribaldry, low jesting.

JES’UI. See Ishvi.

JES’UITES. See Ishvites.

JES’URUN. See Jeshurun.

JE’SUS CHRIST (jē’zus krīst). In order to understand the life of the Lord, recourse should first be had in brief to the broad teachings of the NT respecting the character, relations, and claims of Jesus Christ. He is the one subject whose history fills the four gospels. We should properly apprehend, although we cannot comprehend, the divine personality set forth in these Scriptures; that personality whose words, deeds, and sufferings, and whose revealing names and titles, are recorded for our learning.

Names Assigned to the Lord. Matthew opens his gospel as “the book of the genealogy of Jesus Christ, the son of David.” Both designations are used here as a personal name, although usually “Christ” is a term employed rather as an appellative, or common name.

His Personal Name. The Lord’s personal name was Jesus, which signifies Savior. It is carefully accented by repetitions in the record as being highly important. (1) He was so called prospectively by Gabriel to Mary: “And behold, you will conceive in your womb, and bear a son, and you shall name Him Jesus” (Luke 1:31, italics added). (2) He was so named by the angel to Joseph in his supernatural dream respecting Mary and the child: “And she will bear a Son; and you shall call His name Jesus, for it is He who will save His people from their sins” (Matt. 1:21). (3) He was so called on the day of His birth: “She gave birth to a son; and he called His name Jesus” (Matt. 1:25). (4) He was so called when His name was officially bestowed at circumcision: “His name was then called Jesus, the name given by the angel before he was conceived in the womb” (Luke 2:21).

His Official Name. His official appellative was Christ, which means the Anointed One. Here the Messiah and the Christ of the Scriptures meet and identify themselves in the personality of Jesus, who was anointed of God as the Prophet, Priest, and King (Christos = Christ = the Anointed; Heb. Māshîaḥ, Messiah = the Anointed). “You know, Jesus of Nazareth, how God anointed Him with the Holy Spirit and with power, and how He went about doing good, and healing all who were oppressed by the devil; for God was with Him” (Acts 10:38). Andrew, who had been one of John the Baptist’s disciples, when he turned to follow Jesus, “found first his own brother Simon, and said to him, ‘We have found the Messiah’ (which translated means Christ)” (John 1:41, italics added). “It had been revealed” to the just and devout Simeon “by the Holy Spirit that he would not see death before he had seen the Lord’s Christ” (Luke 2:25–26, italics added). Peter, answering the Lord’s question, said, “Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God” (Matt. 16:16, italics added).

Other Titles. The Jehovah of the OT is the Jesus of the NT. (1) Jesus is called “the Son of Man” (ho huios tou anthrōpou). With this formula Jesus usually addressed Himself to the apprehension of His disciples. The reasons are obvious: Jesus was in His condition of humility; He was, as yet, thus best known to His followers in His humanity. He was to be known as the promised “seed” of the woman. He was a perfect man whose unique mission into this world was to be the Redeemer of lost mankind. (2) Jesus is called distinctively “the Son of God” (ho huios tou theou). This title expresses the deity of the Lord Jesus as distinguished from His humanity. In Scripture this designation is never applied to His miraculous birth, or exclusively to His messiahship, which, however, is included, but invariably to His original relation to the Father as He was in His preexistence before He assumed humanity. Our Lord declared Himself to be the Son of God, and included His messiahship as based upon His proper oneness and equality with God, either by direct expression or indirectly by implication. That relation made the messiahship possible, as expressed in “God ... sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh” (Rom. 8:3). The reference is not to the incarnation or miraculous conception of Christ but to His oneness with God in the glory that He had with the Father before the world was created (John 17:5). Jesus said to the Jews, “Do you say of Him, whom the Father sanctified and sent into the world, ‘You are blaspheming,’ because I said, ‘I am the Son of God’?” (John 10:36; cf. 9:35–37; Matt. 26:33, 64). The Jews understood that Jesus made this high claim and wanted to stone Him because He, being a man, had made Himself God (John 10:33). Paul reaffirms the claim when he represents Jesus Christ as He “who, although He existed in the form of God, did not regard equality with God a thing to be grasped.... That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of those who are in heaven, and on earth, and under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father” (Phil. 2:6–11). (3) Jesus is called “God our Savior” (ho Sōtēros hēmōn Theos). These passages express Christ’s unity and identity with God, illustrating the character of the preexistence of Jesus. Hence, the apostle Paul speaks of “the commandment of God our Savior” (1 Tim. 1:1; Titus 1:3); of “the kindness of God our Savior and His love” (Titus 3:4); of that which “is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Savior” (1 Tim. 2:3); and that men should “adorn the doctrine of God our Savior in every respect” (Titus 2:10), “looking for the blessed hope and the appearing of the glory of our great God and Savior, Christ Jesus” (2:13).

Ground of Christian Belief. The four gospels are occupied in furnishing facts illustrative of Jesus Christ and His work as related to mankind; also in teaching His relation to God. As these Scriptures derive all their character and significance from His personality and life—without which they would have no occasion to exist—our faith in their teaching rests on the following propositions: (1) the absolutely unique and perfect manhood of Jesus Christ among men; (2) the realization in Him of all the messianic predictions of Scripture; (3) all His miracles (see Table 20, “The Miracles of Jesus”), being restorative, were part of His redemptive plan; (4) the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, an absolute historical fact; (5) the transformation secured in the character of the individual believer; (6) the Spirit’s witness to personal adoption in Christian consciousness; and (7) the preeminence of the Christian nations as seen on the atlas of the world.

The Uniqueness of Christ as a Person. As a result of form critics of the twentieth century, such as K. L. Schmidt, M. Dibelius, and R. Bultmann, and the consequent common critical view that the gospel accounts of Jesus’ life and work are strongly mythological, there has been a strong tendency to strip Jesus Christ of the uniqueness ascribed to Him in the four gospels. The question may well be asked, In what sense was Jesus Christ unique?

Unique in His Birth. Was Jesus born like all other children by natural generation? Was Joseph His physical father? Is the doctrine of His virgin birth a myth effectually disposed of by form criticism and completely unhistorical? Whatever modern criticism may say, the record of the birth of Jesus as catalogued in the gospels presents the eternal Word who “was with God” and “was God” (John 1:1), becoming flesh (1:14) in a virgin’s womb by the Holy Spirit and under the overshadowing “power of the Most High” (Luke 1:35).

Scripture gives a chaste, exalted story of the nativity. The gospels present Jesus as if He was divine. If God was actually becoming incarnate, conception in other than a virgin’s womb would have been pure nonsense. No birth in all history was so simple and sublimely beautiful. If it is quasi-legendary and must be demythologized, why the absence of the fanciful and fantastic? Conception by the Holy Spirit, the virgin birth, the angelic choir on Judean hills, and the wise men’s star present a marvelous blending of the simple and the sublime, the humanly inscrutable and the spiritually satisfying. If the incarnation was God become man, as the gospels present, and not merely God entering a man, as modern criticism teaches, the miraculous would be expected. If the critic conveniently labels these details in the nativity as myth and succeeds in demythologizing it, the result is a divine man but not a God-man. The resulting creation of the critics is an historical misfit not dovetailing with OT prophecies, NT doctrine, apocalyptic, general church history, and human experience. Besides, it crashes head-on with the rest of the gospel accounts of the life, death, and resurrection of Christ, which are of one piece with the nativity story. If we believe the gospels, we shall find ourselves bowing at the manger cradle of the Christ Child and adoring Him.

Unique in His Life. Was Jesus’ earthly life unique? Was He compassed with sin, afflicted with error and frailty common to all other men? Did He have a genuine messianic consciousness? Did He know who He was and what He had come into the world to do, or was He an apocalyptic enthusiast dominated by grandiose dreams, deluding Himself and His followers? Criticism of the life of Christ in the early part of this century tended to deny Him ethical flawlessness (cf. such liberal interpretations as Benjamin W. Bacon, Jesus the Son of God [1930]; Harry E. Fosdick, The Manhood of the Master [1913]; id., The Man from Nazareth [1950]; Sherwood Eddy, A Portrait of Jesus [1943]; Ralph W. Sockman, Paradoxes of Jesus [1936]; Ernest F. Tittle, Jesus After Nineteen Centuries [1932]). Whatever such criticism might conclude concerning the interpretation of the life of Jesus Christ, it is inescapable that He is presented in the gospels as sinless in life. A unique life is indicated as subsequent to a unique birth. With wonderful clarity the evangelists present a sinless Savior against the backdrop of a sinful world. He is portrayed as a Savior who came to save sinners and was able to save them because He Himself was sinless.

Although He was presented as sinless, He had the keenest sensitivity to sin. He was never conscious of sin in Himself. He never confessed sin. He is always depicted in the gospel accounts as acting and speaking apart from sin. John, the disciple closest to His affection, declares, "In Him there is no sin" (1 John 3:5). Peter says He "committed no sin, nor was any deceit found in His mouth" (1 Pet. 2:22). Paul pens the fact that He "knew no sin" (2 Cor. 5:21). Enemies were constrained to confess the same fact. Pilate confessed Him to be a righteous man (Matt. 27:24) and declared, "I find no guilt in Him" (John 18:38). Judas had to own that he had betrayed "innocent blood" (Matt. 27:4).

The gospels are filled with the fascination of a sinless and selfless Christ who cultivated unbroken fellowship with the Father in full obedience to the divine will, even to the death of the cross. Moreover, men who refuse to exercise faith in the gospel accounts and who view the sinlessness of Jesus as a pious fiction of the early church are confronted with the poignant beauty and power of Christ as the dominating character of the gospels.

Men like Wilhelm Wrede (Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien [1901]) denied the mystic consciousness of Jesus in the synoptic gospels, particularly in Mark. Wrede contended that mystery attaches to the problem of Jesus' messiahship, and he used the term "Mystic Secret." He declared this was a dogmatic invention of the primitive church. He held that the church had no real proof that Jesus Himself held to or declared Himself to be the Messiah. Consequently Wrede maintained it superimposed this dogmatic invention upon the traditional account of Christ's life in order to explain the silence of tradition on the subject. Wrede forgot that the phenomena he cited are explainable as simple historical facts rather than an artificial invention forced upon the accounts. Works in a general sense favorable to Wrede's position, with variations, are A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus, 2d ed. (1911); M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel (1935); C. C. McCown, The Search for the Real Jesus (1940); R. Bultmann, Theology of the N. T., vol. 1 (1951). More conservative interpretations are found in J. W. Bowman, The Intention of Jesus (1943); W. Manson, Jesus, the Messiah (1943); V. Taylor, The Gospel According to St. Mark (1952).

Unique in His Death. Were the sufferings of Jesus radically different from those of the saints and martyrs? Was His death unparalleled, or was it merely the martyrdom of a misguided zealot rather than the redemptive act of the Savior of the world? Was it vicarious, redemptive, and substitutionary, or was it purely an example and ethically influential?

The theological thinking of the past century has been dominated by the spirit of relativism. This view, a product of the History of Religions school of the nineteenth century, professes to find elements similar to Christianity in the various great ethnic faiths. Its tendency is more and more to refuse to speak in absolutes, denying the uniqueness of Christianity and Christ and thus to put the birth, life, and death of Jesus Christ on a general par with the experience of other great and good men. The present-day question of relativism in relation to the uniqueness of Christ and Christianity presents one of the most profound problems of our present ecclesiastical climate. Only by walking the way of faith will contemporary relativizing scholarship correct itself. Contemporary biblical criticism must realize that faith in the uniqueness of Christ and the absoluteness of Christianity is not an attainment of human intellect or human brilliance. It is gained rather through the enlightenment of the Spirit of God.

Looking at the gospel accounts, we discover that the sufferings of Christ are presented as entirely different from those of any other human being. The agony in the Garden and the sweat that "became like drops of blood" (Luke 22:44) were the result not merely of extreme mental and physical anguish on the human plane but were occasioned by the sinless soul of the Son of God coming in contact with the weight of the world's sin. Apart from this explanation the gospel accounts of the darkness of Gethsemane's anguish are unexplainable. The sufferings of Calvary are more than the excruciating pain of crucifixion or body-racking thirst. Other men have endured as much or more. The cross of Christ is a travesty unless He who hung there knew no sin but was made a sacrifice for sin "that we might become the righteousness of God in Him" (2 Cor. 5:21). The sinless One coming in contact with the sin of the world and enduring the wrath of God against sin are the only sensible explanations of the unique sufferings of Christ. Without a sinless life and a virgin birth as antecedents, such a death is impossible and meaningless.

Contemporary scholarship develops the life of Christ under various presentations based on the assumption that Jesus differed only by degree from other people. Some, realizing the obvious fact that the gospels would never have been penned unless Jesus was an eminent personality, stress this element (cf. S. J. Case, The Historicity of Jesus [1912]; also the works of Browne and Ray O. Miller). Others highlight His character, such as Martin J. Scott. Others, His spiritual insight (F. W. Lewis) or His spiritual life (cf. Rittelmeyer, E. Irvine, and Steer). Others emphasize His strength of character and spiritual eminence (cf. David Smith, Wendling, and Coates). Others dwell upon the everyday naturalness of Jesus and His love of outdoor life (Bruce Barton and Kagawa). Albert Schweitzer held that Jesus reacted as a fanatic believer in an apocalyptic program (The Quest of the Historical Jesus [1910]; The Psychiatric Study of Jesus [1948]). The flaw of all of those treatments of the life of Christ is that our Lord differed only in degree from other men, whereas the gospels present Him as God become flesh, deity and humanity united in one Person.

Unique in His Resurrection. Is the bodily resurrection of Christ historically and experientially defensible, or is it a mere myth dreamed up by excited followers? Rationalism has always questioned the resurrection of Christ on the grounds of the miraculous, but this aspect of His Person and work is inseparable from His supernatural birth, life, and death. If Jesus was He whom the gospels portray Him to be and He whom He Himself claimed to be, resurrection was the vindicating event of His sinless life and redemptive death. More than this, it was an absolute necessity.

The prevailing problem in modern thinking is the difficulty of fitting the resurrection into the scientific atmosphere of our day that assumes that the universe is shut up to the rigid and irrefutable rule of natural law. But natural law is not a body of regulations that forces compliance. Rather, it is merely an observation of how things have been known to occur in the space-time universe. An adequate view of natural law does not preclude the possibility of divine intervention in the space-time universe any more than it rules out human exercise of mind over matter. By their abilities, men violate the laws of nature constantly.

Numerous writers in this scientific age labor to explain away Christ's physical resurrection. For example, Shirley Jackson Case maintains that the early Christian believers were compelled to outstrip their heathen rivals by attributing to their "hero" a resurrection that was already believed in by devotees of Osiris, Hercules, Dionysius, Adonis, and Attis (cf. S. J. Case, Experience with the Supernatural in Early Christian Times [1929]; The Origins of Christian Supernaturalism [1946]). Old writers such as K. H. Venturini at the beginning of the nineteenth century held the absurd position that Jesus did not really die but merely swooned, revived in the tomb, and was rescued by His disciples. D. F. Strauss, another noted rationalist, saw the ridiculousness of this view and supplanted it by a mystical theory (1835). Similarly C. H. Weisse, after the middle of the nineteenth century, refused to allow that the resurrection had to do with the outward corporeal existence but merely touched the spiritual and psychic life. Adolf Harnack accepted the Easter message of the soul's survival after death but rejected the Easter event.

Despite the unbelief of the naturalists the Christian church has hung tenaciously to the resurrection. The Lord's Day, the climax of the church calendar in Easter Sunday, and the experiential assurance of myriads of regenerated believers all attest the importance of this doctrine in Christian conviction. J. S. Stewart (A Faith to Proclaim [1953], pp. 106f.) speaks clearly of this as a "cosmic event" and as "the shattering of history by a creative act by God Almighty." This, Stewart says, was God "doing something comparable only with what He had done at the first creation."

All who clearly evaluate the resurrection see its inseparable connection with other unique features of the Person and work of Christ. Disbelievers in the resurrection of Christ must realize that this truth, like any other spiritual truth, becomes experiential on the basis of faith. Those who walk with the risen Christ, like the Emmaus disciples, will receive the revelation that they received. The present spiritually adrift age, dazzled by man's scientific progress and ensnared by towering intellectual pride, must realize that the resurrection of Jesus Christ is a great experienced reality that makes intelligible all the other realities of the Person and work of Christ. Men are blundering today by thinking that science can speak ex cathedra on such a matter as Christ's resurrection. The voice of science is authoritative and often unquestioned in the natural realm, but regarding the life of Christ science cannot speak because it is confined to the natural and the life of Jesus of Nazareth spans both time and eternity and embraces the natural as well as the supernatural.

However, as an actual event of history, the resurrection of Christ on purely naturalistic grounds is as well attested an event as any happening of ancient times. The glowing faith of the hitherto unbelieving disciples, the establishment of the Christian church, the production of the NT Scriptures, and the history of the redemptive touch of the risen Christ upon the human heart are all phenomena that are unexplainable to the rationalistic denier of the historicity of the resurrection. Such a resurrection saga as confronts us in the NT, not only in the gospels but in all the other books, in itself is an eloquent contradiction of man's proud unbelief.

Unique in His Redemptive Touch. In the resurrection was fulfilled Christ's incipient announcement of the purpose of His coming into the world. "I came that they might have life, and might have it abundantly" (John 10:10). Down through the ages those who have rested their faith in a crucified and risen Redeemer have experienced the regenerating touch of God upon their lives. No change is quite so wonderful as that which takes place in the person who begins to have faith in Jesus Christ. Those who know His redemptive touch and make their quest the supreme goal of knowing Him (Phil. 3:10), such as the apostle Paul did, have moved and are moving the world for God and for good. Not only does the believing soul receive life but fullness of life. The whole magnificent theology of Paul is based on the believer's union with the resurrected Christ. This exalted position Paul contends is transferred into experiential reality on the basis of faith. The believer in the resurrected Christ is "dead to sin, but alive to God in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 6:11). This high position is transferred into his everyday experience when he believes. Thus the resurrection power of Jesus Christ manifested in fullness of life is on a faith basis.

Those who do not exercise faith cannot hope to understand or interpret the life of Jesus, appreciate His personal work, or have any knowledge of the life or fullness of life He came to bring. They are shut up, if intellectually honest, to explaining away the miraculous and supernatural elements of His Person and unique work, which make Him what He is, and form the basis of what He accomplished. Thomas believed because he saw. But millions since his day and because of Christ's redemptive touch have been "blessed ... who did not see, and yet believed" (John 20:29). It remains a thrilling fact that Christians, not only the ignorant and unlearned but the philosophical and learned, have this as a treasure, that they know the living Christ. Through the channel of faith His life has flowed into their being. Although they have never seen Him with the physical eye, He is no less real to the spiritual perception.

Because Jesus was unique in birth, in life, in sufferings, in death, and in resurrection, He is the basis of the good news, or gospel, that Christians have received and that they proclaim, by which gospel, Paul says, “you stand, by which also you are saved.... For I delivered to you as of first importance what I also received, that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, and that He was buried and that He was raised on the third day according to the Scriptures” (1 Cor. 15:1–3).

It is thus apparent that apart from the many-sided uniqueness of the Person and work of Christ there can be no Christian gospel. The gospel centers in Christ. The gospel is Christ. The gospel brings to men redemption. Men who reject the Christ of the four gospels cut away the foundation of the Christian gospel. This may not seem a tragedy to those with superficial views of sin and the necessity of God’s grace. But souls awakened to the depravity of sin and the lostness of the human soul apart from God’s mercy, see in the rejection of the supernatural Christ a catastrophe of first magnitude. Without the Christ of the gospels fulfilling the messianic prophecies of the OT and furnishing the gospel as expounded by the apostle Paul, Christianity is an empty shell, a mere corpse overlaid with elaborate ritual and costly trappings, but spiritually meaningless. Christ is the life of Christianity and its very heart. If the heart is rejected, the life is forfeited. Jesus must remain the absolute One or the greatest unanswered riddle of history. M.F.U.

JE’SUS, OFFICES OF. “Jesus is, in virtue of his incarnation, anointed mediator between God and man. His work was the fulfillment and consummation of the ancient prophetic, priestly, and regal functions to which the typical servants of God under the old economy were anointed. These offices he began to discharge on earth, and continues to discharge in heaven. While considering them as distinct, it is important to remember that they are one in the mediatorial work” (Pope, Christ. Theol., p. 196).

The Prophetic Office. We call Christ our highest Prophet because He is the perfect revealer of the counsel and will of God for the salvation of sinners. As such He comes with supreme credentials, the Truth and the Light of men. The Lord not only speaks of Himself as a prophet (Matt. 13:57; John 4:44) but also receives this name from others (Matt. 21:11; John 3:2; 4:19; 6:14; 9:17) and declares that He is come into the world in order to bear witness of the truth (John 18:37). His disciples call Him prophet and apostle (Luke 24:19; Acts 3:22–24; Heb. 1:1–2; 3:1; 2 Pet. 1:18–19; Rev. 1:5).

Christ came as the greatest prophet, priest, and king. As revealed of God par excellence He fulfilled Deut. 18:15: “The Lord your God will raise up for you a prophet like me from among you, from your countrymen, you shall listen to him.”

Priestly Office. Here on earth our Lord was a priest in a preeminent sense, both in His sacrifice of Himself for the sins of the world and in His intercession. He is also our present High Priest, interceding for us in heaven. Jesus’ baptism in Jordan was evidently a divine setting-apart of the Messiah for His threefold office of Prophet, Priest, and King, especially as a priest, for therein was the essence of His work manifested in human redemption. See Intercession; Mediation; Propitiation.

Kingly Office. All the OT prophecies concerning the kingdom have in view Christ’s kingly office. (1) Christ will in the future occupy David’s throne as David’s heir (2 Sam. 7:16; Ps. 89:20–29; Isa. 11:1–16; Jer. 33:19–21). (2) He was born as a king (Matt. 2:2). (3) He came into the world as a king (Luke 1:32–33). (4) He was rejected as a king (Mark 15:12–13; Luke 19:14). (5) He died as a king (Matt. 27:37). (6) He is coming again as a king (Rev. 19:16). Christ is never called “King of the church,” although the term is used in the worship of the church (1 Tim. 1:17). He is “King of the Jews” (Matt. 2:2) and “head over all things to the church” (Eph. 1:22–23). At His second coming Christ will set up the Davidic mediatorial kingdom and reign as King-Priest (Zech. 6:11–13). His millennial reign will be mediatorial in the sense that God will reign through Christ. The mediatorial kingdom will continue until all enemies, angelic and human, will be put down (1 Cor. 15:25–28). However, Christ’s kingly reign is eternal (2 Sam. 7:16; Ps. 89:36–37; Isa. 9:6–7) inasmuch as Christ goes on reigning by the same authority of the Father (1 Cor. 15:28). See Kingdom of God.

JE’THER (je’ther; “eminence, abundance, surplus”).

1. Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses (Ex. 4:18, marg.).

2. The firstborn of Gideon’s sons, who, when called upon to execute the captured Midianite kings, Zebah and Zalmunna, “was afraid, because he was still a youth” (Judg. 8:20). According to 9:18 he was killed, with sixty-nine of his brothers, at the hand of Abimelech.

3. The father of Amasa, commander of Absalom’s army (1 Kings 2:5, 32). Jether is merely another form of Ithra (2 Sam. 17:25), the latter probably being a corruption. He is described in 1 Chron. 2:17 as an Ishmaelite, which again is more likely to be correct than the “Israelite” of the Heb. in 2 Sam. 17 or the “Jezreelite” of the LXX and Vulg. in the same passage (K. & D., Com., ad loc.). Kimchi suggests “that in the land of Ishmael Jether was called the Israelite from his nationality, and in that of Israel they called him the Ishmaelite on account of his living in the land of Ishmael.”

4. The son of Jada, a descendant of Hezron, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:32).

5. The son of Ezrah, whose name occurs in a dislocated passage in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chron. 4:17).

6. The head of a family of warriors of the line of Asher, and father of Jephunneh (1 Chron. 7:38). He is probably the same as Ithran (v. 37).

JE'THETH (je'theth; derivation uncertain). One of the "chiefs" who were descended from Esau (Gen. 36:40; 1 Chron. 1:51).

JETH'LAH. See Ithlah.

JETH'RO (jeth'rō; "excellence, superiority"). A priest or prince of Midian, both offices probably being combined in one person. Moses spent the forty years of his exile from Egypt with him and married his daughter Zipporah (Ex. 3:1; 4:18; 18:1–7), c. 1475 B.C. At the advice of Jethro, Moses appointed deputies to judge the congregation and share the burden of government with him (18:13–26). On account of his local knowledge he was entreated to remain with the Israelites throughout their journey to Canaan (Num. 10:29–32). It is said in Ex. 2:18 that the priest of Midian whose daughter Moses married was Reuel. But in 3:1 he is called Jethro, as in 4:18 and chap. 18, and in Num. 10:29 he is called "Hobab the son of Reuel the Midianite" (cf. Judg. 4:11). Jethro and Reuel were probably different names of Moses' father-in-law (the former being either a title or a surname showing the rank of Reuel in his tribe), and the son, Hobab, was probably his brother-in-law.

JE'TUR (je'tur). One of the twelve sons of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chron. 1:31). His name stands also for his descendants, the Ituraeans (5:19), living E of the northern Jordan (Luke 3:1).

JEU'EL (je-ū'el).

1. A descendant of Zerah who, with 690 of his relatives, dwelt in Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:6), 536 B.C.

2. One of the "last" sons of Adonikam who, with sixty males, formed part of the caravan of Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:13; "Jeiel," KJV), about 457 B.C.

JE'USH (je'ush).

1. The first of the three sons of Esau by Oholibamah, born in Canaan, but afterward a chief of the Edomites (Gen. 36:5, 14, 18; 1 Chron. 1:35), after 1950 B.C.

2. The first named son of Bilhan, the grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:10), considerably after 1900 B.C.

3. A son of Eshek, a remote descendant of Saul (1 Chron. 8:39; "Jehush," KJV).

4. A Levite, one of the four sons of Shimei, of the Gershonites. He and his brother Beriah, not having many sons, were reckoned as the third branch of the family (1 Chron. 23:10–11), about 960 B.C.

5. The first named of the three sons of Rehoboam, apparently by Abihail, his second wife (2 Chron. 11:19), after 926 B.C.

JE'UZ (je'uz; "counselor"). The head of a Benjamite house, one of the sons of Shaharaim, born of his wife Hodesh in Moab (1 Chron. 8:10).

JEW (jū; Heb. yhūdî). A Jehudite, i.e., descendant of Judah; Gk. Ioudaios, a name formed from that of the patriarch Judah and applied first to the tribe or country of Judah or to a subject of the kingdom of Judah (2 Kings 25:25; Jer. 32:12; 38:19; 40:11, 41:3; 52:28) in distinction from the seceding ten tribes, the Israelites. From the time of the Babylonian captivity, as the members of the tribe of Judah formed by far the larger portion of the remnant of the covenant people, Jews became the appellation of the whole nation (2 Macc. 9:17; John 4:9; 7:1; Acts 18:2, 24). The original designation of the Israelite people was the Hebrews, as the descendants of Abraham. Thus Paul was appropriately called a Hebrew, and still later the terms Hebrew and Jew were applied with little distinction. See Israel; Hebrew.

JEWEL, JEWELRY. In all ages and among all peoples the love of ornament has expressed itself in the making and wearing of objects of beauty in such forms as were attainable. Very early, as soon indeed as the use of metals was known, the making of jewelry, in our sense of the word, began. In the prehistoric Bronze Age we find multitudes of objects for personal adornment made of that material. Articles of silver and gold set with stones are preserved for us from the very dawn of history. The almost universal practice of burying such treasures with the remains of their owners has been a priceless boon both to history and archaeology in revealing to us the arts, the commerce, the culture, and the migrations of perished races and civilizations.

Uses. The uses of jewelry in Scripture have been various: mere personal adornment (Ex. 11:2; Isa. 3:18–21); gifts and tokens of friendship or affection (Gen. 24:22, 53; Ezek. 16:11–13); emblems of office in secular and religious ceremonials (Gen. 41:42; Dan. 5:7, 16, 29); and priestly insignia (Ex. 28, 39). The royal jewels and the insignia of orders of nobility in Europe and the ecclesiastical jewelry of the Greek and Roman Catholic churches are modern examples of office emblems and priestly insignia. In addition to these uses it may be noted that in ancient times, and still in the East, where money could not be invested as it is with us, precious stones and elaborate jewelry formed one of the safest and most convenient ways of preserving great wealth in small bulk—easy to transport and to conceal.

Scripture Terms. Four Heb. words are commonly used in reference to jewels or jewelry: (1) Sgūllâ, “shut up, treasure,” rendered “possession,” is connected with the idea and habit referred to in no. 4, immediately below (see Mal. 3:17, marg.) and is often used figuratively (Ex. 19:5; Ps. 135:4). (2) Klî, is something “wrought” or “prepared,” an article of silver or gold (Gen. 24:53; Ex. 3:22; 11:2; 12:35; Num. 31:50–51), and more generally refers to jewels (Isa. 61:10; Ezek. 16:39). This is also an indefinite term, often, perhaps, meaning vessels or implements, at other times decorations or trappings. (3) Helyâ, an ornament or trinket (Hos. 2:13), again general in character. (4) Nezem, a “ring,” the only term that is at all specific, generally rendered “earring,” and clearly so in Gen. 35:4; Ex. 32:2, 3; Ezek. 16:12; but sometimes meaning a “nose ring” (Prov. 11:22; Isa. 3:21). In many other cases (Gen. 24:22, 30, 47; Num. 31:50–51; Judg. 8:24–26; Prov. 25:12; etc.), although the former is the rendering, the latter may very probably be the original sense. The nose ring is sometimes two or two-and-a-half inches in diameter (as in Arabia, especially in the Nejed) or less (as with the women of Anatolia), and sometimes, as in the region of Damascus, is reduced to a mere jeweled stud, like our earrings within the last generation.

Other forms of jewelry need but brief reference. Bracelets and necklaces are familiar in all ages and nations, but in ancient times they were largely worn by men, as is conspicuously shown in the Assyrian sculptures and implied in Scripture passages such as Num. 31:50; Dan. 5:7, 16, 29. The large, massive golden bracelets of both men and women were sometimes made hollow, as is now done, and filled with sulphur, partly to lighten their weight and partly to save material. This has been proved by Phoenician examples and was probably frequent. Some of the ancient necklaces were very beautiful; much use was not made of precious stones, but glass and glazed earthenware were used, especially in Phoenician jewelry, in ornaments of beads, and pendants mingled with gold.

The passage “Your cheeks are lovely with ornaments, your neck with strings of beads” (Song of Sol. 1:10) probably refers to a style of ornament seen in many Cypriote figures, a series of coins, hung by small chains or links from behind the ears and coming down by the sides of the face in pendant “rows.”

Egyptian. The art of manufacturing jewelry had reached great perfection in Egypt at an early date. Nothing in ancient gilt or gem work, and scarcely anything now, can surpass in elegance the jewelry found with mummies of the royal family of the Twelfth Dynasty. The jeweled treasuries of Tutankhamen of the resplendent Eighteenth Dynasty were incredibly magnificent. His tomb, when opened in 1922, was intact. The tombs were systematically violated and robbed in ancient times, but a few escaped intact, and in them were found the mummies of several princesses, with their jewels. Among these were necklaces, bracelets, etc., exquisitely wrought and set with pearls, carnelian, emerald, and lapis lazuli. Other articles were inlaid with these same stones somewhat in the manner of cloisonne enamel, including two very remarkable crowns like delicate wreaths, the one encrusted with flowers of gems and bearing a fanlike spray of similar flowers, with stems and leaves of gold; the other a lacelike garland of gold with forget-me-nots of gems and beads of lapis lazuli (cf. Ezek. 16:12). The most familiar form of Egyptian jewelry is that of the so-called scaraboid seals. Many of them, doubtless, were used more as ornaments than as actual seals, though they were frequently employed for the latter purpose.

Assyrian. The jewelry of Assyria and Babylonia may be characterized generally as large, heavy, and showy but not graceful or delicate. The form best known to us, however, is that of the peculiar “Chaldean cylinders,” or rolling seals, which, like the Egyptian scarabs, were largely worn as ornaments and charms. Herodotus mentions a cylinder seal, a staff, and some other articles as forming part of the regular outfit of a Babylonian gentleman for all dress occasions; with this may be compared the much more ancient account of Judah (Gen. 38:18). Sumerian jeweled wealth is lavishly illustrated by the royal tomb of Queen Puabi, discovered by Woolley at ancient Ur.

Phoenician. With regard to the Phoenician artisans in Judea, it is not necessary to suppose that they resided there, except perhaps in the principal cities, but they probably traveled through the country doing a little business from place to place. Some writers observe that this custom may still be seen in the East; the itinerant goldsmith and jeweler comes with his small portable furnace, crucible, and stock in trade, and sets up business for a day or two. The women bring their treasured coins to be fashioned into bracelets, bangles, or rings, and the artificer deducts a little percentage for his work. This method is probably very ancient and widespread. Excavations in the Royal Tombs of Byblos have yielded abundant evidences of Phoenician jewel-craft. In the National Museum of Lebanon gleaming objets d’art displaying Phoenician skill can be seen today.

Hebrew. Or course, the most interesting and important articles of Hebrew jewelry are those connected with the worship of the Tabernacle, especially the high priest’s breastpiece, of which such specific descriptions are given. The style of workmanship must have been Egyptian in character; the Israelites had been living there for generations and must have been familiar with the art of that country, while long cut off from association with Mesopotamia. At a later period of their history they came under Assyrian and Babylonian influence. In art matters, they were largely influenced by their Phoenician neighbors. We have seen how the latter borrowed and mingled the art styles of Egypt and Mesopotamia, developing no originality, though much of skill and delicacy in treatment. It would seem, therefore, that the influences dominating Hebrew art in jewelry must have been first Egyptian, then Phoenician, and finally Chaldean.

At this point a few words should be said as to the differences between ancient and modern jewelry. The whole method of cutting stones in facets is modern and European—Eastern and ancient jewelry is quite different. In ancient times the stones were dressed en cabochon, as modern jewelers call it, i.e., made in rounded forms with smooth or polished convex surfaces. This mode we still employ for opaque and translucent gems, such as turquoises, opals, moonstones, and “carbuncle” garnets, but anciently it was universal. This method gives none of the brilliant flashing effect now so highly esteemed, which results from the internal reflection and refraction of the rays of light from the numerous facets. Hence the ancients seem to have cared less for transparency than we do, and to make up for the loss of beauty in this regard they paid more attention to engraving gems than the moderns. Any collection of ancient jewelry will show a large proportion of opaque and semitransparent stones, all en cabochon, rounded, and many beautifully sculptured with cameos, intaglios, or inscriptions. In this work the ancients excelled, and the fineness, sharpness, and boldness of their gem engraving cannot be surpassed, indeed, can scarcely be equaled by modern workmen with the best of tools and magnifiers (see Anklets; Bracelets; Precious Stones; Ring). JEW'ESS, (jū'es). A woman of Hebrew extraction, without distinction of tribe (Acts 24:24). This passage refers to Drusilla, wife of Felix and daughter of Herod Agrippa I, but in 1 Chron. 4:18 Mered's "Jewish wife" (NIV, "Judean") is mentioned, and in Acts 16:1 Timothy is called "the son of a Jewish woman."

JEWISH (Gk. Ioudaikos). Of or belonging to Jews. The apostle Paul warns his young brother against Jewish myths, i.e., the rabbinical legends (Titus 1:14).

JEZANI'AH (jez-a-nī'a; Jer. 40:8; 42:1). See Jaazaniah, no. 1.

JEZ'EBEL (jez'e-bel; perhaps "noncohabited, un-husbanded"). The daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre and Sidon, and queen with Ahab. Her father had formerly been a priest of Astarte, but had violently dispossessed his brother Phelles of the throne. The first mention of Jezebel in Scripture is her marriage with Ahab (1 Kings 16:31), about 871 B.C.

Introduces Idolatry. The first effect of her influence was the immediate establishment of the Phoenician worship on a grand scale at the court of Ahab. At her table were supported no less than 450 prophets of Baal and 400 of Astarte (1 Kings 16:31–32; 18:19), whereas the prophets of Jehovah were slain by her orders (18:13; 2 Kings 9:7).

Opposes Elijah. When at last the people, at the instigation of Elijah (which see), rose against her ministers and slaughtered them at the foot of Carmel, and when Ahab was terrified into submission, she alone retained her presence of mind; and when she received, in the palace of Jezreel, the tidings that her religion was all but destroyed, she vowed to take the life of the prophet (1 Kings 19:1–2).

Secures the Death of Naboth. When Jezebel found her husband cast down by his disappointment at being thwarted by Naboth (which see), she took the matter into her own hands. She wrote a warrant in Ahab's name, which was to secure the death of Naboth. To her, and not Ahab, was sent the announcement that the royal wishes were accomplished, and she bade her husband go and take the vacant property (1 Kings 21:1–16). On her, accordingly, fell the prophet's curse, as well as on her husband (v. 23).

Influence. Her policy was so triumphant that there were at last but seven thousand people who had not bowed the knee to Baal or kissed the hand of his image. Through her daughter Athaliah, queen of Judah, the same policy prevailed for a time in that kingdom. Jezebel survived Ahab fourteen years and maintained considerable ascendancy over her son Jehoram.

Death. When Jehu entered Jezreel, Jezebel was in the palace, which stood by the gate of the city, overlooking the approach from the E. She determined to face the destroyer of her family, whom she saw rapidly advancing in his chariot. She painted her eyelids in the Eastern fashion with antimony, so as to give a darker border to the eyes and make them look larger and brighter, possibly in order to induce Jehu, after the manner of Eastern usurpers, to take her, the widow of his predecessor, for his wife, but more probably as the last act of regal splendor. She adorned her head, and, looking down upon him from the high latticed window in the tower, she met him by an allusion to a former act of treason in the history of her adopted country. Jehu looked up from his chariot. Two or three officials of the royal harem showed their faces at the windows and, at his command, threw her down from the chamber. She fell in front of Jehu's chariot. When, afterward, he wished to show respect to her corpse as that of "a king's daughter," nothing was found of her but "the skull and the feet and the palms of her hands," thus fulfilling the prophecy of Elijah (2 Kings 9:30–37), about 841 B.C.

Character. Jezebel was a woman in whom were united the sternest and fiercest qualities inherent in the Phoenician people. The wild license of her life and the magical fascination of her arts and of her character were known throughout the nation (2 Kings 9:22). Long afterward her name lived as the byword for all that was detestable. In Rev. 2:20 she is used as a type of those who encourage immorality and false teaching, in the same way that she engulfed Israel in idolatry.

JE'ZER (je'zer; "form, purpose"). The third named of the sons of Naphtali (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:49; 1 Chron. 7:13) and the progenitor of the Jezerites (Num. 26:49), before 1870 B.C.

JEZI'AH. See Izzi'ah.

JE'ZIEL (je'zi-el). A "son" of Azmaveth and one of the Benjamite archers who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:3), before 1000 B.C.

JEZLI'AH. See Izliah.

JEZO'AR. See Izhar.

JEZRAHI'AH (jez-ra-hī'a; "Jehovah will shine"). He was the superintendent leader of the singers at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh. 12:42), 445 B.C.

JEZ'REEL (jez'rēl; "God sows").

1. A descendant of the father (or founder) of Etam, of the line of Judah (1 Chron. 4:3).
2. The oldest son of the prophet Hosea, so called because of the great slaughter predicted by his father (Hos. 1:4–5), about 748 B.C. See "The bloodshed of Jezreel," in no. 3, below.
3. The name of a city in Issachar (Josh. 19:18), and the plain in which it was located (1 Sam. 29:1; Hos. 1:5). It was situated about fifty-five miles N of Jerusalem and is identified with the present Zer 'in, about seven miles N of Jenin. Here the kings of Israel had a palace (2 Sam. 2:8–9), and here the court often resided (1 Kings 18:45–46; 2 Kings 10:11). In or near the town was a temple of Baal and an Asherah (1 Kings 16:32–33). The palace of Ahab was on the eastern side of the city, forming part of the city wall (cf. 1 Kings 21:1; 2 Kings 9:25, 30, 33). The palace in which Jezebel lived was on the city wall, with windows facing to the E (2 Kings 9:30). Nearby was the vineyard of Naboth, coveted by King Ahab, and secured by Jezebel through the cruel death of its owner (1 Kings 21:1–16).

"The bloodshed of Jezreel" ("I will punish the house of Jehu for the bloodshed of Jezreel," Hos. 1:4) is generally understood to be put for the murders perpetuated by Ahab and Jehu at this place. But the divine vengeance is to be visited upon the house of Jehu and would seem, therefore, to be because of his acts. This may be, not because of his extermination of the house of Ahab, in which he fulfilled the divine command, but by reason of the motives that actuated Jehu. That he was moved by evil and selfish motives is evident (see 2 Kings 10:29, 31).

The “District of Jezreel” refers to the fortification or entrenchment surrounding the city, outside of which Naboth was executed (1 Kings 21:23).

The “Spring of Jezreel” (“The spring which is in Jezreel,” 1 Sam. 29:1) is mentioned as the spot near which the Israelites pitched their camp in one of their campaigns against the Philistines. At present it is called Ain Jalûd (or Ain Jalût), i.e., Goliath’s fountain, probably because it was regarded as the scene of Goliath’s defeat. It is a very large spring issuing from the foot of the mountain on the NE border of Gilboa.

“The Property of Jezreel” (also called the “territory of Jezreel,” 2 Kings 9:10), is the field or country adjacent to the city, where the crime of Ahab occurred (2 Kings 9:10, 21, 36; etc.).

The “Tower in Jezreel” was one of the turrets or bastions guarding the entrance of the city, and where the watchman was stationed (2 Kings 9:17).

The “Valley of Jezreel” lies on the northern side of the city between the ridges of Gilboa and Moreh. Its name was afterward extended to the whole plain of Esdraelon (Josh. 17:16; Judg. 6:33; Hos. 1:5). Smith suggests that the “word for ‘vale,’ ĕmeq, literally deepening, is a highlander’s word for a valley as he looks down into it, and is never applied to any extensive plain away from hills.”

4. A town in the mountains of Judah, mentioned between Juttah and Jokdeam (Josh. 15:56, and probably the native place of Ahinoam, one of David’s wives (1 Sam. 25:43; 27:3); the site has not yet been discovered.

JEZ´REELITE (jez´rēl-īt). An inhabitant of Jezreel (which see) in Issachar (1 Kings 21:1, 4, 6–7, 15–16; 2 Kings 9:21, 25).

JEZ´REELITESS (jez´rēl-ī-tes; 1 Sam. 27:3, 30:5; 2 Sam. 2:2, 3:2; 1 Chron. 3:1). A woman of Jezreel in Judah, mentioned in connection with David’s wife Ahinoam.

JOAB (jō´ab). The name of one of David’s captains (see article below) and of several other men in the Bible.

1. In 1 Chron. 2:54 there is mention of “Atroth-beth-joab.” Which Joab is meant is uncertain.

2. The son of Seraiah (son of Kenaz), a Judaite and progenitor of the inhabitants of Geharashim, who were craftsmen (1 Chron. 4:14).

3. The head of a family whose descendants, with those of Jeshua, to the number of 2,812 (Ezra 2:6) or 2,818 (Neh. 7:11) returned from Babylon with Ezra. It is not certain whether Jeshua and Joab were sons of Pahath-moab, or whether, in the registration of those returned, the descendants of Jeshua and Joab were represented by the sons of Pahath-moab. The Joab mentioned in Ezra 8:9 is probably the same person; 445 B.C.

JO´AB (jō´ab; “Jehovah is father”). A “captain of the host” of David. He was one of the three sons of Zeruah, the sister of David. His father is not named in the Scriptures, but Josephus (Ant. 7.1.3) gives his name as Suri. He seems to have resided at Bethlehem, and to have died before his sons, as we find mention of his tomb at the place (2 Sam. 2:32).

First Appearance. Joab's first appearance was in connection with his brothers, Abishai and Asahel, in command of David's army, when they went against Abner, who was championing the claims of Ish-bosheth to the throne. The armies met at the pool of Gibeon, and Abner was defeated in battle. In his flight he killed Asahel, who was pursuing him (2 Sam. 2:13–32), about 1000 B.C.

Avenges Asahel. Joab was greatly angered at the death of his brother, but postponed his revenge. Abner, quarreling with Ish-bosheth, came to David in Hebron in order to enlist in his service. Returning from a raid, Joab was informed of Abner's visit. He chided the king, accused Abner of treachery, and then sent messengers after Abner, who returned at once and was killed by Joab and his brother Abishai. David reproved the act, but seems to have been in fear of his able and intrepid nephew (2 Sam. 3:8–39).

In Chief Command. At the siege of Jerusalem Joab succeeded in scaling the height upon which the fortress stood and was made "chief" of the army of all Israel, of which David was then king (2 Sam. 5:6–10; 1 Chron. 11:5–8). He immediately undertook, in conjunction with David, the fortification of the city (2 Sam. 5:9; 1 Chron. 11:8). He had a chief armor-bearer of his own, Naharai, a Beerothite (2 Sam. 23:37; 1 Chron. 11:39), and ten attendants to carry his equipment and baggage (2 Sam. 18:15). He was in charge of giving the signal by trumpet for advance or retreat (18:16). He was called "lord" (11:11), "the commander of the king's army" (1 Chron. 27:34). His usual residence was in Jerusalem, but he had a house and property, with barley fields adjoining, in the country (2 Sam. 14:30), in the "wilderness" (1 Kings 2:34), probably on the NE of Jerusalem (cf. 1 Sam. 13:18; Josh. 8:15, 20), near an ancient sanctuary, called from its nomadic village "Baal-hazor" (2 Sam. 13:23; cf. 14:30), where there were extensive sheepwalks.

Military Achievements. Joab's military exploits were conducted by him in person and may be divided into three campaigns: that against the allied forces of Syria and Ammon, that against Edom, and that against the Ammonites.

In the campaign against the allied forces of Syria and Ammon, Joab attacked and defeated the Syrians, while his brother did the same to the Ammonites. The Syrians rallied with their kindred beyond the Euphrates and were finally routed by David himself (2 Sam. 10:7–14).

In the campaign against Edom the decisive victory was gained by David himself in the "Valley of Salt" and celebrated by a triumphal monument (8:13). But Joab had the charge of carrying out the victory and remained for six months, completely destroying the male population, whom he then buried in the tombs of Petra (1 Kings 11:15–16).

In the third campaign the Ammonites were again left to Joab (2 Sam. 10:7–19). The Ark was sent with him at the siege of Rabbah, and the whole army was encamped in booths or huts around the beleaguered city (11:1, 11). After a sortie of the inhabitants, which caused some loss to the Jewish army, Joab took the lower city on the river and then sent to urge David to come and take the citadel, that the glory of the capture might be the king's (12:26–28).

Services to David. Joab served David faithfully, both in political and private relations, and he showed himself to be truly devoted to the king's interests. (1) During the Ammonite war Joab lent himself to the king's passion and secured the death of Uriah the Hittite (2 Sam. 11:14–25). (2) When Absalom accomplished the death of Amnon, Joab effected Absalom's return by means of the widow of Tekoah. When Absalom revolted, Joab's former closeness to the prince did not impair his fidelity to the king. He followed Absalom beyond the Jordan and in the final battle of Ephraim, in spite of David's injunction to spare him and when no one else had courage to act so decisive a part, killed the prince (2 Sam. 18:2, 11–15). (3)

When David resolved to number the people, Joab tried to dissuade him from his purpose. Unsuccessful in this, Joab performed the task slowly in order to give the king an opportunity to reconsider the matter (24:1–9).

Murder of Amasa. David, to conciliate the powerful party that had supported Absalom, offered the command of the army to Amasa. Joab was grievously offended by this act of the king, and when Amasa tarried longer than the time allowed him to assemble his forces, Joab had an opportunity of displaying his superior resources. Abishai was ordered to pursue the revolting Sheba (perhaps with Joab in command, K. & D.), and when Amasa came up to meet them at Gibeon he was treacherously killed by Joab (2 Sam. 20:4–13).

Joins Adonijah. Shortly before the death of David a demonstration was made in favor of his eldest surviving son, Adonijah, instead of Solomon, and Joab joined this party. The prompt measures taken rendered Adonijah's demonstration abortive, and Solomon was declared king (1 Kings 1:7–39).

Death. Hearing of the death of Adonijah, Joab fled for refuge to the altar. Solomon, hearing of this, sent Benaiah to put him to death, and, as he refused to come forth, Benaiah killed him. His body was buried in the wilderness of Judah (1 Kings 2:5, 28–34), about 962 B.C.

Character. Joab was a man of great military prowess, valiant, and capable. He was revengeful, and not above treachery in order to gratify his vengeance. Although he treated his king with little ceremony he was, nevertheless, truly devoted to his interests. His principles did not prevent his serving his master's vices as well as his virtues. Altogether he appears in history as one of the most accomplished and unscrupulous warriors that Israel ever produced. BIBLIOGRAPHY: R. O. Corvin, David and His Mighty Men (1970), pp. 69–86; W. G. JO'AH (jō'a; "Jehovah is brother").

1. Son of Asaph and "recorder" of King Hezekiah, and one of the messengers sent to receive the insulting message of Rabshakeh (2 Kings 18:18, 26, 37; Isa. 36:3, 22), about 719 B.C.

2. A Levite of the family of Gershon, son of Zimnah and father of Iddo (1 Chron. 6:20–21). He is probably the same person who, with his son Eden, assisted Hezekiah in the reformation of the Temple worship (2 Chron. 29:12), about 719 B.C. He is identified with Ethan, mentioned in 1 Chron. 6:42.

3. The third son of Obed-edom, one of the gatekeepers (porters, KJV) for the Tabernacle in the time of David (1 Chron. 26:4), after 1000 B.C.

4. Son of Joahaz and recorder for King Josiah. He was appointed one of the superintendents of the Temple repairs (2 Chron. 34:8), 639 B.C.

JO'AHAZ (jō'a-haz; "Jehovah holds"). The father of Joah, a recorder in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. 34:8), 639 B.C.

JOA'NAN (jō-a'nān). The son of Rhesa and grandson of Zerubbabel, in the lineage of Christ (Luke 3:27; "Joanna," KJV).

JOAN'NA (jō-a'na; Gk., probably feminine of Jōannēs, John). The wife of Chuza, the steward of Herod Agrippa (Luke 8:3). She, with other women, was either cured of disease by Jesus or received material benefits from Him and afterward ministered to Him and His disciples. She was also one of the women to whom Christ appeared after the resurrection (Luke 24:10).

For the name in Luke 3:27, see Joanan.

JO'ASH (jō'ash; Heb. Yô'āsh, "Jehovah has given"; Arab. asa, "to give").

1. The father of Gideon, who, although himself an idolater, ingeniously screened his son from those desiring to avenge his overthrow of the altar of Baal (Judg. 6:11, 29–31; 7:14; 8:13, 29). He was buried in Ophrah, where he lived (8:29–32).

2. A person who was ordered by King Ahab to imprison Micaiah the prophet for denouncing the allied expedition against Ramoth-gilead (1 Kings 22:26; 2 Chron. 18:25), about 853 B.C. In both passages he is called "the king's son," which is usually taken literally. Some, however, suggest that the title may merely indicate a youth of princely stock; others, that Melek, translated "king," is a proper name.

3. King of Judah (2 Kings 11:2; 12:19–20; 13:1, 10; 14:1, 3, 17, 23; 1 Chron. 3:11; 2 Chron. 22:11; 24:1–2, 4, 22, 24; 25:23, 25). See Jehoash, no. 1.

4. King of Israel (2 Kings 13:9, 12–14, 25; 14:1, 23, 27; 2 Chron. 25:17–18, 21, 23, 25; Hos. 1:1; Amos 1:1). See Jehoash, no. 2.

5. A descendant of Shelah, son of Judah, mentioned among those "who ruled in Moab" (1 Chron. 4:22). The Hebrew tradition, quoted by Jerome and Jarchi, applies it to Mahlon, the son of Elimelech, who married a Moabitess.

6. A son of Shemah (or Hasmath), the Gibeathite, who, with his brother Ahiezer and other "mighty men," joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:3).

JO'ASH (Heb. Yô'āsh, "Jehovah has come, hastened").

1. One of the "sons" (descendants) of Becher, son of Benjamin, and a leader of his family (1 Chron. 7:8).

2. The person having charge of the "stores of oil" under David and Solomon (1 Chron. 27:28), after 1000 B.C.

JOB. For the character in the book that bears his name, see Job, Book of; for the Job referred to in the KJV of Gen. 46:13, see the article Jashub.

JOB, BOOK OF. This splendid dramatic poem belongs to the Wisdom Literature of the OT. It is universally recognized as superb literature. The poem takes its name from its chief character, Job, ḥiyyôb. Interestingly enough, the name occurs in the Berlin Execration Texts as the name of a certain prince in the region of Damascus in the nineteenth century B.C. (Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 82 [1941]: 36). The name is also found in the Amarna correspondence dating c. 1400 B.C. referring to a prince of Pella. Job of the biblical story was a dweller in the land of Uz (Job 1:1), which evidently lay somewhere between Damascus on the N and Edom on the S; that is, in the steppes E of Palestine-Syria.

Subject. The book of Job revolves around the perplexing question of why the righteous suffer and how their suffering can be reconciled with the infinite goodness and holiness of God. Job loses family, wealth, and his own health, and then sits "among the ashes," where he is visited by three friends who come to mourn with him and to offer their explanations of his misfortune. Job's three friends offer practically the same answer (chaps. 3–31), implying that suffering is always the outcome of sin. Job desperately asserts his innocence and at times appears almost delirious under the unjust insinuations. He borders upon accusing God of injustice, but he recoups his confidence in the divine goodness and protests that he will be finally vindicated. At this juncture Elihu comes on the scene and appears with the divine message elaborated in the NT, that sufferings are very often the medium of refining the righteous, the chastisements of a Father who loves His children, and by no means the action of a vindictive or implacable God (chaps. 32–37). Then God speaks to Job out of the whirlwind, humbling him and bringing him to a realization that he, himself, is to be abhorred before God’s presence (42:1–6). His self-abnegation and spiritual refining are a prelude to his restoration (42:7–17).

Outline.

- I. Prologue: Testing of Job (1–2)
- II. Job falsely comforted by his friends (3–31)
 - A. First cycle of speeches:
Job’s speech followed by those of his three friends, each in turn answered by Job (3–14)
 - B. Second cycle of speeches:
Each friend speaks to Job and is answered by him (15–21)
 - C. Third cycle of speeches:
Eliphaz and Bildad speak until answered by Job (22–31)
- III. Speeches of Elihu (32–37)
 - A. First Speech: Purpose of affliction (32–33)
 - B. Second Speech: God vindicated (34)
 - C. Third Speech: The advantages of piety (35)
 - D. Fourth speech: God’s greatness and Job’s ignorance (36–37)
- IV. Speeches of God and Job’s response (38:1–42:6)
 - A. First speech: Creation declares God’s all-power; Job’s conversion (38:1–40:5)
 - B. Second speech: Power of God and human weakness; Job’s humility (40:6–42:6)
- V. Epilogue: Job’s friends rebuked; Job restored (42:7–17)

Time and Composition. Great disagreement prevails as to the composition. Critics date the composition of the book anywhere from patriarchal times (Ebrard) to as late as 400 B.C. (Eissfeldt; Volz) or even the third century B.C. (Cornill). Probably the most likely date is the Solomonic era, (Franz Delitzsch; Keil), because it bears evidence of the creative beginning period of Wisdom Literature. It comprehends ideas similar to parts of Proverbs (cf. Job. 15:8 and chap. 28 with Prov. 8).

Authenticity. It is customary among critics to deny the authenticity of (1) the prologue and epilogue; (2) chap. 28, the poem of Divine Wisdom; (3) the description of leviathan and behemoth (40:10–41:25); and (4) the discourses of Elihu (32:1–37:24). No valid reason can be brought forward for ascribing the prologue and epilogue to a later author. “The dialogue cannot have had any independent existence,” as A. Bentzen correctly observes. “In 8:4–29:5 it presupposes the description of Job’s illness as given in the narrative” (Intr., 2:175). Chapter 28 cannot be proved to be extraneous, although the passage is admittedly loosely connected with the context, but so are other choice literary pieces of the book. If, as is certainly true, “the finest literary masterpieces are to be found among these incidental pieces and in digressions rather than in the argumentative scaffolding of the book,” as Pfeiffer admits, why reject this passage and retain others when “to remove even some of them would greatly reduce the value of the original poem and imply that the poetic genius of the supplementers was equal, if not superior, to that of the original poet?” (Intr., p. 686). The same answer may be given to the critical contention that the descriptions of leviathan (crocodile) and behemoth (hippopotamus) in 40:15–41:34 are a subsequent insertion. The language and ideas of this passage are similar to the remainder of the book (cf. 40:15 and 39:15 with 5:23; 41:9 with 3:9; etc.). Elihu’s speeches are rejected because he does not appear in the prologue or epilogue. He is not merely a loquacious interrupter. He adds a momentous truth that affliction of the righteous is disciplinary (33:16–18, 27–30; 36:10–12). Elihu’s speeches answer Job’s problem and get him ready for Jehovah’s appearance and words from the whirlwind. There would be a genuine lack in the book if the Elihu sections were omitted. He does not appear in the epilogue because, unlike Job's friends, he did not merit rebuke. His contribution to the solution of the problem of the book invalidates the rejection of this portion.

JO'BAB (jō'bab; "howler, one who calls shrilly").

1. The last in the order of the sons of Joktan (Gen. 10:29; 1 Chron. 1:23).

2. Son of Zerah of Bozrah, and one of the "kings" of Edom (Gen. 36:33–34; 1 Chron. 1:44–45), probably before 1440 B.C.

3. The king of Madon, a royal city of the Canaanites. He assisted Jabin, king of Hazor, against Joshua; they were both overcome by him (Josh. 11:1), after 1370 B.C.

4. A Benjamite, and the first named of the sons of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (1 Chron. 8:9).

5. One of the "sons" (probably descendants) of Elpaal, a chief of Benjamin at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:18), probably about 588 B.C.

JOCH'EBED (jok'ē-bed; "Jehovah her glory"). The wife of Amram and mother of Miriam, Aaron, and Moses (Num. 26:59), c. 1520 B.C. In Ex. 6:20 it is expressly declared that she was the sister of Amram's father, and, consequently, her husband's aunt. It was contrary to the law for persons thus related to marry, and several attempts have been made to prove a more distant relationship. Kitto says, "The fact seems to be that where this marriage was contracted there was no law forbidding such alliances, but they must in any case have been unusual, although not forbidden; and this, with the writer's knowledge that they were subsequently interdicted, sufficiently accounts for this one being so pointedly mentioned." So K. and D. (Com., ad loc.).

JO'DA (jō'da). The son of Joanan and father of Josech, listed among the maternal ancestors of Christ (Luke 3:26, NASB and NIV; "Juda," KJV).

JO'ED (jō'ed; "Jehovah his witness"). The son of Pedaiah and grandfather of Sallu, who was one of the Benjamites chosen to dwell in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:7), before 536 B.C.

JO'EL (jō'el; "Jehovah is God").

1. The eldest of the two sons of Samuel, appointed by him as judges in Beersheba. By the taking of bribes and perversion of judgment they led to the popular desire for a monarchy (1 Sam. 8:2–3; 1 Chron. 6:28), before 1030 B.C. He is named as the father of Heman, the Levitical singer (6:33; 15:17).

Com. Commentary

NASB New American Standard Bible

NIV New International Version

2. A descendant of Simeon, one of those whose families emigrated to the valley of Gedor (1 Chron. 4:35), about 715 B.C.

3. A descendant of Reuben, but by what line or in what degree of proximity is uncertain (1 Chron. 5:4, 8).

4. A chief of the Gadites living in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:12), perhaps about 782 B.C.

5. A Kohathite Levite, son of Azariah and father of Elkanah (1 Chron. 6:36). He is probably the Joel who assisted Hezekiah in his restoration of the Temple services (2 Chron. 29:12), 719 B.C.

6. The third named of the four sons of Izrahiah, a chief of the tribe of Issachar in the time of David (1 Chron. 7:3), about 1000 B.C.

7. Brother of Nathan and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:38), about 1000 B.C. He is called "Igal the son of Nathan" in 2 Sam. 23:36. Kennicott decides in favor of the former as most likely to be the genuine text (Dissertations, pp. 212–14).

8. A Levite, head of the family of Gershom, who, at the head of 130, was appointed by David to assist in removing the Ark (1 Chron. 15:7, 11), after 1000 B.C. He is probably the same as the third of the "sons" of Ladan (23:8), and also with the son of Jehieli, who was one of those in charge of the "treasures of the house of the Lord" (26:22) (Keil).

9. Son of Pedaiah, and prince in the time of David, of the half tribe of Manasseh west (1 Chron. 27:20), about 1000 B.C.

10. One of the "sons" of Nebo, who put away his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:43), 456 B.C.

11. Son of Zichri and "overseer" of the Benjamites living in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:9), about 536 B.C.

12. Son of Pethuel, and second of the twelve minor prophets (Joel 1:1; Acts 2:16). Nothing is known of his life, and all that can be inferred with any certainty from his writings is that he lived in Judah and probably prophesied in Jerusalem. The date of his ministry is also a disputed point; some make him contemporary with Amos and Isaiah during the reign of Uzziah, about 770 B.C., others (Keil, Com.) assign him to the first thirty years of Jehoash.

JOEL, BOOK OF. Joel, the writer of the book of Joel, was a prophet of the Southern Kingdom. His name means "Jehovah is God." His frequent addresses to the priesthood would seem to indicate that he himself was a priest.

Purpose. The prophet's purpose was to warn the nation to repent in the light of approaching judgment, as well as to stir up the faithful among the people to believe the promises of God involving coming salvation and the destruction of the enemies of God's kingdom. In the prophecy a terrible plague of insects is made the occasion of great prophetic significance (Joel 1:13–14), foreshadowing the Day of the Lord. Chapter 2 demonstrates this fact when the scourge of locusts fades out of the picture and the future Day of Jehovah comes into full view. The prophetic imagery refers to the end time of the present age, the period of the "times of the Gentiles" (Luke 21:24; Rev. 16:14). The Battle of Armageddon is also prefigured, as well as the regathering of Israel and the Kingdom blessing. Joel presents the following order of events: (1) The invasion of Palestine by Gentile nations under the leadership of the Beast and the false prophet (Joel 2:1–10; cf. Armageddon, Rev. 16:13–14). (2) Decimation of the invading hordes by the Lord's host (Joel 2:11; cf. Rev. 19:11, 21). (3) Judah's conversion in the land (Joel 2:12–17). (4) The Lord's promise of deliverance (Joel 2:18–27). (5) The pouring out of the Holy Spirit preceding the Kingdom age (Joel 2:28–29). (6) The second advent of Christ with the establishment of the mediatorial Kingdom (Joel 2:30–32; cf. Acts 15:15–17). (7) The judgment of the nations (Joel 3:1–16). (8) Realization of full millennial conditions (Joel 3:17–21; cf. Zech. 14:1–21).

Authorship. As early as 1872, M. Vernes denied the Joel authorship (cf. 1:1). Vernes maintained that chap. 3 was not written by the same person as chaps. 1 and 2. Such critics as J. W. Rothstein, Sievers, B. Duhm, and Paul Haupt also deny the unity of the book. These views have not met with wide acceptance, however (cf. L. Dennefelt, Les Problemes du Livre de Joel [1926]; J. Smith, W. H. Ward and J. Bever, Joel in International Critical Commentary [1911]; A. S. Kapelrud, Joel Studies [1948]; R. K. Harrison, Introduction to the Old Testament [1969], pp. 874–82).

Date. Critics commonly date Joel’s prophecy anywhere from the division of the kingdom (c. 932 B.C.) to the time of Malachi (c. 400 B.C.) or even later. The safest date seems to be preexilic. The reign of Joash (835–796 B.C.) is most appropriate for the prophecy.

Several lines of argument would seem to indicate that Joel’s prophecy is early. Its style and general spirit are dissimilar to that of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, postexilic prophets. Its language and style rather belong to the period of Hebrew classical literature. Joel’s diction seems reminiscent of Amos, who himself seems to have made use of Joel (cf. Joel 3:16 with Amos 1:2; Joel 3:18 with Amos 9:13). Perhaps most significant is the lack of the mention of a king in the book. Joash was a minor and for a long time under the guardianship of Jehoida the high priest. Then too, Israel’s enemies were the Phoenicians and Philistines (Joel 3:4), the Egyptians and Edomites (3:19), and the Assyrians and the Babylonians who harassed Israel from the time of Amos to the Exile. Cornill, Oesterley and Robinson, Merx, and S. R. Driver agree for a postexilic date but their evidence is inconclusive. Joel 3:2 is supposed to allude to the Exile but this is clearly a predictive passage of the nation’s present-day scattering and by no means needs to refer to the Babylonian captivity. The mention of the Javanim or “Ionians” does not necessitate a date after the Exile. These people are alluded to in the Assyrian records of the eighth century B.C. Arguments based on the silence with regard to a king or idolatrous places of worship in the Northern Kingdom are pointless. Such mention is also lacking in Nahum, Jonah, Zephaniah, and Obadiah.

JOE'LAH (jō-e'la, “furthermore”). One of the two sons of Jeroham of Gedor who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:7), before 1000 B.C.

JOE'ZER (jō-ē'zēr; “Jehovah his help”). One of the Korahites who united themselves to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:6), before 1000 B.C.

JOG'BEHAH (jog'be-ha; “hillock”). One of the “fortified cities” rebuilt by the Gadites (Num. 32:35). It is mentioned (Judg. 8:11) as in the route of Gideon while pursuing the Midianites. Its name still exists in Jubeihah, six miles NW of Rabbath Amman.

JOG'LI (jog'li; “exiled”). The father of Bukki, the man appointed from the tribe of Dan to the commission for dividing the land of Canaan (Num. 34:22), about 1380 B.C.

JO'HA (jō'ha; probably “Jehovah revives”).

1. One of the sons of Beriah the Benjamite, and a leader of his tribe residing at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:16), perhaps about 588 B.C.

2. A Tizite who, with his brother Jediael, was one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:45), 1000 B.C.

JOHA'NAN (jō-ha'nan; contracted form of Jehohanan, “God is gracious”). In all but a few passages Johanan appears in the same verses in the KJV, NIV, and NASB. The exceptions are 1 Chron. 26:3; 2 Chron. 17:15; 23:1, where NASB Johanan replaces KJV and NIV Jehohanan (which see); and Ezra 10:6; Neh. 6:18, where NASB and NIV Jehohanan (which see) replaces KJV Johanan. The material below is based on NASB usage.

1. The son of Kareah, one of the Jewish leaders who rallied around Gedaliah on his appointment as governor (2 Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8). He also warned the governor of Ishmael's intention to assassinate him and offered to kill Ishmael, but Gedaliah refused to listen to his advice (40:13–16). After the murder of Gedaliah, Johanan led in the pursuit of the assassin and rescued the people he had taken captive (41:11–16). He then consulted with Jeremiah as to what course the remnant of the people should pursue, but when he was told by the prophet to remain in the land he and his associates refused and moved (taking Jeremiah with them) to Tahpanhes, in Egypt (43:1–7). From this time we lose sight of him and his fellow captains, and they doubtless shared the threatened punishment (vv. 11–12), 586 B.C.

2. The eldest son of Josiah, king of Judah (1 Chron. 3:15). He probably died early, as Scripture makes no further mention of him, after 639 B.C.

3. The fifth son of Elieoenai, one of the descendants of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:24), probably after 400 B.C. He is identified by some with Nahum, mentioned (Luke 3:25) among the ancestry of Christ.

4. Son of Azariah, and father of Azariah, high priests (1 Chron. 6:9–10), and by some thought to have been the same as Jehoiada (2 Chron. 24:15).

5. One of the mighty men who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:4), before 1000 B.C. He was probably a Benjamite.

6. The eighth named of the Gadite warriors who rallied to the support of David in the stronghold in the wilderness (1 Chron. 12:12), before 1000 B.C.

7. A Korahite and the head of the sixth division of the Levitical Temple gatekeepers (1 Chron. 26:3; “Jehohanan,” KJV, NIV), about 960 B.C.

8. The second named of the commanders of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah. This person was commander of 280,000 men (2 Chron. 17:15; “Jehohanan,” KJV and NIV) and was, probably, the same whose son Ishmael supported Jehoiada in the restoration of prince Jehoah (23:1), about 875 B.C.

9. The father of Azariah, the man who insisted upon sending home the captives taken from Judah (2 Chron. 28:12; NIV, “Jehohanan”), about 735 B.C.

10. The son of Hakkatan, of the “sons” of Azgad, who returned with 110 men from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:12), about 457 B.C.

11. A priest mentioned in the KJV, NIV, and NASB of Neh. 12:12 as Johanan, but identified with the Jehohanan (which see) of Ezra 10:6 (“Johanan,” KJV).

12. In the KJV of Neh. 6:18, the son of Tobiah the Ammonite. See Jehohanan.

JOHN (jon; Gk. Ἰωάννης; from Heb. Yôḥānān, “Jehovah is gracious”). The name of the apostle (see article following); of the baptizer and forerunner (see article following) of Jesus Christ; and of several other biblical personages.

1. The father of the apostle Peter (John 1:42; 21:15–17).

2. One of the family of the high priest, who, with Annas and Caiaphas, sat in the council before whom the apostles Peter and John were summoned for their cure of the lame man and for preaching in the Temple (Acts 4:6). “Lightfoot identifies him with Rabbi Johanan ben Zaccai, who lived forty years before the destruction of the Temple, and was president of the great synagogue after its removal to Jabne, or Jamnia. Grotius merely says he was known to rabbinical writers as ‘John the priest’” (Smith, Dict.).

3. The Heb. name of the evangelist Mark, who throughout the narrative of the Acts is thus designated (Acts 12:12, 25; 13:5; 15:37).

JOHN THE APOSTLE (jon; Gk. Ἰωάννης; from Heb. Yôḥānān, “Jehovah is gracious”).

The son of Zebedee, a fisherman on the Sea of Galilee, (Mark 1:19–20; Luke 5:10), and Salome (Matt. 27:56; cf. Mark 15:40). We have no information respecting the religious character or personal participation of Zebedee in the events of the gospel history, but John’s mother was one of the women who followed Jesus even to His crucifixion.

Early Life. John was probably the younger brother of James (Matt. 4:21). The mention of the “hired servants” (Mark 1:20); of the “private means” of those women who supported Jesus, which probably included Simone, John’s mother (Luke 8:3); of “his own household” (John 19:27), and of his acquaintance with Caiaphas the high priest (18:15) implies a position of at least considerable influence and means. His mother, who manifested an earnest desire for the welfare of her sons (Matt. 20:20), probably instructed him in religious things. His trade of fisherman was adapted to holy meditation, since it frequently required him to pass whole nights in stillness upon the water.

Introduction to Jesus. The incident recorded in John 1:35–39 would seem to indicate that John had first become a disciple of John the Baptist. His mention of Andrew only by name is consistent with his usual manner of naming himself as “the other disciple,” the disciple “whom Jesus loved.” John was probably among the disciples who followed their new Teacher to Galilee (1:43), were with Him at the marriage feast of Cana (2:2), journeyed with Him to Capernaum and thence to Jerusalem (2:12, 23), and came back through Samaria (4:5). He then returned to his former occupation.

As Apostle. At last the time came when the disciples were to enter into closer relation to Jesus and become His apostles. John, with his brother James, Simon, and Andrew, were called at the same time to be “fishers of men” (Mark 1:17–20; Luke 5:10). John, with Peter and James, was distinguished above the other apostles, entering more fully into the Master’s feelings and plans, and receiving in return His confidence and love. Mention is made of John at the restoration of Peter’s mother-in-law (Mark 1:29–31); at the ordination of the twelve apostles (3:17), where he and his brother received the surname Boanerges (“sons of thunder”) from Jesus; at the raising of Jairus’s daughter (5:35–37; Luke 8:51); at the transfiguration (Matt. 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28); rebuking one who cast out devils in the Lord’s name because he was not one of their company (9:49); seeking to call down fire from heaven upon a village of the Samaritans (9:54); joining with his mother and James in asking for the highest places in the kingdom of the Master (Matt. 20:20–28; Mark 10:35–45); with Jesus upon the Mount of Olives when He foretold the destruction of Jerusalem (13:3); sent by the Master to prepare, with Peter, the Passover (Luke 22:8); asking Jesus, at the Last Supper, who would betray Him (John 13:23–26); with Peter and James in Gethsemane (Mark 14:32–33). When the betrayal occurred, Peter and John followed from a distance and, through the personal acquaintance between the latter and Caiaphas, gained admittance into the palace (John 18:15–16). John was the only disciple present at the crucifixion and was appointed by Jesus to care for Mary (19:26–27).

Friendship for Peter. Notwithstanding the denial of Peter, he and John continued to be friends and are afterward often mentioned together. To them Mary Magdalene first ran with the news of the empty tomb (20:2). They were the first to reach the tomb and look inside (20:4–8). For at least eight days they remained in Jerusalem (20:26), after which they returned to the Sea of Galilee, pursuing their old trade (21:1). John was the first to recognize the risen Lord; Peter was the first to plunge into the water and swim toward the shore where Jesus stood (21:7). Peter's affection and anxiety for John are shown in his question, "Lord, and what about this man?" (21:21).

History of Acts. The same union continues in Scripture between Peter and John. Together they witnessed the ascension and shared in the election of Matthias and the baptism at Pentecost. Together they entered the Temple as worshipers (Acts 3:1), were imprisoned, and protested against the threats of the Sanhedrin (4:3–21). They were also sent together to preach to the Samaritans (8:14). John and the rest of the apostles remained at their post despite the persecution of Saul (cf. 8:1). He did not meet Paul when the latter came back to Jerusalem as a convert (Gal. 1:19); but this, of course, does not make the inference necessary that he had left Jerusalem. During the persecution under Herod Agrippa he lost his brother, James, by martyrdom (Acts 12:2), while his friend Peter sought safety in flight (12:18–19). Fifteen years after Paul's first visit he was still at Jerusalem (Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of Paul). He was one of the "pillars" of the church and took part in settling the controversy between the Jewish and Gentile Christians (15:6–13; Gal. 2:9). We have only the slightest trace of the work of the apostle during this period.

After His Departure from Jerusalem. John probably remained in Judea till the death of Mary released him from his promise. When this took place we can only speculate. There are no signs of his being at Jerusalem at the time of Paul's last visit (Acts 21). "Assuming the authorship of the epistles and Revelation to be his, the facts which the New Testament writings assert or imply are: 1. That, having come to Ephesus, some persecution drove him to Patmos (Rev. 1:9). 2. That the seven churches in Asia Minor were the special objects of his affectionate solicitude (1:11); that in his work he had to encounter men who denied the truth on which his faith rested (1 John 4:1; 2 John 7), and others who disputed his authority (3 John 9–10)." If we add to this that he must have outlived all, or nearly all, of those who had been the friends and companions of even his maturer years; that this lingering age gave strength to an old impression that his Lord had promised him immortality (John 21:23); that, as if remembering the actual words that had been thus perverted, the longing of his soul gathered itself up in the cry, "Come, Lord Jesus" (Rev. 22:20), we have stated all that has any claim to the character of historical truth. Tradition tells us that he was shipwrecked off Ephesus and arrived there in time to check the progress of the heresies that sprang up after Paul's departure; that in the persecution under Domitian he was taken to Rome and that the boiling oil into which he was thrown had no power to hurt him; that, returning to Ephesus, he attested to the truth of the first three gospels, writing the fourth to supply what was wanting; that he introduced the Jewish mode of celebrating the Easter feast; and that, when all capacity to work and teach was gone—when there was no strength even to stand—he directed himself to be carried to the assemblage of believers, and simply said, with a feeble voice, “Little children, love one another.”

Writings. The following books of the NT are generally accepted as having been written by the apostle John: the gospel, the three epistles bearing his name, and the Revelation.

JOHN, FIRST EPISTLE OF. The first epistle of John is in the nature of a family letter from the heavenly Father to His “little children” who are in the world. The great theme of the epistle is fellowship in the family of the Father. The intimacy of the epistle has always had great attraction for the people of God.

Occasion and Date. The epistle was apparently written to compete with various forms of error, particularly Cerinthian Gnosticism. False teachers of this cult had denied the essential truth of the incarnation, that Christ had come in the flesh, maintaining that matter was evil. The writer also combated false mysticism that denied the reality of the sin nature in the Christian. He also railed against those who violated Christian fellowship and rejected Christian morality and love. The first epistle of John is in a sense a moral and practical application of the gospel. The time between the two could not have been long. It was probably written a little later than the gospel, around A.D. 90 or 95.

Purpose. The apostle plainly refutes the false ideas of the errorists. He does this positively, giving fresh interpretation and application of the gospel to the urgent demands of his time. He shows the reality of the fellowship with the Father and that believers possess eternal life now in this world. He stresses the close connection of the possession of eternal life with the manifestation of love, right conduct, and sound morality. The apostle apparently does not develop this thought in progressive fashion but in what has been called a “spiral” manner, treating a number of related topics and interweaving them. For this reason outlining the epistle is difficult and to some extent arbitrary. The book is commonly divided into two principal parts.

Outline:

I. Family fellowship (1:1–3:24)

- A. The incarnation the basis of this fellowship (1:1–3)
- B. Family fellowship with the Father and the Son (1:3–4)
- C. Conditions of family fellowship (1:5–3:24)
 - Walking in the light (1:5–7)
 - Realization of the indwelling sin nature (1:8)
 - Forgiveness by confession (1:9–10)
 - Christ’s advocacy maintains fellowship (2:1–2)
 - The tests of fellowship, obedience, and love (2:3–3:24)

II. Family fellowship in the world (4:1–5:21)

- A. Warning against false teachers (4:1–6)
- B. Description of God’s true child (4:7–10)
- C. Manifestations of life of love (4:11–21)
- D. Faith as a conquering principle in the world conflict (5:1–21) M.F.U.

JOHN, SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES OF. These two letters are extremely short. Each was sent by “the elder” (2 John 1; 3 John 1). They were written in the province of Asia probably between A.D. 95 and 100. Second John is addressed to a Christian mother and her family, called “the chosen lady and her children.” The second epistle, as in the first, gives prominence to the commandment of love. It warns against false teachers (v. 7). These heretics were to be treated with sternness and shown no hospitality. The key phrase of the second epistle is “the truth,” by which John means the body of revealed truth, the Scriptures. The epistle is divided into three parts.

Outline:

- I. “The truth” and love are joined together in true Christian life (1–6)
- II. The danger of unscriptural ways (7–11)
- III. A superscription (12–13)

The third epistle of John, like the second, was written by the apostle probably around A.D. 95. The aged apostle arraigned the church for permitting one Diotrephes to exercise dominating authority. In the primitive church such a thing was incredible. This domineering individual had rejected the apostolic authority. Historically this small epistle outlines the commencement of the clericalism and priestly arrogation of authority that in later centuries was to develop in such evil proportions. The believer’s resource in such a day of declension is also given. John does not write as an apostle but as an elder, and the letter is addressed not to a church but to a faithful man in the church, to comfort and sustain those who were adhering to the simplicity of earlier times. The third letter of John stresses personal responsibility in a day of deterioration.

Outline:

- I. Personal greetings to “the beloved” Gaius (1–4)
- II. Instructions concerning ministers (5–8)
- III. Warning against the power-loving Diotrephes (9–11)
- IV. The praiseworthy Demetrius (12–14) M.F.U.

JOHN, THE GOSPEL OF. The fourth gospel, regarded by many as the deepest and most wonderful book in the NT. Although in one sense it is simple, direct, penetrating, and to be understood by common people, yet in another respect it is a sublimely profound revelation fathomed only by spiritual scholars. Some have called it “the greatest book in the world.”

Purpose. The aim of the gospel of John is spiritual. Although many different opinions have been advanced, the purpose is stated clearly and unequivocally in 20:30–31: “Many other signs therefore Jesus also performed in the presence of the disciples, which are not written in this book; but these have been written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing you may have life in His name.” It is evident from this statement that the author’s intent was to conduct men to saving faith in Christ as the Son of God and so enable them to obtain eternal life. The deity of Christ is thus proved by miraculous signs consisting of a selective group of miracles, which he enumerates as demonstrating Christ's messiahship. A careful reading of the gospel will also disclose that the author seeks to accomplish this in various other ways by presenting the true Person and work of the Savior and by a variety of telling figures describing Christ as the Bread of Life, the Light of the World, the Good Shepherd, the Truth, the Way, the Life, and the Vine. To accomplish his spiritual aim, John records eight miracles. All but two—the feeding of the five thousand (6:4–14) and the walking on the water (6:15–21)—are peculiar to John. This wondrous book has a literary unity; the miracles, the discourses, the imagery, and the figures are all selected in order to attain its purpose. In the synoptic gospels the miraculous works of Jesus are frequently performed out of mercy, but in the gospel of John they are presented as attestations of His messiahship.

Outline:

- I. Prologue: The deity and glory of the Son of God (1:1–5)
- II. The incarnation and reception of the Son of God (1:6–18)
- III. The Son of God revealed to Israel (1:19–12:50)
- IV. The Son of God instructing His disciples (13–17)
- V. The Son of God glorified in His passion (18–19)
- VI. The Son of God revealed in resurrection power and glory (20–21)

Author. Internal evidence that the author is “the disciple whom Jesus loved,” who also leaned on His breast at supper (21:20, cf. 21:7), and that this is the apostle John, is supported by numerous lines of evidence. (1) He was a contemporary of the events described. The writer was known to the high priest and entered the high priest's residence in company with Jesus (18:15). He alone narrates the fact that it was the high priest's servant whose ear Peter cut off (18:10). He deals with questions about the period before the destruction of Jerusalem and not with controversies of the second century when Gnostic and Ebionite defections were active (cf. 6:15; 11:47–50). Numerous other details point to the contemporary scene. (2) He was a Jew of Palestine. He shows acquaintance with Heb., as is shown by the book's opening words (cf. Gen. 1:1). Three times he quotes from the Heb. (12:40; 13:18; 19:37). He knows intimately the Hebrew festivals, that of Passover (21:13, 23; 6:4; 13:1; 18:28), the Feast of Booths (7:2; Tabernacles, KJV), and the Feast of Dedication (10:22). Jewish customs and habits of thought are familiar to him, such as questions of purification (3:25; 11:55), marriage customs, especially the way of arranging waterpots (2:1–10); Jewish burial customs (11:38, 44; 19:31, 40). He shows firsthand knowledge of Palestine, that there is a descent from Cana to the Sea of Galilee (2:12) and that Jacob's well is deep (4:11). He is familiar with such places as Ephraim (11:54), Aenon (3:23), Mt. Gerizim (4:20), Jerusalem and the Kidron (18:1), Bethesda and Siloam (5:2; 9:7), and Golgotha (19:17; etc.). (3) He was John, the beloved apostle. This is a general deduction sustained from the above facts. He indicates the hours of events recounted (1:39; 4:6, 52; 19:14). He reports quotations of Philip (6:7; 14:8), Thomas (11:16; 14:5), Judas (14:22), and Andrew (6:8–9). He leaned on Jesus' breast at the Last Supper (13:23–25) and was numbered among the three, Peter, James, and John. Moreover, Peter is distinguished from the author by name, as in 1:41–42; 13:6, 8, and James had suffered martyrdom long before the writing of the gospel (Acts 12:2). He characteristically introduces himself (John 13:23; 19:26; 20:2; 21:7, 20). These general facts make it difficult to escape the conclusion that John the apostle wrote the fourth gospel.

Authenticity. External evidence for the early date and apostolic authorship of the gospel of John is as substantial as that for any NT book. Early evidence is found in the epistle of Barnabas. Tatian quotes the fourth gospel in his Diatessaron, as well as Theophilus of Antioch. The Muratorian Canon says, “John, one of the disciples, wrote the fourth book of the gospels.” From the time of Irenaeus the evidence becomes indisputable. He frequently quotes the gospel and in such a way as to show it had been used for a long time in the churches. This testimony is perhaps most important considering he was a pupil of Polycarp, and Polycarp was a friend of the apostle John. Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian of Carthage often quote from the gospel of John.

Date. The date of the fourth gospel is to be assigned between A.D. 85 and 95. A papyrus bit containing two verses of the gospel of John has been discovered; it belongs to the Papyrus Rylands and is dated c. A.D. 140. This bit of evidence suggests that the fourth gospel was in existence as early as the first half of the second century and at that time was already in wide use. M.F.U.

JOHN THE BAPTIST, “John the baptizer.” The forerunner of Jesus Christ. He and his mission were foretold by Isaiah (Isa. 40:3; cf. Matt. 3:3) and by Malachi (Mal. 3:1). John was of the priestly tribe by both of his parents, his father, Zacharias, being a priest of the division of Abijah, and his mother, Elizabeth, being “from the daughters of Aaron” (Luke 1:5). His birth—through the miraculous interposition of almighty power, by reason of his parents’ extreme age—was foretold by an angel sent from God, who at the same time assigned to him the name of John. He was born in the hill country (where his mother had gone, probably for the sake of privacy) six months before the birth of our Lord (perhaps 5 B.C.).

Early Life. On the eighth day he was brought to be circumcised, and friends of his parents proposed to call him Zacharias, after his father. But his mother required that he should be called John, a decision that his father, still speechless, confirmed by writing on a tablet. He was set apart as a Nazirite, according to the angelic injunction (Luke 1:15; cf. Num. 6:1–21). All that we know of the period between this time and the beginning of his ministry is contained in a single verse: “The child continued to grow, and to become strong in spirit, and he lived in the deserts until the day of his public appearance to Israel” (Luke 1:80).

Beginning of Ministry. At length, in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar (A.D. 25), John began to preach, and he attracted a great multitude from “Jerusalem ... and all Judea, and all the district around the Jordan” (Matt. 3:5). To them he proclaimed the near approach of “the kingdom of heaven” and administered the rite of baptism “for repentance.” His birth, his hard, ascetic life, and the general expectation that some great one was about to appear served to attract this great multitude, for “John performed no sign” (John 10:41).

Meeting with Jesus. Before long Jesus presented Himself to John in order to receive baptism at his hand, which John declined to administer until the Lord declared that “in this way it is fitting for us to fulfill all righteousness” (Matt. 3:15).

Subsequent Ministry. With the baptism of Jesus, John’s special office ceased. The King had come, and there was little further need of the herald. We learn that John and his disciples continued to baptize some time after our Lord entered upon His ministry (John 3:23; 4:1).

John also instructed his disciples in certain moral and religious duties, such as fasting (Matt. 9:14; Luke 5:33) and prayer (11:1). We also learn that he still continued to be a witness to Jesus, so confidently pointing Him out as the Lamb of God that two of his own disciples were led to accept Jesus as the true Messiah and became His followers (John 1:29–39).

Imprisonment and Death. Shortly after this, John’s public ministry was violently brought to a close. Herod Antipas had taken Herodias, his brother Philip’s wife. When John reproved him for this and other sins (Luke 3:19), Herod cast him into prison in the castle of Machaerus on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea. While confined there John sent two of his disciples to Jesus with the inquiry, “Are You the Expected One?” This was doubtless in order to assist his disciples in transferring their allegiance to Jesus, as Jesus Himself bore testimony to the steadfastness of John (7:19–28). Herodias, embittered against John, determined to have him killed but was prevented by Herod’s conviction that John was a just man (Mark 6:19–20) and by his fear of the people (Matt. 14:5). But at last her opportunity arrived, and, taking advantage of a promise given by Herod to her daughter, Herodias ordered the head of John the Baptist. The king reluctantly complied and sent an executioner, who beheaded him in the prison. John’s disciples, when they heard of his death, buried his body and went and told the Lord (Matt. 14:3–12; Mark 6:17–29).

John’s Acquaintance with Jesus. Much discussion has arisen concerning the apparent contradiction between Matt. 3:13–14 and John 1:31–33. In the former John evidently knew Jesus, while in the latter he says, “I did not recognize Him.” The truth seems to be that John knew Jesus but was not certain of His messiahship. It was necessary for him, before asserting positively that Jesus was the Christ, to have undoubted testimony of the fact. This was given him in the descent of the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove, as John himself declared (John 1:33).

Character. The nature of John the Baptist was full of impetuosity and fire—a second Elijah. His life, however, was characterized by the graces of self-denial, humility, and holy courage. His abstinence was so great that some thought him possessed and said, “He has a demon!” In his humility he declined the honors that an admiring multitude almost forced upon him and declared himself to be no one—merely a voice—calling upon the people to prepare for the reception of the One whose sandal he was not worthy to remove. And when that One came, he recommended his own disciples to attach themselves to Him, furnishing an example of gracefully accepting the fact that “He must increase, but I must decrease.” For his courage in speaking the truth he went a willing victim to prison and to death.

JOI’ADA (joy’a-da; “Jehovah knows”).

1. A contraction of Jehoiada (which see), the son and successor of Eliashib in the high priesthood who was succeeded by his son Jonathan (Neh. 12:10–11, 22). Another of his sons married a daughter of Sanballat, on which account he was banished by Nehemiah (Neh. 13:28), before 445 B.C.

2. One of the repairers of the Jeshanah (or Old) Gate of Jerusalem under Nehemiah’s direction (Neh. 3:6). See Jehoiada, no. 3.

JOI’AKIM (joy’a-kim; “Jehovah establishes”). A contraction of Jehoiakim (which see), a high priest, son of Jeshua and father of Eliashib (Neh. 12:10, 12, 26), before 445 B.C.

JOI’ARIB (joy’a-rib; “Jehovah will contend”).

1. A teacher, and one of those with whom Ezra consulted upon the subject of obtaining a company of Levites to return with him to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:16). This conference took place at the river Ahava (v. 15) and resulted in sending a delegation to “Iddo the leading man at the place Casiphia,” who responded with a large number of the desired ministers (vv. 17–20), about 457 B.C.

2. A descendant of Judah, son of Zechariah, and father of Adaiah, probably through Shelah (Neh. 11:5), before 445 B.C.

3. The founder of one of the divisions of priests and the father of Jedaiah (Neh. 11:10). It is thought that there is some error in the list by which he is given as the father of Jedaiah, for in 1 Chron. 9:10 (where his name is given in full, Jehoiarib), he ranks with Jedaiah and Jachin as heads of divisions of priests (see Kiel, ad loc.).

4. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:6). His son, Mattenai, was a contemporary of the high priest Joiakim (v. 19), 536 B.C.

JOININGS (1 Chron. 22:3, KJV). Clamps.

JOK'DEAM (jok'de-am). A city of Judah in the hill country (Josh. 15:56), apparently S of Hebron. Perhaps it is to be identified with Khirbet Raza' near Ziph.

JO'KIM (jōkim; contraction of “Joiakim”). A descendant of Shelah, the son of Judah (1 Chron. 4:22). See Joiakim.

JOK'MEAM (jok'me-am). One of the places given, with its suburbs, to the Levites (1 Kings 4:12; 1 Chron. 6:68). It is in the Jordan Valley. Its name is given as Kibzaim in Josh. 21:22.

JOK'NEAM (jok'ne-am). A city in Palestine on the border of Zebulun's allotted portion (Josh. 12:22; 19:11; 21:34). Called also Jokmeam in the KJV and NASB (1 Kings 4:12; 1 Chron. 6:68). It is modern Tell Qeimun or Tel Yoqneam, twelve miles SW of Nazareth.

JOK'SHAN (jok'shan). The second son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:2–3; 1 Chron. 1:32). His sons Sheba and Dedan are the ancestors of the Sabaeans and Dedanites that populated a part of Arabia Felix.

JOK'TAN (jok'tan). Second named of the two sons of Eber, a descendant of Shem. His brother was Peleg (Gen. 10:25–26, 29; 1 Chron. 1:19–20, 23).

JOK'THEEL (jok'thîl).

1. A city in the low country of Judah, mentioned between Mizpeh and Lachish (Josh. 15:38).

2. The name given by King Amaziah to Sela—the stronghold of the Edomites—after he captured it from them (2 Kings 14:7; cf. 2 Chron. 25:11–13). Possibly Petra.

JO'NA (jō'na). The KJV term in John 1:42 for John the father of the apostle Peter. See John, no. 1.

JON'ADAB (jon'a-dab; “Jehovah gives”). A shortened form of the name Jehonadab (which see).

1. The son of Shimeah and nephew of David (2 Sam. 13:3, 32, 35).

2. The Rechabite whose followers refused to drink the wine that Jeremiah, at the Lord's command, offered to them (Jer. 35:6, 8, 10, 14, 16, 18–19).

JO'NAH (jō'na; “dove”). The fifth in order of the minor prophets, the son of Amittai. He was born in Gath-hepher, in the tribe of Zebulun (2 Kings 14:25).

Personal History. Jonah flourished probably in or before the reign of Jeroboam II (c. 782–753 B.C., Thiele's dates) and predicted the successful conquests, enlarged territory, and brief prosperity of the Israelite kingdom under that monarch's sway (2 Kings 14:25). What else we know of Jonah's history is to be gathered from the book that bears his name. He was commissioned by Jehovah to go and prophesy to the Ninevites, but because as a partisan Israelite he did not want to see Israel's great enemy spared, he was reluctant to obey and attempted to flee to Tarshish. He went to Joppa and there embarked upon a ship. A violent storm arose, and the captain of the vessel called upon Jonah to pray to his God to save them. As the storm did not abate, the sailors proceeded to cast lots, believing that some person on board the ship had caused the anger of God, as manifested in the tempest. Jonah was singled out as the culprit, and at his suggestion they unwillingly cast him into the sea. By the appointment of God he was swallowed by a great fish, which upon the third day cast him out upon dry land. Jonah was again commanded to go to Nineveh and immediately obeyed. The people repented, a fast was appointed, and the city was not destroyed. Provoked at the sparing of Nineveh, Jonah in his displeasure prayed to Jehovah to take his life because his proclamation had not been fulfilled. God taught him, by means of the rapidly growing and speedily decaying plant, that it was proper for Him to exercise mercy toward the repentant city (Jonah 1:1–4:11).

Jonah and the Fish. Much objection has been urged against the truth of the story of Jonah and the fish. It is simply said, “The Lord appointed a great fish to swallow Jonah.” The species of marine animal is not defined, and the Greek ketos is often used to specify not the genus whale but any large fish or sea monster. All objection to its being a whale that lodged Jonah in its stomach, from the narrowness of throat or rareness of haunt in the Mediterranean, are thus removed. Since the days of Bochart it has been a common opinion that the fish was of the shark species, Lamia canis carcharias, or “sea dog.” Entire human bodies have been found in some fish of this kind. Still, granting all these facts, the narrative is miraculous, and nothing is impossible with God.

The Sign of the Prophet. Various interpretations are given of “the sign of Jonah the prophet” (Matt. 12:39). Keil (Com., ad loc.) says: “The mission of Jonah was a fact of symbolical and typical importance, which was intended not only to enlighten Israel as to the position of the Gentile world in relation to the kingdom of God, but also to typify the future adoption of such of the heathen as should observe the word of God, into the fellowship of the salvation prepared in Israel for all nations.” Whedon (Com., ad loc.) explains: “Our Lord, even in refusing a sign, gives a sign. His prophecy of his burial, after the manner of the swallowing of Jonah, was in itself a miracle of foreknowledge, and so a proof of his Messiahship.”

JONAH, BOOK OF. Jonah is listed among the minor prophets and is unique in that it is not a collection of Jonah’s prophecies but is a biographical account of his ministry in Nineveh. It teaches the lesson that God’s grace went beyond the boundaries of Israel to embrace the nations. It is placed among the minor prophets because the experience and the career of Jonah are prophetic of the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ and the consequent blessing upon the Gentiles.

Literary Character. Critics commonly view the book as being either legend, myth, or parable, but it is correctly evaluated as history. There is not the slightest reason to stumble over the miraculous and to brand it as legend or myth. The miracles of the book of Jonah are a piece with those that honeycomb all Scripture, particularly the Pentateuch. The storm, Jonah’s being swallowed by the sea monster, the conversion of the Ninevites, and the fast-growing plant are no more incredible than the dividing of the Red Sea, the cloudy and fiery pillar, manna from heaven, water out of the flint, or the resurrection of Christ. The latter is directly connected with Jonah’s experience in the great fish (Matt. 12:39–41; Luke 11:29–32). The book is certainly designed to be viewed as historical. There is nothing in it to suggest otherwise. To assert that our Lord’s words regarding Jonah did not imply His belief in the historicity of events is highly artificial and arbitrary. Ancient Jewish opinion looked upon the account as historical (Josephus Ant. 9.10.2). The general Jewish and Christian tradition has followed the same view. But although the book is historical, it is more than history. Its right to the position in the twelve minor prophets is due to the fact that it is predictive or typical history. In its prophetic aspects the book of Jonah has important ramifications. In one sense of the word, Jonah in his ministry prefigures Christ in His specific character as the Sent One, being buried, raised from the dead, and carrying salvation to the nations. In another aspect of his ministry, Jonah portrays Israel nationally, outside of its own land, as since A.D. 70, a serious trouble to the Gentiles, yet meanwhile witnessing to them. Finally they are cast out by the Gentiles, but preserved through their future tribulation at the end of this age (Dan. 12:1). At the time of the second advent of Christ they will find salvation and deliverance (Rom. 11:25–26), becoming worldwide witnesses to the Gentiles in the future earthly Davidic millennial kingdom (Zech. 8:7–23).

Author and Date. It is by no means impossible that Jonah himself was the author of this book in the eighth century B.C. This is the predominating tradition. It is true there are Aramaisms in the book. This is made mention of by the critics. But such forms occur in early as well as in late OT books and are to be found in the Ras Shamra epics from Ugarit, dating c. 1400 B.C. Robert Pfeiffer imagines that an historical blunder occurs in the designation of the Assyrian emperor as the “king of Nineveh” (3:6) and the description of Nineveh as “an exceeding great city, a three days’ walk” (3:3). Pfeiffer, moreover, asserts that it is “physiologically improbable” for a man to survive three days within a fish. But the expression “Nineveh was an exceedingly great city” does not imply a date after 600 B.C., but merely points to the dimensions of the city as Jonah found them. Luke 24:13 constitutes a parallel. This verse states that Emmaus “was about seven miles from Jerusalem.” In answer to Pfeiffer’s rationalistic position, it should be noted that Christ believed in the historicity of the miracle narrated in Jonah (Matt. 12:39–41; Luke 11:29–30). To deny the miraculous in Jonah is to limit God, who is certainly able to preserve a man for three days in a fish. The term “king of Nineveh” can scarcely be dismissed. The Israelites normally spoke of the ruler of Assyria as king, as in similar references to surrounding kings (cf. 1 Kings 20:43; 21:1; 2 Kings 3:9, 12; 2 Chron. 24:23). The universalistic ideas of the book are not a late and strange development but appear early (cf. Gen. 9:1–10). To assert that such teaching was confined to the postexilic era is arbitrary. The period of Jonah can be fitted into historical conditions at Nineveh under Semiramis, the queen regent, and her son Adad-Nirari III (810–782 B.C.). The god Nebo was worshiped and constituted an approach to monotheism reminiscent of Amenophis IV of Egypt in the fourteenth century B.C. Jonah preached in Nineveh either in the closing years of this reign or earlier in the reign of Assur-dan III (771–754 B.C.). This period was favorable for Jonah’s ministry. Whether the plagues recorded in Assyrian history in 765 and 759 B.C. and the total eclipse of 763 B.C., regarded as portents of divine wrath, prepared the Ninevites for his message is not known.

How the reference to a “great city of three days’ walk” is to be understood is not clear. Excavations reveal that the wall of Nineveh was 8 miles in circumference (compare Babylon at 11 miles, Ur at 2½ miles, and the Jerusalem of David at 11 acres), and there was a suburban area outside the walls. It would not have taken more than about one day to walk around the urban area. One suggestion is that the city was so large it would have taken three days to stop at all its significant squares and major buildings and proclaim the judgment of God.

Unity of the Book. Critics commonly reject the psalm in chap. 2, but if this psalm is removed, the symmetry of the book is undeniably destroyed. The book obviously falls into two halves, the first half including chaps. 1–2 and the second half including chaps. 3–4. Moreover, 1:1–3a is practically identical with 3:1–3a. Also, it is to be noted that 2:2 and 4:2 both mention Jonah's praying. In one case there is a complaint and in the other a song of thanksgiving. The rejection of 2:2–9 accordingly destroys the basic symmetry of the book. Critics assert that in 2:1 it is said that Jonah prayed, but what follows is not a prayer but a song of praise for deliverance. But such a critical censure is pointless, displaying ignorance of the fact that thanksgiving is the very heart of prayer. In addition, critics maintain that the song of thanksgiving for deliverance occurs prior to the deliverance, but not until v. 10 is it said that Jonah was cast upon the dry land. Julius Wellhausen even went so far as to say that the mention of weeds in 2:5 exploded the idea that Jonah was in the fish's belly. His remark that "weeds do not grow in a whale's belly" (Die Kleinen Propheten [1898], p. 221) has become proverbial, but Edward J. Young (Introduction to the O.T. [1949], p. 257) shows clearly that Wellhausen and other objectors to the genuineness of 2:2–9 miscomprehend the meaning of the psalm completely. Says Young, "Of course weeds do not grow in whales' bellies. But this is not a psalm of thanksgiving for deliverance from a whale's belly. It is rather a song of thanksgiving for deliverance from drowning. The figures of speech employed in this psalm have reference to drowning, not to a whale's belly. Furthermore, there is not one scintilla of evidence which makes this psalm purport to have reference to deliverance from the belly of a fish. The school of negative criticism has unjustly imputed to this psalm a meaning which it was never intended to bear."

JO'NAM (jō'nam). The son of Eliakim and father of Joseph, among the maternal ancestors of Christ (Luke 3:30; "Jonan," KJV). He is not mentioned in the OT.

JO'NAN. See Jonam.

JONAS. The KJV term in Matt. 12:39–41; 16:4; Luke 11:29–30,32 for the prophet Jonah and the KJV term in John 21:15–17 for John the father of the apostle Peter. See John, no. 1; Jonah.

JO'NATH E'LEM REHO'KIM (jō'nath- e'lem-re-hō'kim). A term in the title of Ps. 56.

JON'ATHAN (jon'a-than; a contracted form of Jehonathan, "Jehovah has given").

1. The son (or descendant) of Gershom the son of Manasseh (Judg. 18:30). Jonathan, who was a Levite, resided at Bethlehem and, leaving that place to seek his fortune, came to Mt. Ephraim to the home of Micah. This person made Jonathan an offer to receive him into his house as priest, an offer that he accepted (17:7–13). Not long after, five Danite spies, looking for a suitable place for settlement, came to the house of Micah and inquired of Jonathan regarding the success of their journey. He replied, “Go in peace; your way in which you are going has the Lord’s approval.” Afterward, when a company of 600 Danites were on their way to occupy Laish, they went to Micah’s house, appropriating the graven image, the ephod, the household idols, and the molten image. Jonathan accepted their invitation to accompany them and became their priest. This office remained in his family until “the day of the captivity of the land” (18:1–30).

2. The eldest son of Saul, king of Israel. This Jonathan first appears in history some time after his father’s accession, being at that time at least thirty. In the war with the Philistines, commonly called from its locality “the war of Michmash,” he commanded 1,000 men of the 3,000 that composed Saul’s standing army. He was encamped at Gibeah, and he “smote the garrison of the Philistines” in Geba (1 Sam. 13:2–3), c. 1020 B.C. Saul and the whole population rose, but unsuccessfully, and the tyranny of the Philistines became harsher than ever. From this oppression Jonathan resolved to deliver his people, and, unknown to any but his armor-bearer, he attacked the garrison at Michmash (14:1, 4–14). A panic seized the garrison, spread to the camp, and thence to the surrounding bands. This was increased by an earthquake and by the combined assault of various bodies of Israelites hidden in the mountains. Saul and his band joined in the pursuit of the Philistines, the king having forbidden any to taste food until the evening. Ignorant of this command and its accompanying curse, Jonathan ate some honey while passing through the forest. Saul would doubtless have fulfilled his vow and have sacrificed Jonathan, but the people interfered in his behalf (14:16–45).

Jonathan is next introduced to us as the bosom friend of David. Their friendship began on the day of David’s return from the victory over Goliath and was confirmed by a solemn covenant, which was ratified by Jonathan’s giving his friend his robe, sword, bow, and belt (18:1–4). Shortly after this he pleaded with his father on behalf of David and secured a reversal of the royal decree against the latter’s life (19:1–7). The king’s madness soon returned, however, and David fled. The friends met by the stone of Ezel and entered into a second covenant, pledging themselves to strive for each other’s safety, and David swearing to show kindness to the family of Jonathan when he should be delivered of his enemies. Jonathan again pleaded with his father to spare David, which so enraged the king that he “hurled his spear at him,” with the evident intention of taking his life. The next day Jonathan communicated the failure of his mission to David, and they parted to meet only once more (20:1–42). This last meeting was in the wilderness of Ziph, during Saul’s pursuit of David. Jonathan gave expression to his confidence in his friend’s elevation to the throne. “The two of them made a covenant before the Lord” and parted to meet no more (23:15–18).

We hear no more of Jonathan until the battle of Gilboa, when, with his father and his two brothers, he was slain by the Philistines (31:2, 8). His remains were carried to Jabesh-gilead and buried there (vv. 11–13) but were afterward moved, with those of his father, to Zela in Benjamin (2 Sam. 21:12–14). Jonathan left one son, Mephibosheth, who was five years old at the time of his death (4:4), about 1000 B.C.

Jonathan was a man of daring who was not afraid to place himself in the greatest danger for the sake of his country. But his most noticeable characteristic was his ardent and unselfish devotion to his friends, which led him to give up his hopes of the throne and even expose himself to death for the sake of those he loved. Notwithstanding that his affection for his father was repelled by the latter, owing to the king’s insanity, he cast his lot with his father’s decline, and “in their death they were not parted.”

3. Son of Abiathar, the high priest, who adhered to David during the rebellion of Absalom (2 Sam. 15:27, 36). He remained at En-rogel to report to his master the proceedings in the camp of the insurgents but, being discovered, fled to Bahurim and escaped by hiding in a well (17:17–21), about 970 B.C. Later his loyalty to the house of David was shown when he announced to the ambitious Adonijah the forestallment of his measures by Solomon's succession to the throne (1 Kings 1:42–43), c. 966 B.C.

4. The son of Shimei and nephew of David who slew a gigantic relative of Goliath and became one of David's chief warriors (2 Sam. 21:21; 1 Chron. 20:7). He is probably the same who is mentioned as one of David's counselors (27:32, where dōd is translated "uncle").

5. The son of Shagee the Hararite, and one of David's famous warriors (2 Sam. 23:32; 1 Chron. 11:34).

6. The second son of Jada, the grandson of Jarahmeel, of the family of Judah. Jether dying without sons, this branch of the line was continued through Jonathan's two sons, Peleth and Zaza (1 Chron. 2:32–33).

7. The son of Uzziah who was in charge of King David's storehouses "in the country, in the cities, in the villages, and in the towers" (1 Chron. 27:25; "Jehonathan," KJV), after 1000 B.C.

8. Father of Ebed, which latter was an Israelite of the "sons" of Adin, who returned with Ezra from Babylon with fifty males (Ezra 8:6), before 457 B.C.

9. Son of Asahel, employed with Jahzeiah in separating the people from their Gentile wives (Ezra 10:15), 457 B.C.

10. Son of Joiada and father of Jaddua, Jewish high priests (Neh. 12:11); elsewhere (12:22) called Johanan (but see discussion at Jehohanan, no. 1). Josephus relates (Ant. 11.11.2) that he murdered his own brother, Jesus, in the Temple, because Jesus was endeavoring to get a high priesthood from him through the influence of Bagoses, the Persian general.

11. A priest, the descendant of Malluchi, in the time of Joiakim (Neh. 12:14), between 536 and 549 B.C.

12. Son of Shemaiah, and father of Zechariah, a priest who blew the trumpet at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:35), after 536 B.C. He is probably the same as Jehonathan (v. 18).

13. A scribe in the time of King Zedekiah, in whose house Jeremiah was imprisoned by the officials of Judah (Jer. 37:15, 20; 38:26), 589 B.C.

14. One of the sons of Kareah, who, with others, held a conference with Gedaliah, the Babylonian governor of Jerusalem (Jer. 40:8), 588 B.C.

JOP'PA (jop'pa; Heb. yāpō, "beauty"). An old city on the Mediterranean, about thirty miles NW of Jerusalem. It is supposed to have got its name from the mass of sunshine that its houses reflected. It is an ancient city, appearing in the lists of the great conqueror Thutmose III (fifteenth century B.C.) and occurring in the Amarna Letters of the early fourteenth century. It was included in the portion assigned to Dan (Josh. 19:46; "Japho," KJV). Its harbor naturally made it the port of Jerusalem. It was to Joppa that Hiram floated down from Tyre the fir trees of Lebanon (2 Chron. 2:16), and, later, Zerubbabel, acting on the edict of Cyrus, caused to be brought here cedar trees from the same mountains (Ezra 3:7). Here Jonah embarked for Tarshish (Jonah 1:3). In Joppa Peter wrought the miracle on Tabitha (Acts 9:36), resided for quite a time with Simon the tanner (v. 43), saw the vision of the great sheet let down from heaven (10:8–16), and received the summons from Cornelius (vv. 17–23).

Jonathan Maccabeus captured Joppa in 148 B.C. (1 Macc. 10:76). Simon, suspecting its inhabitants, set a garrison there (12:34) and upon the restoration of peace established it again as a haven (14:5). The city was destroyed twice by the Romans and changed hands several times during the Crusades. In the fourth century it was made the seat of a bishopric. The city (Yâfa) now comprises the S part of the Tel Aviv-Jaffa municipality.

Y. Kaplan for the Tel Aviv Museum conducted excavations at Joppa from 1955 to 1966. Remains documented all periods from the sixteenth century B.C. to Byzantine and Arab times. In confirmation of an Egyptian papyrus of the thirteenth century describing an Egyptian fort at Joppa, the excavators found the fort and its gate with an inscription bearing the titles of Rameses II. The Philistines wrought destruction there during the twelfth century. At the end of the eighth century the town evidently became part of the Assyrian empire. In the fifth century it was under the control of Sidon, as a Sidonian fort there attests. The excavations also revealed the destruction of Joppa by Vespasian at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. R.K.H.; H.F.V.

JO´RAH (jō´ra). A man whose descendants (or place whose former inhabitants), numbering 112, returned from the Babylonian captivity (Ezra 2:18). Called Hariph in Neh. 7:24, about 536 B.C.

JO´RAI (jō´ra-ī; same as “Jorah”). The fourth named of seven Gadite leaders (1 Chron. 5:13), the place of whose residence is not given, unless, as Keil conjectures (Com., ad loc.), v. 16 mentions it. In that case they lived in Gilead, in Bashan, perhaps about 782 B.C.

JO´RAM (jō´ram; “Jehovah is high,” a shortened form of Jehoram, which see).

1. Son of Toi, king of Hamath, who was sent by his father to congratulate David upon his victory over Hadadezer (2 Sam. 8:9–10), about 986 B.C. He is called Hadoram in 1 Chron. 18:10.

2. One of the descendants of Eliezer (1 Chron. 26:25).

3. Jehoshaphat’s son Jehoram (which see; in Matt. 1:8 the name is given as Joram).

4. The name of Ahab’s son according to the NIV, usually rendered Jehoram (which see) in other versions.

JOR´DAN, RIVER OF (Heb. generally with article hayyardēn, “the descender,” probably from the rapid descent of the stream). It is now called El Urdan, or Esh-Sheri’ah, or the watering-place, and is the chief river of Palestine.

JOR´DAN (jor´dan) Valley (Heb. Ārābâ; rendered “the Arabah,” Deut. 11:30; Josh. 18:18; Ezek. 47:8). Its modern name is El Ghor. For convenience we treat both the river and valley together.

The Jordan Valley is a rift more than 160 miles long, counting from just below Lake Huleh, where the dip below sea level begins, to the point on the Arabah S of the Dead Sea where the valley rises again to sea level. It is from 2 to 15 miles broad and falls as deep as 1,292 feet below sea level at the surface of the Dead Sea, whereas the bottom of the Dead Sea is 1,300 feet deeper still. In this valley is the Jordan River, two great lakes—Galilee and the Dead Sea—respectively 13 and 50 miles long, and large tracts of arable land, especially about Gennesaret, Bethlehem, and Jericho. Actually the Jordan rift is part of a geological fault that extends from Mt. Hermon down into E Africa.

Geologists claim this valley is due to volcanic action's forcing up two long folds of limestone running N and S, with a diagonal ridge shutting off the Dead Sea from the Red Sea and enclosing a part of the old ocean bed. "There then followed a period of great rains, with perpetual snow and glaciers on Lebanon, during which the valley was filled with fresh water to an extent of two hundred miles, or one long lake from the Sea of Galilee to some fifty miles S of the present end of the Dead Sea. How the valley passed from that condition to its present state is not clear.... In this valley are six distinct sections: the Beka'a, or valley between the Lebanons; the Upper Jordan, from its sources at the foot of Hermon through Lake Huleh to the Lake of Galilee; this lake itself; the lower Jordan to its mouth at Jericho; the Dead Sea; and thence to the Gulf of 'Akaba, the Wady 'Arabah" (Smith, Hist. Geog., pp. 470–71).

The Upper Jordan. "The great valley of Palestine, as it runs out from between the Lebanons, makes a slight turn eastward round the foot of Hermon, so that Hermon not only looks right down the rest of its course, but is able to discharge into this three fourths of the waters which gather on its high and ample bulk" (Smith). Four streams that unite before entering Lake Huleh contest the honor of being considered as the source of Jordan: (1) the Nahr Bareighit, which comes down the Merj 'Arun; (2) the Nahr Hasbany, which springs half a mile to the N of Hasbeya, from a buttress of Hermon, and flows down between Hermon and the Jebel Dahar, the longest of the four but having much less water than the two following; (3) the Nahr Leddân, the shortest but heaviest, springing from Tell-el-Qadi in the bosom of the valley itself; and (4) Nahr Baniyas, rising in the very roots of Hermon and having the largest number of tributaries. These last two have generally been considered as the sources of Jordan.

This whole district was given (20 B.C.) to Herod the Great by Augustus, and the town he built was known as Caesarea Philippi. To this region Jesus went to avoid Jewish hostility, and it is this district that is referred to in Ps. 42. It was, from a military point of view, the northern gate of Palestine; and here in Dan lay the limit of the land of Israel. At the lower end of this district lay Lake Huleh, about five miles NE of Hazor, without doubt the Lake Semechonitis of Josephus (Ant. 5.5.1; Wars 3.10.7) and probably also the waters of Merom of the book of Joshua (11:5–6). From the lower end of the lake the Jordan River enters the Great Rift below the level of the sea, falling 680 feet in less than nine miles, and then glides quietly into the Lake of Galilee.

It is hard for the modern tourist to visualize what the upper Jordan looked like in biblical times because Israeli engineers have deepened and straightened the riverbed and have drained the malarial swamps of Huleh and converted the area into about fifteen thousand acres of magnificent farmland.

The Lower Jordan. The Jordan Valley between the Lake of Galilee and the Dead Sea is sixty-five miles long. On the W are the mountains of Galilee and Samaria, with the break between them of the valley of Jezreel. On the E are the flat hills of Gilead, some two thousand feet above the Jordan, broken by the valleys of the Yarmuk and Jabbok. Between these ranges of hills the valley is from three to fourteen miles wide. Much of this valley is fertile, vegetation being extremely abundant, especially in the spring. There is, however, much poor land, jungle, obtrusive marl, and parched hillsides, all justifying the name of desert. Down this broad valley there curves and twists the deeper, narrower riverbed, from 200 yards to a mile broad. This is the breadth to which the Jordan rises when in flood, once a year (Josh. 3:4; Eccles. 24:26). Farther on we come to the Jordan itself, from 90 to 100 feet broad, rapid and muddy. The depth varies from 3 feet at some fords to 10 or 12. In the 65 miles the descent is 610 feet, an average of 14 feet a mile. But few towns have been built in the Jordan Valley for the following reasons: from early spring to late autumn the heat is intolerable, the temperature rising as high as 130 degrees in August; in ancient times the valley was infested with wild beasts, and there were frequent incursions of Arabs. The importance of the Jordan in Scripture would seem to arise from its being a boundary (Gen. 32:10; Deut. 3:20; 27:4; Num. 34:10–12; Josh. 1:2) and a military frontier (Judg. 7:24; 12:5). To pass the Jordan was figurative of decision, like crossing the Rubicon. Many of the most remarkable names and events of Scripture are associated with the Jordan: Joshua leading Israel into the Promised Land, the parting of Elijah and Elisha, Naaman being healed in its waters, David crossing it to escape from the rebellious Absalom, and the baptism of Jesus by John.

With the partition of Palestine in 1948, much of the Jordan Valley came under the control of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, with its capital at Amman. After 1967 it became the boundary between the state of Jordan and the Israeli-occupied West Bank. H.F.V.

JOSEPH (jō'zef). The name of the elder son (see article below) of Jacob and Rachel, and of several other persons in the Bible.

1. The father of Igal, the spy delegated from Issachar to explore Canaan (Num. 13:7), 1440 B.C.

2. One of the sons of Asaph who were appointed leaders of the first division of sacred musicians by David (1 Chron. 25:2, 9), about 960 B.C.

3. A Jew of the family of Bani who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:42), 456 B.C.

4. Son of Shebaniah, and one of the chief priests after the captivity (Neh. 12:14), after 536 B.C.

5. The husband of Mary and foster-father of our Lord. By Matthew (who gives the line of royal descent) he is said to have been the son (i.e., son-in-law) of Jacob, whose lineage is traced through David up to Abraham. Luke (giving the line of natural descent) represents him as the son of Eli and traces his origin back to Adam. Only a few statements respecting Joseph appear in Scripture. While living at Nazareth (Luke 2:4) he became engaged to Mary (1:27), but before he took her home as his wife she proved to be with child. Grieved at this and yet not wishing to make a public example of Mary, Joseph "desired to put her away secretly." He was dissuaded from taking this step by the assurance of the angel that Mary had conceived under divine influence (Matt. 1:18–23). Joseph obeyed the divine command and took Mary as his wife (1:24). Shortly after, he was obliged by the decree of enrollment from Augustus Caesar to leave Nazareth with his wife and go to Bethlehem, where Jesus was born. When the shepherds came he was there with Mary and her baby. He went with them to the Temple to present the infant according to the law and, warned by an angel, took them down to Egypt, where he remained until he was directed by a heavenly messenger to return to the land of Israel. His intention to reside in Bethlehem was changed through fear of Archelaus, and he settled in Nazareth (2:1–23), where he carried on his trade of carpenter. When Jesus was twelve years old Joseph took Him and Mary to Jerusalem to keep the Passover and upon their return to Nazareth continued to act as His father (Luke 2:41–51). Scripture furnishes no additional information respecting Joseph, and the origin of all the earliest stories and assertions of the Fathers concerning him is to be found in the apocryphal gospels.

6. The son of Mattathias and father of Jannai, maternal ancestors of Jesus (Luke 3:24).

7. A maternal ancestor of Christ, given as Josech (which see) in the NASB and NIV (Luke 3:26).

8. The son of Jonam and father of Judah, among Christ's maternal ancestors (Luke 3:30).

9. Of Arimathea, "a prominent member of the Council, who himself was waiting for the kingdom of God," and was a secret disciple of Jesus. The crucifixion seems to have wrought in him positive convictions, for, upon learning of the death of our Lord, he "gathered up courage and went in before Pilate, and asked for the body of Jesus." Pilate, having learned from the centurion who had charge of the execution that Jesus was actually dead, gave the body to Joseph, who took it down from the cross. After it had been embalmed at the cost of Nicodemus, another secret disciple (John 19:38–39), Joseph had the body wrapped in linen and deposited it in a new tomb belonging to himself and located in a garden "in the place where He was crucified" (Matt. 27:58–60; Mark 14:43–46; Luke 23:50–53; John 19:38–42). Luke describes Joseph as "a good and righteous man" and adds that "he had not consented to their plan and action," i.e., of the Jewish authorities. From this remark it seems to be evident that he was a member of the Sanhedrin.

10. Surnamed Barsabas, one of the two persons whom the early primitive church nominated immediately after the resurrection of Christ, praying that the Holy Spirit would show which one should be named an apostle in place of Judas. When the lots were cast Matthias was chosen (Acts 1:23–25). Joseph also bore the name of Justus and was one of those who had accompanied the apostles and Jesus "beginning with the baptism of John, until the day that He was taken up from us" (vv. 21–22).

11. A Levite of Cyprus (Acts 4:36), surnamed Barnabas (which see) by the apostles.

JOSEPH (jō'zef; "may he," i.e., Jehovah, "add"). The eldest son of Jacob and Rachel, born while his father was still serving Laban (Gen. 30:22–25), about 1910 B.C. After his birth Joseph is mentioned in connection with his father's flight from Laban (Gen. 33:2, 7) and then no more until he was seventeen years of age.

Position in the Family. As the child of Rachel, “son of his old age” (37:3), and doubtless also for his excellence of character, his father loved him more than all his brothers. This, together with the fact that he reported to his father the evil conduct of the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah, caused his brothers to hate him. Their jealousy was aggravated by Jacob’s showing his preference in presenting Joseph with a coat, probably a long tunic with sleeves, worn by youths of the richer class (37:2–4). A still greater provocation was the telling of his dreams, that seemed to foreshow his preeminence in the family (vv. 5–11).

Sold into Slavery. Such was Joseph’s relation to his brothers when his father sent him from the valley of Hebron to Shechem to inquire concerning their welfare. They were not at Shechem but were found by Joseph in Dothan. His appearance aroused their hatred, and, with the exception of Reuben, they resolved to kill him. Reuben interfered on Joseph’s behalf and persuaded them to cast him into a pit, intending “to restore him to his father.” This they accordingly did, after stripping him of his tunic. While they were eating a company of Arabian merchants (Ishmaelites) appeared, and, at the suggestion of Judah and in the absence of Reuben, Joseph was sold to them for twenty shekels of silver. Dipping Joseph’s tunic in the blood of a goat, they sent it to Jacob, so that he might believe that his favorite had been torn to pieces by some wild beast. Their trick succeeded, and Joseph was mourned as dead. The merchants sold Joseph to Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, and he became an Egyptian slave (37:12–36), about 1897 B.C.

Slave Life. Joseph behaved himself so discreetly in the service of Potiphar, and was so led of God, that he found great favor with his master, who gave him the direction of all his affairs. Refusing, however, to gratify the improper request of his master’s wife, he was accused by her of unchastity and thrust into prison. Here, also, God was with Joseph, granting him favor in the eyes of the governor of the prison, so that he entrusted all the prisoners to his care, leaving everything to his supervision (39:1–23). While in prison Joseph interpreted correctly the dreams of two of his fellow prisoners—Pharaoh’s chief cupbearer and baker—disclaiming any human skill and acknowledging that the interpretations were of God. These interpretations were fulfilled three days afterward, on the king’s birthday (chap. 40).

Exaltation. After two years Pharaoh had two prophetic dreams that the magicians and wise men of Egypt were unable to interpret. The cupbearer, calling to mind the service rendered him by Joseph, advised his royal master to put his skill to the test. Joseph was sent for and interpreted the dreams as foretelling seven years of plenty to be followed by seven years of famine. He followed up this interpretation by advising Pharaoh to “look for a man discerning and wise, and set him over the land of Egypt.” This counsel pleased Pharaoh and his ministers, who believed that Joseph possessed the spirit of supernatural insight and wisdom. Joseph was appointed ruler over Pharaoh’s house and over all the land; in other words, becoming next to Pharaoh in authority in Egypt. Pharaoh called him Zaphenath-paneah (“savior of the world”) and married him to Asenath, daughter of Potipherah, the priest of On. This promotion took place when Joseph was thirty years of age (41:1–46), about 1883 B.C. During the seven years of plenty Joseph prepared for the years of famine to follow by carefully husbanding the grain, which was so abundant as to be beyond measurement. During these years his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, were born (41:47–52). When scarcity began, Joseph was in a condition to supply the wants of Egypt and also of surrounding nations. He put all Egypt under Pharaoh—first the money, then the cattle, the land (excepting the priests’), and eventually the Egyptians themselves became the property of the crown. The people were distributed according to the cities in which the grain was stored and were instructed to pay a tax to the crown of one-fifth of the product of the soil (41:53–57; 47:14–26).

Joseph and His Brothers. Early in the time of famine the brothers of Joseph, except Benjamin, went to Egypt to buy food. Applying to Joseph, who had supreme control over the stores of Egypt, they did not recognize him, but he knew them and seems to have resolved to make them feel and acknowledge the wrong they had done him. He acted as a foreigner toward them, spoke harshly to them, inquired whence they had come, and accused them of being spies. This charge they denied and told him specifically about their family. After putting them in prison for three days he sent them home to bring back their youngest brother as proof of their veracity, keeping Simeon as hostage. Having with great difficulty secured Jacob's permission, they returned with Benjamin, a present, and double money to repay the sum placed by order of Joseph in each man's sack. The presence of his younger brother assured Joseph of the truth of his father's welfare, and, yielding to his natural impulses, he made himself known to his brothers. He inquired again concerning his father; told them not to grieve because of the sin they had committed in selling him, as God had overruled it for their welfare; charged them to return to Canaan and bring Jacob and their families to Egypt, saying that he would provide for them during the five remaining years of famine. These events reached the ear of Pharaoh; he approved all that Joseph had done and commanded that Jacob and his family should forthwith come into Egypt (42:1–45:24).

Welcomes Israel. Israel, convinced that Joseph still lived, went to Egypt, where he was tenderly welcomed, provided for, and placed in the land of Goshen. When he died he was embalmed by order of Joseph and carried by him to Canaan and laid in the cave of Machpelah (45:25; 50:13).

Remaining History. Upon their return from Canaan Joseph found his brothers in fear lest, their father being dead, he would punish them. He assured them that this was not his purpose and promised to still nourish them and their little ones. Joseph lived to be 110 and, dying, made his brothers promise that they would carry up his bones to the land of promise. After his death he was embalmed and "placed in a coffin in Egypt" (50:14–26), about 1800 B.C. The promise was religiously kept, for "Moses took the bones of Joseph with him" (Ex. 13:19), and they were at length put in their final resting place at Shechem (Josh. 24:32).

Character. In Joseph we recognize the elements of a noble character—piety, pure and high morality, simplicity, gentleness, fidelity, patience, perseverance, an iron will, and indomitable energy.

Chronology. The Joseph story, according to the biblical chronology preserved in the Masoretic Heb. text, is to be placed c. 1871 B.C., i.e., during the splendid Twelfth Dynasty. However, many scholars have concluded that it would be an "historical misinterpretation" (Alexis Mallon, "Les Hebreux en Egypte," Orientalia 3 [1921]: 67) to imagine that a young Semitic foreigner would have been lifted up to such power under native Egyptian dynasties. This would be more likely, it is claimed, under the Hyksos-Semitic conquerors of Egypt. It is unfortunate that this period of the Hyksos infiltration is to a large extent unknown. Everybody agrees, however, that Israel was in Egypt during this period of confusion and turmoil (c. 1750–1550) and that the notice that an oppressor called "a new king ... who did not know Joseph" (Ex. 1:8) refers to one of the pharaohs of the New Empire, after the hated Asiatic Hyksos were expelled from Egypt. This tallies with the fact that the Israelites were in residence in the plain of Tanis, called "the field of Zoan" (Ps. 78:12). This was the Hyksos capital of Egypt.

Archaeology. That Jacob and his sons went down into Egypt under Joseph's prime ministership has been denied by some of the more radical critics (cf. Leroy Waterman, Journal of the American Oriental Society 57: 375–80; id., American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures 55: 25–43). But this historical tradition is so inextricably woven into the fabric of Jewish history that it "cannot be eliminated without leaving an inexplicable gap" (W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity [1940], pp. 183ff.). In addition to this general conclusion, numerous evidences of Israel's sojourn in Egypt appear in the Genesis-Exodus part of the Pentateuch. Most astonishing are the surprising number of Egyptian personal names showing up in the Levitical genealogies (Theophile Meek, "Moses and the Levites," American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures 56: 117ff.). Unquestionably Egyptian are such names as Moses, Hophni, Phinehas, Merari, Putiel (first element), and Assir. First Sam. 2:27 further corroborates this fact. Critics unwarrantedly, however, deny that the other tribes sojourned in Egypt on the basis that the Egyptian names are apparently confined to the Levitical tribe. Another evidence of the Egyptian sojourn is the authentic local coloring that appears in numerous aspects of the Pentateuchal account. Many bits of Egyptian coloring exist "which are beautifully illustrated by Egyptological discoveries" (W. F. Albright in Young's Analytical Concordance, 20th ed. [1936], p. 27). When the writer, for instance, mentions the title of Egyptian officials such as the "chief cupbearer" and "chief baker" (Gen. 40:2), they are those of bona fide palace officials mentioned in Egyptian documents. (See G. E. Wright and F. Filson, Westminster Historical Atlas to the Bible [1945], p. 28b). Other examples occur in 39:4; 41:40, 42–43. Such striking examples as the famines of Egypt (cf. chap. 41) are illustrated by at least two Egyptian officials who give a resume of their charities on the walls of their tombs, listing dispensing food to the needy "in each year of want." One inscription from c. 100 B.C. actually mentions the famine of seven years' duration in the days of Pharaoh Zoser of Dynasty III about 2700 B.C. Such items as dreams, the presence of magicians (cf. 41:8), mummification (50:2, 26), and Joseph's life span of 110 years (50:22), the traditional length of a happy, prosperous life in Egypt, are all well illustrated by the monuments. The family of Jacob, some seventy persons (46:26–27), were settled down in Goshen (vv. 28–34). This area has been identified with the eastern part of the Delta around the Wadi Tumilat. The region around this wadi, especially N of it, was one of the most fertile parts of Egypt, "the best of the land" (47:11). A fine archaeological parallel is the representation of a group of W Semitic immigrants going down to Middle Egypt around the year 1900 B.C. The scene is sculptured on the tomb at Beni Hasan of one of Senwosret II's officials named Khnumhotep. A party bringing barter products from SW Asia appears under the leadership of "Sheik of the highlands, Ibshe." The name and the faces are clearly Semitic. Thick black hair falls to the neck, and their beards are pointed. They are dressed in long cloaks and are armed with spears, bows, and throw sticks. The accompanying inscription reads: "the arrival, bringing eye paint, which thirty-seven Asiatics bring to him" (Jack Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past [1946], p. 83). Other bits of evidence are the Canaanite place names in the Delta. These include Succoth (Ex. 12:37), Baal-zephon and Migdol (14:2), Zilu (Tell Abu Zeifah), and very likely Goshen itself (8:22; 9:26). (See W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity [1940], p. 184.)

Moreover, in addition to Canaanite traders and migrants to Egypt, we now know that the Hyksos were gradually infiltrating the Delta area during the nineteenth century B.C. The Hebrew migration may be seen as part of that general movement. It is also interesting to see how the biblical account of the famine may fit into Egyptian history. The Middle Kingdom began with the nobles enjoying considerable power as feudal lords. However, the pharaohs were able to reestablish the absolute power over Egypt that they had enjoyed during the Old Kingdom period (the pyramid age) at just about the time Joseph as prime minister would have been enslaving the people in return for food, if one follows the Masoretic chronology. JO'SES (jō'sēz; Gk. form of Joseph).

1. A brother of Jesus (Mark 6:3).

2. Son of Mary and brother of James the Less. Their mother was present at Christ's crucifixion and visited His grave (Mark 15:40, 47). Some regard this Joses and the brother of Jesus as one and the same person. R.K.H.

JO'SHAH (jō'sha). Son of Amaziah and one of the leaders of Simeon, the increase of whose family led them to move to the valley of Gedor, from which they expelled the Hamites (1 Chron. 4:34, 38–41), about 711 B.C.

JOSH'APHAT (josh'a-fat; "Jehovah judges"). A Mithnite, and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:43), about 1000 B.C.

JOSHAVI'AH (josh-a-vī'a). A son of Elnaam, and, with his brother Jeribai, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:46), 1000 B.C.

JOSHBK'ASHAH (josh-bek'a-sha; perhaps "he," i.e., God, "returns a hard fate"). A son of Heman, and leader of the seventeenth division of the Temple musicians (1 Chron. 25:4, 24), about 960 B.C.

JOSHEB-BASSHE'BETH (jō'sheb-bash'e-beth; "sitting in the council"; "Josheb-basshe'beth," KJV). The Tachemonite, the "chief of the captains" among David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:8). He is called Jashobeam (which see) in 1 Chron. 11:11.

JOSHIBI'AH (jo-shi-bī'a; "dweller with Jehovah"; "Josibiah," KJV). The son of Seraiah, of the tribe of Simeon. His son Jehu was one of those who migrated to Gedor (1 Chron. 4:35), before 711 B.C.

JOSHUA (josh'ū-a). The name of the assistant and successor of Moses (see article below), and of four other persons in the Bible.

1. A native of Beth-shemesh, an Israelite, the owner of the field into which the cart that bore the Ark came on its return from the land of the Philistines (1 Sam. 6:14, 18), about 1076 B.C.

2. The governor of Jerusalem at the time of the reformation by Josiah (2 Kings 23:8), 621 B.C.

3. The son of Jehozadak (Hag. 1:1, 12, 14), a high priest in the time of Haggai and Zechariah. In Zechariah (3:1–10) Joshua, as high priest, represents the people dressed in the garb of slaves and, afterward, clothed with the new and glorious garments of deliverance. This symbolic action prefigures the future national cleansing of Israel at the second advent of Christ and her reconstitution as a nation in the millennial kingdom. When messengers came to Jerusalem, from the remnant of the captivity in Babylon, to offer presents of gold and silver to the Temple, the prophet was directed to have some of their offerings made into crowns for Joshua, as a symbol of the priestly and royal crowns of Israel that were to be united on the head of the Messiah (Zech. 6:10–11). For further discussion, see Jeshua, no. 3.

4. One of the maternal ancestors of Jesus (Luke 3:29; "Jose," KJV), not mentioned in the OT.

JOSH'UA (josh'ūa); (Heb. $y\text{ } \square h\text{ } \text{ōshūa}$, "Jehovah is salvation"), changed by Moses (Num. 13:16) from Hoshea, "salvation" (13:8). The assistant and successor of Moses. He was the son of Nun, the son of Elishama, head of the tribe of Ephraim (Ex. 33:11; Num. 1:10).

In Battle. In the Bible Joshua is first mentioned as the victorious commander of the Israelites in their battle against the Amalekites at Rephidim (Ex. 17:8–16), 1440 B.C.

On Mount Sinai. When Moses ascended Sinai to receive the two tables for the first time (Ex. 24:13), Joshua, who is called his servant, accompanied him part of the way and was the first to meet him on his return (32:17).

In Charge of Tabernacle. After the defection of Israel and their worship of the golden calf, Moses moved the Tabernacle outside the camp and, returning to the congregation, left it in charge of Joshua (33:11).

An Unwise Request. When it was told Moses that Eldad and Medad prophesied in the camp, Joshua asked Moses to forbid them, to which Moses replied, “Are you jealous for my sake? Would that all the Lord’s people were prophets, that the Lord would put His Spirit upon them!” (Num. 11:27–29).

A Spy. Soon after, Joshua was appointed as one of the twelve chiefs sent to explore the land of Canaan (13:8, 16–17). He and Caleb (which see) were the only ones to give an encouraging report of their journey, and they exhorted the people to go up and possess the land (14:6–9).

Appointed Ruler. When the forty years of wandering had almost passed, Joshua, because of his faithfulness, was one of the few survivors (Num. 26:65). Moses, by direction of God (27:18–23), invested him solemnly and publicly with authority, in connection with Eleazar, over the people (Deut. 3:28).

With Moses in the Tabernacle. It was revealed to Moses that he was soon to die and that he should appear with Joshua in the Tabernacle. While in the presence of God, Moses gave his faithful minister a commission from God: “Be strong and courageous, for you shall bring the sons of Israel into the land which I swore to them, and I will be with you” (Deut. 31:14, 23).

Assumes Charge of Israel. Under the commission of God, again renewed (Josh. 1:1–9), Joshua, “filled with the spirit of wisdom” (Deut. 34:9) assumed the command of the people, c. 1400 B.C. From Shittim he sent spies into Jericho, where they were given lodging and were hidden by Rahab (which see). They returned to Joshua with an account of the fear of the people because of the Israelites (Josh. 2).

Entrance into Canaan. The next morning after their return, Joshua broke camp at Shittim and moved down to the edge of Jordan, which at this season, the harvest (April), overflowed its banks (Josh. 3:15). On the third day the officers instructed the people in the order of the march, and Joshua ordered them to sanctify themselves for the next day. In the morning the priests advanced in front of the people, bearing the Ark, and when their feet touched the water the river was divided. They took their position in the midst of the riverbed and remained there until the people had all passed over. Meanwhile, twelve chosen men, one from each tribe, took twelve stones from the spot where the priests stood, leaving in their place twelve other stones taken from the dry land. When all this was done Joshua commanded the priests to come up out of the Jordan, and as soon as they reached dry ground the waters of the Jordan returned and overflowed its banks as before (4:1–18).

It need not be assumed that there was only a narrow dry path on which the multitude of Israelites might pass over. The waters of the Jordan were blocked by a mud slide at Adam and Zarethan, some sixteen miles north of Jericho (Josh. 3:16). Thus the bed of the Jordan would have been dry for some twenty miles between Adam and the Dead Sea, and the time needed for the Israelites to cross would have been minimal. A narrow pathway would have required so much time for passage that the whole upper valley of the Jordan would have been submerged.

In Canaan. The host encamped that night at Gilgal, in the plains of Jericho, and there Joshua set up the twelve stones taken from the Jordan as a perpetual memorial of the dividing of its water (4:19–24). At the command of God, Joshua caused the people to be circumcised, a rite that seems to have been neglected in the case of those born after the Exodus (5:5). Four days after the crossing of Jordan the Passover was celebrated; the Israelites ate the next day of bread made from the grain of the land, and the manna ceased (5:10–12).

Capture of Jericho. As Joshua stood by Jericho, he saw a warrior with a drawn sword in his hand, who, in reply to Joshua's challenge, announced himself as the "captain of the host of the Lord" and gave the divine plan for the capture of the city (vv. 13–14). The men of war and the priests carrying the trumpets and the Ark were to circle the city once each day for six days, and seven times on the seventh day, when the walls of the city would fall. Joshua followed the directions he was given, watched the fall of the city, put the inhabitants to death, and destroyed the property found within it. The Israelites spared only Rahab and her household and the silver and gold and vessels of brass and iron, which they placed in the sacred treasury (chap. 6).

The First Defeat. The next undertaking was the capture of Ai (which see), which the spies informed Joshua would be easily accomplished. Only 3,000 men were sent to take it—so sure seemed victory. They were repulsed and chased to Shebarim, with a loss of thirty-six men. Asking the Lord as to the reason for the defeat of Israel, Joshua was told of the taking of spoil from Jericho by one of the Israelites. A lot was ordered, which resulted in fixing the crime upon Achan (which see) and the destruction of himself, family, and property (chap. 7).

Taking of Ai. Joshua then formed a plan for taking Ai by stratagem, which met with complete success. The city was destroyed with all its inhabitants; its king was hanged on a tree and buried under a great heap of stones, the only memorial of the city (8:1–29). After this Joshua caused the law to be engraved upon stones on Mt. Ebal and read to the people stationed upon that mountain and Mt. Gerizim (8:30–35).

Craft of the Gibeonites. When the kings of the Hittites and other nations W of Jordan heard of the fall of Ai, they armed themselves against Joshua. But the Gibeonites, a confederacy of several cities not far from the encampment of the Israelites, sent ambassadors in torn clothes, with old sacks and dry bread, pretending that they had come from a distant country and wished to make a covenant with Israel. They obtained a treaty, which was respected by Joshua, and were made "hewers of wood and drawers of water for the whole congregation" (chap. 9).

Battle of Gibeon. Alarmed by the defection of the Gibeonites, Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem, became an ally of the kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon and laid siege to Gibeon. Joshua hastened to the aid of the cities, marching by night from Gilgal and, taking the Amorites by surprise, defeated them near Beth-horon. Joshua was helped in this battle by an unprecedented hailstorm, which killed more than fell by the sword, and by a miraculous lengthening of the day, which enabled him to pursue the fugitives to Makkedah (Josh. 10:1–14).

The lengthening of the day of the battle of Gibeon has elicited much skepticism and called forth many theories. The miraculous event may have consisted in the expansion of the rotary motion of the earth or in an extraordinary refraction of the light so as to be visible over the whole globe. Keil suggests that the day merely seemed lengthened because the work accomplished by the Israelites was so great.

Subsequent Conquests. This great battle was followed by the conquest of Makkedah, Libnah, Lachish, Gezer, Eglon, Hebron, and Debir. In this one campaign Joshua subdued the southern half of Palestine from Kadesh-barnea to Gaza, the eastern and western limit of the southern frontier; and he led the people back to Gilgal (Josh. 10:15–43). In another campaign he marched to Lake Merom, where he met and overthrew a confederacy of the Canaanite kings of the N under Jabin, king of Hazor; and in the course of the war led his victorious soldiers to the gates of Sidon (Zidon, KJV) and into the valley of Lebanon, under Mt.

Hermon, but left the cities standing, with the exception of Hazor. In six years Joshua was master of the whole land from Mt. Halak, at the ascent of Mt. Seir on the S, to Baal-gad, under Mt. Hermon on the N. His conquests were six nations, with thirty-one kings, including the Anakim, the old terror of Israel (11:1–12:24).

The severe treatment of the Canaanites has provoked considerable comment. That Joshua was right because he acted under the command of Jehovah has been justified by (1) the excessive wickedness of the Canaanites (Lev. 18:21–24) and (2) the contamination of their example (Deut. 7:1–5). Archaeology has corroborated the wickedness and utter debilitating effect of Canaanite cults. Religious literature excavated at Ras Shamra (1929–37) presents the Canaanite pantheon as utterly immoral. The chief god, El, was a monster of wickedness. His son, Baal, great NW Semitic god of the thunder, was no better. The three famous goddesses, Asherah, Anath, and Ashtoreth, were patronesses of sex and war, and their bloodiness and lustfulness must have reduced Canaanite civilization to extremely sordid depths. This archaeological picture of Canaanite religion fully supports Philo of Byblos's estimate of the utter corruption of Canaanite cults and removes critical doubt of the authenticity of Philo's material.

Dividing the Inheritance. Joshua, in conjunction with Eleazar and the heads of the tribes, now proceeded to apportion the Promised Land, including the part yet unconquered, asking for his portion Timnath-serah, a city of the hill country of Ephraim (chaps. 13–19). After the inheritance of five of the tribes had been determined Joshua moved to Shiloh, where he set up the Tabernacle and assembled the people (18:1). Seven tribes had not received their inheritance, and Joshua reproved them for not taking possession of the land. Three men were appointed from each tribe to survey the rest of the land and to divide it into seven portions, which, with their cities, they described in a book. When the survey was finished, Joshua cast lots for the seven portions before the Tabernacle in Shiloh (18:2–10). Six cities of refuge were appointed by the people themselves, three on the W of Jordan and three on the E (chap. 20). The Levites, having claimed the right given to them by Moses, received forty-eight cities and their surrounding villages, which were given up by the several tribes in proportion to the cities they severally possessed (chap. 21; cf. Num. 35:1–8). The warriors of the trans-Jordanic tribes were then dismissed in peace to their homes (Josh. 22).

Old Age and Death. After an interval of rest Joshua called all Israel to an assembly and delivered to them two solemn addresses concerning the marvelous fulfillment of God's promises to their fathers. He warned them of the conditions upon which their property depended and caused them to renew their covenant with God at Shechem. He died at the age of 110 years and was buried in his own city, Timnath-serah (24:1–31), about 1365 B.C.

Character. It is difficult to form an estimate of Joshua's character, because the man is overshadowed by the greatness of the events in which he was placed. And yet this is not a dishonor to him, but a glory; a lesser man would have been seen and heard more. His life, though recorded with fullness of detail, shows no stain. By the faithful serving of his youth he was taught to command as a man; as a citizen he was patriotic in the highest degree; as a warrior, fearless and blameless; as a judge, calm and impartial. He was quite equal to every emergency under which he was to act—valiant without temerity, active without precipitation. No care, no advantage, no duty was neglected by him. He ever looked up for and obeyed divine direction with the simplicity of a child and wielded the great power given him with calmness, unostentation, and without swerving, to the accomplishment of a high, unselfish purpose. He earned by manly vigor a quiet, honored old age and retained his faith and loyalty, exclaiming, in almost his dying breath, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." M.F.U.; H.F.V.

Purpose. The book of Joshua demonstrates God’s faithfulness to His promise by leading Israel into the land of Canaan as He had previously led them out of Egypt (Gen. 15:18–21; Josh. 1:2–6). The account of the conquest is highly selective and abbreviated. Those events that are enumerated are deemed sufficient for the purposes the author had in mind.

Typical Meaning. According to 1 Cor. 10:11 events of the Exodus, the wilderness wandering, and the conquest of Canaan are highly typical. “Now these things happened to them as an example,” literally, “as types.” Accordingly, Joshua is a type of Christ as our conquering commander. The redemption out of Egypt and the passage of the Red Sea typify our being baptized by the Holy Spirit into union with Christ (cf. 10:2): “And all were baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea.” This redemptive experience prefigures the position the Christian has by virtue of being in Christ by the Spirit’s baptizing work (12:13; Rom. 6:2–3; Col. 2:9–12). The crossing of Jordan is a type of our death with Christ experientially, as the crossing of the Red Sea is a type of our positional death in Christ. Claiming by faith our experience based upon our position is set forth by the crossing of the Jordan and the entering the land of conflict and victory (cf. Eph. 6:10–20). Canaan is not a type of heaven but a type of our meeting our spiritual enemies in victorious Christian living. It is considering ourselves “to be dead to sin, but alive to God in Jesus Christ” (Rom. 6:11). Every believer is positionally “dead to sin” and “alive to God.” The difference is that when he reckons it true, it becomes experientially actual. The Canaanites, Perizzites, Hivites, and others like them may typify our spiritual enemies (Eph. 6:12).

Authorship and Date. The book is anonymous. That the book, however, was composed in substance by Joshua himself or by an inspired writer soon after his death is supported by the following facts: (1) The account has the vividness of an eye-witness (Josh. 5:1, 6). Such events as the sending out of the spies (chap. 2), the crossing of Jordan (chap. 3), the capture of Jericho and Ai (chaps. 6–8), and so forth, are described with great vividness of detail. (2)

Parts of the book, at least, are written by Joshua (cf. 18:9; 24:26). (3) The narrative was written very early. Rahab, the harlot, was still alive (6:25). That the Jebusites were living “with the sons of Judah at Jerusalem until this day” (15:63) points to a pre-Davidic date (cf. 2 Sam. 5:5–9). References such as those mentioning the Canaanites’ dwelling at Gezer (Josh. 16:10) are pre-Solomonic, because the pharaoh of Egypt killed the Canaanite inhabitants and gave the cities as a present to his daughter, Solomon’s wife. Jerusalem was not yet an Israelite capital (18:16, 28). Archaic names of cities appear, such as Baalah, later Kiriath-jearim (15:9). The Gibeonites were still “hewers of wood and drawers of water” (9:27), whereas in Saul’s day they suffered massacre and their status had been changed (2 Sam. 21:1–9). (4) Although the book is early and doubtless written by Joshua himself, minor details in the present form of the work cannot be assigned to Joshua’s original work, for example the account of his death (Josh. 24:29–31) and the strange use of the term “from all the hill country of Judah and from all the hill country of Israel” (11:21). The reference in Joshua to the book of Jashar (10:13) is similar to a reference to Jashar that occurs in 2 Sam. 1:18, and as a consequence some have argued that the book of Joshua was written during David’s reign or later, but that is not a legitimate argument. Almost nothing is known of the book of Jashar, which may have been an anthology of national heroes, expanded from century to century to include contemporary celebrities.

Relation to the Pentateuch. Denying that the book of Joshua is a literary unit, the critics weave it into their theory of the Pentateuch and have coined the unsound critical term “Hexateuch” to fit their hypothesis. The sources J (Jehovistic) and E (Elohistic) are claimed to be the two primary sources of chaps. 1–12, revised later by Deuteronomic writers. Chapters 13–22 are said to be from a priestly source (P) and were added to JED around 400 B.C. That the “Hexateuch” is purely a critical invention is proved from the following reasons: (1) It is of a piece with the documentary hypothesis of the Pentateuch and is founded upon the same false literary, historical, and religious philosophical presuppositions. (2) Certain pronounced linguistic peculiarities that appear in the Pentateuch are absent from the book of Joshua. (3) There is no historical evidence that Joshua was ever thought of as forming a unit with the Pentateuch. The Samaritans took only the Pentateuch, which would have been inconceivable had Joshua at that time formed a “Hexateuch,” and especially so when the book apparently favors the Samaritans by its references to Shechem (24:1, 32).

Authenticity and Credibility of the Book. To the believing student the book of Joshua by its own internal evidence, the implicit and explicit references to it in the NT (Heb. 11:30–31), and the intimate fashion in which its typology is interwoven in the NT revelation of God’s redemption in Christ (3:7–4:11; cf. 4:8) stamp it as genuine. Moreover, a detailed geographical and archaeological study of references and events recorded in the book lends credence to its historicity. M.F.U.

JOSI’AH (jō-sī’a). The name of a king of Judah (see article below) and of the son of Zephaniah, residing in Jerusalem after the captivity, in whose house Zechariah was to crown the high priest Joshua (Zech. 6:10), 519 B.C.

JOSI’AH (jō-sī’a; perhaps, “Jehovah heads,” cf. Arab. asa, “cure, nurse”; “Josias,” Matt. 1:10–11, KJV). The name of a son of Zephaniah (see article above) and of the sixteenth king of the separate kingdom of Judah; this king was the son of King Amon and his wife Jedidah. Josiah, at the early age of eight years, succeeded his father on the throne of Judah (2 Kings 21:26; 22:1; 2 Chron. 34:1), c. 640 B.C.

Idolatry Overthrown. In the eighth year of his reign “he began to seek the God of his father David” (2 Chron. 34:3) and manifested that enmity to idolatry in all its forms that distinguished his character and reign. In the twelfth year of his reign “he began to purge Judah and Jerusalem of the high places, the Asherim, the carved images, and the molten images” (34:3). So strong was his detestation of idolatry that he ransacked the sepulchers of the idolatrous priests of former days and burned their bones upon the idol altars before they were overthrown. He did not confine his operations to Judah but went over a considerable part of Israel, with the same object in view. At Bethel, in particular, he executed all that the prophet (1 Kings 13:2) had foretold (2 Kings 23:1–20; 2 Chron. 34:3–7).

Temple Repaired. In the eighteenth year of his reign Josiah proceeded to cleanse and repair the Temple. The task was committed to Shaphan, the scribe; to Maaseiah, an official of the city; and to Joah. All parties engaged in the work displayed such fidelity that the money could be given to them without reckoning (2 Kings 22:3–7; 2 Chron. 34:8–13).

Finding of the Law. In the course of this pious labor the high priest Hilkiah discovered in the sanctuary “the book of the law,” by Moses. He reported his discovery to Shaphan, who conveyed the volume to the king and read it in the royal presence. Alarmed by the penalties threatened in the law, Josiah sent several of his chief counselors to consult with the prophetess Huldah, who replied that although these dread penalties would be inflicted, he would be gathered to his fathers in peace before the days of punishment came. Perhaps with a view of averting the threatened doom, Josiah convened the people at Jerusalem and, after the reading of the law, made a solemn covenant with Jehovah (2 Kings 22:8–23:3; 2 Chron. 34:14–32). To ratify the renewal of the covenant Josiah appointed the Passover to be held at the legal time, which was accordingly celebrated on a scale of unexampled magnificence. But it was too late; the hour of mercy had passed, for “the Lord did not turn from the fierceness of His great wrath” (2 Kings 23:21–23, 26; 2 Chron. 35:1–19).

Death. Not long after this Pharaoh Neco, king of Egypt, sought passage through Josiah’s territory on his way to fight against Carchemish, on the Euphrates. Josiah, disguising himself, went out to battle and was mortally wounded by a random arrow and taken to Jerusalem, where he died (609 B.C.). “Then Jeremiah chanted a lament for Josiah. And all the male and female singers speak about Josiah in their lamentations to this day”; i.e., in the lamentation that they were wont to sing on certain fixed days, they sang also the lamentation for Josiah (2 Kings 23:29–30; 2 Chron. 35:20–25). Both Jeremiah and Zephaniah mention Josiah in their prophecies.

JOSI’AS. The name of a king of Judah in the KJV of Matt. 1:10–11. See Josi’ah.

JOSIBI’AH. See Joshibiah.

JOSIPHI’AH (jōs-i-fi’a; “Jehovah will increase, add”). One of the family of Shelomith, whose son led 160 men under Ezra to Jerusalem from Babylon (Ezra 8:10), about 457 B.C.

JOT. Rather, iota. The smallest letter of the Gk. alphabet (ι), from the Heb. yôd (י), and answering to the i or y of the European languages. It is used figuratively in KJV to express the smallest of trifles (Matt. 5:18; NASB and NIV, “smallest letter”), just as alpha and omega are used to express the beginning and the end.

JOT'BAH (jot'ba; “goodness, pleasantness”). The city of Haruz, whose daughter Meshullemeth was the mother of King Amon (2 Kings 21:19). It is possibly to be identified with Jotapata (Khirbet Jefāt), seven miles N of Sepphoris.

JOT'BATH. See Jotbathah.

JOT'BATHAH (jot'ba-tha; “goodness, pleasantness”). One of the Israelite encampments (Num. 33:33–34; Deut. 10:7; “Jotbath,” KJV).

JO'THAM (jō'tham; “Jehovah is upright”).

1. The youngest of Gideon's seventy legitimate sons, and the only one of them who escaped the massacre ordered by Abimelech (Judg. 9:5), perhaps about 1108 B.C. After Abimelech had been made king by the Shechemites, Jotham appeared on Mt. Gerizim and protested against their act in a beautiful parable, in which the trees are represented as bestowing upon the bramble the kingly honor that had been refused by the cedar, the olive, and the vine (vv. 7–12). We hear no more of him but are informed that three years later the curse that he uttered was accomplished (v. 57).

2. The eleventh king of Judah, and son of King Uzziah by Jerushah, daughter of Zadok. After his father was struck with leprosy Jotham conducted the government for him until his death (about thirteen years), when he ascended the throne, being then twenty-five years of age (2 Kings 15:5, 32–33; 2 Chron. 27:1), about 740 B.C. Jotham reigned in the spirit and power of his father and avoided any assumption of the priestly function that proved so disastrous to his father. He was unable, however, to correct all of the corrupt practices of the people. He built the upper gate of the Temple—i.e., the northern gate of the inner court—and continued the fortifying of Jerusalem that his father had begun. He also built “cities in the hill country of Judah” and “fortresses and towers on the wooded hills” (27:2–4). He waged war successfully against the Ammonites, who seem to have refused to pay to Jotham the tribute which they paid to Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:8). For three years after their defeat he compelled them to pay one hundred talents of silver and ten thousand measures each of wheat and barley (27:5). After a reign of eighteen years, including his joint reign with Uzziah, Jotham died and was buried in the sepulcher of the kings (2 Kings 15:38; 2 Chron. 27:8–9), about 732 B.C.

The KJV of Matt. 1:9 describes this person as Joatham the son of Ozias.

3. A descendant, apparently, of Caleb, and one of the six sons of Jahdai (1 Chron. 2:47).

JOURNEY, DAY'S; SABBATH DAY'S. See Metrology: Measures of Length.

JOY. Usually some form of Heb. gîl, to “leap,” or “spin around” with pleasure; a stronger term than šimḥâ (Ps. 30:5; etc.); māsôs (Job 8:19; etc.), rejoicing; Gk. chara (Matt. 2:10), gladness; the cause or occasion of joy (Luke 2:10; 1 Thess. 2:20).

1. Joy is a delight of the mind arising from the consideration of a present or assured possession of a future good. When moderate it is called gladness; raised suddenly to the highest degree it is exultation or transport; when the desires are limited by our possessions it is contentment; high desires accomplished bring satisfaction; vanquished opposition we call triumph; when joy has so long possessed the mind that it has settled into a temper, we call it cheerfulness. This is natural joy.

2. There is a moral joy, which is a self-approbation, or that which arises from the performance of any good actions; this kind of joy is called peace, or serenity of conscience; if the action be honorable, and the joy rise high, it may be called glory.

3. Spiritual joy is called a “fruit of the Spirit” (Gal. 5:22); “joy in the faith” (Phil. 1:25). Its objects are God Himself (Ps. 43:4; Isa. 61:10); the promises (Phil. 3:3; 1 Pet. 1:8); the gospel (Ps. 89:15); the prosperity of Christ's kingdom (Acts 15:3; Rev. 11:15, 17); the happiness of a future state (Ps. 16:9–11; Rom. 5:2; 15:13). This spiritual joy is permanent (John 16:22; Phil. 4:4) and unspeakable (1 Pet. 1:8).

JOZ'ABAD (joz'a-bad; contraction of Jehozabad, "Jehovah endowed").

1. An inhabitant of Gederah, and one of the famous Benjamite archers who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:4; "Josabad," KJV), before 1000 B.C.

2, 3. Two of the "captains" of Manasseh having this name who joined David when retreating to Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:20), before 1000 B.C.

4. One of the subordinate overseers, under Colnaniah and Shimei, who had charge of the contributions, tithes, and consecrated gifts in the time of Hezekiah. He was probably a Levite (2 Chron. 31:13), about 719 B.C.

5. One of the Levite officers who contributed offerings at the renewal of the Passover by Josiah (2 Chron. 35:9), about 621 B.C.

6. A Levite, the son of Jeshua, employed with others by Ezra to weigh the silver and gold and vessels brought from Babylon for the sanctuary (Ezra 8:33), about 457 B.C. He is probably the same as the chief Levite who afterward was "in charge of the outside work of the house of God" (Neh. 11:16), 445 B.C.

7. One of the priests, of the "sons" of Pashhur, who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:22), 456 B.C.

8. A Levite who also divorced his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:23), 456 B.C. Perhaps identical with no. 9.

9. One of the Levites who assisted Ezra in expounding the law to the people (Neh. 8:7), about 445 B.C.

JOZ'ACAR (joz'a-kar; "Jehovah has remembered"). The son of Shimeath, an Ammonitess, and one of the two servants of Joash, king of Judah, who formed a conspiracy against him and killed him in Millo (2 Kings 12:21; 2 Chron. 24:25–26; in the former passage the KJV term is Jozachar and the NIV Jozabad; in the latter it is Zabad in the KJV and NIV), 839 B.C.

JOZ'ADAK (joz'a-dak; Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; 10:18; Neh. 12:26). See Jehozadak.

JU'BAL (jū'bal). The second son of Lamech by Adah, a descendant of Cain. He is called "the father of all those who play the lyre and pipe" (Gen. 4:21). According to Josephus (Ant. 1.2.2), he "exercised himself in music; and invented the psaltery and the harp."

JUBILEE. See Festivals: Septenary Festivals.

JU'CAL (jū'kal). An abbreviated form (Jer. 38:1) of Jehucal (which see).

JU'DA (jū'da). An incorrect English form. See Judah; Judas; Joda.

JU'DAH (jū'da). The name of the patriarch and fourth son (see article below) of Jacob and Leah, and of several other persons in the Bible.

1. A Levite who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:8), about 536 B.C. He is perhaps the same person whose sons aided in rebuilding the Temple (Ezra 3:9), although the latter may be the same as Hodaviah (2:40).

2. The son of Hassenuah, a Benjamite, and "second in command of the city" of Jerusalem. Strong (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia s.v.) maintains that the true translation is "over the second city" and that Judah was prefect over Acra, or the Lower City (Neh. 11:9), 445 B.C.

3. One of those (priest or Levite is not stated) who followed the Jewish princes around the southern portion of the rebuilt wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:34), 445 B.C. He is perhaps identical with the musician named in v. 36.

4. The son of Joseph and father of Simeon, listed among the maternal ancestors of Christ (Luke 3:30; "Juda," KJV).

JU'DAH (jū'da; Heb. Yġhūdā, "may he," i.e., God, "be praised"; "Judas" in the KJV of Matt. 1:2–3). The patriarch and fourth son of Jacob and Leah, and whole brother to Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, older than himself, and Issachar and Zebulun, who were younger (Gen. 29:35), about 1950 B.C.

Personal History. It was by Judah's advice that his brothers sold Joseph to the Ishmaelites instead of taking his life. By the light of his subsequent conduct we see that his action on this occasion arose from a generous impulse, although the form of the question he put to them suggests an interested motive: "What profit is it for us to kill our brother and cover up his blood? Come and let us sell him" (Gen. 37:26–27).

Moves to Adullam. After the sale of Joseph, Judah moved to Adullam and married the daughter of a Caananite, by whom he had three sons, Er, Onan, and Shelah. Er married a woman whose name was Tamar, but he died childless. Judah then gave Tamar to his second son, Onan, who also died without children. Judah was reluctant to bestow his only surviving son upon this woman and told her to wait until the boy became of marriageable age (38:1–11).

Judah's Sin. Upon learning that Judah was going to Timnah, Tamar disguised herself as a harlot and, sitting along the roadside, met Judah and became pregnant by him. The result was the birth of two sons, Zerah and Perez (38:12–30).

Becomes Leader. Though not the firstborn, Judah "prevailed over his brothers" (1 Chron. 5:2), and we find him subsequently taking a decided lead in all the affairs in the family. When it became necessary to go a second time into Egypt for food, he remonstrated with Jacob for not allowing Benjamin to go with them and agreed to be responsible for his safety (Gen. 43:3–10). When the cup was found in Benjamin's sack and punishment from Joseph seemed imminent, Judah's earnest prayer for his father and brothers and his offer of himself as slave so moved Joseph that he could no longer retain his secret (44:16–34). It was also Judah who was sent by Jacob to smooth the way for him in the land of Goshen (46:28). We hear nothing more of him till he received, along with his brothers, the final blessing of his father (49:8–12).

The Tribe of Judah. When Judah went into Egypt he had three sons, but so greatly did this family increase that at the first census it numbered 74,600, being first in population of all the tribes. At the second census it numbered 76,500, still retaining its rank. Its representative among the spies, and also among those appointed to partition the land, was Caleb the son of Jephunneh (Num. 13:6).

Position. During the march through the desert Judah's place was on the E side of the Tabernacle toward the sunrise, with his kinsmen Issachar and Zebulun (2:3–9; 10:14). According to rabbinical authority, Judah's standard was green, with the symbol of a lion (Keil).

Portion in Canaan. Judah was the first tribe to receive its allotted possessions W of the Jordan, and this territory included fully one-third of the whole land. When the land was again distributed by actual survey, a portion of Judah's land was given to Simeon. The boundaries and contents of the territory allotted to Judah are given at great length (Josh. 15:1–12, 20–63).

Relation to Other Tribes. During the rule of the judges, Judah maintained an independent spirit toward the other tribes; and although they acquiesced in the Benjamite Saul's appointment as king, it could hardly have been with very good grace, as may be inferred from the small contingent they supplied to that monarch's army against Amalek (1 Sam. 15:4).

As a Kingdom. When Judah established David as king and moved the sanctuary to Jerusalem, the Ephraimites were dissatisfied and seized the first opportunity of setting up an independent kingdom. Then the history of Judah as a tribe lapsed into that of Judah as a kingdom. What followed was a varied history of wars, vassalage, and occasional prosperity. Against Judah were arrayed Israel, Egypt, and Syria, and finally the country was ravaged by the king of Babylon. Jerusalem was burned with fire, the holy Temple laid in ashes, the people taken away into captivity. The nation Judah was no more (2 Kings 24–25; Jer. 34–41).

JUDAH, KINGDOM OF. See History, Old Testament; Judah.

JU'DAS (jū'das; Gk. form, Ioudas, of Heb. Judah). In the KJV of Matt. 1:2–3, the term refers to the patriarch Judah (which see). More generally, the name refers to the betrayer of Christ, Judas Iscariot (see article below) and to five other biblical characters.

1. Judas, mentioned with James, Joseph, and Simon, as a son of Mary and brother of Jesus (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3).

2. Judas, surnamed Thaddeus (cf. Matt. 10:3, where his name is given in the KJV as Lebbaeus; Mark 3:18). The Gk. of Luke (6:16) simply designates him “Judas of James,” which probably means that he was the son of James, as the NASB and NIV render it (6:16; Acts 1:13), or perhaps the brother of James the Less (which see). We find mention of Judas among the twelve apostles (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:16), besides which the only circumstance recorded of him in the gospels consists in the question put by him to our Lord (John 14:22): “Judas (not Iscariot) said to Him, ‘Lord, what then has happened that You are going to disclose Yourself to us and not to the world?’” Nor have we any account of his activities after the resurrection, for the traditions respecting him are lacking in authority, associating him with the founding of the church at Edessa.

3. Judas of Galilee, who stirred up a sedition among the Jews soon after the birth of Jesus (Acts 5:37). According to Josephus, he was born in Gamala, and the sedition occurred in A.D. 6. He was destroyed and his followers scattered by Cyrenius, proconsul of Syria and Judea.

4. A Jew who lived in Damascus on the street called Straight, probably the “Street of Bazaars.” Ananias went there by direction of God and recovered Saul from his blindness (Acts 9:11). The so-called “House of Judas” is still shown in an open space called “the Sheyk’s Place,” a few steps out of the Street of Bazaars.

5. Judas, surnamed Barsabbas, a disciple, and one of the deputation sent to confirm the Syrian Christians. The epistle having been read to the church assembled at Antioch, Judas and Silas exercised their prophetic gifts for the confirmation of the believers, after which Judas returned to Jerusalem (Acts 15:22, 27, 32).

JU'DAS ISCAR'IOT (Gk. Ioudas, from Heb. Judas; Iskariotēs, “inhabitant of Kerioth”). The son of Simon and one of our Lord’s twelve apostles.

His Call. We learn nothing of Judas previous to his call (Matt. 10:4; Mark 3:19; Luke 6:16), and yet the appearance of his name in the lists of the apostles would seem to indicate that he had previously declared himself a disciple. It does not seem necessary to speculate upon the motives that influenced Judas to become a disciple, or to attempt a solution of the question why such a man was chosen for the office of an apostle.

As Treasurer. When the twelve became an organized body, traveling, receiving money and other offerings, distributing to the poor, it became necessary that someone should act as steward; we learn that this duty fell to Judas and also that “he was a thief, and as he had the money box, he used to pilfer what was put into it” (John 12:4–6; 13:29).

Treachery Foretold. Some time previous to the betrayal of Jesus “many of His disciples withdrew, and were not walking with Him anymore” (John 6:66), probably influenced by the disappointment of their earthly expectations or fearful of coming evil. In deep sadness of heart Jesus asked His disciples the question, “You do not want to go away also, do you?” Receiving assurance of faithfulness from the disciples through Peter, “Jesus answered them, ‘Did I Myself not choose you, the twelve, and yet one of you is a devil?’ Now He meant Judas the son of Simon Iscariot, for he, one of the twelve, was going to betray Him” (vv. 67–71). The scene at Bethany, which in John (12:3–9) indicates that it was Judas who protested Mary’s use of the costly perfume to anoint Jesus’ feet (cf. Matt. 26:6–13; Mark 14:3–9), points to the smallness of spirit that would lead him to betray his Lord.

Betrayal of Jesus. Previous to the feast of the Passover Judas had gone to “the chief priests and officers,” agreeing to betray Jesus to them for a sum of money (Matt. 26:14–16; Mark 14:10–11; Luke 22:3–6). He seems to have concealed his treachery, however, for we find him still with the disciples. At the beginning of the Last Supper he was present, his feet were washed, and he heard the fearful words, “You are clean, but not all of you,” and the Master’s teaching of the meaning of the act (John 13:2–15). Reclining near Jesus, he heard Him tell the disciples, “One of you will betray Me,” and he asked with the others, “Surely not I, Lord?” And then, fully given over to Satan, he heard Jesus say to him, “What you do, do quickly.” Judas rose from the feast (Matt. 26:20–25; John 13:26–30), and shortly afterward he completed the betrayal. He knew the garden where Jesus and the disciples often went, and he came accompanied by a band of officers and servants, to whom he made known his Master by a kiss (Matt. 26:47–49; Mark 14:43–45; Luke 22:47–48; John 18:1–5). Jesus replied to that kiss with words of stern, sad reproach, “Judas, are you betraying the Son of Man with a kiss?” (Luke 22:48).

Remorse and Death. When Judas saw that Jesus was condemned, he was conscience stricken. Returning to the priests, he confessed his crime and hurled down the money, which they refused to take (Matt. 27:3–5). Feeling, perhaps, that there was for him no restoration, that he was, indeed, “the son of perdition” (John 17:12), “he went away and hanged himself” (Matt. 27:5). He went “to his own place” (Acts 1:16–25).

Between two passages that describe these events (Matt. 27:5; Acts 1:16–25) there appears at first sight a discrepancy. In Matthew it is stated “he threw the pieces of silver into the sanctuary and departed; and he went away and hanged himself.” In Acts (chap. 1) another account is given. There it is stated: (1) that instead of throwing the money into the Temple he bought a field with it; (2) that instead of hanging himself, “falling headlong, he burst open in the middle and all his bowels gushed out”; (3) that for this reason, and not because the priests had bought it with the price of blood, the field was called “Hakeldama ... Field of Blood.” The fact would seem to be that Judas hanged himself, probably with his girdle or belt, which either broke or became untied, and threw him heavily forward upon the jagged rocks below, thus inflicting the wound mentioned by Peter in the Acts. The apparent discrepancy in the two accounts as to the disposition of the money may be thus explained: “It was not lawful to take into the temple treasury, for the purchase of sacred things, money that had been unlawfully gained. In such case the Jewish law provided that the money was to be restored to the donor, and, if he insisted on giving it that he should be induced to spend it for something for the public weal. By a fiction of law the money was still considered to be Judas’s, and to have been applied by him in the purchase of the well-known ‘potter’s field’” (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, 2:575).

Character. The strongest element in the character of Judas was doubtless avarice, and there is no vice at once so absorbing, so unreasonable, and so degrading as the vice of avarice. The disappointment of every expectation that had first drawn him to Jesus, the intolerable rebuke of that sinless life, and, lastly, the sight of Mary’s lavish sacrifice, which brought no gain to himself, increased his alienation, so that Judas became capable of the deed that has given his name an everlasting stain.

JUDE. The “brother of James” (Jude 1) and the author of the last of the general epistles, usually identified with the Judas who was the half brother of Jesus or with the Judas who was surnamed Thaddeus (but see the discussion below of the epistle of Jude, under “Authorship”).

JUDE, EPISTLE OF. One of the general letters dealing primarily with false teachers (Jude 4–6) and in this respect resembling 2 Peter. Jude expresses affectionate solicitude for the Christians (1–3, 20–25) and urges them to contend “for the faith which was once for all delivered to the saints.” His language is extremely stern toward heretics. He denounces and threatens them rather than refuting them. Although the epistle deals with conditions that were incipient in the writer’s time, nevertheless the scope of the book comprehends conditions at the end of the age and so has a suitable place before the book of Revelation.

Authorship. According to the testimony of the book itself, it was written by “Jude, a bond-servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James” (v. 1). Since James was one of the brothers of Jesus, Jude was likewise one of His brothers. Matthew 13:55 and Mark 6:3 (“Judas” in both places in the NIV) indicate that Jesus had a brother by that name. Six other Judes or Judases are referred to in the NT, but the writer of this epistle is not to be confused with any of them. He differentiated himself from others of the same name by the mention of his brother, rather than his father. The reason for this is that his brother was much better known among his readers. Jude was not an apostle, as indicated by the omission of the apostolic title. Almost nothing is known about the life of Jude. He was apparently convinced of the deity of Christ after the resurrection.

Authenticity. Hermas, Polycarp, Athenagoras, Theophilus of Antioch, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Eusebius give early attestation to the authority of the book. Jude is more strongly attested than 2 Peter. This is somewhat astonishing when one considers its lack of apostolic authorship, its shortness, its polemic character, and its alleged reference to apocryphal literature. Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Augustine, Jerome, and other church Fathers maintained that Jude actually made reference to the Apocrypha. For this reason many early Fathers rejected it as authentic. Verse 9 was thought to have been a quotation from the Assumption of Moses and vv. 14–15 were supposed to be taken from the book of Enoch. It is possible that Jude quoted a passage from a known uncanonical book, not by way of endorsement, but because he used this particular statement as divinely given.

Background. The general character of the epistle does not permit a certain determination of the locality of its composition or its destination. It may be that the letter was intended for the same people as those to whom James addressed his letter.

Occasion and Date. The inroads of apostasy and heretical doctrine stirred up the author to write and to warn the faithful Christians against this danger. The author cites important examples of defection in the OT and their result, notably the defection of the Israelites when they came up out of Egypt; defection among angelic beings, evidently in connection with the Flood (v. 6); and the apostasy of Sodom and Gomorrah. Jude gives an eloquent and impassioned polemic against the apostate teachers (vv. 8–19). He concludes his epistle with comfort to Christians by reminding them of their first duty. The date is undeterminable; any time from A.D. 66 to A.D. 75–80 could be possible. It is commonly dated around A.D. 75 by Zahn and others.

JUDE’A (jū-dî’a). The name of the southernmost Roman division of Palestine. Judea is very small, for if you include the whole maritime plain and the desert, it does not amount to more than 2,000 square miles. But it never included the whole of the plain. Apart from the Shephelah and the plain, Judea was 55 miles long, from Bethlehem to Beersheba, and from 25 to 30 miles broad, about 1,350 square miles, of which nearly one-half was desert. On the E was the Jordan and its valley, and coming W, the desert, then the “hill country,” then the Shephelah (or low hills), and, finally, the maritime plain. On the N Judea was bounded by Samaria and on the S by the desert.

The wilderness of Judea extends from the beach of the Dead Sea to the very edge of the central plateau (or hill country), thus obliging travelers from the E to journey from five to eight hours through a waterless desert. Three well-watered spots are on its eastern edge, Jericho, ‘Ain Feshka (10 miles to the S), and ‘Ain Jidi (or Engedi, 18 miles farther). Three roads into Judea begin at Jericho; another road into Judea begins at ‘Ain Feshka; and still another begins at Engedi. The roads from Jericho run NW to Ai and Bethel, SW to Jerusalem, and SSW to the lower Kidron and Bethlehem. Just after this last road crosses the Kidron it is joined by the road from ‘Ain Feshka. The road from Engedi breaks into two branches, one running NW to Bethlehem and Jerusalem, a wild and difficult road never used by caravans, the other branch turning SW to Yuttah and Hebron.

Smith (Hist. Geog., p. 310) says that the three features of Judea’s geography that are most significant in her history are “her pastoral character, her neighborhood to the desert, her singular unsuitableness for the growth of a great city.” Two, at least, of the prophets were born in the face of the wilderness of Judea—Amos at Tekoa, and Jeremiah at Anathoth. The wilderness was the scene of David’s refuge from Saul; here John the Baptist prepared for his mission; and here our Lord suffered His temptation.

Although physically the most barren and awkward, Judea was morally the most famous and powerful of the provinces of Syria. Her character and history are thus summed up: “At all times in which the powers of spiritual initiative or expansion were needed, she was lacking, and so in the end came her shame. But when the times required concentration, indifference to the world, loyalty to the past, and passionate patriotism, then Judea took the lead, or stood alone in Israel, and these virtues even rendered brilliant the hopeless, insane struggles of her end. Judea was the seat of the one enduring dynasty of Israel, the site of their temple, the platform of their chief prophets. After their great exile they rallied round her capital, and centuries later they expended upon her fortresses the last efforts of their freedom. It is, therefore, not wonderful that they should have won from it the name which is now more frequent than either their ancestral designation of Hebrews or their sacred title of Israel” (Smith, Hist. Geog., pp. 259–60).

JUDGE. For judge in the general sense of magistrate, see Law, Administration of.

JUDGES. There is a restricted sense of the word judge, in which it refers to that person who presided over the affairs of the Hebrews in the period between Joshua and the accession of Saul.

Age of the Judges. “In those days there was no king in Israel; every man did what was right in his own eyes” (Judg. 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25). This sentence, frequently and earnestly repeated, gives us the keynote of the whole book of Judges. Each tribe took thought for itself how best to secure and maintain an adequate territory, so that separate interests of all sorts soon became prevalent and regard for the general welfare was more and more forgotten. This separation of the parts of the nation was aided by the early disunion and jealousies of the several tribes, no one of which held preeminence. The consequences of this internal discord were so threatening that it became a grave question whether the nation would be able to hold even the soil on which its peculiar religion and culture were to attain their full development. Then, too, the ancient inhabitants still retained their hold on large tracts or on important positions throughout the country. The neighboring powers still looked upon the newcomers as an easy prey to incursion and devastation, if not to actual subjugation. Nor did Israel escape the pernicious influence of idolatry, both of Canaan and the surrounding countries. The following is a review of the period of the judges: The children of Israel did evil against Jehovah, though He had manifested special favor to them; He therefore sold them into the hand of various enemies; they then cried to Him in their trouble; He raised up a deliverer who saved them; the land had a period of rest; again the people sinned; and the same cycle was repeated.

The Judges. Under the circumstances mentioned above the people were left an easy prey to idolatrous influences. They seemed incapable of grasping the idea of a divine and invisible King; therefore God allowed them judges who acted, for the most part, as agents of the divine will, regents of the invisible King, holding their commission directly from Him or with His sanction. They would thus be more inclined to act as dependent vassals of Jehovah than as kings, who would naturally have notions of independent rights and royal privileges. In this greater dependence of the judges upon the divine King we see the secret of their institution. As to the nature of the office, it appears to have resembled that of the Roman dictator, to which it has been compared, with this exception, that the dictator laid down his power as soon as the crisis that had called for its exercise had passed away; but the Hebrew judge remained invested with his high authority throughout his life (1 Sam. 4:18; 7:15). Sometimes these judges commenced their career with military exploits, but this was not always the case. Eli and Samuel were not military men; Deborah judged Israel before she planned the war against Jabin; and of Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon, it is at least uncertain whether they ever held any military command. The origin of their authority must in all cases be traced ultimately to Jehovah, owing to the very nature of the theocracy, yet this did not prevent differences of detail in the manner of their appointment. In Judg. 2:16 it is distinctly stated that “the Lord raised up judges” (italics added; cf. 3:10; 6:34; 11:29; 13:25). One, Barak, was named by the prophetess Deborah, who was herself acknowledged as a judge of Israel (4:5–6). Of others it is simply said that they arose (10:1, 3), although Jephthah furnishes a clear instance of popular election (10:18; 11:5–6).

Name and Function. The name in Heb. is the participle of shāpaṭ, “to judge, pronounce” judgment. The judges were men (excepting Deborah) who procured justice or right for the people of Israel, not only by delivering them from the power of their enemies but also by administering the laws and rites of the Lord (Judg. 2:16–19). Judging in this sense was different from the administration of civil jurisprudence and included the idea of government such as would be expected from a king (see 1 Sam. 8:5–6; 2 Kings 15:5). Alongside the extraordinary rule of the judges, the ordinary administration of justice and government of the commonwealth still remained in the hands of the heads of the tribes and the elders of the people.

Chronology of the Period. The following are the data of this period as we find them in the book of Judges:

But according to 1 Kings 6:1, the Temple was built in the 480th year after the Israelites left Egypt. The apostle Paul says: "And after these things He gave them judges until Samuel the prophet" (Acts 13:20). There can be but little doubt that some of the rulers were contemporaneous, which would greatly reduce the length of the period. See Chronology, Old Testament; History, Old Testament.

JUDGES, BOOK OF. The book of the OT that carries on the history of God's chosen people through the era intervening from the death of Joshua (c. 1375 B.C.) to the era of Samuel (c. 1075 B.C.), a period of roughly three centuries.

Purpose. The book of Judges aims to demonstrate that defection from Jehovah incurs severe punishment and servitude. Only by turning back to God can restoration be enjoyed. Thus the judges were charismatic leaders, raised up by God to deliver His theocratic people. Only by heeding their Spirit-directed message and following them in deliverance against their enemies could restoration be accomplished. The OT judges performed two functions. By divine power and Spirit-anointed leadership they delivered the people from enemy oppression. Having accomplished this, they ruled over them and administered government in the name of Israel's God. In their governmental capacity they correspond roughly to the shufetim of Phoenicia and the sufetes of Carthage, who were akin to the Roman consuls. (See Zellig Harris, A Grammar of Phoenician Language [1936].) The events illustrating the spiritual principle of restoration upon repentance are selective. Often they are coeval rather than chronological in sequence. Evidently long periods are passed over without comment. Quite a few of the judges are mentioned by name only, without any word about their particular deliverance. Since the book reports seven apostasies, seven servitudes to seven heathen nations, and seven deliverances, it is evidently put in a symmetrical form. A parallel in church history is found in the professing church since the apostolic age, in which the rise of numerous sects and the forfeited sense of the unity of the Spirit and of one body appear.

Critical View of Literary Composition and Date. The prevailing literary view of Judges, though not intimately connected with Pentateuchal criticism, is built on many of the same fallacies. It construes the book of Judges as a collection of old hero tales that were taken from two chief sources labeled J and E. These two documentary strata were supposed to have been fused in the latter half of the seventh century B.C. into one with a few small additions, such as the minor judges, to form substantially the present book (10:1–5; 12:8–15). A Deuteronomist somewhat later supposedly gave a pragmatic religious interpretation to the whole that, according to Julius Bewer (The Literature of the O.T. [1933], p. 230) was "distorted and wrong" from "an historical point of view." It is also maintained that the book did not attain its precise present form until around 200 B.C.

Conservative View of Literary Composition and Date. The evidence of the book itself coupled with tradition indicates that it was written sometime during the early years of the Hebrew monarchy, probably in the era of Saul, around 1020 B.C. Samuel, as a member of the prophetic school, may well have been the author-compiler. This is supported by the following evidence: (1) The author was undoubtedly a compiler to a large extent. This is necessitated by the simple consideration that the events extended over several centuries. The compiler, for example, selected the prose account of the deliverance of Deborah in chap. 4, and the early poem The Song of Deborah, in chap. 5. More prominence was accorded the stories of Gideon and Samson. This is evidently explained by their high didactic value. (2) The book displays the unity of one author-editor. Its symmetrical development and unified plan are the result of the early influence of the book of Deuteronomy as a genuine Mosaic composition. In this important book, blessing in Canaan is promised on the terms of obedience to the divine law, and punishment is threatened upon the breaking of it (Deut. 28:1–68). Critics who reject the Mosaic authenticity of Deuteronomy explain this intense pragmatic interpretation as the work of a so-called Deuteronomistic Work of History (cf. Aage Bentzen, Introduction to the O.T., 2:87), but this is the result of an unsound assumption and a false view of the date and genuineness of the book of Deuteronomy. (3) The book evidently belongs to the period of Saul (cf. the statement in Judg. 1:21 that “the Jebusites have lived with the sons of Benjamin in Jerusalem to this day.” This notice could not have been penned after David’s conquest of Zion in the seventh year of his reign (c. 996 B.C.; 2 Sam. 5:6–8). The statement “in those days there was no king in Israel” (Judg. 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25) points to the early period of the monarchy. (4) Hebrew tradition names Samuel as the author. The internal evidence and Hebrew tradition lend their voice to a position that is defended by many Christian conservative scholars.

JUDGMENT. In this article we treat of judgment: (1) right of private; (2) judgments of men; (3) judgments of God; and (4) judgment, the final.

Judgment, Right of Private. Important considerations regarding the right of private judgment are (1) the Protestant-Catholic split; (2) the position held within Protestant denominations; and (3) the obligation a private citizen has to the state.

Protestant-Catholic Split. The right of individuals to interpret the Scriptures for themselves or to form their own judgments as to the meaning of the Scriptures is an issue principally between Roman Catholics and Protestants. It is asserted by the Roman Catholic church that the church is the divinely authorized and infallible interpreter of Scripture revelation. It is admitted that many questions of details in connection with the study of the Bible should be left to scientific research. But still it is held that in all controversies with respect to the meaning of particular passages, as well as to the general doctrine of the Scriptures, the decision of the church is final. The only course that is safe or right for the people is to submit unreservedly to the judgment of the church.

In opposition to this Protestants generally hold that the Bible is a book for the people. It is God's message to be received and read and, in its great general meaning, to be apprehended directly by the people themselves. The prophets of the OT spoke to the people. The gospels and the epistles were for popular use and instruction. And while parts of Holy Scripture are difficult or impossible to understand without skilled interpretation, still the truth essential to salvation is within the reach of all. Christ has not appointed any class or body of men in the church as interpreters of the Scriptures in any such sense as to make their interpretation final or supreme before the conscience and intelligence of the people. The responsibility for religious faith and conduct belongs to the individual. One does not have the obligation to submit blindly in these respects to the guidance of others. It is to be maintained, however, that everyone is bound to exercise diligence and to use all proper means for the right understanding of moral truth, to pay respect to the judgment of those wiser than oneself, and especially to pay heed to those interpretations of the Scriptures that have generally prevailed or have been universal in the history of the Christian church.

Private Judgment in Churches not Professing Infallibility. The claim of the church of Rome to infallibility covers not only the interpretation of Scripture but other matters resting professedly upon tradition, with respect to which the church has rendered formal decision. Protestants meet this twofold assumption with their historic watchword "The Bible the only and sufficient rule of faith and practice." And yet the extent to which private judgment may be rightfully exercised in Protestant churches is a question by no means settled. At the one extreme are those who hold that the church should present very few, if any, doctrinal tests of membership; reliance should be placed upon vigorous Christian institutions as most likely to lead to a real and general Christian belief. This is the view of the Broad church party in the Church of England and others of so-called liberal tendencies. At the other extreme are those who would impose upon the membership of Protestant churches not only a detailed system of doctrine but also ethical regulations that are not supported by the Scriptures. With this is strictly asserted the obligation of membership in these churches. The more moderate position holds that churches for their very existence must have a basis of general doctrine that rests unmistakably upon the Scriptures and must prescribe a line of conduct resting upon the same authority. The difficulties, both theoretical and practical, grow out of a lack of proper conception of the church and of the churches. For discussion of this we refer to the article in this work, Church.

Liberty of Private Judgment in Relation to the State. Civil government is clearly recognized by the Scriptures as resting upon divine authority. Obedience to the state may therefore be said, in general terms, to be a divine requirement (see Rom. 13:1–7; 1 Pet. 2:13–15). But it is equally clear that in order to justly exact obedience from citizens or subjects the state must confine its action within its proper sphere. The function of the state is to protect life and property and to preserve social order. When civil government attempts to enforce assent to religious doctrines or to enact laws that require disobedience to the commandments of God, then the right of private judgment must be asserted. "We must obey God rather than men." There are other cases, into which we cannot here enter, in which a perversion or abuse of civil power must be met by the exercise of individual conscience. This is a principle, nevertheless, that in a free and popular government needs to be carefully guarded. For discussion of this point, see Hodge, Systematic Theology, 3:356–60; Lieber, Political Ethics.

Judgments of Men. The Scriptures recognize it to be necessary that, under proper limitations, men should form and express judgments relative to their fellowmen.

There is the necessity of private, unofficial judgment. We must constantly form estimates of the conduct and character of others for our own guidance and safety and usefulness. “You will know them by their fruits.” The prohibition of judging in Matt. 7:1 is not opposed to this, as can be seen in vv. 6–7 of the same chapter. We are forbidden to usurp God’s place as judge, or to pass rash and unjust and uncharitable and needless judgments.

It is also necessary that men should judge officially. Human government is divinely authorized. And the exercise of judicial functions is essential to all government. All judges, however, are to remember that they are subject to the judgment of God, and to exercise their office equitably and with due moderation. (See Rom. 13:1–5; 1 Pet. 2:13–15.)

JUDGMENTS. Theologians have often maintained that there is one general judgment. This is a tenet strongly entrenched in Christian theology. But a careful inductive study of all the Scriptures involved demonstrates that there are at least eight distinct judgments described in the Bible.

The Judgment of the Cross. This is the judgment upon sin effected by Christ when He said, “It is finished” (John 19:30). It is the basis of the believer’s salvation when he believes. Christ has borne the sinner’s guilt and in Him, as a substitute for all on behalf of whom He died, sin has been judged. The one who believes on Christ has been released from judgment, and “there is therefore now no condemnation” (John 5:24; Rom. 8:1; Gal. 3:13; Heb. 9:26–28; 1 Pet. 2:24).

The Judgment of Believers. This takes the form of divine correction and chastisement (1 Cor. 11:30–32; Heb. 12:3–13; John 15:1–9). The apostle Paul says: “But if we judged ourselves rightly, we should not be judged. But when we are judged, we are disciplined by the Lord in order that we may not be condemned along with the world” (1 Cor. 11:31–32). This, then, involves God’s disciplinary action against a sinning saint. “The sin leading to death” (1 John 5:16; cf. 1 Cor. 5:1–5; Acts 5:1–11) occurs when the believer, through deliberate continued sin, brings reproach upon the name of Christ and upon his salvation by free grace, and forfeits his physical life “that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.”

The Believer’s Works. This judgment concerns only Christians, and it is not a matter of judgment for sins that have been judged at the cross and with which the believer will not again be faced (John 5:24; Rom. 8:1); it involves instead the divine appraisal of the Christian’s works and service. This will entail reward or loss of reward (2 Cor. 5:10; Rom. 14:10, 12; Eph. 6:8; 2 Tim. 4:8). See Judgment Seat of Christ.

The Judgment of Self. This is referred to in 1 Cor. 11:31–32. It has reference to stern criticism of a Christian of his own ways with accommodation to the divine will and immediate confession of and turning away from all sin (1 John 1:7–9). True confession is equivalent to self-judgment and involves immediate cleansing and restoration to fellowship and walking “in the light.”

Judgment of the Nations. This judgment is referred to in Matt. 25:31–46. It involves divine dealing with the nations on the basis of their treatment of Israel. The “goat” nations on the left hand involve those peoples who are sent to the lake of fire. The “sheep” nations on the right hand enter the millennial kingdom. The peculiar basis of this judgment is the way all nations have dealt with Israel during the Tribulation period preceding the second advent of Christ. OT prophecy is clear in its prediction that some Gentile nations will enter the coming kingdom of Israel (cf. Isa. 60:3; 61:6; 62:2). These nations will be subordinate to Israel. As the millennial state merges into the eternal state, Gentile nations are still asserted to be on the earth when the heavenly Jerusalem descends from heaven (Rev. 21:24, 26).

The Judgment of Israel. Ezekiel 20:33–44 clearly teaches that Israel must come into judgment before being restored in the millennial kingdom. This OT teaching has confirmation in the NT from the parable of the ten virgins (Matt. 25:1–13 (see Joel 3:11–15)). Prophecy seems to teach that there will be a general resurrection of all truly regenerated Israelites of the past dispensation to be judged. Those who had a kingdom hope are to arise and enter the earthly glory (cf. Ezek. 37:1–14; Dan. 12:1–3).

The Judgment of Angels. These are fallen angels and are evidently judged in connection with the great white throne (1 Cor. 6:3; 2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 1:6).

The White Throne Judgment. This last great judgment comprehends the judgment of all unsaved of all ages (Rev. 20:11–15). The basis will be works, which evidently suggests differences and degrees of punishment. All who are not found in “the book of life” are cast into “the lake of fire.” This is called “the second death,” which means final and complete cutting off from God’s presence and a sin-cleansed universe.

For theologians who object to these various judgments, a simple choice must be made between following traditional theology or the plain teachings of the Scripture inductively formulated. The author considers that the doctrine of a general judgment is incompatible with inductive logic in handling the Scriptures. M.F.U.

JUDGMENT HALL (Gk. praitorion, “headquarters” in a Roman camp; the palace of a governor). See Praetorium.

JUDGMENT SEAT (Gk. bēma, a “step”). A raised place mounted by steps; used of the official seat of a judge (Matt. 27:19; John 19:13; Acts 18:12, 16–17; 25:6, “seat on the tribunal”); of the judgment seat of God (Rom. 14:10); Christ (2 Cor. 5:10); and of the structure, resembling a throne, that Herod built in the theater of Caesarea, from which he used to view the games and make speeches to the people (Acts 12:21, marg.).

JUDGMENT SEAT OF CHRIST. This judgment is spoken of in 2 Cor. 5:10: “For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that each one may be recompensed for his deeds in the body, according to what he has done, whether good or bad.” The manifestation of the believer’s works is in question in this judgment. It is most emphatically not a judgment of the believer’s sins. These have been fully atoned for in the vicarious and substitutionary death of Christ, and remembered no more (Heb. 10:17). It is quite necessary, however, that the service of every child of God be definitely scrutinized and evaluated (Matt. 12:36; Rom. 14:10; Gal. 6:7; Eph. 6:8; Col. 3:24–25). As a result of this judgment of the believer’s works, there will be reward or loss of reward. In any event, the truly born-again believer will be saved (1 Cor. 3:11–15). The judgment seat, literally bēma, evidently is set up in heaven previous to Christ’s glorious second advent to establish His earth rule in the millennial kingdom (Matt. 16:27; 2 Tim. 4:8; Rev. 22:12). The out-taking of the church, according to 1 Thess. 4:13–18; 1 Cor. 15:51–58, must first be fulfilled. The judgment seat of Christ is necessary for the appointment of places of rulership and authority with Christ in His role of “King of kings and Lord of lords” at His revelation in power and glory. JUDGMENTS OF GOD. See Judgment.

JU'DITH (jū'dith; "Jewess"). The daughter of Beerī, the Hittite, and one of Esau's two wives (Gen. 26:34). She is elsewhere called Oholibamah (which see; in the KJV her name is given as Aholibamah).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. S. Enslin and S. Zeitlin, The Book of Judith (1972).

JUG (Heb. šappaḥat; nēbel; nōd). In the NASB and NIV "jug" replaces KJV "cruze" in 1 Sam. 26:11–12, 16 and in the NASB "jug" replaces "bottle" in 1 Sam. 1:24; 10:3; 16:20; 25:18; Jer. 13:12. The NIV renders "skin" in 1 Sam. 1:24; 10:3; 16:20; and 25:18; and "wineskin" in Jer. 13:12. See also Bottle; Cruze.

JU'LIA (jū'li-a; feminine of "Julius"). A female disciple at Rome to whom Paul sent salutations (Rom. 16:15).

JU'LIUS (jū'li-us). The centurion who conducted Paul to Rome. At Sidon he allowed Paul to visit his friends and treated him courteously throughout the voyage (Acts 27:1, 3, 43), A.D. 62.

JU'NIA, JU'NIAS (jū'ni-a; jū'ni-as).

Junias. A Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation in connection with Andronicus as "my kinsmen, and my fellow prisoners, who are outstanding among the apostles, who also were in Christ before" himself (Rom. 16:7), A.D. 60. From his calling them kinsmen it is supposed that they were of Jewish extraction.

JUNIPER. See Vegetable Kingdom: Juniper.

JU'PITER. See Gods, False: Zeus.

JU'SHAB-HE'SED (ju'shab-he'sed; "returner of kindness"). According to some, the son of Pedaiah (1 Chron. 3:20); but according to Keil (Com., ad loc.), the last named of the sons of Zerubbabel. Keil thinks that the two groups of sons (vv. 19–20) are mentioned separately because they had different mothers.

JUSTICE, IN ETHICS. A term referring both to disposition and to conduct. For various Heb. and Gk. words rendered justice or righteousness in the Scriptures, we refer to Young's or Strong's concordance. The Lat. word "iustitia" is defined by Cicero as "animi affectio suum cuique tribuens" (De Finibus 5.23.65). This definition he expands elsewhere so as to have justice include religion, filial affection, fidelity, lenity in moderating punishment, and kindly benevolence (Partitiones Orat. 22.78). Thus the term is used in a general sense for "what is right, or as it should be." The NT conception of justice thoroughly accords with this. Justice is not only respect for the rights of one's fellowmen, as of life, property, and reputation; in the broadest sense it includes the proper recognition of man's duty toward God. It begins with that (see Matt. 22:21, 37–38, and many other places). With respect to man's relation to man, it includes several details often forgotten as items of justice. Thus charity or love is an obligation of righteousness (Rom. 13:8), and respect for human nature is enjoined in the precept "Honor all men" (1 Pet. 2:17). Thus also is courtesy and hospitality (3:8–9; 4:9). In short, man in his relation to man is to reflect the justice or righteousness of God; with the exception, considered below, that man, as an individual, is not to administer retributive justice. The public administration is a most important part of social ethics and, as just noted, entirely distinct from the ethics of individual life. Here it is to be borne in mind that in human courts where just laws are properly administered, they are reflections, at least, of the distributive justice, that is, of divine justice (see Judgments of Men). The judicial function of the state, must, however, be confined within its proper limits, taking cognizance of only external conduct, and this so far as it relates to the protection of life, property, reputation, and social order. And yet justice is not to be administered merely upon grounds of social expediency but because it is justice (see Punishment). E.MCC.

JUSTICE OF GOD (Heb. šedeq, “right, rightness”). In theology, as in the Scriptures, the terms justice and righteousness are used synonymously. The justice of God is both an essential and a relative attribute of the divine existence. It is a necessary outflow from the holiness of God. It is that in positive form that is negatively described as holiness, or separateness from evil. And, further, it is the holiness of God as manifested and applied in moral government. See Holiness of God.

The justice or righteousness of God is proclaimed emphatically in the Scriptures of the OT and NT (e.g., Gen. 18:25; Ps. 11:7; John 17:25; Heb. 6:10). In accordance with the Scripture, divine justice, i.e., perfect justice, is everywhere in the divine administration. God is the righteous Governor of the world. His laws are equitable and practicable. This is legislative or rectoral justice. God is also the righteous Judge. The sentences He pronounces, the rewards He bestows, and the penalties He inflicts are all righteous. This is the judicial or distributive justice (see Deut. 32:3–4; Pss. 19:7–10; 36:6; 97:2; 119:142; Isa. 33:22; Acts 10:34; Rom. 2:11; Rev. 15:3; 16:7; et al.).

The relation of the justice to the grace of God cannot be considered here fully. It should be remarked, however, that the revelation of His highest grace in Christ was “to demonstrate His righteousness” (Rom. 3:25–26; see Grace; Atonement). Also, the rewards graciously apportioned to the eternally saved vary in measure and have respect to the individual character and deeds of those who receive them. The righteousness or justice of God, also like His holiness, is communicable to men. It is the work of divine grace to impart to men rightness by renewal “in righteousness and holiness of truth” (Eph. 4:23, 24; Isa. 46:13; 51:5; 56:1; Rom. 10:3). See Image of God.

There is no warrant for the statement that the OT magnifies the justice of God more than does the New. The NT brings to light most distinctly the economy of grace, but by no means has it been lost sight of in the Old. But, at the same time, it reveals most fully the triumph of the righteous kingdom of God, culminating in the final judgment. E.MCC.

JUSTIFICATION. Justification is a divine act whereby an infinitely Holy God judicially declares a believing sinner to be righteous and acceptable before Him because Christ has borne the sinner’s sin on the cross and has become “to us ... righteousness” (1 Cor. 1:30; Rom. 3:24). Justification springs from the fountain of God’s grace (Titus 3:4–5). It is operative as the result of the redemptive and propitiatory sacrifice of Christ, who has settled all the claims of the law (Rom. 3:24–25; 5:9). Justification is on the basis of faith and not by human merit or works (3:28–30; 4:5; 5:1; Gal. 2:16). In this marvelous operation of God the infinitely holy Judge judicially declares righteous the one who believes in Jesus (Rom. 8:31–34). A justified believer emerges from God’s great courtroom with a consciousness that another, his Substitute, has borne his guilt and that he stands without accusation before God (8:1, 33–34). Justification makes no one righteous, neither is it the bestowment of righteousness as such, but rather it declares one to be justified whom God sees as perfected once and forever in His beloved Son. As Lewis Sperry Chafer says: “Therefore, this may be stated as the correct formula of justification: The sinner becomes righteous in God’s sight when he is in Christ: he is justified by God freely, all without a cause, because thereby he is righteous in His sight” (Systematic Theology, 7:222). M.F.U.

Throughout the whole history of this doctrine the principal point of difference and dispute has been as to whether faith is the only condition of justification or whether good works in connection with faith are also to be regarded as an instrumental cause. Upon this question opinion has run to opposite extremes—from antinomianism to the doctrine of penances and works of supererogation. A chief cause of error has been an undue magnifying of the intellectual element in faith at the expense of the element that is moral and practical. Even in the earliest days of Christianity the tendency was to regard faith as merely a mental assent to Christian doctrine. The possessor of such faith deemed himself as having fully met the gospel requirement, though regardless of the claims of Christian service and even of ordinary morality. Passages in the epistles of Paul and James were written to correct this antinomian error (e.g., Rom. 6:1; Gal. 5:16–25; James 2:14–26). Partly as a recoil from this error the demand arose that, in addition to good works as evidences of true faith in believers, the sins of believers should be expiated by penances. And still further came the false idea of the character of good works. Instead of the clear recognition of the only relative and imperfect character of the righteousness of even the best Christians, the distinction was made between the divine commands and the divine counsels, and the belief obtained footing that by keeping both, men might do more than meet the divine requirements. Thus the scriptural doctrine of justification by faith became, to a considerable extent, beclouded in the early period of the history of the church. The abuses that later became prevalent in the Roman Catholic church through the failure to maintain the Scripture conception of faith and through the false conception of good works are well known. Without entering in detail into the views of this or of the Greek church, it must suffice us to emphasize the fact that the rescuing of the Scripture doctrine upon this subject, largely, though not wholly, lost sight of for a long time, was the work of the Reformation of the sixteenth century. Justification by faith is a fundamental doctrine of Protestant and evangelical Christianity. It stands opposed to those rationalistic conceptions of sin, and the attitude of God toward it, that reduce justification to a nullity, and to those views of Christian merit, cherished by Romanism, that derogate from the efficacy of Christ's atonement; at the same time it holds before men the great hope of the gospel and lays deep the foundation of Christian morality. JUS'TUS (jus'tus; "just").

1. The surname of Joseph, also called Barsabbas, who, with Matthias, was selected by the apostles as a candidate for the place made vacant by the apostasy of Judas Iscariot (Acts 1:23).

2. The name in the KJV, NASB and NIV of Titius Justus, a disciple living at Corinth, in whose house, near the synagogue, Paul preached to the Gentiles (Acts 18:7), A.D. 54.

3. Called also Jesus, a Jewish Christian mentioned in connection with Mark by Paul as being his "only fellow workers" at Rome when he wrote to the Colossians (Col. 4:11), A.D. 64.

JUT'TAH (jū'ta; "inclined"). A Levitical city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:55; 21:16). It was allotted to the priests, but in the catalog (1 Chron. 6:57–59) the name has escaped (see NIV margin). It is supposed to have been the residence of Zacharias and Elizabeth, and the birthplace of John the Baptist (cf. Luke 1:39). It is doubtless the present Jutta, or Jitta, about five miles S of Hebron.

K

KAB, CAB. A Hebrew dry measure equal to about two quarts (2 Kings 6:25). See Metrology.

KAB'ZEEL (kab'zîl; "God has gathered"). A city in the S of Judah, the birthplace of Benaiah (Josh. 15:21; 2 Sam. 23:20; 1 Chron. 11:22). In Neh. 11:25 it is called Jekabzeel (which see). Perhaps it was located at Khirbet Hora, about ten miles NE of Beersheba.

KA'DESH (kā'desh; "consecrated"). More fully Ka'desh-bar'nea (ka'desh-bar'nē-a). A spot where the Israelites encamped twice while journeying from Egypt to Palestine, their nineteenth and thirty-seventh station. Its original name seems to have been Rithmah (which see), becoming Kadesh when the Tabernacle rested there; En-mishpat (Gen. 14:7), "Fountain of Judgment," when judgment was passed upon the Israelites; and Meribah (which see) when it became the place of murmuring and strife.

From Kadesh-barnea Moses sent messengers to explore the Promised Land. There the people rebelled and prepared to choose a captain to lead them back to Egypt (Num. 14:4). Consequently, Kadesh, the "sanctuary," became En-mishpat, a "Fountain of Judgment," when the rebellious people were sentenced to complete forty years of wandering. Israel determined to obtain possession of Canaan (14:39–40) and pushed into the S country (the Negeb), that is, the high land between the desert and Canaan proper. They were, however, defeated by the Amorites (Deut. 1:44) and the Amalekites (Num. 14:45).

Scripture References. The first mention of Kadesh-barnea is in connection with the devastating march of Chedorlaomer (which see), king of Elam, in the days of Abraham (Gen. 14:1–16). Kadesh is mentioned in connection with the flight of Hagar, where it is recorded that she rested by "the spring on the way to Shur" (16:7), between Kadesh and Bered (v. 14). Again it is recorded that Abraham moved from Hebron and sojourned at a point "between Kadesh and Shur" (20:1). Some believe that the rebellion of Korah and his company occurred at Kadesh, that it was there "the earth opened its mouth and swallowed them up" (Num. 16:1–32). It was certainly at Kadesh that Miriam died and was buried (20:1), and it was there that Moses struck the rock when he had been told only to speak to it (vv. 2–11). This was the third time that it became the "Fountain of Judgment" by Jehovah's passing judgment upon Moses for his impatience, presumption, and lack of reverent obedience (vv. 12–24). Then Kadesh, "consecrated (place)" or "sanctuary," became Meribah, or "strife" (v. 13).

A long halt at Kadesh followed (Deut. 1:46), and it appears that the Israelites scattered in the valleys of the desert, leading a nomadic life. All this time Kadesh was the northernmost limit of their roving and, in a peculiar sense, the center of their occupancy, the pivot of their wanderings. Thirty-seven years passed, during which time Israel did not advance one single step toward the occupancy of the Promised Land. Then "the whole congregation" (Num. 20:1; Deut. 2:1) came together in Kadesh, as if it was the rendezvous and rallying point of the scattered nation.

From Kadesh Moses sent messengers to the king of Edom with the request that Israel might pass through his country on the way to Canaan (Num. 20:14–21), and he also sent a similar request to the king of Moab (Judg. 11:16–17).

Location. This has been successfully identified with 'Ain Kadeis or 'Ain el Qudeirat, about fifty miles S of Beersheba in the NE part of the Sinai Peninsula. The determining factor of the location was water (Num. 20:2). With the region some five or six miles to the N, which was also well watered, Israel acquired the most livable part of the Sinai Peninsula. This circumstance offers the reason for their extended stay at this place. T. E. Lawrence and C. L. Woolley examined 'Ain Kadeis in 1914 on behalf of the Palestine Exploration Fund and drew up a plan of a fortress on the site. In 1956 M. Dothan excavated the fortress under the auspices of the Israel Department of Antiquities and found that it dated to the tenth century B.C. No remains of the Mosaic period have been located there, but none should be expected—given the nature of the Hebrew encampment. Moreover, excavation or even exploration of the site is incomplete.

KAD'MIEL (kad'mi-el; “God is in the front”).

1. One of the Levites who, with his family, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. Apparently he was a representative of the descendants of Hodaviah, or, as he is elsewhere called, Hodevah or Judah (Ezra 2:40; Neh. 7:43; 12:8, 24). He assisted in the various reforms of that period (Ezra 3:9), 536 B.C.

2. A Levite who assisted in leading the devotions of the people after they were taught the law by Ezra (Neh. 9:4–5). He also signed the covenant (10:9), 445 B.C. He is thought to have been a son of no. 1.

KAD'MONITE (kad'mon-it). A tribe mentioned only in Gen. 15:19 as one of the nations to be dispossessed by Israel. As an adjective the name means “eastern,” or “ancient.” Quite probably, therefore, the Kadmonites were “bene-kedem” (Judg. 6:33, “sons of the east”), i.e., tribes who roamed in the barren areas E and SE of Palestine. W.H.; M.F.U.

KAIN (kān). A city of the low country of Judah (Josh. 15:57; “Cain,” KJV), Khirbet Yagin, three miles SE of Hebron.

KAL'LAI (kal'ī; “swift, light”). Son of Sallai and a chief priest in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:20), after 635 B.C.

KA'MON (ka'mon). The place of the judge Jair's burial (Judg. 10:5; “Camon,” KJV). Josephus (Ant. 5.7.6) states that Kamon was a city of Gilead. Eusebius and Jerome place it on the great road, six Roman miles N of Legio, on the plain of Jezreel or Esdraelon. Polybius (doubtlessly correct) mentions it among other cities of Gilead (History 5.70.12).

KA'NAH (kā'na; “place of reeds”).

1. A stream or “brook” that empties into the Mediterranean between Caesarea and Joppa after serving as a boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. 16:8; 17:9). It is identified by some as the river Aujeh.

2. A town N of Asher (Josh. 19:28), identified with modern Qana, about six miles SE of Tyre.

KAPH (כ) (kaf; Heb. kaf, “palm of hand”). Eleventh letter of the Heb. alphabet (cf. Ps. 119:81–88, where this letter begins each verse in the Heb.).

KJV King James Version

KARE'AH (ka-rē'a; "bald"). The father of Johanan and Jonathan, Jewish leaders in the time of Gedaliah, the Babylonian-appointed governor of Jerusalem (Jer. 40:8, 13, 15–16; 41:11, 13–14, 16; 42:1, 8; 43:2, 4–5). He is called Careah in 2 Kings 25:23, KJV.

KAR'KA (kar'ka; "ground, floor"). A place named in the description of Judah's lot, lying between the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea (Josh. 15:3; "Karkaa," KJV). Perhaps to be located at 'Ain el-Qeseimeh, three miles NW of Kadesh-Barnea.

KAR'KOR (kar'kor; cf. Arab. karkar, "soft, level ground"). A place E of the Jordan where Gideon's 300 men, "weary yet pursuing," captured Zebah and Zalmunna (Judg. 8:4, 12). Its location cannot be determined with accuracy, but some would place it at Qarqar in the Wadi Sirham, 120 miles SE of Amman.

KARNA'IM (karna'yim). A place mentioned in Amos 6:13 as either a literal city or district of unknown location or a figurative place whose meaning is "horns." The prophet then would be ridiculing wicked Israel for having overcome the "horns," a symbol of strength, by strength.

KAR'TAH (kar'ta; "city"). A town in the tribe of Zebulun, assigned (Josh. 21:34) to the Levites of the family of Merari.

KAR'TAN (kar'tan; "town, city"). One of the cities of refuge in Naphtali, belonging to the Gershonite Levites, not far from the Sea of Galilee (Josh. 21:32; "Kiriathaim," 1 Chron. 6:76). It is present-day Khirbet el-Kureiyeh, fifteen miles SE of Tyre.

KAT'TAH (kat'ta). One of the towns of Zebulun (Josh. 19:15; "Kattath," KJV), probably the same as Kitron (Judg. 1:30).

KATYDID. See Animal Kingdom: Locust.

KEBAR. See Chebar.

KE'DAR (kē'der; Heb. qādar, "to be dark," but cf. Arab. qadara, "to be able, mighty").

1. The second son of Ishmael and father of the tribe bearing his name (Gen. 25:13; 1 Chron. 1:29). Little is known of Kedar, but his descendants are frequently mentioned (see no. 2).

2. Kedar, in the stricter sense, was a nomadic tribe of Ishmaelites that wandered as far as the Elanitic gulf. But this term is usually used in Scripture as the collective name of the Arab tribes (Bedouin) in general (Song of Sol. 1:5; Isa. 21:16–17; 42:11; 60:7; Jer. 2:10; 49:28; Ezek. 27:21). In Ps. 120:5 Kedar and Meshech represent uncivilized tribes.

KED'EMAH (ked'e-ma; "eastward"). The last named son of Ishmael, and probably head of an Arab tribe of the same name (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chron. 1:31).

KED'EMOTH (ked'e-mōth; "eastern places"). A city of Reuben, assigned with its pastureland to the Levites of the Merari family (Josh. 13:18; 21:37; 1 Chron. 6:79). "From the wilderness of Kedemoth" Moses sent a deputation to Sihon, king of the Amorites, with a request to pass through his land (Deut. 2:26). Site uncertain.

KE'DESH (kē'desh; "sacred place, sanctuary").

1. A city in the extreme S of Judah (Josh. 15:23), and probably the same as Kadesh-barnea (which see).

2. A city in the tribe of Issachar, given to the Levites of the family of Gershom (1 Chron. 6:72; called "Kishion," Josh. 19:20; 21:28). Perhaps Tell Abu Qudeis, about two miles SE of Megiddo.

3. A "fortified city" of Naphtali (Josh. 19:37) and one of the cities of refuge (20:7). Its king was slain by Joshua (12:22). It was the residence of Barak (Judg. 4:6), was captured by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings 15:29), and was a well-known place after the captivity (1 Macc. 11:63–74). Probably to be identified with Khirbet Qedish, about two miles S of Tiberias.

KE'DESH-NAPH'TALI (kā'desh-naf'ta-lī; Judg. 4:6).

KEDORLAOMER. See Chedorlaomer. See Kedesh, no. 3.

KEHELA'THAH (ke-he-la'tha; “assembly convocation”). One of the stations (twenty-third) of the children of Israel in the desert (Num. 33:22–23).

KEI'LAH (kē'la). A city in the plains of Judah that David once relieved from a siege by the Philistines, but its inhabitants were false and sought to deliver him up to Saul (1 Sam. 23:1–13). The site is satisfactorily identified with Khirbet Qila, about 8½ miles NW of Hebron. In the time of Nehemiah Keilah was so considerable that it had two prefects who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:17–18).

KELA'IAH (ke-la'ya). One of the Levites who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:23, “that is, Kelita”).

KELAL. See Chelal.

KEL'TA (kel'i-ta; perhaps “dwarf”; cf. Arab. qulāt). One of the Levites who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:23), assisted Ezra in expounding the law (Neh. 8:7), and signed the covenant made by Nehemiah (10:10), 456 B.C.

KELUB. See Chelub.

KELUHI. See Chelluhi.

KEM'UEL (kem'ū-el; “assembly of God”).

1. One of the sons of Abraham's brother Nahor (Gen. 22:20–21), about 2150 B.C.
2. The son of Shiphthan and representative of Ephraim in the partition of the land of Canaan (Num. 34:24), about 1375 B.C.
3. The father of Hashabiah, who was leader of the Levites in the time of David (1 Chron. 27:17), about 1000 B.C.

KENAANAH. See Chenaanah.

KE'NAN (kē'nan). The son of Enos and great-grandson of Adam. He was born when his father was 90 years old. He lived 70 years and became the father of Mahalalel, after which he lived 840 years (Gen. 5:9–14). He is also mentioned in 1 Chron. 1:2.

KENANI. See Chenani.

KE'NATH (kē'nath; “possession”). A city in Gilead that was taken with “its villages” from the Canaanites by Nobah, and afterward called by his name (Num. 32:42). It is mentioned (1 Chron. 2:22–23) apparently as taken by Jair. Kenath is now Kanawat, a ruined town E of Bashan and about fifty miles SE of Damascus, on the W side of the Hauran Mountains. It overlooks a vast region and is surrounded by a cluster of cities, all within a distance of a half hour to two hours. The number of ruined buildings of all kinds is considerable.

KE'NAZ (kē'naz).

1. One of the sons of Eliphaz, the firstborn of Esau. He became chief of one of the Edomite tribes of Arabia Petraea (Gen. 36:11, 15; 1 Chron. 1:36). Genesis 36:42 and 1 Chron. 1:53, according to Keil and Delitzsch (Com., ad loc.), include a list, not of persons, but of capital cities of the several kingdoms.

2. A brother of Caleb and father of Othniel who took Kiriath-Sepher and received Caleb's daughter Achsah as a reward (Josh. 15:17; Judg. 1:13; 3:9, 11; 1 Chron. 4:13), about 1400–1370 B.C.

3. The son of Elah and grandson of Caleb (1 Chron. 4:15).

KE'NITES (kē'nīts; "pertaining to copper-smiths"). A group of metalsmiths who traveled throughout the mineral-bearing region in the Wadi Arabah. They are first mentioned in Gen. 15:19 as one of the nations to be "given" to Israel. They descended from the Midianites and developed extraordinary skill in metalwork. They settled down early along the SW shore of the Dead Sea, SE of Hebron (Judg. 1:16). Hobab, the son of Reuel, was a Kenite and acted as a guide to Israel in the wilderness (1:16; 4:11). Their nomadism is suggested in the OT by numerous individual Kenites described as living in various places. Besides their residence SE of Hebron, they were found in the Wadi Arabah (Num. 24:21), in Naphtali (Judg. 4:11) and in the Davidic-Solomonic era they are mentioned in southern Judah (1 Sam. 15:6; 27:10). Heber, mentioned in Judg. 4:11 and 5:24, was a Kenite, and the ascetic Rechabites mentioned in 1 Chron. 2:55 were also of Kenite extraction. M.F.U.

KEN'IZZITE (ken'i-zīt; Heb. haqqnizzî). The Kenizzites are mentioned in Gen. 15:19, where they are named between the Kenites and the Kadmonites among the nations to be dispossessed by Israel. They probably dwelt somewhere in the southern part of Canaan. They were related to the Kenites and like them were skilled metal-workers of the copper-rich Jordan Valley and the Arabah (see Kenite). In Gen. 36:11, 15 Kenaz is a son of Eliphaz, the son of Esau, and in 36:42 Kenaz appears among the "chiefs" of Edom. This might lead us to believe that the Kenizzites were an Edomite tribe, if they had not been mentioned so long before. The case is similar to that of Amalek (which see); but the occurrence of the name Kenaz in vv. 15, 42 makes it appear that Kenaz may have been a more common name than Amalek. In Num. 32:12; Josh. 14:6, 14 the same Heb. ("Kenezite," KJV) is an epithet of Caleb or of Jephunneh in the phrase "Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite." It is quite probable that Caleb was descended from the Edomite Kenaz. This is argued from 15:13, "Now he gave to Caleb the son of Jephunneh a portion among the sons of Judah," and 14:14, "Hebron became the inheritance of Caleb the son of Jephunneh, the Kenizzite until this day, because he followed the Lord God of Israel fully." The same is indicated by Edomite and Horite names in the genealogy of Caleb. Thus, besides Kenaz (Gen. 36:11, 15), we find Shobal (cf. 1 Chron. 2:52 with Gen. 36:20), Manahathites (1 Chron. 2:52; cf. Manahath, Gen. 36:23), Korah (cf. Gen. 36:14, 16, 18 with 1 Chron. 2:43), the Ithrites (1 Chron. 2:53; cf. Ithran, Gen. 36:26), Elah (1 Chron. 4:15; cf. Gen. 36:41), and Jephunneh, who has been compared with Pinon (Gen. 36:41). W.H.; M.F.U.

KENO'SIS (ke-nō'sis; Gk. kenōsis, "an emptying"). A Gk. word used in theology with reference to the self-denial of the Son of God in becoming incarnate and entering into His state of humiliation. This use of the term is based upon Phil. 2:7, where the phrase heauton ekenōse, "emptied Himself," occurs. The same idea of self-deprivation, or the laying aside of something that Christ possessed as a divine person in His pre-existent state, finds expression in other places in the Scriptures. For example, in John 17:5 the Lord speaks of the glory that He had with the Father "before the world was." Paul says of Christ, "though He was rich, yet for your sake He became poor" (2 Cor. 8:9).

The profound and difficult question naturally raised is, In what sense did the Son of God lay aside His divine riches in becoming the God-man? Of what "glory" did He divest Himself? What are we to understand by the kenosis, or “emptying of Himself”? The question is inwoven with the mystery of the incarnation. And the inquiry soon leads to depths that are unfathomable because of the incomprehensibility of God and the inability of the human mind to conceive adequately the divine mode of existence. And yet, fidelity to the Scriptures and the proper demands of the intellect foster the attempt to penetrate the mystery as far as possible, even though the result may fall far short of the full solution.

A brief survey of the fluctuations of doctrine and conjecture on this subject will be helpful. Historically, the question has presented many phases, among them these: Was the Son of God during His earthly sojourn in the flesh self-deprived in any measure of His divine attributes? If He still retained them fully in His possession, was their exercise or use for the time surrendered? If so, to what extent? Under what regulating principles? Was the consciousness of our Lord simply human—the divine consciousness for the time nonexistent or awakening in Him only gradually—or was His consciousness throughout that of the God-man?

The ancient church, with but few exceptions, taught that the Son did not retain the divine glory for Himself, for His own advantage, while yet He did not cease even in the flesh to be what He eternally was. “That emptying,” said Hilary, “is by no means the annihilating of the heavenly nature.” The theology of the Middle Ages so honored the divine nature of Christ as to overlook all limitations assumed in the union of that nature with the human. Thomas Aquinas admitted only an outward development in age and wisdom as in the sight of men.

The kenosis became the subject of much controversy between the theologians of Giessen and Tübingen early in the seventeenth century, the former (Menzer and Feurborn) maintaining that if Christ did not during His humiliation actually divest Himself of His attributes, such as omnipotence and omniscience, and so on, He did lay aside their use. The latter (Haffenreffer, Thummus, Nicolai, Oriander) contend that the kenosis was only a concealment or veiling of their use. Later Thomasius (Person and Work of Christ) took the ground positively of self-abdication of the divine attributes on the part of Christ, assuming a sleeplike unconsciousness of the divine nature of the Son during this earthly life, and the exclusion of the Son from the Trinity during that period. Gess (Die Lehre von der Person Christi) and Georg Ludw. Hahn (Theologie der N. T.) take substantially the same ground. This scanty outline is sufficient to show the perilous paths that are followed when the attempt is made to push speculation too far in this direction. Likewise it must be apparent that the conclusion reached should be such as not to deny the absolute unchangeableness of God, nor the constant completeness of the divine nature in the Son even in the days of His humiliation; while, on the other hand, the reality of His loving self-abasement in His entrance into fellowship with humanity should be duly recognized. All reflection upon this subject, as upon many others, must be under the guidance, and within the limits, of Scripture teaching.

That the “Word made flesh” was truly God, as well as man, with divine nature and attributes undiminished, cannot be doubted by anyone who believes the first chapter of John’s gospel, to say nothing of the force of other Scriptures.

Whether the consciousness of His divine nature was from the very outset possessed by our Lord is a matter upon which the Scriptures are silent. Luke, however, furnishes a glimpse that is suggestive when the child Christ says, “Did you not know that I had to be in My Father’s house?” (Luke 2:49). And certainly He clearly expresses this consciousness during the years of His ministry (e.g., John 8:58; 10:30; 14:9–11; 17:25).

As to the divine attributes in Christ, the distinction seems valid between their full possession and their constant exercise. That He constantly possessed the attributes of deity is inseparable from faith in His divine, and therefore unchangeable, nature. And yet the use of these same properties appears to have been in some way limited. This must be manifest to anyone who attentively reads the gospels. And the law of this limitation is found in the love and self-sacrifice that led our Lord to the complete acceptance of His human and earthly lot. He who “emptied Himself” took “the form of a bond-servant.” The two expressions are mutually explanatory. Thus He who was “in the form of God” and “did not regard equality with God a thing to be grasped,” placed Himself in relation to the Father in the lowly position of a servant (Matt. 26:39; John 4:34; 5:30; 14:28; 17:4, 18); He was also the servant of mankind (Matt. 20:28; Luke 22:26–27); He never wrought miracles for Himself, but often did so for others (cf. Matt. 4:3–4; 14:15–21; 15:32–39); He admitted and asserted a limitation to His knowledge with respect to one matter but manifested and declared Himself to be possessed of divine knowledge with respect to other matters—even the highest. And here the fullness of His knowledge was always at the service of His love (cf. Matt. 11:27; Mark 13:32; John 3:12–13; 17:25–26). He neither exercised His omnipotence nor exhibited His omniscience for His own advantage and glory but for the performance of His saving work among men.

Two other expressions in the same passage (Phil. 2:5–8) throw light upon the kenosis. Before the kenosis Christ was “in the form of God”; afterward He was “made in the likeness of men,” “found in appearance as a man.” Here the contrast is between the manifestations of being and character that naturally belonged to the Son of God, and the veiling of the divine glory that came to pass when He became incarnate. What the “form of God” was that the Son laid aside, the apostle does not tell us; but evidently it was such manifestation of the divine being as was befitting to Him who “did not regard equality with God a thing to be grasped.” Paul elsewhere writes that God “dwells in unapproachable light” (1 Tim. 6:16). In strongest contrast with this was all the outward appearance of the earthly life of our Lord. He left the companionship of angels for that of men. The angels are the servants of God. Though on special occasions they were sent to minister to Him (Matt. 4:11; Luke 22:43), Christ never called for them (see Matt. 26:53).

Two features of the incarnate life of the Son of God are emphasized by Paul for ethical purposes in connection with the kenosis: first, self-sacrificing love (Phil. 2:3–5); second, obedience (2:8, 12–13). The sequence, the exaltation of Christ (vv. 9–11), has the gloriously hopeful suggestion and promise for all His followers. See Incarnation; Humiliation of Christ. BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. B. KERE’ (ke-ra’, ke-rā) (Aram. passive part. $q\bar{\square}r\bar{e}$, signifying “what is to be read”). This is a marginal reading in the traditional Hebrew MT. In the opinion of the Jewish scholars (Masoretes) this was the superior reading and was to be substituted or read for what was written in the text, called the kethib (which see). Actually the vowel pointings of the kethib were to be read with the kere.

KER'EN-HAP'PUCH (ker'en-hap'uk; "paint-horn," i.e., "cosmetic box"). The name given to the youngest daughter of Job after his restoration to prosperity (Job 42:14).

KER'ETHITES. See Cherethites.

KE'RIOTH (kē'rī-ōth; "cities"). A city of Moab mentioned by Jeremiah (Jer. 48:24, 41) and Amos (Amos 2:2; "Kiriath," KJV) in their prophecies of its overthrow by the Babylonians. It occurs on the Moabite Stone (line 13).

KE'RIOTH-HEZ'RON (ke'ri-ōth-nez'ron). A city of southern Judah and probably included with Simeon (Josh. 15:25; "Kerioth, and Hezron," KJV), and identified with Hazor (which see). It seems to be the place alluded to in the name of Judas Iscariot, a native of Kerioth. It is called simply Hezron in 15:3. The city has been identified with Khirbet el-Karyathein, about 4½ miles S of Tell Mācin.

KE'RITH. See Cherith.

KE'ROS (ke'ros). One of the Temple servants whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem after the captivity (Ezra 2:44; Neh. 7:47), before 536 B.C.

KETHIB (ke-thîb', also written kethiv, ke-thēve, an Aram. passive part. k-thîb, "written").

The kethib was the reading actually occurring in the Heb. text and represented, even though an inferior reading in the opinion of the Masoretic scholars, an ancient traditional reading deserving of some credence. The vowels on the kethib were meant to be superimposed upon the marginal, or kere, reading (see Kere). The Kethib Kere device proves the high veneration of Masoretic scholars for the traditional readings and for sacred regard of the text together with their extreme unwillingness to change it, even in the case of an inferior traditional reading. M.F.U.

KETTLE (Heb. dûd, "boiling"). A large pot for cooking (1 Sam. 2:14; 2 Chron. 35:13; elsewhere rendered "pot," Job 41:20; "basket," Ps. 81:6). From 1 Sam. 2:14 it is evident that this vessel was used in preparing the peace offerings: "All that the fork brought up the priest would take for himself."

KETU'RAH (ke-tū'ra; "incense"). The second wife (or concubine, 1 Chron. 1:32) of Abraham (Gen. 25:1, 4). By Abraham she had six sons, who, after they grew to manhood, were sent "to the land of the east" so that they would not interfere with Isaac. It is generally supposed that she was married to Abraham after the death of Sarah; but against this it is urged that it is improbable that six sons should have been born to Abraham by one woman, and that, too, after he was 140 years old, and that he then should have lived to see them arrive at an adult age. It has therefore been suggested that Keturah had been Abraham's secondary or concubine wife before the death of Sarah, and that she was raised to the dignity of a full wife after that event. Through the offspring of Keturah Abraham became the "father of a multitude of nations."

KEY. As an instrument for fastening, see Lock.

Figurative. Because of its power to open to, or exclude from, all treasures of a city or house, the key is often used in Scripture as a symbol of power and authority, whether in church or state. Thus Isaiah speaks (22:22) of the key of David being given to Eliakim as the most influential adviser of the king. The power of the keys consisted not only in the supervision of the royal chambers, but also in deciding who was and who was not to be received into the king's service.

With reference to the administration of the house of David in the higher sense, our Lord is represented as having the key of David (Rev. 3:7), receiving and excluding whom He pleases, and committing to His apostles—to Peter first as the most prominent member of the apostolic body—the keys of the kingdom (Matt. 16:19; 18:18). See Peter.

“The key of knowledge” (Luke 11:52) of spiritual things is the Scriptures, which the scribes reserved exclusively for themselves. The figure used by our Lord is that of knowledge being a temple into which the scribes should have led the people, but whose gate they closed, and holding the key with jealous care, even their commentaries hiding rather than revealing knowledge.

KEZI'AH (ke-zī'a; “cassia”). Job's second daughter born to him after his adversity (Job 42:14; “Kezia,” KJV).

KE'ZIB. See Chezib.

KE'ZIZ. See Emek-keziz.

KHAN (kan). The more common Arab. name for the establishments that correspond to our inn (which see).

KIB'ROTH-HATTA'AVAH (kib'rōth-ha-ta'a-va; “the graves of lust”). One of the stations of the Israelites, probably in Wadi Murrah, about thirty miles NE of Sinai. It was the scene of murmuring and discontent, followed by most severe punishment (Num. 11:34–35; 33:16–17; Deut. 9:22; cf. Ps. 78:30–31).

KIB'ZAIM (kib'za-im; a “double heap”). A city of Ephraim, assigned to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. 21:22), called Jokmeam (which see) in 1 Chron. 6:68. Its site is not ascertained.

KID. The young of the goat. See Animal Kingdom: Goat; Sacrificial Offerings.

KIDNAP (Heb. gānab, to “steal, secretly carry away”). The kidnapping of a freeborn Israelite, either to treat him as a slave or to sell him into slavery, was by the law of Moses punished by death (Ex. 21:16; Deut. 24:7). In 1 Tim. 1:10 Paul denounces kidnappers (Gk. andrapodistēs; NIV, “slave traders”) among other ungodly or profane men.

KIDNEY (Heb. kilyâ; Gk. nephros).

The kidney with its surrounding fat was part of the burnt offering (Ex. 29:13, 22; Lev. 3:4, 10, 15; 4:9; 8:16, 25; etc.). See Sacrificial Offerings.

Figurative. To the Hebrews, the kidneys, because of their sensitivity, were believed to be the seat of desire. Scripture contains many eloquent passages referring to this, although the NASB and NIV have rendered them in such a way as to make them understandable to us. When a man suffers deep within himself, he is “pierced within” (in the kidneys, Ps. 73:21); when he rejoices, it is with his “inmost being” (kidneys, Prov. 23:16); and when he earnestly longs, his “heart [kidneys] faints within” (Job 19:27). The kidneys also seem to provide knowledge and understanding, as in Ps. 16:7 and Jer. 12:2, where the word is rendered “mind” (i.e., “my mind [kidneys] instructs me in the night”). Job complains that God has split his “kidneys open” (Job 16:13, cf. Lam. 3:13, marg.).

KI'DON. See Chidon.

KID'RON (kid'ron; “turbid, dusky, gloomy”; Gk. Kedrōn; “Cedron,” John 18:1, KJV). The brook that flows through the valley of Jehoshaphat. The name was also applied to its bed, the valley of Kidron. It is thus described by Smith (Hist. Geog., p. 511): “To the north of Jerusalem begins the torrent-bed of the Kidron. It sweeps past the Temple Mount, past what were afterward Calvary and Gethsemane. It leaves the Mount of Olives and Bethany to the left, Bethlehem far to the right. It plunges down among the bare terraces, precipices, and crags of the wilderness of Judea—the wilderness of the scapegoat. So barren and blistered, so furnace-like does it [the valley] become as it drops below the level of the sea, that it takes the name of Wady-en-Nar or the Fire Wady. At last its dreary course brings it to the precipices above the Dead Sea, into which it shoots its scanty winter waters; but all summer it is dry.” The valley is only 20 miles long but has a descent of 3,912 feet. The place where it enters the Jordan is a narrow gorge about 1,200 feet deep.

The Kidron was the brook crossed by David when he fled from Absalom (2 Sam. 15:23). Solomon fixed it as the limit of Shimei's walks (1 Kings 2:37); beside it Asa destroyed and burned his mother's idol, or Asherah (15:13); here Athaliah was executed (Josephus, Ant. 9.7.3; cf. 2 Kings 11:16). It then became the regular receptacle for the impurities and abominations of the idol worship when removed from the Temple and destroyed by the adherents of Jehovah (23:4, 6, 12; 2 Chron. 29:16; 30:14); and in the time of Josiah this valley was the common cemetery of Jerusalem (2 Kings 23:6; Jer. 26:23; 31:40).

KI'NAH (kî'na; “lamentation dirge”). A city in the extreme S of Judah toward Edom (Josh. 15:22). Kinah is located at the head of Wadi el Keini.

KINDNESS and Loving-Kindness (Heb. hesed, “desire, zeal”). Zeal toward another in a good sense: (1) Of men, as shown in doing mutual favors, benefits (Gen. 21:23; 2 Sam. 10:2); compassion for the afflicted (Job 6:14; “pity,” KJV). The formula to “show kindness” is frequent in Scripture (2 Sam. 3:8; 9:1, 7), and in 2 Sam. 9:3 there is the expression “to whom I may show the kindness of God,” i.e., “like that of God,” or “for the sake of God.” (2) Of God toward men, as shown in mercies, benefits, and so on (Pss. 31:21; 107:43; 117:1; etc.). Kindness is also the rendering of the Gk. chrēstotēs, “moral goodness,” and so “benignity” (Rom. 2:4; Gal. 5:22; 2 Cor. 6:6; Eph. 2:7; Col. 3:12).

KINDRED, KINSMAN. This is a general heading expressing the variety of family relations that are found in Scripture. The following are commonly found Heb. and Gk. words and their translations dealing with this topic:

marg. margin, marginal reading

1. Family (Heb. mishpāhâ, usually so rendered). This word corresponds to our word clan and is used of the different tribes of Canaanites (Gen. 10:18); a subdivision of the Israelites (Ex. 6:14; Num. 1:20; etc.); figuratively for a nation (Jer. 5:9; 8:3; 25:9; 20:32; Mic. 2:39); and of a specific house (Ruth 2:3; Job 32:2). It is also rendered “relatives” (Gen. 24:41; Josh. 6:23). In all of these it refers to relationship, to consanguinity, more or less remote.

2. Lineage (Heb. môledet). Hence a person born, a child (Gen. 28:9; Lev. 18:9, 11); persons of the same family or lineage, a “relative” (Gen. 12:1; 24:4; 31:3; 43:7; Num. 10:30); also rendered “kindred” (Esther 2:10; 8:6). In some of these instances the relation is only that of common nationality.

3. Acquaintance (Heb. môda:at, rendered “kinsmen,” Ruth 3:2, see marg.). Used to express blood relationship.

4. Near relative (Heb. gô:ēl “near of kin”). This term is applied to one who is so related as to possess the rights and obligations of a kinsman (which see), an avenger (which see). It is generally used to denote the nearest kinsman, able to redeem; “the closest relative” (Ruth 4:1; 3:12).

5. Brother (Heb. āh). This term occurs as “kinsmen” only in 1 Chron. 12:29 (KJV), but occurs frequently elsewhere in a wide sense, including all collateral relationships, whether by consanguinity, affinity, or simple relationship. From this term comes brotherhood. The Hebrews also expressed consanguinity by such words and phrases as flesh (Gen. 37:27; Isa. 58:7); bone and flesh (Gen. 29:14; Judg. 9:2; 2 Sam. 5:1; etc.); “blood relative” (Lev. 18:6; 25:49).

6. In the NT the following Gk. words refer to kindred: genos, the most general and frequent term, our “kin,” i.e., blood relationship; its derivative, suggeneia, “corelationship”; patria, “families” (Acts 3:25), descent in a direct line (Luke 2:4; Eph 3:15), phulē, “offshoot,” a “tribe” (Rev. 5:9; 7:9; 11:9; 13:7; etc.). Of the names denoting special relations, the principal will be found explained under their proper headings Father, Brother, and so on. It will be seen there that the words denoting near relation in the direct line are also used for the superior or inferior degrees in that line, such as grandfather, grandson, and so on. The words expressing collateral consanguinity are uncle, aunt, nephew, niece (not in KJV), cousin. The terms of affinity are father-in-law, mother-in-law, son-in-law, daughter-in-law, brother-in-law, sister-in-law. The domestic and economic questions arising out of kindred may be classed under the headings Family, Marriage, Inheritance, and Blood Revenge. KINE. The KJV term for NASB and NIV “cows.” For a discussion of the figurative use of the term cows, see the entry in the general listing. See also the discussion of the ox in the article Animal Kingdom.

KING (Heb. and Aram. melek, “ruler”; Gk. basileus).

General Use of Term. This term is used with considerable latitude in Scripture and is often applied where some inferior epithet would correspond better with modern ideas. Thus, when we read of the king of Sodom, of Gomorrah, of Admah, of Zeboiim, and of Bela (Gen. 14:2)—all towns lying within a limited distance—it is important that we understand the term king in the sense of a local ruler. This and many similar notices show a prevailing tendency in early times toward monarchical government. Whenever the people of a district settled down and formed themselves into a regular community it was under the presidency of a regal head. Not in Egypt alone, but in Salem, in Gerar, in all the little towns to which the patriarchs came, a king invariably appears on the scene. Thus, in so small a country as Canaan thirty- one kings were conquered by Joshua (Josh. 12:9, 24), while Adonibezek speaks of having subdued seventy (Judg. 1:7).

Hebrew Use of the Term. Among the Israelites the title king was applied to the supreme head of the nation from about 1020–587 B.C.

Occasion. The immediate occasion for the substitution of a regal form of government for that of the judges (which see) seems to have been the siege of Jabesh-gilead by Nahash, king of the Ammonites (1 Sam. 11; 12:12), and his refusal to make a covenant with the inhabitants of that town except on humiliating and cruel conditions (11:2, 4–6). The Israelites seem to have been convinced that they could not succeed against their formidable enemies unless, like other nations, they placed themselves under the rule of a king. Probably another influencing cause was the disgust excited by the corrupt administration of affairs by the sons of Samuel and the desire for a radical change (8:3–6). Accordingly, the original idea of a Hebrew king was twofold: first, that he should lead the people to battle in time of war, and second, that he should execute judgment and justice for them in war and peace (8:20).

Powers. Besides being commander in chief of the army, supreme judge, and absolute master of the lives of his subjects, the king exercised the power of imposing taxes and of exacting personal service and labor from his subjects. The degree to which the exaction of personal labor might be carried on a special occasion is illustrated by King Solomon's requirements for building the Temple. The king of Israel, as the viceregent of Jehovah, also had another claim to respect and obedience (1 Sam 10:1; 16:13) and was, as it were, His son, if just and holy (2 Sam. 7:14; Pss. 89:26–27; 2:6–7). Set apart as a consecrated ruler and anointed with the holy oil (Ex. 30:31; 1 Kings 1:39), he became "the Lord's anointed."

Court. A ruler who had so much authority, both human and divine, was naturally distinguished by outward honors and luxuries. Thus, gradually, he came to have a magnificent court. When the kingdom was at its height he sat on a throne of ivory, covered with pure gold, at the feet of which were two figures of lions. He was dressed in royal robes (1 Kings 22:10; 2 Chron. 18:9); his insignia were a golden crown perhaps with gems (2 Sam. 1:10; 12:30; 2 Kings 11:12; Ps. 21:3) and a royal scepter. He was treated with the utmost consideration; those who approached him bowed to the ground (1 Sam. 24:8). He had a more or less extensive harem, guarded by eunuchs (2 Sam. 20:3; 1 Kings 11:3; etc.).

Succession. The law of succession to the throne is somewhat obscure, but it seems most probable that the king named his successor during his lifetime. This was certainly the case with David (1 Kings 1:30; 2:22) and with Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:21–22). At the same time, if no partiality for a favorite wife or son intervened, there would always be a natural bias of affection in favor of the eldest son.

Officers. These were the recorder, or chronicler, whose duty it was to write the annals of the king's reign; the scribe, or secretary (2 Sam. 8:17; 20:25; 2 Kings 12:10; etc.); the chief steward "in charge of the royal household" (Isa. 22:15; 36:3); the king's friend (1 Kings 4:5) or companion; the keeper of the wardrobe (2 Kings 10:22); the captain of the bodyguard (2 Sam. 20:23); officers over the king's treasure, storehouses, laborers, vineyards, olive trees, sycamore trees, camels, herds, and flocks (1 Chron. 27:25–31); the commander in chief of the army (2 Sam. 11:1; 20:23; 1 Chron. 27:34); the royal counselors (1 Chron. 27:32; Isa. 3:3; 19:11, 13).

Revenue. The following sources are mentioned: the cornfields, vineyards, and olive gardens; the produce of the royal flocks (1 Sam. 21:7; 2 Sam. 13:23; 2 Chron. 26:10; 1 Chron. 27:25–31); a nominal tenth of the produce of grain lands and vineyards and of sheep (1 Sam. 8:15, 17); a tribute from merchants who passed through Hebrew territory (1 Kings 10:14–15); presents made by his subjects (1 Sam. 10:27; 16:20; 1 Kings 10:25; Ps. 72:10). In the time of Solomon the king had trading vessels of his own at sea (1 Kings 10:22). It is probable that Solomon and some other kings may have derived some revenue from commercial ventures (1 Kings 9:28); the spoils of war taken from conquered nations and the tribute paid by them (2 Sam. 8:2, 7–8, 10; 1 Kings 4:21; 2 Chron. 27:5); and last, an undefined power of exacting compulsory labor, to which reference has been already made (1 Sam. 8:12–13, 16).

New Testament Use of Term. Owing to the peculiar political relations of the Jews, the title king has different significations: the Roman emperor (1 Pet. 2:13, 17); and so the “seven kings” (Rev. 17:10) are thought to be the first seven Caesars; Herod Antipas (Matt. 14:1–9; Mark 6:14–27), although he was only tetrarch (cf. Luke 3:19); the ten provincial representatives of the Roman government (Rev. 17:12), as being supreme each in his own jurisdiction.

Figurative. “King” is used symbolically to signify the possessor of supreme power (Prov. 8:15–16); it is applied to God as the sole proper sovereign and ruler of the universe (1 Tim. 1:17); to Christ as the sole head and governor of His church (6:15–16; Matt. 27:11; Luke 19:38; John 1:49; 18:33, 37); to men, as invested with regal authority by others (Luke 22:25; 1 Tim. 2:1–2; etc.). The people of God are called kings and priests (Rev. 1:6, KJV; NASB and NIV, “a kingdom,” Ps. 49:14; Dan. 7:22, 27; Matt. 19:28; Luke 22:29–30; 1 Cor. 6:2–3; etc.); death, the “king of terrors” (Job 18:14); the Leviathan (which see), “king over all the sons of pride” (41:34). See History, Old Testament; Israel, Kingdom of.

KINGDOM OF GOD, KINGDOM OF HEAVEN. The “kingdom of God” is evidently a more comprehensive term than the “kingdom of heaven” and embraces all created intelligences, both in heaven and on earth, who are willingly subject to God and thus in fellowship with Him. The “kingdom of heaven”—more precisely the “kingdom of the heavens”—is a term descriptive of any type of rulership God may assert on the earth at a given period. As a predicted kingdom it has reference to the establishment of the kingdom of Israel on the earth (Acts 1:6) and is the subject of extended glowing prophecies in the OT (cf. Pss. 2:6; 72:1; Isa. 11:1; 32:1; 65:17; Jer. 33:15; Dan. 7:13–14; Mic. 4:1; Zech. 9:10; 12:1; 14:9). As a covenanted kingdom the kingdom of heaven becomes the national hope of Israel (2 Sam. 7:4–17). John the Baptist, Christ, and the apostles announced that the kingdom of national Israel was “at hand.” That offer was rejected. As a result the “kingdom of heaven” in its earthly manifested form was postponed until Christ’s second advent. Widespread attempts to “bring in the kingdom” on the basis of Christ’s first advent are misplaced. According to the clear teaching of the Bible it will be realized only in connection with the second advent. The testimony of Scripture agrees completely with this fact. According to Matt. 13 the present gospel age represents the mystery form of the kingdom. “Since the kingdom of heaven is no other than the rule of God on the earth, He must now be ruling to the extent of full realization of those things which are termed ‘the mysteries’ in the NT and which really constitute the new message of the NT” (Lewis Sperry Chafer, Systematic Theology, 7:224). The “kingdom of the heavens,” that is, the manifested rule of God on the earth in the mediatorial Davidic kingdom, will not be realized until the future millennial period. The kingdom of God and the kingdom of heaven, as Chafer points out, are not identical despite the fact that “Matthew employs the terminology of the kingdom of heaven” and Mark and Luke, when presenting practically the same teaching, employ the phrase “kingdom of God.” According to Scripture the “sons of the kingdom shall be cast out” (Matt. 8:12; 24:50–51; 25:28–30). This fate cannot be applied to the kingdom of God and its members (John 3:18). The parable of the wheat and the tares (Matt. 13:24–30, 36–43) and the parable of the good and bad fish (13:47–50) are only spoken of in connection with the kingdom of heaven. The parable of the leaven, however (13:33; Luke 13:20–21), is applied to both kingdoms. “Leaven represents evil doctrine rather than evil persons, and evil doctrine may and does corrupt both kingdoms” (op. cit., pp. 224–25). M.F.U.

KINGS, 1 AND 2, BOOKS OF. These books are named from the opening word of 1 Kings in the Hebrew text, wāhammelek, meaning “and the king,” and from the fact that this section of Scripture deals with the kings of Israel and Judah in their historical setting, in one case to the fall of Samaria (722–721 B.C.) and in the other case to the Babylonian captivity. In the LXX and the Vulg. it is recorded as 3 and 4 Kings. In modern Hebrew Bibles it appears as 1 and 2 Kings after 1 and 2 Samuel. The book was originally single-volumed like Samuel.

Scope. As a historical narrative the books of Kings carry on the recital of the history of Israel where 1 and 2 Samuel leave off, just prior to the death of David. The historical narrative is carried forward to the fall of Samaria in the case of the Northern Kingdom and until the thirty-seventh year of King Jehoiachin’s captivity in Babylon. The time span is c. 972–560 B.C.

Chronology. The task of harmonizing the synchronous reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel has been a difficult problem, exercising the ingenuity of scholars for many years. More recent chronologists include F. X. Kugler, Von Moses bis Paulus, 1922; J. Begrich, Die Chronologie der Koenige von Israel und Judah, 1929; S. Mowinckel, Die Chronologie der israelitischen und juedischen Koenige, 1932; M. Vogelstein, Biblical Chronology, Part 1, 1944. Numerous factors complicate the chronology of the monarchic period such as coregencies, ancient calendar reckonings, synchronisms, and so on. Edwin R. Thiele’s The Mysterious Number of the Hebrew Kings (1951) is enlightening. W. F. Albright has also made valuable contributions to the chronological study of this period in his article “The Chronology of the Divided Monarchy,” in Bulletin of the American Schools 100:16–22. Albright observes coregencies and synchronisms but reduces the reigns of Judahite kings as well as the number of Israelite kings, especially in the case of the Omrides. These and other studies have somewhat reduced vexing problems, yet few of the dates of this period are absolutely fixed, although in most cases are perhaps not more than five years wrong.

Authorship. The Talmud (Baba Bathra, 14b) names Jeremiah as the author of these books. J. E. Steinmueller (A Companion to Scripture Studies, 2: 98f.) espouses this view. He maintains that the Jeremian authorship does not rule out the composition of the book at Babylon, since tradition holds that Nebuchadnezzar carried Jeremiah to Babylon after the former had conquered Egypt in his thirty-seventh year (568 B.C.). In Babylon Jeremiah died as an aged man past ninety. Under this view Jeremiah wrote 2 Kings 25:27–30 in Babylon, although the remainder of the book may have been compiled long before that time.

Sources. The writer, whether he was Jeremiah or not, was in all probability a contemporary of Jeremiah and also a prophet who was deeply distressed at the spiritual declension of Judah. The author makes free mention of sources that he evidently used extensively. He refers to the book of the acts of Solomon (1 Kings 11:41). The book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel is mentioned seventeen times. The book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah is referred to fifteen times.

Critical View. Higher critics commonly place the original edition of the book of Kings shortly after the death of Josiah, somewhere between 609 and 600 B.C. The claim is made that the writer was the first to use historical materials derived from the recently discovered book of Deuteronomy, which initially is alleged to have appeared in 621 B.C. The book is supposed to be a religious and not a historical work. Critics call it a Deuteronomistic history (cf. Pfeiffer, Introduction, p. 380). The unique law of the central sanctuary appearing in Deut. 12 is supposed to be the guiding principle for evaluating each king. Thus, authentic history is ruled out. It is also maintained that in c. 550 B.C., during the exilic period, a second Deuteronomist added the history to the liberation of King Jehoiachin (2 Kings 25:27–30) and made various additions to the book. Wellhausen critics assume as well that this Deuteronomist also redid the Pentateuchal books, except Leviticus, together with Joshua, Judges, and Samuel. Supposedly a few additions were finally made by a priestly writer until the time it was canonized (c. 200 B.C.).

Repudiation of the Critical Position. This critical view must be rejected because it is unsound and of one piece with the partitioning of the Pentateuch. The same erroneous philosophical, historical, and literary suppositions underlie the notion of a Deuteronomistic work of history as underlie the unsound partitioning of the Pentateuch. The objectionable theory is that the book discovered in the eighteenth year of Josiah's reign (2 Kings 22:3–8) was Deuteronomy and that alone, and that this book was composed shortly before its discovery and passed off as the law of Moses. It is a far sounder view to accept early Pentateuchal evidences of the existence of Deuteronomy rather than to invent this artificial theory and to reject all such inferences as later glosses or redactional additions. Moreover, the critical theory must be rejected because the Deuteronomic stamp is no less original with other OT books than it is with the book of Kings. It is pure supposition to view Joshua, Judges, and Samuel as originally written without the background of the Deuteronomic laws. It must not be denied, however, that the author of Kings had a pragmatic and religious motive. He was not supplanting existing histories but writing a religious history. This history is not to be accounted as distorted or arbitrary simply because it deals with the rulers of the theocratic kingdoms on the basis of their loyalty to the Word of God.

KINSMAN (Heb. gô'el, "redeemer"). This Heb. term for kinsman is used to imply certain obligations arising out of that relationship, and has for its primary meaning "coming to the help or rescue" of one. The gô'el among the Hebrews was the nearest living male blood relative ("close relative," Ruth 3:12; 4:1), and on him devolved certain duties to his next of kin.

Blood Avenger. The most striking office of the kinsman gô'el was that of blood avenger (see Blood, Avenger of). Although the word is peculiar to the Heb. language, the institution that it represents is common to several branches of the Semites. The unit of Semitic society is the clan, a body of persons united to one another by blood, a family on a somewhat enlarged scale. The members of the clan, closely bound by blood ties to one another, feel a mutual responsibility for one another. A wrong done to a single member is a crime against the entire clan. The obligation, therefore, rests upon the clan to punish the wrongdoer. In the case of murder it is a positive obligation to seek not vengeance but avengement. The blood of the murdered person cries up from the ground, and the cry is heard loudest by that member of the clan who stands nearest to the dead. The crime consists in the spilling of the blood—its waste—rather than in the extinction of life. The son is enjoined to avenge the blood of his father; the brother is obliged to punish a crime committed against his sister. “Lynch law” is the most primitive form of justice; and gô·ēl is the “avenger,” legitimately constituted as such and recognized by the verdict of ancient Semitic society. If the killing was accidental the gô·ēl had no claim, unless the slayer left the city of refuge before the death of the high priest in whose reign the crime was committed. See Cities of Refuge.

Redeemer. It was the duty of a kinsman (i.e., “redeemer”) to redeem the paternal estate that his nearest relative might have sold through poverty (Lev. 25:25; Ruth 4:4), to ransom his kinsman who may have sold himself (Lev. 25:47–49), and to act as go-between in case a person wished to make restitution to a relative. If there was no kinsman then the compensation went to the priest as representing Jehovah, the king of Israel (Num. 5:6–8).

From Ruth (chaps. 3–4) it has been inferred that among the duties of kinsman gô·ēl was that of marrying the widow of a deceased kinsman. But the Levirate law expressly limits the obligation to a brother. The nearest kinsman had the right to redeem the land, which, perhaps, involved marrying the widow of the deceased owner, according to usage. See Marriage, Levirate; Redeemer.

KI'OS. See Chios.

KIR (kir; “wall”). The place to which Tiglath-pileser led captive the people of Damascus (2 Kings 16:9), according to the prophecy of Amos (1:3–5), and from which at some time the Aramaeans emigrated to Syria (9:7). Delitzsch (Com., on Isa. 22:6) identifies the Kir in this passage with that mentioned in Kings and Amos. It seems to have been situated on the river Kur (Kuros), which takes its rise in Armenia.

KIR OF MOAB (kir of Mō'ab). One of the two strongly fortified cities of Moab (Isa. 15:1), the other being Ar. It is probably the same as Kir-hareseth (which see).

KIR-HAR'ESETH (kir-har'e-seth; “city of pottery,” some read “new city,” 2 Kings 3:25; Isa. 16:7, 11; “Kir-heres,” Jer. 48:31, 36; and “Kir of Moab,” Isa. 15:1). A strongly fortified city of Moab, which is now known as Kerak and lies about fifty miles from Jerusalem. Joram, king of Israel, took the city and destroyed all but its walls (2 Kings 3:25). King Mesha endeavored to fight his way through the besiegers with 700 men, but when this attempt failed, in desperation he took his firstborn son, who was to succeed him as king, and offered him as a sacrifice upon the wall. From the other passage cited it would appear to have been restored before Isaiah's time and ravaged by the Babylonians.

KIR'IATH (kir'yath; “city”). A city belonging to Benjamin (Josh. 18:28; “Kirjath,” KJV). By some it is identified with Kiriath-jearim, but this is disputed.

KIRIATHA'IM (kir'yath-tha'im; “double city”; sometimes “Kirjathaim,” KJV).

1. A city of refuge in Naphtali (1 Chron. 6:76); elsewhere (Josh. 21:32) called Kartan (which see).

2. An ancient town E of Jordan, from which the gigantic Emim (which see) were expelled by the Moabites (Gen. 14:5, “Shaveh-kiriathaim,” cf. Deut. 2:9–10). It was next held by the Amorites, from whom it was taken by the Israelites and assigned to Reuben (Num. 32:37; Josh. 13:19). During the Babylonian Exile the Moabites again took possession of this and other towns (Jer. 48:1; Ezek. 25:9). See Moabite Stone, line 10. Harper and others identified Kiriathaim with the ruins of El Kūreiyât, about six miles NW of Dibon.

KIR'ATH-AR'BA (kir'yath-ar'ba; “city of Arbah”; ìKir'jath-arba,” KJV). A city in the mountains of Judah, named after Arba the Anakite (Gen. 23:2; Josh. 14:15; 15:54; 20:7; Judg. 1:10; Neh. 11:25), but better known as Hebron (which see).

KIR'ATH-A'RIM (Ezra 2:25; “Kirjath-arim,” KJV). See Kiriath-jearim.

KIR'ATH-BA'AL (kir'yath-ba'al; “city of Baal”), another name (Josh. 15:60; 18:14) for Kiriath-jearim (which see). Rendered “Kir'jath-ba'al,” KJV.

KIR'ATH-HU'ZOTH (kir'yath-hu'zōth; “city of streets”; ìKir'jath-hu'zoth,” KJV). A city of Moab to which Balak took Balaam to offer up sacrifice (Num. 22:39). Balak undoubtedly expected through these offerings to propitiate Jehovah and secure His favor to the Moabites.

KIR'ATH-JE'ARIM (kir'yath-je'a-rim; “city of forests”; “Kirjath-jearim,” KJV), or Kiriath-arim (kîr'iăth-ā'rîm; contracted form, Ezra 2:25; “Kirjath-arim,” KJV). A Gibeonite town (Josh. 9:17), first assigned to Judah (15:60) but afterward to Benjamin (18:28). It was called Baalah (15:9) and Kiriath-baal (v. 60). Modern Deir al 'Azar, it was located about eight miles N of Jerusalem and just W of Abu Ghosh. Kiriath-jearim lay on the western border of Benjamin; once the Ark was set there, it was off the debatable plain of the Shephelah and within Israel's proper territory. Here the Ark rested until David brought it to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:2–3, marg., 12; 1 Chron. 15; cf. Ps. 132).

KIR'ATH-SAN'NAH (kir'yath-sa'na; “Kirjath-sannah,” KJV); called also Kiriath-sepher (kir'yath-sef'er) or “city of books,” and later, Debir (which see, no. 2; Josh. 15:15–16, 49). This southern Judah city of the hill country has been identified with Tell Beit Mirsim, some thirteen miles WSW of Hebron. Melvin Grove Kyle and W. F. Albright excavated the site from 1926 to 1932. The results were most satisfactory, revealing clear strata with occupation from c. 2200 B.C. to 586 B.C., when Nebuchadnezzar destroyed it for the last time. At this place masonry of the Canaanites, Egyptians, Hyksos, and Hebrews can be seen. This site has greatly increased knowledge of Hebrew craftsmanship, particularly pottery making, building, and dyeing. Here a jar handle was recovered marked “Belonging to Eliakim, steward of Yaukin” (Jehoachin). Othniel took Debir (Kiriath-sepher) and received Caleb's daughter Achsah as a reward (15:7, 15–16). The city was given over to the descendants of the priesthood (21:15). M.F.U.

KISH (kish).

1. The father of King Saul (1 Sam. 9:3; 10:11, 21; 14:51; 1 Chron. 9:39; 12:1; 26:28). He was a wealthy Benjamite, the son of Ner (8:33; 9:39) and grandson of Abiel the "son" of Zeror (1 Sam. 9:1), being used in the general sense of male descendant. No incident respecting him is mentioned with the exception of his sending Saul after the lost donkeys (9:3) and that he was buried in Zela (2 Sam. 21:14), about c. 1025 B.C. He is mentioned in Acts 13:21.

2. The third son of Jeiel (of Gibeon) and Maacah, a Benjamite of Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:29–30; 9:35–36).

3. The second son of Mahli (grandson of Levi). His sons married their cousins, the daughters of his brother Eleazar (1 Chron. 23:21–22; 24:29), probably before 1440 B.C.

4. Another Levite, also of the family of Merari. He was the son of Abdi and assisted Hezekiah in cleansing the Temple (2 Chron. 29:12), 719 B.C.

5. A Benjamite, and great-grandfather of Mordecai (Esther 2:5), considerably before 478 B.C.

6. An ancient lower Mesopotamian city eight miles E of Babylon. Excavated palaces, temples, canals, and ziggurats (temple towers) give much information on Babylonian life before Abram's residence at Ur. Sargon I (c. 2380 B.C.) was a native of Kish. Hammurabi (c. 1700 B.C.) adorned the city.

KISH'I (kish'i; 1 Chron. 6:44). See Kushaiah.

KISH'ION (kis'yon; "hard ground"). A city of Issachar (Josh. 19:20) assigned to the Levites of the family of Gershon and as a city of refuge (21:28; "Kishon," KJV). It is erroneously transcribed Kedesh (1 Chron. 6:72).

KI'SHON (ki'shon; "ending, winding"; and "Kison," Ps. 83:9, KJV). Also known as the "waters of Megiddo" (Judg. 5:19), a torrent or winter stream in central Palestine (cf. Ps. 83:9). It rises in the hills about Tabor and Gilboa and, running in a NE direction through the plains of Esdraelon and Acre, empties into the Mediterranean Sea at the foot of Mt. Carmel. The two channels of the stream unite a few miles N of Megiddo. The channel of the united stream is deep and miry here, the ground for some distance on each side is low and marshy; the fords during winter are difficult, and often, after heavy rain, impassable. Yet in summer the whole plain and riverbed are dry and hard. Indeed, during the greater part of the year the stream is confined to a few miles next to the sea. The modern name is Nahr el Mukatta', i.e., "the river of slaughter" (cf. 1 Kings 18:40). In the song of Deborah (Judg. 5:21) it is spoken of as "the ancient torrent."

It was a little to the S of Kishon, namely, at Megiddo, that Sisera (which see) was defeated. While the battle raged, a violent storm of wind and rain came (5:20–21), and the plain became a marsh and the dry riverbed a foaming torrent. This, of course, greatly interfered with the fighting of Sisera's cavalry and charioteers. Kishon was also the scene of the destruction of the prophets of Baal. Their slaughter doubtless took place near the foot of Carmel.

KISS. Kissing the lips by way of affectionate salutation was customary among near relatives of both sexes, both in patriarchal and in later times (Gen. 29:11; Song of Sol. 8:1). Between individuals of the same sex, and in a limited degree between those of different sexes, the kiss on the cheek as a mark of respect or an act of salutation has at all times been customary in the East. In the Christian church the “holy kiss” or “kiss of love” was practiced not only as a friendly salutation but as an act symbolical of love and Christian brotherhood (Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thess. 5:26; 1 Pet. 5:14). It was embodied in the earlier Christian offices and has been continued in some of those now in use. Among the Arabs the women and children kiss the beards of their husbands or fathers. The husband or father returns the salute by a kiss on the forehead. In Egypt an inferior kisses the hand of a superior, generally on the back, but sometimes, as a special favor, on the palm also. To testify abject submission, and in asking favors, the feet are often kissed instead of the hand. The written decrees of a sovereign are kissed in token of respect; even the ground is sometimes kissed by orientals in the fullness of their submission (Gen. 41:40, see marg.; 1 Sam. 24:8; Ps. 72:9; etc.). Kissing is spoken of in Scripture as a mark of respect or adoration given to idols (1 Kings 19:18; Hos. 13:2; Smith, Bib. Dict., “Kiss”).

KITE. See Animal Kingdom.

KITH'LISH. See Chitlish.

KIT'LISH. See Chitlish.

KIT'RON (kit'ron; “figurative, knotty”). A city in Zebulun, from which the Israelites did not expel the Canaanites (Judg. 1:30), probably the same as Kattath (which see). A. Alt locates it at Tell el-Far about 7½ miles SE of Haifa.

KIT'TIM, CHIT'TIM (kit'im). A general name (such as our Levant) applied to the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean in a loose way without fixing the particular part, though particular and different parts of the whole are probably in most cases to be understood. According to Josephus (Ant. 1.6.1) it is an ancestral name. “Chethimus possessed the island Chethima; it is now called Cyprus.” By the Greeks the name was retained for the city Citium, a Phoenician colony of unknown antiquity on the southern coast, while “by the Hebrews all islands and most of the seacoasts are called Chethim.” Modern scholars hold that the name was extended first from Citium to all Cyprus and afterward to the coasts and islands, especially of Greece, though sometimes it was carried as far as Italy. In Maccabees, Chittim is Macedonia. The Vulg. in Numbers and the Vulg. and the Aram. Targum in 1 Chron. 1:7 have “Italy,” and in Ezek. 27:6 the Targum has “Apulia.”

Among the Phoenicians Kitti meant Cyprians. Among the Hebrews we may say that the writers who showed most interest in and acquaintance with the maritime operations of Tyre, as Isaiah (see chap. 23), Jeremiah (25:22; 47:4), and Ezekiel (chaps. 26–28), used almost entirely the longer and more accurate form Kittiyîm, as Isa. 23:1, kethibh (but in 23:12 it is kittim); Jer. 2:10; whereas authors more remote in space or time have the shorter form Kittim (Gen. 10:4; Num. 24:24; 1 Chron. 1:7; Dan. 11:30).

The name Chittim, being once given to these regions, might continue as a geographical term without regard to changes in population; but the association of Kittim in Gen. 10:4 with Javan and Elishah points to Greeks and Carians rather than to Phoenicians. If in Gen. 10:4 we read Rodanim (as in 1 Chron. 1:7) instead of Dodanim, we may with plausibility liken Javan, Elishah, Kittim, and Rodanim to Ionia, Elis, Citium, and Rhodes.

Cyprus was visited by Sargon I, about 2380 B.C. It paid tribute to Thutmose III in the fifteenth century B.C.; seven of its kings sent ambassadors to Sargon II, 709 B.C., who erected a monolith at Citium; ten of its kings sent envoys to Esar-haddon at the close of the war against Abdimiljuti and Sanduarri, 676 B.C. See Cyprus.

KIY'YUN (ki'un). A word occurring in the Bible only in Amos 5:26. It is generally revocalized Kaiwan or Kewan, i.e., Saturn (Ninib). Apparently the Masoretes gave the vocalization of Shiqquṣ ("a detestable thing," whence Kiyyun). KJV uses the word Chiun; RSV translates "Kaiwan your star god." The NIV renders "the pedestal of your idols" for "Kaiwan your idols" (see marg.). Stephen quotes "the star of the god Rompha" (Acts 7:43), the Kiyyun of Amos being read by the LXX translators Rephan, evidently the Egyptian name for Saturn. See Gods, False. M.F.U.

KNEAD. The preparation of dough by working it into a mass with the hands; a task usually performed by women (Gen. 18:6; 1 Sam. 28:24; 2 Sam. 13:8; etc.) but sometimes by men (cf. Hos. 7:4).

KNEADING BOWL. The vessel in which the dough was mixed and leavened and then left to rise (Ex. 8:3; 12:34; and Deut. 28:5, 17, where the KJV has "store"). For this purpose the Arabs use a piece of leather that can be drawn up into a bag by running a cord along the border, in which they often prepare and carry their dough. It is not probable that the bowls used by the Hebrews in the references above were like these, as they were not a nomadic people. See Bread.

KNEE. The expression "knelt" or "kneeling on his knees," "falling on his knees," has for its primary notion that of breaking down, and then to invoking God, to bless (2 Chron. 6:13; Ps. 95:6; Dan. 6:10; Matt. 17:14). To kneel signifies also to give or receive a blessing, because the person blessed kneels. In this sense it refers to: (1) the benediction of dying parents (Gen. 27:4, 7, 10, 19); (2) of the priest to the people (Lev. 9:22, 23); (3) of a prophet (Num. 24:1; Deut. 33:1). It also signifies "to salute," which is connected with blessing (2 Kings 4:29).

The expression "and he made the camels kneel down" (Gen. 24:11) means that they were to rest.

To "bow" the knee is to perform an act of worship (1 Kings 19:18; Isa. 66:3, where the rendering is "blesses an idol").

Kneeling in prayer was a practice of great antiquity, and references are made to it in both the OT and NT (2 Chron. 6:13; Ps. 95:6; Dan. 6:10; Luke 22:41; Acts 7:60; 9:40; 21:5; Eph. 3:14).

Figurative. Knees are used symbolically for persons (Job 4:4; Heb. 12:12).

KNIFE (Heb. ma'akelet, šakkin, ta'ar). The knives of the Egyptians, and of other nations in early times, were probably only of hard stone, and the use of the flint or stone knife was sometimes retained for sacred purposes after the introduction of iron and steel. Herodotus (2.86) mentions knives both of iron and of stone used in different stages of the same process of embalming. The same may perhaps be said to some extent of the Hebrews.

Lachish yielded an inscribed Hyksos knife. Hittite daggers have been recovered at Bethshan from about 1470 B.C. Till the time of Saul and David iron and "steel" knives with ivory handles were rare, being monopolized by the iron-smelting Philistines.

In their meals the Jews, like other orientals, made little use of knives, but they were required both for slaughtering animals either for food or sacrifice, as well as for cutting up the carcasses (cf. Lev. 7:2; 8:15, 20, 25; 9:8–15; 1 Sam. 9:24; etc.). Smaller knives were in use for paring fruit and for sharpening pens (Jer. 36:23). The razor was often used for Naziritic purposes, for which a special chamber was reserved in the Temple (Num. 6:5, 9, 19; Ezek. 5:1; etc.). The pruning “hooks” of Isa. 18:5 (KJV) were probably curved knives. The lances of the priests of Baal were pointed knives (1 Kings 18:28), and the suffering caused by cutting themselves with these knives was supposed to secure from Baal a favorable hearing. The knives that, with other articles of Temple furniture, were brought back from Babylon were doubtless used for killing and dissecting the sacred offerings (Ezra 1:9, see marg.).

KNOCK (Heb. dāpaq; Gk. krouō, Song of Sol. 5:2; Judg. 19:22, “pounding”; Matt. 7:7; Rev. 3:20; etc.). “Though [some Eastern people] are very jealous of their privacy, yet they never knock when about to enter your room, but walk in without warning or ceremony. It is nearly impossible to teach [some] servants to knock at your door. They give warning at the outer gate, or entrance, either by calling or knocking. To stand and call is a very common and respectful mode; and thus it was in Bible times, and to it there are many very interesting allusions. Moses commanded the holder of a pledge to stand without, and call to the owner thereof to come forth (Deut. 24:10–11). This was to avoid the insolent intrusion of cruel creditors. Peter stood knocking at the outer gate door (Acts 12:13–16), and so did the three men sent to Joppa by Cornelius (10:17–18). The idea is that the guard over your privacy is to be placed at the entrance to your premises” (Thomson, Land and Book, 1:191). The expression “Ask ... seek ... knock” (Matt. 7:7; Luke 11:9) depicts the fervor of an earnest prayer.

KNOPS. An archaic translation of two Heb. words, one denoting the spheroidal decorations of the seven-branched candlestick in the Tabernacle (Heb. kaptōr; Ex. 25:31–36; NASB, “bulbs,” NIV, “buds”) and one denoting the ornamentation of the Temple (Heb. pqā'âm; 1 Kings 6:18; NASB and NIV, “gourds”) and of laver in it (1 Kings 7:24; NASB and NIV, “gourds”). See Bulbs; Laver; Sea, Bronze; Tabernacle of Israel.

KNOWLEDGE. The expression “to know” sometimes means to approve of and take delight in (Ps. 1:6; Rom. 8:29); to cherish (John 10:27); to experience (Eph. 3:19). In Job 7:10 it is used of an inanimate object: “He will not return again to his house, nor will his place know him anymore.” By a euphemism “to know” frequently denotes sexual intercourse (Gen. 4:1, KJV).

Knowledge may be partial (1 Cor. 13:9). It implies discovery, detection; as “through the Law comes the knowledge of sin” (Rom. 3:20). Knowledge is spoken of as an emblematical person, and as the gift of God (Prov. 1:29; 8:10; etc.). Knowledge may be perverted and thus become the medium of evil (Isa. 47:10; Rom. 1:28; 1 Cor. 8:1). Respecting divine knowledge, see Omniscience.

KO´A (kō´ā). This word occurs only in Ezek. 23:23 in the prophetic announcement of punishment to the Jewish people from the various nations whose idolatries they had adopted: “The Babylonians and all the Chaldeans, Pekod and Shoa and Koa, and all the Assyrians with them.” The Koa are evidently to be equated with Kutu (Ku), located E of the Tigris and S of the lower Zab.

KO´HATH (kō´hath). The second son of Levi (Gen. 46:11), and the father of Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel (Num. 3:19). Of his personal history we know only that he went down to Egypt with Levi and Jacob (Gen. 46:11), that his sister was Jochebed (Ex. 6:20), and that he lived to the age of 133 (6:18), about 1871 B.C. His descendants, the Kohathites (which see), formed one of the three great divisions of the Levites and contained the priestly family descended from Aaron (6:18–20). In the service of the Tabernacle their duty was to bear the Ark and the holy objects (Num. 4:15; 7:9). The inheritance of the Kohathites who were not priests lay in the half tribe of Manasseh in Ephraim (1 Chron. 6:61–70) and in Dan (Josh. 21:5, 20–26).

KO'HATHITES (kō'ha-thīts). The descendants of Kohath, the second of the three sons of Levi (Gershon, Kohath, Merari), from whom the three principal divisions of the Levites derived their name (Gen. 46:11; Num. 3:27; 2 Chron. 34:12; etc.). See Levites: Classification.

KOLA'IAH (ko-lī'ya; “voice of Jehovah”).

1. A Benjamite and remote ancestor of Sallu, which latter dwelt in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:7), long before 445 B.C.

2. The father of Ahab, which latter was a false prophet denounced by Jeremiah (Jer. 29:21), about 626 B.C.

KO'RAH (kō'ra).

1. The third son of Esau by his Canaanite wife Oholibamah (Gen. 36:5, 14, 18; 1 Chron. 1:35), about 1950 B.C. He was born in Canaan before Esau migrated to Mt. Seir (Gen. 36:5–9), and became the chief of an Edomite tribe (36:18). “Korah, in Gen. 36:16 has probably been copied by mistake from v. 18” (K. & D., Com., ad loc.).

2. The Levite who conspired with Dathan and Abiram against Moses. Korah was the son of Izhar, the brother of Amram, the father of Moses and Aaron, making him cousin to these leaders of Israel (Ex. 6:21; Num. 16:1–49). About all that we know of Korah is in connection with the conspiracy of which he was one of the leaders.

Korah was probably influenced by jealousy because the high honors and privileges of the priesthood had been exclusively appropriated by the family of Aaron. Moses having supreme authority in civil affairs, the whole power over the nation would seem to have been taken by him and Aaron. The particular grievance that rankled in the minds of Korah and his company was their exclusion from the office of priesthood and their being confined—those among them who were Levites—to the inferior service of the Tabernacle.

Having joined to himself Dathan and Abiram and 250 “leaders of the congregation,” Korah appeared with them before Moses and Aaron and charged them with usurpation of privileges and offices rightfully belonging to others. Moses no sooner heard this charge than he “fell on his face,” as if to refer the matter to the Lord (cf. Num. 14:5) and declared that the decision should be left to Jehovah. He told them to appear the next day with censers and incense.

The next day the rebels presented themselves before the Tabernacle, along with Moses and Aaron, and the whole congregation gathered at the instigation of Korah. The Lord appeared, and a voice commanded Moses and Aaron to separate themselves from the congregation, that they might not share in its destruction for making common cause with the conspirators. The two leaders prayed that the people might be spared and that Jehovah would confine His wrath to the leaders of the rebellion. The congregation, instructed by Moses, withdrew, and after Moses had appealed to what was about to happen as a proof of the authority by which he had acted, the earth opened and then closed over the fallen tents of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. The other 250 rebels, who were probably in front of the Tabernacle, were then consumed by fire “from the Lord,” about 1430 B.C. The incense burners of the rebels were made into plates to form an outer covering to the altar, a warning of the just judgment of God (vv. 38–40). The next morning the whole congregation murmured against Moses and Aaron and charged them with having slain the people of Jehovah. Notwithstanding the prayers of Moses and his brother, they could not avert the bursting forth of wrathful judgment. A plague destroyed 14,700 (vv. 41–50), and the high priesthood of Aaron was confirmed (chap. 17). As the descendants of Korah afterward became eminent in the Levitical service, it is clear that his sons were spared. They were probably living in separate tents or had separated themselves from the conspirators at the command of Moses. He is referred to in Num. 26:9–11; 1 Chron. 6:22, 37. In Jude 11 Korah is coupled with Cain and Balaam, and is held up as a warning to presumptuous and self-seeking teachers.

3. Son of Hebron. The eldest of the four sons of Hebron, of the family of Caleb and tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:43), considerably after 1380 B.C.

KO'RAHITE (kō'ra-hīt; Ex. 6:24; Num. 26:58; 1 Chron. 9:19, 31; the KJV sometimes renders “Korhites,” or “Korathites”). That portion of the Kohathite Levites who were descended from Korah (which see). See Levites: Classification.

KOR'AZIN. See Chorazin.

KO'RE (kō're; “crier” or “partridge”).

1. A Levite, the son of Ebiasaph, and father of Shallum, who was one of the “keepers of the thresholds of the tent” (1 Chron. 9:19). In 26:1 Kore is named as the father of Meshelemiah (or Shelemiah), a Temple gatekeeper, 960 B.C.

2. Son of Imnah, a Levitical keeper of the eastern gate, appointed by Hezekiah to receive the freewill offerings and distribute them to the priests (2 Chron. 31:14), 719 B.C.

3. Mistaken translation in 1 Chron. 26:19, KJV. Should read “Korah.”

KOUM. See Kum.

KOZ (koz; “thorn”). In the NASB and NIV, the father of Anub and others of the posterity of Judah (1 Chron. 4:8; “Coz,” KJV); where, however, his own parentage is not stated, unless he is a son or brother of Ashhur (v. 5).

The term appears in the KJV in Ezra (2:61) and Nehemiah (3:4,21; 7:63); in those verses it is replaced in the NASB and NIV by Hakkoz (which see).

KU'E. (kū'e). A place from which Solomon imported horses (1 Kings 10:28; 2 Chron. 1:16), usually identified with Cilicia (see NIV, marg.).

KUM (kūm; Gk. from Aram. qûmî; “cumi,” KJV). “Arise” (Mark 5:41).

KUSHA'IAH (ku-shā'ya). A Merarite Levite whose son Ethan was appointed a chief assistant of Heman in the Temple music by David (1 Chron. 15:17), 975 B.C. In 1 Chron. 6:44 he is called Kishi.

L

LA'ADAH (la'a-da; meaning uncertain). The second son of Shelah (son of Judah) and "father" (founder) of Mareshah (1 Chron. 4:21).

LAADAN. See Ladan.

LA'BAN (lā'ban; "white").

1. The son of Bethuel (Gen. 28:5), grandson of Nahor, Abraham's kinsman, and brother of Rebekah (Gen. 24:15, 29); an Aramean herd owner of Mesopotamia. He united with his father, according to the usual custom, in consenting to the marriage of Rebekah to Isaac (24:29–33, 50–59), about 1920 B.C. When their son Jacob became of marriageable age his parents directed him to take a wife from the daughters of Laban, and Jacob complied (28:2, 5). Laban arranged with his nephew to give him Rachel on condition of seven years' service, but on the wedding night led Leah, his eldest daughter, into the bridechamber. When Jacob complained to him Laban made the weak excuse, "It is not the practice in our place, to marry off the younger before the first-born." But, to satisfy Jacob, he promised to give him Rachel in a week if he would serve him seven years longer. To this Jacob consented, and eight days later he was wedded to the woman he loved (29:15–30). At the end of the second period of seven years Jacob desired to return to Canaan, but Laban persuaded him to remain, making a contract with him to keep his flocks. By a cunning artifice Jacob made this bargain result greatly to his own advantage (30:25–43) and at the end of six years left stealthily for his former home (31:1–21). Three days later, Laban, hearing of Jacob's flight, started in pursuit and overtook him on the seventh day at Mt. Gilead. The night before Laban was warned by God in a dream not to speak to Jacob "either good or bad," that is, not to threaten or persuade him to return. Laban confined himself to bitter reproaches. He told Jacob that he had power to do him harm if God had not forbidden him and accused him of stealing his household gods. Finally a covenant of peace was established and was celebrated with a feast, and the next morning Laban departed to his own place (31:22–55).

2. A place in the desert, on the route of the Israelites (Deut. 1:1), probably identical with Libnah (Num. 33:20).

LABOR. This English term is the rendering of a large number of Hebrew and Greek terms. The teaching of Scripture (Gen. 2:15) is that man, even in his state of innocence, was to lead a life of activity, which was different, however, from the trouble and restlessness of the weary toil into which he was plunged by sin. Exercise of some kind was essential to his well-being (cf. Eccles. 5:12). In consequence of the Fall, the earth no longer yielded spontaneously the fruits requisite for man's maintenance, but he was obliged to secure the necessities of life by labor and strenuous exertion (Gen. 3:19).

"Work, as distinguished from labor, is not so much a term denoting a lighter kind of labor as a general and comprehensive term applied to the performance of any task, whether easy or severe. Ābōdâ is the execution of a definite daily task, whether in field labor (Ps. 104:23) and mechanical employment (Ex. 39:32) on the one hand, or priestly service and the duties connected with the worship on the other (12:25–26; Lev. 23:7–8), i.e., such occupations as came under the denomination of labor, business, or industrial employment” (K. & D., Com., on Ex. 20:8).

That labor was held in high respect we gather from such expressions as, “Do you see a man skilled in his work? He will stand before kings” (Prov. 22:29; cf. 10:4; 12:24, 27). When Nebuchadnezzar carried the Jews away into captivity he found among them a 1,000 craftsmen and smiths (2 Kings 24:14–16; Jer. 29:2).

The ancient rabbis regarded manual labor as honorable and urged it upon all as a duty. In the Talmud we find such sayings as the following: “He who does not teach his son a craft is, as it were, bringing him up to robbery”; “Labor is greater to be prized, for it elevates the laborer, and maintains him.”

The following values of labor are given by F. R. Conder (Bib. Ed., 3: 223ff.): “The denarius, which was the Roman equivalent for a quarter shekel, was a day’s pay of a Roman soldier. This was in exact accordance with the price, mentioned in the parable of the laborers in the vineyard, of a penny a day. The limit between the proper subject for alms for the purpose of support and the independent man was fixed by the oral law at the receipt of two hundred zuzae, that is to say, to one shekel per week.... This was considered by the law of Moses to be the lowest rate at which life was to be supported.” See Handicrafts; Service.

LA’CHISH (lā’kish). A royal Canaanite city and one of the chief fortresses of Judah, identified with the large twenty-two-acre mound now known as Tell ed-Duweir. It is situated thirty miles SW of Jerusalem, fifteen miles W of Hebron. It is of immense strategic importance, dominating the old road from the Palestinian highland to the Nile valley. The site was excavated by the Wellcome-Marston Archaeological Expedition beginning in 1933. The work was supervised by J. L. Starkey until his murder by bandits early in 1938. The excavation of this site, ranking in importance with Bethshan and Megiddo, was thereafter carried on by Charles H. Inge and Lankester Harding. Yohanan Aharoni led Israeli digs there in 1966 and 1968, and David Ussishkin of Tel Aviv University has been excavating there since 1973.

The city was occupied several millennia before Abraham and was an important city still standing when the Israelites invaded Palestine. Its king, Japhia, joined a confederacy against Joshua (Josh. 10:3, 5) but was captured by the Israelites (10:31–35; 12:11). It was rebuilt or fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:9) and had a reputation for strength. Amaziah fled there and was slain (2 Kings 14:19; 2 Chron. 25:27). Lachish fiercely resisted the siege of Sennacherib when on his way to Egypt (2 Kings 18:13–17; 2 Chron. 32:9; Isa. 36:2; 37:8) but ultimately capitulated in 701 B.C. Sennacherib portrayed the event on the walls of his palace at Nineveh. The city experienced two destructions by Nebuchadnezzar, one in 598 B.C. when Jehoiachin and the Jerusalem citizens were carried into captivity (2 Kings 24) and another in 589/88 B.C. when the city was reduced to ashes. After the Exile it was reoccupied (Neh. 11:30). Micah (1:13) denounced Lachish because it was the first to admit the iniquities of Israel into Judah, i.e., the idolatry of the image worship of the ten tribes. (See Mic. 1:5; Amos 3:14). Numbers of inscriptions have been found at the site, notably a broken bowl written in Egyptian, apparently by an Egyptian tax collector enumerating certain wheat deliveries. This is dated in the “year 4” of a certain pharaoh. Also found in a Late Bronze Age temple at

K. & Johann Karl Friedrich Keil and Franz Julius Delitzsch, Old Testament Commentaries (1875)

Com. Commentary

Lachish were a bowl and a jar inscribed in an early Canaanite script. This script is identical with that of the proto-Semitic inscriptions found at Serabit el-Khadem on the Sinai Peninsula and in similar levels at Shechem, Gezer, and Beth-shemesh. Most important of all of the Lachish discoveries are the so-called Lachish Letters. These priceless documents, of vast epigraphic importance, illustrate the Hebrew current in the time of Jeremiah. They are to be dated between the two Babylonian sieges of Lachish (598–589/88 B.C.). Eighteen of these pieces of ancient inscribed pottery were found in 1935, to which three more were added in 1938. Practically all of these ostraca were written by a certain Hoshaiiah, who was thought to be stationed at a military outpost, to a man named Jaosh, believed to be the high commanding officer at Lachish. This traditional interpretation has been disputed by Yigael Yadin, who concluded that the letters were first drafts of letters sent by Hoshaiiah, the commander at Lachish, to Jaosh, his superior in Jerusalem. In any event, they give a sense of “you are there” at the destruction of Judah by Nebuchadnezzar. Other significant finds at the site include the 105-foot-square platform on which David built a government house, a Late Bronze temple, the walls of Rehoboam, a mass grave of 1,500 bodies probably dating to the Assyrian attack, the gate complex, and an Assyrian siege ramp and a Judean counter-ramp. LA'DAN (lā'dan).

1. An Ephraimite, the son of Tahan and grandfather of Elishama, which latter was head of his tribe at the Exodus (1 Chron. 7:26), before 1440 B.C.

2. The first named of the two sons of Gershon, the son of Levi (1 Chron. 23:7–9; 26:21). Keil (Com., ad loc.) believes that Ladan was a later descendant of Gershon than Libni, and that the Shimei of v. 9 was a descendant of Libni.

LADDER (Heb. sūllām; “staircase”). This word occurs only in the account of Jacob’s dream at Bethel (Gen. 28:12, “and behold, a ladder was set on the earth with its top reaching to heaven,” etc.). By many the rendering “staircase” (NIV, “stairway”) is preferred, and is supposed to apply to the rocky mountainside. The vision that Jacob saw of angels ascending and descending teaches the fact of communication between heaven and earth, and the ministry of angels. To us there is a deeper meaning since the incarnation. The true staircase by which heavenly messengers ascend and descend is the Son of Man. It is He who really bridges the interval between heaven and earth, God and man. However, the true fulfillment of Jacob’s vision will not take place until the millennial age when the covenant with Abraham confirmed in Isaac and Jacob will be realized (John 1:49–51).

LA'EL (lā'el; “to, belonging to God,” i.e., devoted to Him). The father of Eliasaph, who was leader of the Gershonites at the time of the Exodus (Num. 3:24), 1210 B.C.

LA'HAD (lā'had; “oppression,” cf. Arab. lahada, “to press down, overburden”). The second of the two sons of Jahath, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:2), after 1210 B.C.

LAHAI'ROI. See Beer-lahai-roi.

LAH'MAS (lā'mas). A city in the plain of Judah (Josh. 15:40; Lahmam, KJV), perhaps among the Philistines W of the highlands of Judea. It is thought to be represented by the ruins of el-Lahm, about two miles E of Lachish.

LAH'MI (lā'mi). Named as the brother of Goliath and slain by Elhanan (1 Chron. 20:5). Strong (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia, s.v.) considers this an incorrect reading for Bethlehemite, as is found in the parallel passage (2 Sam. 21:19). Winer, Keil, Deutsch, Grove, and others maintain that Chronicles gives the true reading. See Goliath.

LA'ISH (lā'ish; a "lion").

1. A native of Gallim, a Benjamite, to whose son, Palti, Saul gave David's wife Michal (1 Sam. 25:44; 2 Sam. 3:15), about 1015 B.C.

2. A place in the N of Palestine (Judg. 18:7, 14), about four miles from Paneas, at the head of the Jordan. It was taken by the restless Danites and included within their territory. It is called also Leshem and Dan (Josh. 19:47, see marg.; Judg. 18:29; Jer. 8:16), now identified with Tell el-Qadi, "the mound of the judge," to the N of the waters of Merom (cf. Josh. 11:5). See also Dan; Laishah.

LA'ISHAH (lā'ish-a). A place mentioned in Isa. 10:30, thought by some to be the modern el-Isawîyeh, about a mile NE from Jerusalem. KJV, Laish.

LAKE (Gk. limnē, a "pool"). A term used in the NT only of the lake of Gennesaret (Luke 5:1–2; 8:22–23, 33) and the "lake of fire" (Rev. 19:20; 20:10, 14–15; 21:8). See Gehenna.

LAK'KUM (lak'um; "an obstruction," cf. Arab. lakama, "to obstruct a roadway"). A place in the NE of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33; "Lakum," KJV). Probably Khirbet el-Mansurah, W of the Jordan near where it flows out of the Sea of Galilee.

LA'MA (lā'ma). A term signifying "why," quoted from Ps. 22:1 by our Savior on the cross (Matt. 27:46; Mark 15:34).

LAMB. Lambs and young rams form an important part of almost every sacrifice in the OT (Lev. 4:32; Num. 6:14). See articles Animal Kingdom; Sacrifice. Lamb of God is a term used typically of Christ as the Sin-bearer of the world (John 1:29, 36; cf. Acts 8:32; 1 Pet. 1:19). In these passages Christ is likened to a sacrificial lamb on account of His death, innocently and patiently endured to expiate sin. "Lamb" was evidently a term used early to describe the redemption to be brought by the long-awaited Messiah (Isa. 53:7). The sheep speaks eloquently of the coming Redeemer and Sin-bearer. The lamb as the symbol of Christ was typified by the Paschal lamb and will be travestied by the Antichrist, who sets himself up as the true Christ, professing to imitate the Redeemer, and whose false prophet is described as "another beast coming up out of the earth; and he had two horns like a lamb" (Rev. 13:11). Especially significant is the use of the figure of the lamb as a symbol of Christ in the Apocalypse. There the lion-lamb portrays Christ in His future victory as crowned because of His redemptive work (5:12–13; 7:9; 22:1, 3). The term "marriage of the Lamb" (19:7–9) symbolizes the union of Christ and His church in glory previous to His second coming to earth to destroy His enemies, cast out satanic power, and set up the long-awaited mediatorial kingdom of Israel (19:11–17). In the Revelation John beheld "a Lamb standing, as if slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven Spirits of God, sent out into all the earth” (5:6), i.e., invested with the attributes of God, omnipotence and omniscience, and sharing the universal empire and homage of the universe.

LAME. A general term referring to imperfect limbs, either by birth or injury. Lameness is mentioned among the bodily imperfections that would exclude a son (descendant) of Aaron from entering the Holy Place or offering sacrifices. A person thus afflicted might, however, eat of the sacrifices, like other priests (Lev. 21:17–23). See also Diseases.

LA'MECH (lā'mek).

1. The fifth in descent from Cain, being the son of Methushael and the father of Jabal, Jubal, Tubal-cain, and the latter's sister, Naamah (Gen. 4:18–22). Lamech took two wives, Adah and Zillah, and was thus the first to practice polygamy. To the narrative of Lamech we are indebted for the only example of antediluvian poetry (vv. 23–24):

“Adah and Zillah,
Listen to my voice,
You wives of Lamech,
Give heed to my speech,
For I have killed a man for wounding me;
And a boy for striking me;
If Cain is avenged sevenfold,
Then Lamech seventy-sevenfold.”

Many views have been entertained as to the meaning of these words. Keil (Com., ad loc.) says that “in the form of pride and arrogance Lamech celebrates the inventions of Tubal-cain”; and the idea of the song is, “Whoever inflicts a wound or stripe on me, whether man or youth, I will put to death; and for every injury done to my person I will take ten times more vengeance than that with which God promised to avenge the murder of my ancestor Cain.” Turner (Companion to Genesis, p. 209) says “that he had slain a young man, not in cold blood, but in consequence of a wound or bruise he had himself received; and on the ground, apparently, of a difference between his case and that of Cain's—viz., that he had done under provocation what Cain had done without it—he assures himself of an interest in the divine guardianship greater than that granted to Cain.”

2. The son of Methuselah and father of Noah. He lived to be 777 (Gen. 5:25–31; 1 Chron. 1:3; Luke 3:36).

LA'MED (ל) (lā'med; “oxgoad”). Letter 12 of the Heb. alphabet corresponding to Gk.

lambda. (λ), English “L.” It stands before the twelfth section of Ps. 119 in which each verse of the Heb. begins with this letter.

LAMENT. See Mourning.

LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF. One of the so-called Megilloth, or Rolls, found in the third part of the Heb. canon. The work consists of five elegiac poems lamenting the destruction of Jerusalem at the time of the Babylonian captivity. It is termed Ekah (How!) in the Heb. from its initial word. The Gk. rendering in the LXX is Threnoi, rendered Lamentations in the Lat. Jeremiah is usually appended as the traditional author.

Purpose. Lamentations portrays the reaction of a devout Israelite toward the destruction of the theocracy. The tragic scene presents God's people as so corrupt that Jehovah has forsaken His sanctuary and abandoned it to enemies. The poet celebrates the Lord's righteousness but bewails the iniquity of the nation and calls upon the inhabitants to repent. The whole note is one of deep tragedy. The Lord's people, from whom salvation would eventually come, have become so vile as to be fit only for destruction.

Form. The first four elegiac poems are alphabetic. In the first two (chaps. 1 and 2) a new letter of the Heb. alphabet opens each verse, which has three parts. In the third lamentation (chap. 3) three verses are allotted to each of the twenty-two letters of the alphabet, and every verse in each group of three begins with the same letter. In the fourth dirge, one verse composed of two members is distributed to each letter. The last dirge is not alphabetic but consists of twenty-two verses. The meter is what is known as qinah, a special elegiac arrangement. The first member of the verse is longer than the second and is sometimes called the "limping verse." Instead of being balanced and reinforced by the second, it is faintly echoed, giving the effect of the whole dying away in a plaintive cadence.

Authorship. Many scholars such as Chaney, Ewald, Eissfeldt, Pfeiffer, and others dismiss authorship by Jeremiah. The main reason given in support of this is that the tradition is unreliable, being removed by three centuries from the age of the prophet. Internal evidence in comparison with Jeremiah's other writings, and several historical allusions, are used as alleged evidence. In reply it may be said that if Jeremiah is not the author, no other contemporaneous writer fits the qualifications of authorship any better. Denying Jeremiah's authorship, critics are cast into complete confusion concerning the question of who the author was. The long-sustained tradition of Jeremiah's authorship could hardly have arisen without solid basis. Argument from differences in vocabulary are extremely precarious. Supporting Jeremiah's authorship is a strong and persistent tradition dating from the time of the Greek version. The Vulg. and the Targum of Jonathan, as well as many of the church Fathers and numerous later commentators, follow this tradition. Internal evidence is also suggestive. The scenes are lifelike in their portrayal and suggest an eyewitness. A comparison of the Lamentations with Jeremiah's other writings also shows points of similarity, and the sensitive temperament of the great prophet is reflected in the elegiac poems. (See S. R. Driver, Introduction [1913], p. 462 for similarities.) M.F.U.

LAMP (Heb. nēr lappîd, "torch"; Gk. lampas). Although lamps are frequently mentioned in Scripture, no indication is given of their form and structure. The natural supposition is that they were similar to those employed in surrounding countries, especially Egypt, to which in matters of art and comfort the Israelites were closely related. The following are the references to lamps:

1. That part of the golden lampstand that bore the light; also of the ten golden lampstands ("candlesticks," KJV) in the Temple of Solomon (Ex. 25:37; 1 Kings 7:49; 2 Chron. 4:20; 13:11; Zech. 4:2).
2. A torch, such as were carried by the soldiers of Gideon (Judg. 7:16, 20), and, perhaps, similar to those that Samson tied to the foxes' tails (15:4). See Torch.

3. Lamps for domestic use. The form of these is known from the numerous excavations in Palestine and elsewhere in the Near East, and the shapes varied with the various periods of history. During most of the OT period in Palestine a lamp was simply a small clay saucer for oil with a pinched lip to hold the wick; olive oil was used for illumination. Normally lamps had a single wick, but sometimes they had four or even more. During the Roman period the common lamp was a small, oblong, covered saucer that could be held in the palm of the hand. Normally it had one wick but it could have two or more.

4. The use of lamps fed with oil in marriage processions is alluded to in the parable of the ten virgins (Matt. 25:1). These probably were similar to the modern Egyptian lantern, called fanoos, a sort of folding lantern.

Figurative. Lamp is used as symbolical of: the Word of God (Ps. 119:105; Prov. 6:23); salvation of God (Gen. 15:17; Isa. 62:1, rendered “torch” in both places); God’s guidance (2 Sam. 22:29; Ps. 18:28); spirit of man (Prov. 20:27); ministers and wise rulers (2 Sam. 21:17; John 5:35); completely put out, the destruction of him who curses his parents (Prov. 20:20).

LAMPSTAND, GOLDEN. See Tabernacle.

LANCES (Heb. rōmah, to “hurl,” 1 Kings 18:28; cf. Job 39:23; 41:29, NIV). This word is elsewhere rendered and appears to mean a javelin, or light spear. It may mean the iron point or head of a lance. See Armor: Spear, Javelin, Dart.

LAND. Respecting the cultivation of land by the Hebrews, see Agriculture.

LAND AND PROPERTY.

Distribution. The patriarchs were promised for their posterity the possession of Canaan on the W of Jordan. But owing to the opposition of the Amorites, who had formed two large kingdoms on the E of Jordan, the Israelites were compelled first to wage war with Sihon of Heshbon and Og of Bashan. They were defeated by Israel, and their territory was taken and divided by Moses, who gave it to the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh. They were allowed to enter upon their possession, however, only after having fulfilled their promise of sending all their men of war in aid of their brothers over the Jordan (Num. 32; Deut. 2:26–3:20; Josh. 13:15–32).

Joshua had charge of the taking and dividing of Canaan, and, having defeated thirty-one kings and taken their cities, he proceeded, by divine command, to divide the whole of that land among the remaining tribes, according to the boundaries fixed by Moses (Num. 34:1–35:8). The portion of each tribe was fixed by lot, that is, it was decided by lot where each tribe was to be located (26:52–56; 33:54). Then the compass, size, and boundaries of the several territories were settled and regulated by the commission appointed for the purpose, consisting of Eleazar the priest, Joshua, and twelve leaders of the tribes mentioned by name (Num. 34:16–29; Josh. 14:1–2). Naturally the extent of territory assigned to each tribe depended upon its number (Num. 33:54). A committee was formed of three men out of each tribe to survey the land (Josh. 18:4–9), that is, not to measure it geometrically but to have it described according to the number of its cities and villages, its soil, and so on. The land was subdivided, so that every clan and father’s house received an inheritance for itself. All the land was not immediately taken possession of, for the Canaanites were not exterminated. In the course of time the Canaanites left in the land were subdued, and their land became the property of the Israelites. As to the division of the cities, towns, and villages, the OT does not give any clear account.

Israel was taught that she had conquered Canaan only by the help of Jehovah (Ps. 44:3), and that the land was and remained the property of Jehovah, the covenant God (Lev. 25:23). Though the land was promised to the children of Israel for an everlasting possession (Gen.

13:15–16), yet their retaining it was conditional on their faithful fulfillment of its covenant obligations (Lev. 26:32–45; Deut. 4:26–30), and even the ground did not become Israel's property in such a way that the possessor could dispose of it as he willed.

Laws. There were laws concerning the rest, redemption, and consecration of the land.

Rest. That Israel might be constantly reminded of the condition upon which it held the land, a year of rest for the ground was to be observed every seventh year, "a sabbath to the Lord" (Lev. 25:4); and every fiftieth year was to be a Jubilee, in which everyone returned to his property (25:10, 13).

The land was not to be sold in perpetuity, but there was a provision for redeeming the land by the seller or next of kin (25:23–24); and if not redeemed before, the land reverted without payment in the Jubilee year to its original possessor or his heir (v. 28). Thus every sale of land became a lease, since only its produce was sold, until the Jubilee (25:15–16).

Redemption. In case the owner or his next of kin wished to redeem the land, then the years that had elapsed since the sale were reckoned, and the buyer received only as much purchase money as would be due for the time remaining until the next Jubilee (25:25–27). This right of redemption in the Jubilee held absolutely for (1) property in lands and houses in villages and unwalled places, and (2) for the houses of the Levites in the cities allotted for them, and the attached fields (25:31–34). In a limited way it held (1) for the dwelling house in walled cities; for them the right of redemption lasted only a full year from the day of sale (vv. 29–30); and (2) for the fields vowed unto the Lord, with the limitation that if they were not recovered for the prescribed valuation, but were sold to another, they did not revert in the Jubilee to their original possessor or his heir, but as being holy to Jehovah like a devoted field, became the property of the priests (27:14–21). Houses in walled cities were not so closely connected with the land, which the Lord gave to His people for an inheritance, that they could be regarded as inalienable.

Consecration. A bought field could be consecrated to the Lord by the buyer only so far as it had become his property. Strictly speaking, he had only bought its produce until the Jubilee and could, therefore, vow only this to Jehovah. If he ransomed it, he ransomed it for himself until the Jubilee; if he did not ransom it, the sanctuary had the use of it for this interval, after which the field reverted in either case without payment to the original owner (Lev. 27:22–24). An hereditary owner could vow a portion to Jehovah, who had given him all. In such a case ransom was allowed until the Jubilee by the payment of the value of the harvests until this date with an added fifth. Then the field remained his property, and from the Jubilee onward its produce again belonged to him cost free. If not redeemed it was understood that he had given it wholly to Jehovah, and it became the property of the priests (27:16–21).

LANGUAGES. The ancient biblical world was a thorough mixture of several languages. Important was Sumerian, a non-Semitic pictograph and sign language current in southern Babylonia previous to 3000 B.C. The Semitic Babylonians brought in Akkadian, written in cuneiform characters. The great family of Semitic languages included its Eastern branch, Assyrian-Babylonian (Akkad.); NW Semitic, Aramaic, Ugaritic, Hebrew, and Phoenician; S Semitic, Arabic, Ethiopic, and Amharic. The language of the Philistines still remains obscure. The Moabites spoke a dialect similar to Hebrew, as shown by the Moabite Stone discovered in 1868. The Gezer Calendar (c. 925 B.C.), the Siloam Inscription (c. 702 B.C.), and the Lachish Letters (c. 589 B.C.) give us epigraphic evidence of the development of Hebrew. (See Hebrew Language.) The Ugaritic Tablets from Ras Shamra (1929–37) have greatly illuminated Canaanite dialects and, being closely associated with Hebrew, have shed much light on the language of the OT. As a cultural bridge between the great Egyptian Empire and the empires on the Halys in Asia Minor and on the Tigris-Euphrates in Mesopotamia, the ancient Hebrews came constantly in contact with various languages. Now well known are Hittite, Hurrian, and Semitic dialects spoken in antiquity. Excavations at Boghaz-Keui, Mari on the Middle Euphrates, and at Nuzi in the Tigris country have yielded a whole vast cuneiform literature in Hittite and Hurrian. At the end of the OT period (c. 400 B.C.) Hebrew began to fade out, and Aramaic became the lingua franca of SW Asia as Akkadian had been in the Amarna Period (c. 1400 B.C.). By the time of Jesus, Aramaic was the vernacular in Palestine with koine Greek a universal language since Alexander's conquests in the fourth century B.C. The Latin of the Roman Empire also became a kind of lingua franca. The superscription on the cross was hence written in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew (Aram.; Luke 23:38, KJV). M.F.U.

LANGUAGES, CONFUSION OF (Gen. 11:1–9). The biblical account of this event begins with the statement “Now the whole earth used the same language and the same words” (v. 1). The author of the book of Genesis conceived the unity of the human race to be of the most rigid nature—not simply a generic unity, nor again simply a specific unity, but a specific based upon a numerical unity, the species being nothing else than the enlargement of the individual. Unity of language is assumed by the sacred historian, apparently as a corollary of the unity of race. No explanation is given of the origin of speech, but its exercise is evidently regarded as coeval with the creation of man. Speech, being inherent in man as a reflecting being, was regarded as handed down from father to son by the same process of imitation by which it is still perpetuated. The original unit of speech was restored in Noah. Disturbing causes were, however, early at work to dissolve this twofold union of community and speech. The human family endeavored to check the tendency to separation by the establishment of a great central edifice, and a city that should serve as a metropolis of the whole world (vv. 3–4). The project was defeated by the interposition of Jehovah, who determined to “confuse their language, that they may not understand one another's speech” (vv. 5–7). See also Babel, Tower of.

The desire for renown and the purpose to maintain their unity were thus manifested, revealing pride and the loss of spiritual unity and brotherly love. “Consequently the undertaking, dictated by pride, to preserve and consolidate by outward means the unity which was inwardly lost, could not be successful, but could only bring down the judgment of dispersion” (K. & D., Com.). By the firm establishment of an ungodly unity the wickedness and audacity of men would have led to fearful enterprise. Therefore God determined, by confusing their language, to prevent the heightening of sin through ungodly association, and to frustrate their design.

The nature of the confusion of language has been variously understood. It is unnecessary to assume that the judgment inflicted on the builders of Babel amounted to a loss, or even a suspension, of articulate speech. The desired object would be equally attained by a miraculous forestallment of those dialectical differences of language that are constantly in a process of production. The elements of the one original language may have remained, but were so disguised by variations of pronunciation, and by the introduction of new combinations, as to be practically obliterated.

“When it is stated, first of all, that God had resolved to destroy the unity of lips and words by a confusion of the lips, and then that he scattered the men abroad, this act of divine judgment cannot be understood in any other way than that God deprived them of the ability to comprehend one another, and thus effected their dispersion. The event itself cannot have consisted merely in a change of the organs of speech produced by the omnipotence of God, whereby speakers were turned into stammerers who were unintelligible to one another” (K. & D., Com., ad loc.).

LANTERN (Gk. phanos, “shining”). This word occurs only in John 18:3, where it is recorded that the party that went to Gethsemane was provided “with lanterns and torches and weapons.” A lantern is simply a lamp with a covering of some sort to protect it from the wind and other violence. Therefore too sharp a distinction between it and a lamp should not be drawn, and not infrequently either term might be indifferently used. The torches, for example, of Gideon’s band, were probably lanterns rather than lamps in the ordinary sense, and when the psalmist speaks of “a lamp to my feet” (Ps. 119:105), we naturally conclude that he refers to some kind of lantern.

LAODICE’A (lā-od-i-sē’a). Of the several cities named Laodicea in Syria and Asia Minor, only one is mentioned in the Scriptures, namely, the one situated in the confines of Phrygia and Lydia, on the banks of the Lycus, and about ninety miles E of Ephesus—not far from Colossae. After having been successively called Diosopolis and Rhoas, it was named Laodicea in honor of Laodice, the wife of Antiochus II (261–246 B.C.), who rebuilt it. It was destroyed by an earthquake (A.D. 66, or earlier) and rebuilt by Marcus Aurelius. It was the seat of a Christian church (Col. 2:1; 4:13, 15–16; Rev. 1:11). It is now a heap of ruins, called by the Turks Eski-hissar, or “old castle.”

The town was located on a flat-topped hill. A wall (about a kilometer long on each of its four sides) surrounded the crown of the hill. Gates pierced this wall on the N, E, and NW. At the SW edge of the plateau stood a stadium, built and dedicated to Vespasian in A.D. 79. Near the stadium was a stone aqueduct, five miles long and probably dating to the second century A.D. Adjacent to the stadium on the N is a structure probably to be identified as baths and built during the reign of Hadrian (A.D. 117–38). Remains of two rather badly ruined theaters stand on the NE of Laodicea. Ruins of numerous other unidentified structures may be seen at the site.

LAODICE’A, CHURCH AT. Among the residents of this city at the time of the apostles were many Jews; and it is probably owing to this fact that a Christian church was planted here at so early a date. It appears from the epistle to the Colossians (4:15–16) that Paul never visited Laodicea, but hearing, most probably, from Epaphras of the false doctrines spread in that city, he wrote to the Colossians desiring that his epistle to that church should also be read in Laodicea. The message of the Spirit (Rev. 3:14–22) to the church of Laodicea was an awful warning. See Laodiceans, Epistle to.

The Laodicean condition describes the spiritual lukewarmness and worldliness that will prevail in the professing church of Christ at the end of the age. Rich, cultured, religiously ritualistic—this church will have become so self-satisfied and worldly as to have ostracised Christ completely. He is represented prophetically as standing on the outside knocking for admission (Rev. 3:20). No longer is He admitted by the corporate body, but stands outside extending an invitation to individuals. The awful spiritual condition, so utterly abhorrent to God, calls forth one of the boldest figures used in the NT. "So because you are lukewarm, and neither hot nor cold, I will spit you out of My mouth" (3:16; cf. 2 Tim. 3:1–8 for the spiritual and moral conditions at the end of the church age). M.F.U.

LAODICE'ANS, EPISTLE TO. In Col. 4:16 Paul desires that the letter from Laodicea be read at Colossae. From this it has been supposed that Paul wrote an epistle to the Laodiceans, which is no longer extant. Jerome and Theodoret mention such an epistle, and it was also referred to at the second council of Nicaea. The epistle assuming to be that in question, and which is generally condemned as spurious, is found in some copies of the NT printed in Germany; and Calmet in his dictionary gives a full translation of it. Some (Conybeare and Howson) have thought that the epistle to the Ephesians is the one alluded to by the apostle. Another explanation of the passage is that Paul intended the letter of the Laodiceans to him, conveyed by Epaphras, to be read in the church of Colossae, together with the apostolic epistle to the Colossians themselves; and that as the epistle to the Colossians was in some sense an answer to the Laodiceans, it would be necessary that both should be read in the church of Laodicea (Imperial Bible Dictionary, s.v.).

1. Heb. beqed, 2 Kings 4:39, a "garment" (hêq, Prov. 16:32, the "bosom"). The fold of the garment in which the Israelites were accustomed to carrying articles in lieu of pockets; thus one of the sons of the prophets gathered "his lap full of wild gourds" (2 Kings 4:39). See Dress. The psalmist prayed, "Return to our neighbors sevenfold into their bosom ("laps," NIV) the reproach" (Ps. 79:12); the same allusion in Luke 6:38, "Give, and it will be given to you; good measure, pressed down, shaken together, running over, they will pour into your lap."

2. Heb. lāqqaq, to "lick" up, as a dog (cf. 1 Kings 21:19). Drinking the water "as a dog laps" was the test given to Gideon's men (Judg. 7:5–6), those who knelt and lapped the water, that is, brought the hand to the mouth so rapidly as to resemble a dog's tongue, were retained for service, presumably as evidence that they were fit for active service.

LAPIS LAZULI. See Mineral Kingdom: Sapphire.

LAPPETH. See Lap.

LAP'PIDOTH (lap'i-doth; "torches"). The husband of the prophetess Deborah (Judg. 4:4), about 1195 B.C.

LAPWING. See Animal Kingdom: Hoopoe.

LASCIVIOUSNESS (Gk. aselgeia, that which "excites disgust"). A KJV term referring to unbridled lust, licentiousness, wantonness. See Sensuality.

LASE'A (la-sē'a). A city of Crete, near Fair Havens (Acts 27:8). If the vessel in which Paul was sailing stopped for any length of time it is probable that Paul visited Lasea. Its ruins are located near Cape Leonda, about five miles from Lasea.

LA'SHA (la'sha). One of the places named in defining the border of the Canaanites (Gen. 10:19). Jerome, Jonathan, and the Jerusalem Targum identify it with Calirrhoe, a place with sulphur baths E of the Dead Sea, in Wadi Zerka Ma'in.

LASHA'RON (la-sha'ron; "of or to Sharon"; signification unknown). One of the thirty-one Canaanite towns, W of Jordan, struck by Joshua (Josh. 12:18). Perhaps the LXX preserves the original reading "the king of Apeh [which belongs] to Sharon."

LAST DAY. See Judgment.

LAST TIME. See Eschatology.

LATCHET (Heb. śrôk, “thong”; Gk. himas, “strap,” i.e., “tie”). The KJV term for the strap or thong used by the orientals to fasten the sandal upon the foot (Isa. 5:27; Mark 1:7; Luke 3:16; John 1:27).

LATIN (lat'in). The vernacular language of the Romans, although most of them in the time of Christ also spoke Gk.

LATRINE. See Draught House.

LATTICE. The rendering of the following words:

1. A lathed aperture (Heb. eshnāb), a lattice window through which the cool breezes pass (Judg. 5:28; Prov. 7:6).
2. A net (Heb. śbākâ, 2 Kings 1:2), probably a screen before a window.
3. A window lattice (Heb. herek, Song of Sol. 2:9).

The object of the lattice is to keep the apartments cool by intercepting the direct rays of the sun and at the same time permit a free circulation of the air through the trellis openings. Perhaps the network through which Ahaziah fell and received his mortal injury was on the parapet of his palace (2 Kings 1:2).

LAUGH. (Gk. katagelaō, to deride, laugh down; KJV, “laughed to scorn”). Elements of rejection, disbelief, and mockery are combined (Matt. 9:24; Mark 5:40; Luke 8:53).

LAUNDERER. See Handicrafts; Fuller’s Field; Mineral Kingdom: Niter; Soap.

LAUGHTER. “In Scripture it usually expresses joy (Gen. 21:6; Ps. 126:2; Eccles. 3:4; Luke 6:21); sometimes mockery (Gen. 18:13; Eccles. 2:2; James 4:9); also security (Job 5:22). When predicated of God (Pss. 2:4; 59:8; Prov. 1:26) it signifies that he despises or pays no regard to the person or subject” (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia, s.v.).

LAVER (Heb. kikkār, something “round,” a “basin”). The basin (so usually in the NIV) in which the priests washed their hands and feet while engaged in their public ministrations. The Tabernacle laver differed from that of the Temple.

Tabernacle Laver. This was made by divine direction of bronze (Ex. 30:18) out of the mirrors of the Hebrew women (38:8). It was placed between the Tabernacle and the great altar, so as to be convenient for the priests’ use when going from the altar to the Tabernacle (30:20–21; 40:32). It consisted of two parts, the laver proper and the stand, or pedestal. Neither the form nor size is given. Regarding its shape, something may be deduced from the etymology of the Heb. term and its use in other passages. Kikkār “is derived from a root that seems primarily to mean excavation by hammering, and this would naturally yield a semi-globular hollow, which form is confirmed by the convenience for a lavatory, like a washbowl or basin, and by the similar shape of the molten sea and the smaller lavers, which took its place in the temple (1 Kings 7:38, 40, 43, etc.), and which are denoted by the same word. The laver proper was probably used as the receptacle for the water, which was allowed to run down upon the hands and feet of those washing.”

The stand (Heb. kēn, “support”) was, doubtless, circular in shape and formed another basin. It was evidently an expansion of the shaft, probably with a turned-up rim. As no mention is made of a vessel in which the parts of the animals offered in sacrifice were washed, the laver probably served this purpose. No direction is given as to the kind of water to be used, but the Jewish commentators state that any kind might be employed, provided that it be renewed daily. “In the account of the offering by the woman suspected of adultery there is mention made of ‘holy water’ mixed with dust from the floor of the tabernacle, which the woman was to drink according to certain rites (Num. 5:17). Most probably this water was taken from the laver. Perhaps the same should be said of the ‘water of purifying’ (8:7), which was sprinkled on the Levites on the occasion of their consecration to the service of the Lord in the tabernacle” (Fairbairn). Like other sacred vessels, the laver was consecrated with oil (Lev. 8:10–11). No mention is made in the Heb. text of the mode of transporting the laver, but in Num. 4:14, a passage is added in the LXX agreeing with the Samaritan version, which prescribed the method of packing it, namely, in a purple cloth, protected by a skin covering.

Temple Basins (Lavers). Owing to the increased number of priests and victims in Solomon’s Temple, greater facilities were needed for washing: ten smaller lavers or “basins” were used for the sacrifices, and a large cast metal “sea” was used for the ablutions of the priests (2 Chron. 4:6). Of these we have more minute descriptions than of the Tabernacle laver.

The Cast Metal Sea (Heb. yām, “sea”; KJV, “molten sea”). This was a huge round basin, five cubits high, ten cubits in diameter at the brim, “and thirty cubits in circumference” (1 Kings 7:23–26). Perhaps the circumference measurement was of the bowl at the water line and did not include the projected rim. It was made of strong bronze, a handbreadth in thickness. “Its brim was bent outward in a cuplike form, and made to resemble the flower of the lily, while underneath two rows of ‘knops’ (coloquintidas, i.e., wild cucumbers or apples), ten to every cubit, ran around the sea for ornament.” In 2 Chron. 4:3 we have “figures like oxen” instead of “knops” or “buds.” It is possible that bakarim, oxen, may be a corruption of pekaîm (Clark, Com. ad loc.). The capacity of this huge basin was 2,000 baths (one bath equaled 7½ gallons). The “3,000 baths” of 2 Chron. 4:5 is thought to be an error of a transcriber. The water was doubtless drawn from this basin by means of faucets. This laver was supported by twelve oxen, three looking toward each point of the compass, although it is probable that they all stood upon one and the same base of metal.

The Ten Lesser Basins, or Lavers. In order to convey water to any part of the courts where it might be needed for washing such things as they offered for the burnt offering (2 Chron. 4:6), ten basins held in beautifully ornamented stands of bronze were prepared, five of them being placed on the S and five on the N side of the altar (1 Kings 7:38–39; 2 Chron. 4:6; for a full description of the stands and the basins, see 1 Kings 7:27–39).

The stands were all alike in form, size, and casting and were square chests, four cubits long, the same wide, and three cubits high. They were constructed with flat panels (“borders”) supported by frames that were ornamented with figures of lions, oxen, and cherubim. Each stand had four bronze wheels and bronze axles, and the four feet had supports (7:30). The meaning seems to be that the chests had feet at each corner, and that these rested upon the axles in such a manner as to raise the chest above the rim of the wheels (v. 32), the four wheels being under the borders. Keil supposes that the supports ran up each corner from the foot and reached to the lower side of the small basin, or laver, thus helping to support it (“beneath the basin were cast supports with wreaths at each side,” v. 30). The wheels were 1½ cubits high, in construction resembling that of chariot wheels, and their axles, rims, spokes, and hubs were cast in bronze.

The top portions of the stands were constructed for the purpose of holding the basins. They were made with plates and borders, like the sides, but appear to have been arched so as to rise in the center, terminating in a circular receptacle, ½ cubit high by 1½ cubits in diameter, for the basin. These plates and borders were engraved with cherubim, lions, and palm trees. The basins themselves were four cubits in diameter, corresponding with the stands, narrowing down at the base to 1½ cubits, and held forty baths (about 440 gallons), just 1/50 of the capacity of the great laver.

Some have thought that the stands were made of so great a height in order to bring the basin near the height of the altar. It may be that these chests (stands) opened at the sides, and were actually tanks for washing the sacrifices in, the water coming into them from the basins by means of a pipe. After use they could be wheeled away and cleaned.

Basin (Laver) in the Second Temple. In the postexilic or second Temple, there appears to have been only one laver of bronze, with twelve instead of two pipes, and a machine for raising water and filling it.

Typical Meaning of the Laver. The laver or basin is a type of Christ, cleansing the believer-priest from the defilement of sin (John 13:2–10; Eph. 5:25–27). The priests, after serving at the bronze altar (itself a type of Christ’s cross on which He, as our whole burnt offering, purchased our redemption), could not enter the Holy Place of God’s manifested presence until their hands and feet were cleansed.

LAW (Heb. tôrâ, “teaching, instruction”; Gk. nomos). A term employed almost 200 times in the Bible and signifying the revealed will of God with respect to human conduct. It includes all the divine commands and precepts for regulating man’s moral life without and within. It is used in six different senses in Scripture.

That Which Is Enacted by Man. (Gen. 9:6; Matt. 10:15; Luke 20:22; 1 Tim. 1:8–10; 2 Tim. 2:5.) Law in this aspect embraces that which established human government requires of those under its jurisdiction.

The Law of Moses. The law of Moses was a divinely instituted rule of life mediated through Moses to govern God’s covenant people, Israel, in Canaan. It regulated their common, everyday conduct and was a covenant of works (Ex. 19:5–6). They were never able to keep this covenant, and it has been superseded by a new covenant (Jer. 31:31–34; Heb. 8:8–13). The Mosaic code of laws included the commandments (Ex. 20:1–17), the ordinances stipulating the Israelites’ social life (21:1–23:33), and those directing Israel’s worship (25:1–31:18). This Mosaic system, including the Ten Commandments as a way of life, came to an end with the death of Christ (John 1:17; Rom. 10:4). The Mosaic age was preceded (Ex. 19:4) and followed (John 1:17) by grace. In the gracious dispensation inaugurated as the result of the atonement of Christ, all the Ten Commandments appear in the epistles except that one regarding the seventh day, and are operative not as stern “you shall nots” but as gracious duties and privileges of a redeemed people possessing the dynamic of the Holy Spirit, willingly and effectively carrying out the commandments’ injunctions. The Mosaic law was thus a temporary divine administration in effect only until Christ should come. It had the definite ministry of imparting to sin the character of transgression (Rom. 5:13; Gal. 3:19).

The Law of Grace. The law of grace includes the doctrines and precepts of grace addressed to the redeemed child of God in this age. It must be carefully noted that the Christian is not under law; grace has imparted to him all the merit that he could ever need (John 1:16; Rom. 5:1–2; 8:1–2; Col. 2:9–10). Being “in-lawed” to Christ (1 Cor. 9:20–21) does not mean that the Christian is without law, but it does mean, as one redeemed by grace, that he has the duty, or rather gracious privilege, of not doing that which is displeasing to God and of fully discharging that which is well pleasing to Him on the basis of a manifestation of spontaneous gratitude for his salvation in grace.

God’s Will. The revealed will of God in any situation becomes a law to the Christian, although it embraces all God’s revealed pleasure for any people at any time. Thus the word law in the book of Romans is sometimes used in referring to something other than the law of Moses (Rom. 7:15–25; 8:4).

Natural Law Written on the Heart. Natural law written on the heart is closely connected with the revealed will of God, but it is to be distinguished in that it is what God requires of all His creatures. “For when Gentiles who do not have the Law do instinctively the things of the Law, these, not having the Law, are a law to themselves, in that they show the work of the Law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness, and their thoughts alternately accusing or else defending them” (Rom. 2:14–15).

The Kingdom Rule of Life. This is the aspect of law that will be in force in the future Millennium. Matthew 5:1–7:29 gives a summary of it. It seems unthinkable to many theologians that there will be a reinstatement of law after the age of grace. But that such is the case is clearly taught in Ezekiel’s great prophecy of millennial conditions described in chaps. 40–48. The legal administration of the Millennium will be an exalted and spiritualized economy and will operate under ideal conditions with Satan bound, a large ministry and operation of the Holy Spirit, and the personal presence of Christ. LAW, ADMINISTRATION OF.

Judges and Courts. Early courts, local courts, local senates, and the Sanhedrin administered the law in biblical times.

Early Courts. In patriarchal times the head of the house had the judicial power over his household, even over life and death (Gen. 38:24). With the increase of families this power passed over to the heads of tribes and clans; but after the Exodus those who sought justice naturally turned to Moses (Ex. 18:13–16). Moses, unable to keep up with the demands made upon him and acting on Jethro’s advice, chose from among the elders “able men who fear God, men of truth, those who hate dishonest gain.” These he appointed as rulers over thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, who should act as judges in all small matters, while the more difficult matters were brought to Moses for decision (18:17–26; Deut. 1:13–18). The relation of these judges to one another is not exactly defined in Scripture; but it may have consisted in the fact that the judges over thousands were appointed to settle the disputes between the tribes and chief clans of the people; the judges over hundreds, and so on, the quarrels and the different contentions between the larger and smaller divisions of the clans and families.

Local Courts. After the entrance into Canaan the same general rules remained in force. For this period there is only the quite general command: “You shall appoint for yourself judges and officers [shōterîm] in all your towns which the Lord your God is giving you, according to your tribes, and they shall judge the people with righteous judgment” (Deut. 16:18). These officials were the local justices, who, in the several cities, pronounced finally on all minor controversies, that is, such as were easy to decide by law, and punished the guilty. For more difficult cases, such as those that had been referred to Moses, a higher court was appointed, having its seat at the place of the sanctuary and consisting of priests and judges; with the high priest and a (secular) supreme judge (Deut. 17:8; 19:16–21). In this court the lay judge conducted the investigation (19:18), while the priest gave guidance from the law (Lev. 10:6–11); finally the judge pronounced sentence.

Senate. Besides these local courts, the elders of every city formed a senate or magistracy, whose duty it was, as representatives of the congregation, to remove the evil from among their midst. This senate decided various simple family matters that required no deeper judicial investigation, punished the guilty even with death, and delivered up the deliberate manslayer to the avenger of blood (Deut. 19:12). Among the cases that came under the jurisdiction of this senate were a rebellious son (21:18–21), a husband’s charge against the virgin chastity of his wife (22:13–21), and the refusal in the matter of levirate marriage (which see). These matters belonged rather to the department of government than to the administration of justice in the strict sense; and the elders took up these cases as the upholders of good order.

David, after his wars, arranged the affairs of his kingdom; and among the other appointments set apart 6,000 Levites to be shoterim and judges (1 Chron. 23:4; cf. 26:29). It is doubtful if these Levites were associated with the local courts, the probability being that they were appointed to administer the payments of the people for the sanctuary, to watch over them, and in disputed cases to give judicial decisions. Jehoshaphat, desirous of spreading the knowledge of the law (2 Chron. 17:7–9), put judges in all the fortified cities (19:5–7) and provided a supreme tribunal in Jerusalem, consisting of Levites, priests, and heads of tribes, presided over by the high priest (for the interest of Jehovah) and the prince of the house of Judah (for the king's interest), with functions of an exclusively judicial character. In postexilic times the functions of the local courts were expanded. Josephus (Wars 2.14.1) mentions local courts that discharged judicial functions; and local Sanhedrins are referred to as those to whom the believers would be delivered (Matt. 10:17; Mark 13:9). These lesser courts were empowered to deal with criminal cases of a serious nature, even to the sentencing of murderers. We may also regard as belonging to the same category those courts that in Matt. 5:22 are assumed to be inferior to the high court of the Sanhedrin; and similarly with regard to the “elders” of Capernaum (Luke 7:3). The most subordinate of these courts consisted of seven persons; although three judges were considered sufficient to decide certain cases. There is a statement in the Mishna to the effect that an inferior Sanhedrin consisted of twenty-three persons, and that one of this sort was assigned to every town with a population of at least 120, or, according to R. Nehemiah's view, of at least 230, in order that there might be a judge for every ten inhabitants.

The Sanhedrin. The Sanhedrin was the great council in latter times (see Sanhedrin).

Judicial Procedure in the Courts. The course of justice was simple. The judges appointed by Moses were to judge the people “at all times” (Ex. 18:22), while the lawgiver himself sat with Aaron and the leaders of the congregation before the Tabernacle (Num. 27:2; cf. Ex. 18:19–23). Judges in the cities, after the custom of the ancient East, had their seat at the gate (Deut. 21:19; 22:15; Prov. 22:22; Amos 5:11, 15) and in the open squares. Before them the litigants appeared, and presented their case orally (Deut. 1:16; 25:1); and the accused who did not appear was summoned (25:8). Counsel was unknown in the OT. The supreme judges of the people administered justice in public; for example, Deborah under a palm tree (Judg. 4:5), the kings in the gate or court of the palace (2 Sam. 15:2–6; cf. 14:4; 1 Kings 3:16); Solomon at a porch hall of judgment in his palace (7:7). Later the princes sat for judgment at the entrance of the New Gate of the Temple (Jer. 26:10–11). The judge was bound to hear and examine closely (Deut. 1:16–17; 13:14). The proof varied according to circumstances. It might be a simple oath (Ex. 22:11), the word of the accuser if a parent (Deut. 21:18–21), a token (22:15, 17). Generally the declarations of witnesses were taken, and those of two or three were required to make the testimony valid (19:15), especially in criminal cases (Num. 35:30; Deut. 17:6). Witnesses were to be rigidly questioned, and if a witness was found to be false he was to be punished with the punishment that would have fallen upon the accused (19:18–19). From Prov. 16:33 and 18:18 it would appear that, other evidence lacking, the lot was applied, though it is not mentioned in the Pentateuch but only in Josh. 7:14 and 1 Sam. 14:40–42 as an immediate divine decision. Sentence was pronounced orally, although under the kings the judges seem to have written their sentences (Isa. 10:1). Punishment was executed without delay (Num. 15:36; Deut. 22:18–19, 21; etc.) and was administered before the judge (25:2–3), probably by the officers of the court; if capital, it was stoning by the whole congregation (Num. 15:36) or by the people of the city (Deut. 22:21), the witnesses being the first to cast a stone (13:9; 17:7), which could hardly be expected of a witness who was not fully satisfied as to the truth of his testimony; or by the avenger of blood (Num. 35:19). After the introduction of the king, punishment was administered by his servants (2 Sam. 1:15) or by the royal guard in case of state or treasonable offenses (1 Kings 2:25, 34, 46; 2 Kings 10:25).

LAWLESSNESS (Gk. anomia; Matt. 7:23; 13:41; and elsewhere, NASB). See Iniquity.

LAW OF MOSES (Heb. tōrah mōsheh). Signifies the whole body of Mosaic legislation (1 Kings 2:3; 2 Kings 23:25; Ezra 3:2); called with reference to its divine origin the law of the Lord (Pss. 19:8; 37:31; Isa. 5:24; 30:9). In the latter sense it is called by way of eminence this law (Heb. hattôrâ, Deut. 1:5; 4:8, 44; 17:18–19; 27:3, 8). The law is especially embodied in the last four books of the Pentateuch. Respecting the question of the origin of the Mosaic law, we quote from J. Robertson, Early Religion of Israel, pp. 335ff.: “It occurs at once as a striking thing that the uniform tradition is, that Moses gave laws and ordinances to Israel; and that it is not a blind ascription of everything to some great ancestor may be gathered from the fact that there are ordinances and customs which are not traced to him. The Sabbath is made as old as the creation; circumcision is a mark of the covenant with Abraham; sacrifices are pre-Mosaic; and the abstaining from the sinew that shrank is traced to the time of Jacob. The body of laws, however, that formed the constitution of Israel as a people is invariably referred to Moses. The persistence with which it is represented that law, moral and ceremonial, came from Moses, and the acceptance of the laws by the whole people as of Mosaic origin, proves at least that it was a deeply-seated belief in the nation that the great leader had given some formal legal constitution to his people.... The testimony of a nation is not so lightly to be set aside; it is the work of criticism to explain and account for tradition, not to give it the lie.”

For a more recent study see George E. Mendenhall, “Law and Covenant in Israel and the Ancient Near East,” in Biblical Archaeologist 17, no. 2 (May 1954): 26–46; no. 3 (Sept. 1954): 49–76.

Principles. At the root of the Mosaic code lies (1) the principle of strict but righteous retribution, the intention being to eliminate evil and produce reverence for the righteousness of the holy God in the heart of the people; (2) the principle that punishment should correspond to the heinousness of the offense, that there shall fall upon the culprit what he has done to his neighbor; and that the punishment is to be limited to the guilty party and not be extended to his children (Deut. 24:16); (3) the principle that all presumptuous disobedience to God and to His holy ordinances should be punished with unsparing severity; and (4) the threat of “a curse and severe punishments from God, the avenger of all evil, for offenses which either escape the eye of civil justice, or which, like apostasy from the Lord to idolatry, may prevail to such a degree that the arm of the earthly magistrate is overpowered and paralyzed by the spirit of the time.”

Division. In analyzing the Mosaic code we adopt the divisions usual in systems of law—civil, criminal, judicial, constitutional, ecclesiastical, and ceremonial.

Civil. Civil law regulated the daily life of the Israelites and had provisions regarding persons and possessions.

Of Persons. The authority of the father was to be sacred; cursing, striking (Ex. 21:15, 17; Lev. 20:9), or stubborn and willful disobedience were to be considered as capital crimes; but punishment of death was vested only in the congregation (Deut. 21:18–21); also the vow of a daughter was conditional upon consent of her father (Num. 30:3–5).

The right of the firstborn to a double portion of the inheritance was not to be set aside by partiality (Deut. 21:15–17); inheritance was allowed to daughters in default of sons, if the heiress married within her own tribe (Num. 27:6–8; cf. chap. 36); unmarried daughters were entirely dependent upon their fathers (30:3–5).

The power of the husband over his wife was such as to make the wife dependent even to the fulfilling of an engagement before God, as in the case of a vow (30:6–15); but a widow or divorced wife became independent and was bound by any vow she may have made (v. 9); upon marriage the husband was excused from war or public duties for one year (Deut. 24:5); marriages within certain degrees were forbidden (Lev. 18:1–24); divorce for “indecency” was allowed, but the divorced wife could not be taken back after marriage to another (Deut. 24:1–4); slander against a wife’s virginity was punishable by fine and by deprivation of power of divorce, but if the wife was proved guilty she was put to death (22:13–21); a slave wife, bought or captive, was not to be actual property, or to be sold; if ill-treated, was to be freed (Ex. 21:7–9; Deut. 21:10–14); raising up of seed (Levirate law) was a right to be claimed by widows with a view to preserving the family (25:5–10).

The power of the master over the slave was limited, so that the slave’s death under chastisement was punishable (Ex. 21:20), and maiming gave liberty (vv. 26–27). The Hebrew slave was freed at the Sabbatical year (his wife and children, if they entered bondage with him, were to go out with him), unless he formally consented to remain in perpetual servitude (21:1–6; Deut. 15:12–18); but in any case he seems to have received his freedom and that of his children at the Jubilee (Lev. 25:10); if a slave was sold to a resident alien (“stranger”), he was always redeemable, at a price proportional to the distance from the Jubilee (25:47–54). Foreign slaves were held and inherited as property forever (25:45–46), and fugitive slaves from other nations were not to be given up (Deut. 23:15).

Strangers seem never to have been sui juris, or able to protect themselves; kindness toward them was enjoined as a duty (Ex. 22:21; Lev. 19:33–34).

Of Possessions. All land was considered as belonging to Jehovah, with its holders as His tenants (Lev. 25:23); sold land, therefore, was to return to its original owners at the Jubilee, the price of sale to be calculated accordingly and redemption on equitable terms to be allowed at all times (25:25–28); a house sold was to be redeemed within one year, and if not, to pass to the purchaser altogether (25:29–30); land was to rest in Sabbatic and Jubilee years, and spontaneous growth of these years was to be for the poor, the stranger, and so on (23:22; Deut. 24:19–21). The houses of the Levites, or those in unwalled villages, were to be redeemed at any time, in the same way as land, and Levitical suburbs were inalienable (Lev. 25:31–34). Sanctified land or houses, tithes, or unclean firstborn animals might be redeemed at the addition of one-fifth their value (reckoned by a priest according to the distance from the Jubilee), if devoted and unredeemed by the owner, to be hallowed at the Jubilee forever and given to the priests (27:14–33). Regarding inheritance (which see), the following were the regulations respecting losses: if two men fought together, and as a result one was disabled from work, the other was to pay for the lost time (Ex. 21:18–19); claims for losses from trespass, or for any lost thing, were to be brought before the judges, and adverse judgment was followed by double payment to the other (22:9); a man finding any lost thing, and denying it, was obliged, when he wished to present a trespass offering, to restore the lost thing with an added fifth to the one to whom it belonged (Lev. 6:3–5). The general principle upon which these enactments were based was that an Israelite’s fellow countrymen were his brothers, and he was always to act the brotherly part. Therefore, whenever he found anything that was lost he was commanded to care for it and to make diligent search for its owner with a view of restoration (Deut. 22:1–4).

All debts to an Israelite were to be released at the Sabbatical year, but they might be exacted of strangers (Deut. 15:1–11); interest from an Israelite was not to be taken (Ex. 22:25–27; Deut. 23:19–20); pledges were not to be insolently or ruinously exacted (Deut. 24:6, 10–13, 17–18).

Taxation included census money. A poll tax (of a half shekel) was to be paid for the service of the Tabernacle (Ex. 30:12–16). Spoil in war was to be divided equally between combatants and the congregation; of the combatant's half 1/500, and of the people's 1/50, was to be given as a heave offering unto the Lord (Num. 21:26–30). Tithes (which see) included poor laws providing for the legal right of the poor to glean fields and vineyards (Lev. 19:9–10; Deut. 24:19–22); for the hungry to eat of grain, and so on, on the spot (23:24–25); for daily payment of wages (24:15); and for the maintenance of priests. See Priest.

Criminal. Criminal law dealt with crimes and their punishment.

Offenses Against God. Offenses against God that were considered treason were all forbidden, in principle, by the Ten Commandments. The first commandment prohibited the acknowledgment of false gods (Ex. 22:20) and all idolatry (Deut. 13; 17:2–5). The second commandment prohibited witchcraft and false prophecy (Ex. 22:18; Deut. 18:9–22; Lev. 19:31). The third commandment prohibited blasphemy (Lev. 24:15–16). The fourth commandment prohibited breaking the Sabbath (Num. 15:32–36). Punishment in all cases was death by stoning. Idolatrous cities were to be utterly destroyed.

Offenses Against Man. The fifth commandment prohibited disobedience to, the cursing of, or the striking of parents (Ex. 21:15, 17; Lev. 20:9; Deut. 21:18–21); it also prohibited disobedience to a priest or supreme judge. Punishment was death by stoning (cf. 1 Kings 21:10–14; 2 Chron. 24:20–21). The sixth commandment prohibited the wrongful taking of life. (1) Murder was punished without sanctuary, reprieve, or satisfaction (Ex. 21:12, 14; Deut. 19:11–13). If in a quarrel a pregnant woman was struck, and she lost her child, fine was exacted; but if she suffered other injury, full retribution (Ex. 21:22–23). Death of a slave by striking with a rod was to be punished (21:20–21). (2) Death by an ox known to gore was punishable by the death of the ox and its owner, but as this was not an intentional crime the owner was allowed to redeem his forfeited life by expiation money (Ex. 21:28–30). (3) In the case of accidental homicide, the guilty party could escape the avenger by fleeing to a city of refuge until death of the high priest (Num. 35:9–28; Deut. 4:41–43; 19:4–20). (4) Death at the hands of an unknown person was to be expiated by formal disavowal and sacrifice by elders of the nearest city (Deut. 21:1–9).

The seventh commandment pertained to the marriage relationship. (1) Adultery was punished by the death of both offenders; the rape of a married or betrothed woman, by the death of the offender (22:22–27). (2) The rape or seduction of an unbetrothed virgin was to be compensated by marriage, with a dowry (fifty shekels) and without power of divorce; or, if she was refused, by payment of a full dowry (Ex. 22:16–17; Deut. 22:28–29). (3) Unlawful marriages (incestuous, etc.) were to be punished, some by death, some by childlessness (Lev. 20).

The eighth commandment dealt with theft or trespass. (1) If stolen property found with the thief was an ox, donkey, or sheep, the thief had to make twofold restoration; if he had killed or sold the property, he had to make fivefold restoration for an ox and fourfold for a sheep (Ex. 22:1, 4). If the thief was unable to make restitution, he might be sold (v. 3); if he was killed while breaking in his death was unavenged (v. 2). (2) Trespass, injury to things, or money lent was to be compensated (22:5–15). (3) Perversion of justice by bribes, threats, and so on, was strictly forbidden (23:6–9). (4) Kidnapping was to be punished by death (Deut. 24:7).

The ninth commandment prohibited false witness and slander. (1) A false witness was punished with that which he wished done to the one against whom he testified (Ex. 23:1–3; Deut. 19:16–21). (2) Slander of a wife’s chastity was punished by a fine and the loss of the power of divorce (Deut. 22:13–19).

The tenth commandment forbade coveting and was applied in the criminal law in various ways. It was forbidden to remove boundary lines, under penalty of a curse (Deut. 27:17); a neighbor’s straying animal was to be returned (Ex. 23:4–5), or helped if in trouble (Deut. 22:1–4); injury done to the field or vineyard of another by animal or fire was to be compensated by the best of one’s own (Ex. 22:5–6); the killing of an animal was to be made good, animal for animal (Lev. 24:18); a blemish caused to another was to be punished by lex talionis, or damages (Ex. 21:18–19, 22–25; Lev. 24:19–20).

Mosaic and Near Eastern Laws. As a result of archaeological excavations, especially of the past three decades, the law of Moses appears in a much clearer context. The Code of Hammurabi, dating from c. 1700 B.C., and discovered at ancient Susa (biblical Shushan) in 1901–2 has been classic in illuminating and illustrating Mosaic law. Now, however, Sumerian, Babylonian, Assyrian, Hittite, and Canaanite codes are shedding their light on the Mosaic legislation. Especially must be mentioned the laws of Lipit-Ishtar, king of Isin, in central Babylonia, dating c. 1875 B.C., and even the earlier laws of Eshnunna, an ancient city NE of modern Baghdad. (See Francis R. Steele, American Journal of Archaeology 3 [1948]: 445–50; Albrecht Goetze, Sumer 4 [1948]: 63–102; P. A. Pohl, Orientalia 18 [1949]: 126–29.) In this context the famous Code of Hammurabi appears as a comparative latecomer in Babylonia. The Code of Eshnunna, antedating Hammurabi’s code by almost two centuries, contains the first exact parallel to any biblical law, namely, that concerning the division of oxen after a fatal combat between the animals (Ex. 21:35). In addition to these codes must be mentioned the old Babylonian and Assyrian tablets from Kanish in Cappadocia (nineteenth century B.C.). A wealth of legal material (fifteenth century B.C.) has also been recovered at Nuzi, near modern Kirkuk, since 1925. Assyrian laws have been recovered by the Germans in the city of Ashur on the Tigris, much of it coming from the period of Tiglath-pileser I (c. 1110 B.C.). Hittite laws have also come to light and date a century or two earlier than the laws of Tiglath-pileser. In comparison with these various laws “the Book of the Covenant exhibits a combination of simplicity in economic life and ethical humanitarianism in human relations which could have arisen only in early Israel” (W. F. Albright, The O.T. in Modern Study [1951], pp. 39f.).

Mosaic Law and the Code of Hammurabi. This famous seven-foot-tall piece of black diorite that regulated the commercial, domestic, social, and moral life of the Hammurabi period (c. 1728–1676 B.C.) constitutes one of the most astonishing legal finds in history. It antedates the Mosaic legislation by three centuries. This famous legal code illuminates the Mosaic laws. As a result of the careful study of the two bodies of material, it will be found that the Mosaic code is neither borrowed from nor dependent upon the Babylonian, but is unique in those specific features that suited Israel’s need as an elect, theocratic nation. In comparing the two it might be observed (1) that the Mosaic and Hammurabic codes are different in content, the Mosaic laws containing numerous ritual regulations and religious stipulations, Hammurabic laws being almost purely civil; and (2) the two codes regulate different societies, Hammurabi’s laws governing an urban, commercial, thickly settled, irrigation culture; the Mosaic laws governing a simple agricultural, pastoral people not urbanized or commercially developed but conscious of their divine calling.

The two codes vary in their morality. Alfred Jeremias succinctly states the essential contrast of the two bodies of laws, noting that the Babylonian code is characterized by significant limitations: “(1) There is no control of lust. (2) There is no limitation of selfishness through altruism. (3) There is nowhere to be found a postulate of charity. (4) There is nowhere to be found the religious motif which recognizes sin as the destruction of the people because it is in opposition to the fear of God. In the Hammurabic Code every trace of religious thought is absent; behind the Israelite law stands ever the ruling will of the Holy God; it bears throughout a religious character” (The O.T. in the Light of the Ancient East [1911], 2:112). It may be fairly said that the resemblances or the likenesses between the two codes are traceable to similarity of antecedents and general intellectual and cultural heritage. M.F.U.

LAWGIVER (Heb. mōhōqēq; Gk. nomothētēs). Used in the usual sense of lawgiver (Isa. 33:22); of God as the Supreme Lawgiver and Judge (James 4:12); but elsewhere as a “scepter,” a badge of power (Ps. 60:7; Gen. 49:10).

LAWYER (Gk. nomikos, according to “law”). A term used to signify one who was conversant with the Mosaic law (Matt. 22:35; Luke 7:30; 10:25; 11:45; 14:3; Titus 3:13), and probably applied to a scribe (which see) in his practical administration of the law in the pronouncement of legal decisions. It is not by accident that the expression is so frequently used by Luke. He purposes by this repetition to make clear to his Roman readers the character of the Jewish scribes.

LAZ´ARUS (laz´a-rus; abridged form of Heb. “Eleazar”).

1. A beggar named in the story of the rich man (Luke 16:20–31), whose patient piety in this world was rewarded with bliss in the next. This is the only instance of a proper name appearing in a parable.

2. A man of Bethany and the brother of Mary and Martha. He was a personal friend of Jesus, by whom he was raised from the dead four days after his burial (John 11:1–44). Later, when a supper was given to our Lord, Lazarus was present, and many people gathered through a desire to see the resurrected man. Such convincing evidence of Jesus’ power was distasteful to the chief priests, and they “took counsel that they might put Lazarus to death also” (12:1–11). This they probably did not do, but satisfied themselves with the death of Jesus. According to an old tradition in Epiphanius (Hoer 66.34, p. 652), Lazarus was thirty years old when restored to life and lived thirty years after.

LEAF. Fig leaves are mentioned as forming the first covering of Adam and Eve (Gen. 3:7).

Figurative. Leaves, as the outward manifestation of life in the tree, are often used symbolically. A bright, fresh-colored leaf, showing that the tree was richly nourished, is figurative of prosperity (Ps. 1:3; Jer. 17:8); a faded leaf, on the contrary, shows a lack of moisture and nourishment and becomes an emblem of adversity and decay (Job 13:25; Isa.

64:6). In Ezekiel's vision of the holy waters the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom are spoken of under the image of trees growing on a river's bank and with fadeless leaves (Ezek. 47:12), which were for "the healing of the nations" (Rev. 22:1–2).

Leaves of a Door. Three Heb. terms are so translated: ṣelāc, a "side," 1 Kings 6:34; qelaac, 1 Kings 6:34; and delet, Ezek. 41:24. Keil (Com. ad loc.) thinks that the term refers to doors made in two sections, like "Dutch doors," that could be open either above or below. Their height in this case would be sufficient to allow the priests to pass through with only the lower half open. In Isa. 45:1, the "leaved gates" (KJV) or "doors" (NASB) refer to a double gate.

Leaves of a Book. See Columns of a Book.

LEAGUE. See Covenant.

LE'AH (lē'a). The oldest daughter of Laban, who by the deceit of her father became the wife of Jacob (Gen. 29:16–23). She was not beautiful like her sister Rachel, having weak eyes, which is probably the reason of Jacob's preference for her younger sister. Leah had six sons, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah (29:32–35), Issachar, and Zebulun (30:17–20), and a daughter, Dinah (v. 21). She probably died in Canaan, as she is not mentioned in the migration to Egypt (46:6), and was buried in Hebron (49:31).

LEATHER. See the articles Handicraft; Writing.

LEAVEN. A substance added to dough to cause it to rise, from Lat. levamen, that is, "that which rises," from lavere, "to raise."

Terms. The Heb. term šēḇōr occurs only five times in Scripture, in four of which (Ex. 12:15, 19; 13:7; Lev. 2:1–11) it is translated "leaven" and in the fifth (Deut. 16:3) "leavened bread." The NIV translates "yeast" in each of these references. This probably denotes the small portion of dough left from the preceding baking that had fermented and turned acidic. Its distinctive meaning is fermented or leavened mass. The Heb. expression maṣṣâ, "sweet," means without leaven (Lev. 10:12); thus the Heb. terms for the meaning of fermented or sour. The Gk. term is zumē and has the same latitude of meaning as the general Heb. words for leaven.

Preparation. In early times leaven was made from fine white bran kneaded with mold or with the meal of certain plants such as fitch or vetch, or from barley mixed with water and then allowed to stand until it turned sour. In later times it was made from bread flour kneaded without salt and kept until it passed into a state of fermentation.

Levitical Regulations. The Mosaic law strictly forbade the use of leaven in the priestly ritual (Lev. 2:11). Typically this signified that the offering was to be a type of purity, and leaven, which causes disintegration and corruption, symbolized evil and the energy of sin. To the Hebrew mind, whatever was in a decayed state suggested the idea of uncleanness and corruption. Amos (4:5), in the light of the prohibitions of the law, ironically commands the Jews of his day to "offer a thank offering also from that which is leavened." In two instances, however, the law permits its use—with the offering of the new loaves presented at Pentecost (Lev. 23:17) and in connection with the peace offering (7:13). The reason for the exception at Pentecost is that the two wave loaves of fine flour typify the NT church brought into being by the baptism of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:1–4; 1 Cor. 12:12–13). The two wave loaves typifying the church contain leaven because there is evil in the church; but it is to be carefully noted that the loaves with leaven were baked; that is, the manifested evil in the Body of Christ, the church, was judged in the death of Christ. Leaven, then, is symbolic or typical of evil, always having this implication in the OT (cf. Gen. 19:3; Ex. 12:8, 15–20, 34, 39). In the NT its symbolic meaning is also clear. It is "malice and wickedness" as contrasted with "sincerity and truth" (1 Cor. 5:6–8). It represents evil doctrine (Matt. 16:12) in its threefold manifestation of Phariseism, Sadduceism, and Herodianism (16:6; Mark 8:15). Religious externalism constituted the leaven of the Pharisees (Matt. 23:14, 16, 28), while a skeptical attitude toward the supernatural was the leaven of the Sadducees (22:23, 29), and the spirit of worldly compromise was the leaven of the Herodians (22:16–21; Mark 3:6). The parable of the leaven “which a woman took, and hid in three pecks of meal, until it was all leavened” (Matt. 13:34) is in agreement with the unvarying scriptural meaning of leaven. M.F.U.

LEB KA MAI (leb ka'mī). A cryptic name for Babylonia or Chaldea (Jer. 51:1, NASB and NIV marg.).

LEBA NA (le-ba'na; Neh. 7:48). See Lebanah.

LEB ANAH (leb'a-na), Leba nah (le-ba'na; “white,” poetically “the moon”). A Temple servant whose descendants returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:45; Neh. 7:48), about 536 B.C.

LEB ANON (leb'a-non; “white,” from the snow on its peaks). The loftiest and best-known mountain range of Syria, forming the northern boundary of Palestine. It is really a branch running southward from the Caucasus, and at its lower end forking into two parallel ranges—the eastern, or Anti-Lebanon, and the western, or Lebanon proper. The mountain chain of Lebanon begins at the great valley connecting the Mediterranean with the plain of Hamath (“Lebo-Hamath,” Num. 34:8) and runs SW until it sinks into the plain of Acre and the low hills of Galilee. Its extreme length is 110 miles, and the average breadth at its base about 20 miles. Its average height is from 6,000 to 8,000 feet; the highest peak—Jebel Mukhmel—is about 10,200 feet, and the Sannin about 9,000 feet. The highest peaks are covered with perpetual ice and snow, and the line of cultivation reaches to the height of about 6,000 feet. In the mountain recesses wild beasts range, as of old (2 Kings 14:9; Song of Sol. 4:8). Lebanon is remarkable for the grandeur and beauty of its scenery, and it supplied the sacred writers with many expressive similes (Pss. 72:16; 104:16–18; Song of Sol. 4:15; Isa. 2:13; 35:2; 60:13; Hos. 14:5). It was noted for its cedars (Ps. 29:5; Song of Sol. 5:15), its wines (Hos. 14:7), and its cool waters (Jer. 18:14).

The eastern range, or Anti-Lebanon, has its center at Mt. Hermon, from which a number of ranges radiate like the ribs of a half-opened fan. The first runs NE, parallel to Lebanon, from which it is separated by the valley of Coele-Syria, or the Beqa', whose average breadth is about six miles. Its elevation is not more than 4,500 feet. As it advances northward its features become wilder and grander, and the elevation increases until, above the plain of Zebedâny, it attains an elevation of about 7,000 feet. There is little change until it reaches the parallel of Ba'albek, when it begins to fall and declines gradually until at length it sinks down into the plain of Hamath. The lowest and last of the Anti-Lebanon ranges runs nearly due E along the plain of Damascus, continuing onward to Palmyra. Its average elevation is not more than 3,000 feet, and, with the exception of a few peaks, it does not rise more than 700 feet above the plain.

Climate. The climate of Lebanon varies greatly. In the plain of Dan, at the source of the Jordan, the heat and vegetation are almost tropical. The coast along the western base of Lebanon, though sultry during the summer months, is not unhealthy. The sea breeze setting in the evening keeps the night comparatively cool, and the air is dry and free from malaria. In the plains of Coele-Syria and Damascus snow falls, sometimes eight inches deep. The main ridges of both ranges are generally covered with snow from December to March. During the summer the higher parts of the mountain are cool and pleasant, rain seldom falling between June 1 and September 20.

History. Lebanon is first mentioned (Deut. 1:7; 11:24) as a boundary of the country promised to Israel; and to those who had lived in Egypt or the desert Lebanon must have seemed a paradise. It was originally inhabited by a number of independent, warlike tribes, some of whom Joshua conquered near Lake Merom (Josh. 11:2–18). They are said to have been of Phoenician stock (Pliny 5.17; Eusebius Onom., s.v.; cf. 1 Kings 5). Farther N were the Hivites (Judg. 3:3), the Giblites, and the Arkites. The Israelites never completely subdued them, but the Phoenicians appear to have had them under their power, as they supplied themselves and Solomon with timber from their forests (1 Kings 5:9–11; Ezek. 27:9). Still later the king of Assyria felled its timber for his military engines (Isa. 14:8; 37:24; Ezek. 31:16). In the fourth century B.C. the whole country was incorporated with the country or kingdom of the Seleucids. Today the Republic of Lebanon embraces much of what was ancient Phoenicia.

Figurative. Lebanon is used to symbolize that which is great, strong, beautiful, as: (1) the army of Asshur (Isa. 10:34); (2) a proud people (Isa. 29:17); (3) the Jews (Jer. 22:6, 23; Hab. 2:17); (4) perhaps of the Temple, in which was timber from Lebanon; (5) the mourning of Lebanon, of deep affliction (Ezek. 31:15).

LEBA´OTH (le-bā´oth; Josh. 15:32). See Beth-lebaath.

LEBBE´US (le-bē´us; “courageous”). In KJV a surname of Judas (Matt. 10:3), one of the twelve apostles. He was called also Thaddaeus, which Meyers (Com. in loco.) believes was his regular apostolic name.

LE´BO HA´MATH (lē´bō hā´math). The NASB and NIV name for Hamath (which see). The KJV translates Lebo literally as “entrance” and thus the full name as “entrance to Hamath.”

LEBO´NAH (le-bō´na; “frankincense”). A town near Shiloh, N of the spot where the young men of Benjamin were directed to capture the Shilonite maidens at the yearly festival (Judg. 21:19). It is, doubtless, the same as Lubban, three miles NW of Shiloh.

LE´CAH (le´ka). A place in the tribe of Judah founded by Er (1 Chron. 4:21), not elsewhere mentioned.

LEECH. See Animal Kingdom.

LEEKs. See Vegetable Kingdom.

LEES (Heb. shēmer, something “preserved”). “Wines on the lees” are wines that have been left to stand upon their lees after the first fermentation is over, which have thus thoroughly fermented, have been kept a long time, and are then filtered before drinking. Hence the wine was both strong and clear; in which case it was used figuratively for the full enjoyment of blessedness in the perfected kingdom of God (Isa. 25:6, “aged wine, ... refined, aged wine,” see marg.). Allowed to remain upon the lees, the wine became thick and syrupy, and symbolized the sloth, indifference, and gross stupidity of the ungodly (Jer. 48:11; Zeph. 1:12, marg.). To drink the lees (“dregs,” Ps. 75:8; and elsewhere in the NIV) was an expression for the endurance of extreme punishment.

LEFT. The left hand was esteemed of ill omen, hence the term sinister as equivalent to unfortunate. This was especially the case among the Greeks and Romans. The Greek term was used in taking auguries; but those omens were euphemistically called euōnuma, which in fact were regarded as unlucky, that is, which came from the left, sinister omens (for which a good name was desired). Among the Hebrews the left hand indicated the north (Gen. 14:15, see marg.; Job 23:9), the person's face being supposed to be turned toward the East.

LEFT-HANDED (Heb. šittēr yad-ymînô, "shut" as to "his right hand"). A term applied to one who is unable to use skillfully his right hand (Judg. 3:15; 20:16). It can hardly mean ambidexterity, since the expression "shut as to his right hand" would preclude the fact of one's ability to use both hands alike. An instance of using both hands dexterously is given in 1 Chron. 12:2. Perhaps this power of using the left hand may have come through practice.

LEG. The bones of the legs of crucified persons were broken to hasten death (John 19:31). See Crucifixion.

LEGION. A main division of the Roman army, nearly equivalent to our regiment. It comprised a much larger number of men, running from 3,000 men to about 6,000 at the time of Christ. See Army.

Figurative. The word legion came to mean a great number or multitude, for example, of angels (Matt. 26:53) and of evil spirits (Mark 5:9, 15).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H. M. D. Parker, The Roman Legions (1928).

LEHA'BIM (le-ha'bim). A people reckoned among the Midianite stock (Gen. 10:13; 1 Chron 1:11). The Lehabim are undoubtedly the fair-haired, blue-eyed Libyans, who as far back as the nineteenth and twentieth dynasties had been incorporated into the Egyptian army. At one time they occupied much the same place in Egyptian history as was subsequently occupied by the Lydians, and the Twenty-second Dynasty, that of Shishak, was of Libyan extraction and owed its rise to power to the influence of the Libyan troops.

LEHA'BITES. See Lehabim.

LE'HI (le'hi; a "cheek, or jawbone"). The place in Judah where Samson killed the Philistines with a jawbone (Judg. 15:9, 14, 16). In v. 19 we read of "the hollow place that is in Lehi." The spring in the hollow place he called En-hakkore, "fountain of him that prayed."

LEM'UEL (lem'u-el, belonging "to God"). A person of whom nothing is known, except that to him the admonitory apothegms of Prov. 31:2–9 were addressed by his mother. The rabbinical commentators identify Lemuel with Solomon, which seems the most likely conjecture. Others (such as Grotius) refer the epithet to Hezekiah, while yet others (such as Gesenius) believe that it refers to some neighboring petty Arabian prince.

Figurative. The leopard is illustrative of God in His judgments (Hos. 13:7); of the Macedonian kingdom (Dan. 7:6); of the Antichrist (Rev. 13:2); tamed, of the wicked subdued by truth and grace (Isa. 11:6).

LEPER (Heb. šāraʿ, "smite"). A person suffering from leprosy. The nature of leprosy is discussed in the article Diseases. Mosaic regulation of leprosy is discussed below, in the article Leprosy and the Mosaic Law.

LEPROSY AND THE MOSAIC LAW (Heb. šāraʿat, "a smiting," "a scourge"). Here will be considered the Mosaic regulations respecting the existence of leprosy and the purification from it. The law for leprosy treats leprosy in man, in a house, and in fabrics:

Leprosy in Man. The priest was to decide whether the leprosy was in its dangerous forms when appearing on the skin (Lev. 13:2–28), on the head and beard (vv. 29–37); in harmless forms (vv. 38–39); and when appearing on a bald head (vv. 40–44); and he was to give instructions concerning the removal of the leper from social contact (vv. 45–46). When he was thus excluded the leper was to wear mourning costume, rend his clothes, leave the hair of his head disordered, keep the beard covered, and cry, "Unclean! Unclean!" that everyone might avoid him for fear of being defiled (cf. Lam. 4:15). As long as the disease lasted he was to dwell outside the camp (Lev. 13:45–46; Num. 5:2–4; 12:15; etc.) Respecting the symptoms the priest was to decide as to whether they indicated leprosy or some other disease.

The ceremony prescribed for the purification of persons cured of leprosy is based on the idea that this malady is the bodily symbol not so much of sin merely as of death. Accordingly the rite of purification resolved itself into two parts. The first part of the rite had to do with the readmission of the sufferer (Lev. 14:1–9), who had been looked upon as dead, into the society of the living, and the preparation for his return to fellowship with the covenant people. This ceremony, therefore, took place outside the camp. The officiating priest caused two clean and living birds, along with some cedar wood, scarlet wool, and hyssop, to be brought. One of the birds was killed over running water, that is, water from a spring or stream, in such a way that the blood would flow into the water. He then dipped into this the living bird, the cedar, the scarlet wool, and the hyssop—the symbol of duration of life, vigor of life, and purity. He then sprinkled it seven times upon the leper, after which the living bird was set free, thus symbolizing that the leper was at liberty to return to society. The slain bird, though not having a sacrificial character, seems intended to show that the leper was saved from death by the intervention of divine mercy. The sprinkling was repeated seven times. The symbolical cleansing was followed by the shaving off of the hair, which was peculiarly liable to be affected by the leprosy, bathing the body in water, and washing the clothes.

The second part of the rite had to do with readmission of the former leper to the camp (Lev. 14:10–32), that he might resume living in his tent. This privilege was obtained after a second cleansing, on the eighth day. On this day the priest presented the candidate, with the necessary offerings, before the Lord. These offerings were two male lambs, one ewe lamb, three-tenths of an ephah of flour mingled with oil, and one log of oil. The priests waved one of the male lambs and the log of oil for a trespass offering. The lamb was then slain, and some of the blood was put upon the tip of the ear, the hand, and the foot of the person. These same organs were afterward anointed with oil, and after the priest had sprinkled some of the oil seven times before the Lord the remainder was poured upon the head of the person to be dedicated. The ewe lamb was then offered for a sin offering, for the purpose of making atonement (v. 19), after which the burnt and meat offerings were presented. In case the person was poor he offered one lamb, two turtledoves, or two young pigeons (vv. 21–22). Thus the restored leper was admitted again to communion with the altar and with Israel.

Leprosy in a House. The law concerning leprosy in a house was made known to Moses, as intended for the time when Israel should possess Canaan and dwell in houses. This leprosy manifested its presence by depressions of a greenish or reddish color on the walls, and was of vegetable formation. When these indications were observed the owner of the house reported to the priest, who directed that the whole contents of the house should be taken out, in order to prevent everything within it from becoming unclean. The priest then examined the walls of the house, and if he saw symptoms of the plague he ordered the house closed for seven days. If on the seventh day the leprosy gave evidence of spreading he ordered the affected stones to be removed, the inside of the house to be scraped, the removed parts replaced by others, and the walls plastered with fresh mortar. If, after these precautions, the evil should reappear, the leprosy was pronounced to be of a malignant type, and the house was pulled down, its stones, timber, and rubbish being removed to an unclean place outside the city. Any person entering the house, who ate or slept in it, was accounted unclean and was required to wash his clothes. If it was found that the plague had not spread after the house was plastered, the priest declared it free from disease, and after sprinkling it seven times with the same kind of sprinkling water as was used in the case of human leprosy, he purified it and made atonement for it that it might be clean (Lev. 14:33–53).

Leprosy in Fabrics. The leprosy in woolen or linen fabrics and in leather was probably the result of damp or ill ventilation, causing the material to rot, and was also indicated by greenish or reddish spots upon them. The presence of these was reported to the priest, who ordered the affected article to be shut up for seven days. If the spots had spread by the eighth day, the article was burned; if not, it was ordered washed and shut up another seven days. If similar spots then appeared, the article or material was burned; but if the leprous spot had yielded to the washing but left a stain, the stained portion was cut out and the remainder pronounced clean. In case no further indication of the disease appeared, the material was washed the second time and pronounced clean (Lev. 13:47–59). The Jewish laws exempted dyed material from liability to leprosy.

LETTER. Used both as an alphabetical character and correspondence (see Writing and Epistle). The words of the apostle (Gal. 6:11), “See with what large letters I am writing to you with my own hand,” is thus explained by Meyer (Com., ad loc.): “In accordance with his well-known manner in other passages, Paul adds to the letter, which up to this point he had dictated, the conclusion from verse 11 onward in his own handwriting. . . . But this close of our epistle was intended to catch the eyes of the readers as something so especially important, that from verse 12 to the end the apostle wrote with very large letters, just as we, in writing and printing, distinguish by letters of a larger size anything that we wish to be considered as peculiarly significant.”

Figurative. The “letter” of the law is used by the apostle Paul in opposition to the spirit (Rom. 2:27, 29; 7:6; 2 Cor. 3:6–7). In general letter is used to denote the Mosaic law, and mere external obedience to it.

LETU'SHIM (le-tū'shim; “hammered, oppressed”). The second son of Dedan, grandson of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:3), considerably after 1950 B.C. The plural form of the three sons of Dedan would seem to indicate tribes descended from him. See Dedan.

LETU'SHITES. See Letushim.

LEUM'MIM (le-um'im; “nations, peoples”). The last of the three sons of Dedan, grandson of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:3), or more probably a tribe descended from Dedan, among whose descendants they appear as third. Some have identified them with the Alumeotai of Ptolemy (6.7.24); but the Alumeotai of central Arabia have been quite as probably thought to correspond to Almodad. In the Sabaean inscriptions, however, the forms lmm and lmym occur.

LEUM'MITES. See Leummim.

LE'VI (lē'vī; a “joining”).

1. The third son of Jacob and Leah (Gen. 29:34), probably 1945 B.C. One fact alone is recorded in which Levi appears prominent. His sister Dinah (which see) was seduced by Shechem, and, according to the rough usage of the times, the stain could only be washed out by blood. Simeon and Levi took this task upon themselves. Covering their scheme with fair words and professions of friendship, they committed a cowardly and repulsive crime (Gen. 34). Levi shared in the hatred that his brothers bore to Joseph (37:4) and joined in the plot against him carried out at Dothan (37:12–32). Years later, with his three sons—Gershon, Kohath, and Merari—Levi went down into Egypt (46:11), and as one of the four oldest sons we may think of him as among the five specially presented to Pharaoh (47:2). Finally, Jacob, on his deathbed, recalled Levi's old crime and expressed his abhorrence of it (49:5–7). See Levites.

2. Father of Matthat and son of Melchi, third preceding Mary among the ancestors of Jesus (Luke 3:24) considerably before 22 B.C.

3. The father of another Matthat, and son of Simeon, in the maternal line between David and Zerubbabel (Luke 3:29), after 876 B.C.

4. An apostle. See Matthew.

LEVIRATE MARRIAGE (from Lat. levir, a “husband’s brother”). The name applied to the custom among the Hebrews that when an Israelite died without leaving male issue, his nearest relative should marry the widow and continue the family of his deceased brother through the firstborn son of their union, he becoming the heir of the former husband. If the brother did not choose to marry the widow she subjected him to gross insult. See Marriage, Levirate.

LEVITES (lē'vīts; Heb. bnêlêwî, “sons of Levi,” or simply lêwî, “Levites”). A patronymic title that, besides denoting all the descendants of Levi (Ex. 6:25; Lev. 25:32; Josh. 21:3, 41), is also the distinctive title of that portion of the tribe that was set apart for the service of the sanctuary and subordinate to the priests (Num. 8:6; Ezra 2:70; John 1:19; etc.). We sometimes read of “the Levitical priests” (Josh. 3:3; Ezek. 44:15).

Appointment. No reference is made to the consecrated character of the Levites in Genesis. Tracing its descent from Leah, the tribe would naturally take its place among the six chief tribes sprung from the wives of Jacob and share with them a superiority over those who bore the names of the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah. The work of Aaron and his greater brother Moses would give prominence to the family and tribe to which they belonged. And again the tribe stood separate and apart as the champions of Jehovah after the sin of making the golden calf. If the Levites had been sharers in the sin of the golden calf, they were, at any rate, the foremost to rally around their leader when he called on them to help him in stemming the progress of the evil. But we are told that the tribe of Levi was specially chosen by God for the purpose of entrusting to it the care and administration of holy things (Num. 3:5–13; 8:14–19). They were consecrated to Jehovah as His peculiar property, instead of the firstborn (which see) of the whole nation, these latter being replaced by the Levites, while all over and above the number required were ransomed at the rate of five shekels a head (18:15–16).

Division . Different functions were assigned to the separate houses of the Levitical branch of the tribe, as can be seen in table 21, formulated from Ex. 6:16–25 and Num. 3:17–20, italicizing the priestly branch.

1. Italics.

In Num. 3:21, Libni and Shimei are mentioned as fathers of families, as in Hebron in v. 27. The design of the genealogy appears to be to give the pedigrees of Moses and Aaron and some other principal heads of the family of Aaron (see Ex. 6:25).

Age and Qualifications. A Levite's period of service was from twenty-five to fifty years of age (Num. 8:24–25); after the latter age he ceased from work and merely “assisted” his brothers. The age of thirty years mentioned in Num. 4:3–49 has been variously explained, some thinking it to have arisen from an error of the copyist, others that it referred to the time of transporting the Tabernacle, others that the first selection of Levites was those from twenty-five to fifty, but that all future Levites had to commence service at thirty. The LXX solves the difficulty by uniformly reading twenty-five instead of thirty. No other qualification than that of age is mentioned, although the regulations in force among the priests respecting deformity and cleanness doubtless applied also to the Levites.

Duties. The functions of the whole tribe of Levi were to preserve the law of Jehovah in all its integrity and purity, to see that its requirements were duly complied with, to dispense justice in accordance with its enactments, and to transmit it to posterity (Lev. 10:11; Deut. 17:18; 31:9–13; 33:10; cf. 2 Chron. 17:8–9; Neh. 8:9; Ezek. 44:23; Mal. 2:7–8). The Levites, apart from their priestly portion, were to act as assistants to the sons of Aaron “for all the service of the tent” (Num. 18:4), but they were forbidden to touch any sacred furniture or the altar until it had been covered by the priests (4:5–15). As the Tabernacle was the sign of the presence among the people of their unseen King, so the Levites may be compared to a royal guard. When the people settled in Canaan it was the duty of the Levites, acting as police, to guard the sanctuary, to open and close it, to look after the cleaning of it and the furniture, to prepare the bread of the Presence and to do whatever other baking was needed in connection with the sacrifices, to lead the music (which see) during worship, to assist the priests in slaughtering and skinning the animals for sacrifice, to examine the lepers according to law, to look after the Temple supplies, and so on. For the heavier and more menial duties of their office, the Levites were assisted by Temple slaves. Thus the Gibeonites had been appointed to act as hewers of wood and drawers of water (Josh. 9:21). David and other kings presented persons to the sanctuary to perform services of such a nature (Ezra 8:20), probably prisoners of war who had become proselytes, called after the captivity Temple servants (which see).

Classification. The better to systematize their service, Moses divided the Levites into three sections by their respective descent from the sons of Levi, namely, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. They were under the general supervision of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, with aides having charge of a section (Num. 3:32).

Kohathites. Elizaphan was leader (Num. 3:30). At the building of the Tabernacle they numbered 8,600 men (3:28), with 2,750 qualified for active service (4:36). They camped on the S side of the Tabernacle (3:29). Their duty was to have charge of the Ark, the table of the bread of the Presence, the lampstands, the altars of burnt offering and of incense, the sacred vessels used in the service, and the veil (3:31; 4:4–15).

Gershonites. Eliasaph was leader (Num. 3:24). They numbered 7,500 men, with 2,630 qualified for active service (3:22; 4:40). They camped on the W side of the Tabernacle (3:23). Their duty was to have charge of curtains, the tent (i.e., above the planks), the coverings and the hanging for the door of the Tabernacle, the hangings of the court and the court entrance, their cords and instruments of service, also the work of taking down and setting these up (3:25–26; 4:22–28).

Merarites. Zuriel was leader (Num. 3:35). They numbered 6,200 men, with 3,200 qualified for active service (3:34; 4:44). They camped on the N side of the Tabernacle (3:35). Their duty was to have charge of the frames, bars, pillars, and sockets of the Tabernacle; also the pillars of the court, their sockets, pegs, cords, and tools pertaining thereto (3:36–37; 4:29–32). Owing to the heavy nature of the materials they had to carry, four wagons and eight oxen were assigned to them; and in the march both they and the Gershonites followed immediately after the standard of Judah, and before that of Reuben, that they might set up the Tabernacle before the arrival of the Kohathites (7:8).

Consecration. The consecration of the Levites began with sprinkling them with the “purifying water” (marg., “water of sin”), followed by shaving off the hair of the entire body, washing the clothes, and accompanied by the sacrifice of two bulls, fine flour, and oil (Num. 8:6–15). The purifying water is thought by some to be the same as that used in the purification for leprosy (Lev. 13:6, 9, 13), whereas others understand it to be the water in the laver, provided for the purpose of cleansing the priests for the performance of their duties. After this purification they were brought before the door of the Tabernacle and set apart for service by the laying on of the hands of the elders.

Revenues and Residence. Chosen from among the whole people to be Jehovah’s peculiar possession, the Levites did not obtain, like the rest of the tribes, any inheritance in the land of Canaan. Their portion was to be Jehovah Himself (Num. 18:20; Deut. 10:9; etc.), who ordained that they should have set apart for them four cities out of every tribe, along with the necessary pasture for their cattle (Num. 35:1–8). Besides this they received the tithes due to Jehovah from the fruits of the fields, from the flocks and herds (Lev. 27:30–33; cf. Num. 18:21–24), of the firstfruits (Ex. 23:19; Lev. 2:14; 23:17; etc.), of the firstborn (Ex. 13:12–13; Lev. 27:26; Num. 18:15–17; Deut. 15:19), as well as certain portions of the sacrificial offerings of the people (Num. 18:8–11, 19). Of the tithes the Levites had to turn over a tithe to the priests (18:26–32). The Levites lived for the greater part of the year in their own cities and came up at fixed periods to take their turn of work (1 Chron. 25–26). How long that term lasted we have no sufficient data for determining.

History. The history of the Levites occurs in distinctive segments.

Until the death of Solomon. We have seen that the Levites were to take the place of the earlier priesthood of the firstborn as representatives of the holiness of the people; that they acted as the royal guard, waiting upon Jehovah; and that they alone bore the Tabernacle and its sacred furniture. Failing to appreciate their holy calling, members of the section of Levites whose position brought them into contact with the tribe of Reuben conspired with it to reassert the old patriarchal system of a household priesthood. However, they were severely punished by divine interposition (Num. 16:1–40). Joshua, the successor of Moses, faithfully planned to continue the Mosaic ideal of the Levites as the priestly caste, providing them with cities to dwell in and servants from the conquered Hivites. During the period of the Judges we have only scanty material respecting the Levites, but the conduct of the people would seem to indicate that either the Levites failed to bear witness to the truth or had no power to enforce it. The shameless license of the sons of Eli may be looked upon as the result of a long period of decay affecting the whole order. Samuel, himself a Levite (1 Chron. 6:28, 33), infused new life into the organization. His rule and that of his sons, and the prophetic character now connected with the tribe, tended to give them the position of a ruling caste; and perhaps the desire of the people for a king was a protest against the assumption of the Levites of a higher position than that originally assigned them.

David definitely recognized their relation to the priesthood and publicly admitted their claim to be the bearers of the Ark (15:2). In the procession that entered Jerusalem bringing the Ark to its final resting place, the Levites were conspicuous, wearing their linen ephods and appearing in their new character as minstrels (15:27–28). The education that the Levites received for their peculiar duties, no less than their connection, more or less intimate, with the schools of the prophets, would tend to make them, so far as there was any education at all, the teachers of the others, the transcribers and interpreters of the law, and the chroniclers of the times in which they lived.

During the Divided Kingdom. Smith observes: “The revolt of the ten tribes, and the policy pursued by Jeroboam, led to a great change in the position of the Levites. They were the witnesses of an appointed order and a central worship. He wished to make the priests the creatures and instruments of the king, and to establish a provincial and divided worship. The natural result was that they left the cities assigned to them in the territory of Israel, and gathered round the metropolis of Judah (2 Chron. 11:13–14). In the kingdom of Judah they were, from this time forward, a powerful body, politically as well as ecclesiastically. We find them prominent in the war of Abijah against Jeroboam (13:10–12). They are sent out by Jehoshaphat to instruct and judge the people (19:8–10). The apostasy that followed on the marriage of Jehoram and Athaliah exposed them for a time to the dominance of a hostile system; but the services of the temple appear to have gone on, and the Levites were again conspicuous in the counter revolution effected by Jehoiada (chap. 23), and in restoring the temple to its former stateliness under Joash (24:5). The closing of the temple under Ahaz involved the cessation at once of their work and of their privileges (28:24). Under Hezekiah they again became prominent, as consecrating themselves to the special work of cleansing and repairing the temple (29:12–15); and the hymns of David and of Asaph were again renewed. Their old privileges were restored, they were put forward as teachers (30:22), and the payment of tithes, which had probably been discontinued under Ahaz, was renewed (31:14). The genealogies of the tribe were revised (v. 17), and the old classification kept its ground. The reign of Manasseh was for them, during the greater part of it, a period of depression. That of Josiah witnessed a fresh revival and reorganization (34:8–13). In the great Passover of his eighteenth year they took their places as teachers of the people, as well as leaders of their worship (35:3, 15). Then came the Egyptian and Chaldean invasions, and the rule of cowardly and apostate kings. Then the sacred tribe showed itself unfaithful. They had, as the penalty of their sin, to witness the destruction of the temple and to taste the bitterness of exile” (Dict. of the Bible).

After the Captivity. After the captivity, Smith notes, the “position taken by the Levites in the first movements of the return from Babylon indicates that they had cherished the traditions and maintained the practices of their tribe. It is noticeable that, in the first body of returning exiles, they were present in a disproportionately small number (Ezra 2:36–42). Those who do come take their old parts at the foundation and dedication of the second temple (3:10; 6:18). In the next movement under Ezra their reluctance was even more strongly marked. None of them presented themselves at the first great gathering (8:15). The special efforts of Ezra did not succeed in bringing together more than thirty-eight, and their places had to be filled by two hundred and twenty of the Nethinim (v. 20). Those who returned with him resumed their functions at the feast of tabernacles as teachers and interpreters (Neh. 8:7), and those who were most active in that work were foremost also in chanting the hymnlike prayer which appears in ch. 9 as the last great effort of Jewish psalmody. They are recognized in the great national covenant, and the offerings and tithes which were their due are once more solemnly secured to them (10:37–39). They take their old places in the temple and in the villages near Jerusalem (12:29), and are present in full array at the great feast of the dedication of the wall. The two prophets who were active at the time of the return, Haggai and Zechariah, if they did not belong to the tribe, helped it forward in the work of restoration. The strongest measures were adopted by Nehemiah, as before by Ezra, to guard the purity of their blood from the contamination of mixed marriages (Ezra 10:23); and they are made the special guardians of the holiness of the Sabbath (Neh. 13:22). The last prophet of the Old Testament sees, as part of his vision of the latter days, the time when the Lord ‘shall purify the sons of Levi’ (Mal. 3:3). The guidance of the Old Testament fails us at this point, and the history of the Levites in relation to the national life becomes consequently a matter of inference and conjecture” (Dict. of the Bible).

In the New Testament. The Levites appear but seldom in the history of the NT. Where we meet with their names it is as the type of a formal, heartless worship, without sympathy and without love (Luke 10:32). The mention of a Levite at Cyprus in Acts 4:36 shows that the changes of the previous century had carried that tribe also into “the Dispersion among the Greeks.”

LEVITICAL CITIES. As the Levites were to “have no inheritance in their land” (Num. 18:20), Moses commanded the children of Israel, that is, the rest of the tribes, to give towns to the Levites to dwell in of the inheritance that fell to them for a possession, with pasturage around the cities for their cattle (35:2–5). The pasturage was to “extend from the wall of the city outward a thousand cubits around. You shall also measure outside the city on the east side two thousand cubits.” These dimensions have caused great difficulty because of the apparent contradiction in the two verses, as specifying first 1,000 cubits and then 2,000.

Of the many explanations given of these measurements, two seem most probable. The Talmud (Erubin, 51a) assumes that the cities were circular in form, the space measured from the wall 1,000 cubits around being used as “suburbs,” and the space measured outside the city 2,000 cubits around being used for fields and vineyards, that is, as “the fields of the suburbs” (fig. 2). Keil & Delitzsch (Com., Num. 35:1–8), following J. D. Michaelis, assume that “the towns and surrounding fields were squares, the pasturage stretching 1,000 cubits from the city wall in every direction, ... the length of each outer side [being] 2,000 cubits, apart from the length of the city wall: so, that, if the town itself occupied a square of 1,000 cubits (fig. 3), the outer side of the town fields would measure 2,000+1,000 cubits in every direction; but if each side of the city was only 500 cubits long (fig. 4), the outer side of the town fields would measure 2,000+500 cubits in every direction.” Of these cities six were to be cities of refuge (which see), and thirteen were allotted to the priests’ portion of the tribe. Which cities belonged to the priests, which to the nonpriestly portion of the tribe, and how they were distributed among the other tribes (Josh. 21:3–42), is shown in table 22, “Distribution of the Levitical Cities.”

These cities were not given entirely to the Levites as their own property but only as many houses in the towns as sufficed for their necessities. These could be redeemed if sold at any time, and reverted to them without compensation in the year of Jubilee, even if not redeemed before (Lev. 25:32–33); but such portion of the city as was not taken possession of by them, together with the fields and villages, continued to be the property of those tribes to which they had been assigned by lot.

LEVITICUS. As Exodus is the book of redemption, Leviticus is the book of the cleansing, worship, and service of the redeemed people.

Name. The name describes its contents, for it deals with the law of the priests, the sons of Levi, Leviticus being taken from the Vulgate Leviticus (through the LXX Leueitikon). The designation sets forth the book as a manual of the OT priesthood (Heb. 7:11). The Jews, however, commonly designate the book from its opening phrase wayiqra, “and He called.” Leviticus sets forth the way of the priestly approach to God. Its inspired NT commentary, the epistle to the Hebrews, describes the same approach in the dispensation of grace. Being a handbook of Levitical directions, it has little narrative, and such brief passages as the episode of the strange fire offered by Nadab and Abihu (10:1–2) are most intimately connected with the illustrations of the law given.

Literary Character. The book incontrovertibly claims Mosaic authorship. Some fifty-six times in twenty-seven chapters the claim is made that these laws were divinely given through Moses. This is the traditional view. However, higher pentateuchal criticism denies the Mosaic authenticity of Leviticus. Critics commonly assign it to the so-called Priest Code, abbreviated

P, which is frequently dated about 500 B.C. or a little later. Some critics believe that Leviticus 17–27 is distinct enough from P to be designated H (“Holiness Code”), which is assumed to be combined with P to form our present book. Thus the critics can hardly escape making the book of Leviticus a pious forgery.

Weakness of the Critical Theory. The hypothesis of an exilic date (S. R. Driver) or postexilic date (Julius Bewer) for the so-called Priestly Code is filled with serious objections for the conservative. Morally it involves the dishonesty of passing off as Mosaic what was not Mosaic at all. This procedure is manifestly inconsistent with the moral standards of a prophet or any adequate view of inspiration. There is also the historical absurdity of getting so late a concoction of laws accepted at all or, what is even more incredible, approved as directly mediated by God to Moses. In addition, there is the legal inanity that is manifested in foisting the code in its Mosaic dress and wilderness framework on a postexilic economy. Critics describe the purpose of Leviticus as arousing the postexilic community to organize “a theocracy which was to be symbolized and realized in a hierocracy” (Julius Bewer, The Literature of the O. T., 7th ed. [1947], p. 259), but this is highly artificial, arbitrary, and against internal evidence of the book itself. Moreover, archaeological discoveries have shown that codification of law in the Near East came early, rather than late, as critics used to assert. There is therefore no objective reason for dating OT legislation late. See Law of Moses: Mosaic and Near Eastern Laws.

LEVY (Heb. mas, “tribute”). The term applied to a company of 30,000 Israelites raised by Solomon (1 Kings 5:13). They were free Israelites who to pay tribute (or tax) worked four months in the year, felling trees under the direction of subjects of Hiram. Another levy was of Canaanites, who were assigned to tributary labor (9:15), in this case for the erection of buildings. The NIV translates mas as “forced labor.”

LEWD, LEWDNESS (Heb. zimmâ, etc., “badness”). Evil or wicked in a moral sense, licentiousness (Judg. 20:6; Ezek. 16:43, 58; etc.). The word is also used once in Hos. 2:10 and refers to the “parts of shame” (Heb. nablût).

LIBATION. The act of pouring wine on the ground in divine worship. Sometimes other liquids have been used, such as oil, milk, water, and honey, but mostly it has been wine. Among the Greeks and Romans it was an essential part of solemn sacrifices. Libations were also in use among the Hebrews, who poured a hin of wine on the sacrifice after it was killed, and the several pieces of the sacrifice were laid on the altar ready to be consumed in the flames. See Offerings.

LIBERTY, CHRISTIAN. Also called evangelical liberty, this is a phrase that covers several NT representations of the Christian life.

1. Believers are emancipated from the bondage of Satan, the domination of sin, guilt, and the fear of death (see John 8:31–36; Acts 26:17–18; Rom. 7:24–25; 8:15; Heb. 2:14–15). Spiritual union with Christ, involving the service of Christ, is compatible with perfect freedom; inasmuch as we are thus restored to the right relationship to God and brought into harmony with His will (see Matt. 11:28–30; James 1:25).

2. Christians are not under obligation to observe the distinctly Jewish regulations. Circumcision, the sign of the Old Covenant, with the whole body of ceremonial and economic requirements essential to the chosen nation during the period that was preparatory to the gospel, under the gospel is set aside. These features of religion, once imposed by special revelation, were annulled by the incoming of the new dispensation. They were not in keeping with the proper magnifying of the grace of Christ, the dignity and inward liberty of redeemed souls, their moral elevation and illumination, or their relationship as children of God. Nor were they adapted to Christianity as designed to be the universal religion of the world (see John 4:20–24; Acts 15:1–29; Gal. 2:1–21; 5:1–6; Heb. 8:10, 13).

3. The phrase also refers to the privilege of Christians to regulate their lives as individuals with respect to matters that are morally indifferent. The NT instructions upon this point were developed for the most part on account of the attempt to impose Jewish regulations upon converts of Christianity, but the principles set forth are of much broader application and are still of great importance (see Rom. 13; 14:14; 1 Cor. 7:8; also Scriptures referred to above). With respect to such things as are not commanded or forbidden in the Word of God, Christian liberty may be exercised and should be allowed. Actions are not to be pronounced sinful that are not sinful. Nonessentials are not to be elevated to the place of essential virtues. Proper room must be left for the exercise of individual judgment or of enlightened Christian conscience. But this liberty with respect to things indifferent is not absolute. Its exercise is under the limitations of the laws of self-preservation, of expediency, of duty, or of love. Concession should be made for the sake of “the weak,” though care should be taken not to make them in such a way, or to such an extent, as to perpetuate their weakness or to promote superstition. If the former is not done “the weak” are needlessly injured. If the latter is omitted the principle of evangelical liberty is violated, Christians are reduced to un-Christian slavery, and the progress of Christ’s kingdom is obstructed.

LIB’NAH (lib’na; “whiteness”).

1. The twenty-first station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:20–21); not identified.

2. A city of the Canaanites, near Lachish, captured by Joshua (Josh. 10:29–32; 12:15); the birthplace of Josiah’s queen, Hamutal (2 Kings 23:31). It was strongly fortified when Sennacherib laid siege to it, and the Assyrian army was cut off (19:8–9, 35). It was a Levitical city in the tribe of Judah (Josh. 21:13) and has been identified with the modern Tell es Safi, but today commonly is identified with Tell Bornat, about five miles N of Lachish.

LIB'NI (lib'ni; "white").

1. The first son of Gershon, the son of Levi (Ex. 6:17; Num. 3:18; 1 Chron. 6:17, 20), after 1900 B.C. His descendants are called Libnites (Num. 3:21; 26:58).

2. The son of Mahli, son of Merari (1 Chron. 6:29). It is probable that he is the same as the preceding and that something has been omitted from the text (Smith, Dict., s.v.).

LIB'NITE (lib'nīt; "white"). A descendant of Libni, the Levite (Num. 3:21; 26:58).

LIB'YA (lib'ya). The country of the Lubim (Gen. 10:13), the tract lying on the Mediterranean between Egypt and Carthage (Ezek. 30:5; Acts 2:10). Cyrene was one of its cities. See Lubim.

LICE. See Animal Kingdom.

LIE. A lie is the utterance by speech or act of that which is false, with intent to mislead or delude. In Scripture the word is used to designate all the ways in which men deny or alter the truth in word or deed, as also evil in general. Good is designated as truth and evil as its opposite. Hence the Scriptures most expressly condemn lies (John 8:44; 1 Tim. 1:9–10; Rev. 21:27; 22:15). The Bible mentions instances of good men telling lies but without approving them, as that of Abraham (Gen. 12:13–19; 20:2–13), Isaac (26:7–9), Jacob (chap. 27), the Hebrew midwives (Ex. 1:15–19), Michal (1 Sam. 19:11–17), David (chap. 20).

LIFE. As used in the Bible, life denotes both physical, or natural, life, eternal life, and absolute life.

Physical, or Natural, Life. This is mere animal life (Gen. 6:17; 7:15). It thus often has reference to man's bodily life upon the earth, its relative value, and transient duration (e.g., Ex. 1:14; Pss. 17:14; 63:3; James 4:14). This form of life propagated by human generation is subject to physical death. Nevertheless, as it involves the whole man, this life is endless in every human being, saved or unsaved. Natural life has a beginning but no end. For the saved it involves eternal life or endless union and fellowship with God. For the unsaved it involves eternal existence in separation from God.

Eternal Life. This is the gift of God as a result of faith in Jesus Christ (Eph. 2:8–10). It must not be confused with mere endless existence, which is true of the unsaved. It involves the endless continuance and perfection of blessedness and communion with God entered upon by the saved on the earth (cf. Matt. 18:8–9; Luke 18:30; John 3:15–16; 6:40; 17:3; Rom. 2:7). (See Immortality.) Thus John writes, "He who has the Son has the life; he who does not have the Son of God does not have the life" (1 John 5:12; cf. John 10:10 with Col. 1:27).

Absolute Life. God in Christ, as self-existent or absolute life, is the source of all life (John 4:26; 14:6; Col. 3:4; 1 John 1:1–2; 5:20).

Manner of Life. This is referred to in Luke 8:14; Eph. 4:18; 1 Tim. 2:2; 1 John 2:16. M.F.U.

LIFT (Heb. nāṣā; Gk. airō). Besides the general meaning of raising, this word has figurative meanings:

1. To lift up the hands is, among the orientals, a common part of taking an oath (Gen. 14:22; Ex. 6:8, see marg.). To lift up one's hand against another is to attack, to fight him (2 Sam. 18:28; 1 Kings 11:26–27, see marg.).

2. To lift up one's face in the presence of another is to appear boldly in his presence (2 Sam. 2:22; Ezra 9:6).

3. To lift up one's hands, eyes, soul, or heart to the Lord, are expressions describing the sentiments and emotion of one who prays earnestly or ardently desires something.

LIGHT (mostly Heb. ōr; Gk. phōs). Light is declared by the Scriptures to have come into existence by the express decree of the Almighty and to have been in existence long before man or animals or vegetables had their being (Gen. 1:3).

Of all the benefits that we, as inhabitants of this lower world, have received from God, there are few more remarkable than the possession of light, along with an ability to make use of it. By it we come to possess much of our knowledge, many of our comforts and necessities; to say nothing of its wonderful purity, delicacy, and variety of colors that it reveals to the eyes of men. It is not at all surprising, therefore, that it should exercise a vast influence over the imagination of mankind and lead to its worship. Such being the case, we find many instances in the Word where such tendency is discouraged. See Sun, Worship of.

Figurative. The Almighty Himself is frequently spoken of as connected with the idea of light. Thus "God is light" (1 John 1:5); the "Father of lights" (James 1:17). God is addressed as "covering Thyself with light as with a cloak" (Ps. 104:2) and as One "who alone possesses immortality and dwells in unapproachable light" (1 Tim. 6:16). Great sublimity is introduced by the combination of figures of darkness and light, and by making them mutually enhance each other (Ps. 18:11–12; Ex. 24:15–17). Jesus, as the One who brings the true knowledge of God, is called "the light of men" (John 1:4; see also Matt. 4:16; John 1:9; 8:12; 12:35–36). Light is continually used as figurative of holiness and purity (Prov. 6:23; Isa. 5:20; Rom. 13:12). Light also, as might naturally be expected, is frequently used for spiritual illumination, especially that illumination that is effected in the soul by the indwelling Spirit of God (2 Cor. 4:6; Eph. 5:14; 1 Pet. 2:9). Again, light is used as the figure in general for that which cheers or renders prosperous, and is applied with much force to spiritual joy arising from the happy influences of the Spirit of peace. Hence the frequent use of the expressions "the light of Thy countenance" (Ps. 4:6); "the Lord is my light and my salvation" (27:1); and "light is sown like seed for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart" (97:11). A striking variety is given in Job 37:21: "Men do not see the light which is bright in the skies," their trouble so oppressing them that all seems dark, and they observe not the happier times in store for them. The Word of God is compared to a "lamp" (Ps. 119:105). Light is also applied to the heavenly state (Isa. 60:19–20; Col. 1:12; Rev. 21:23–25; 22:5). Finally, the figure is applied to Christians in general (Matt. 5:14; Eph. 5:8) and to holy men, such as John the Baptist (John 5:35). See Lamp.

LIGHTNING (Heb. bārāq, "gleam"; Gk. astrapē). In Syria lightning is frequent in autumn, seldom a night passing without a great deal of it, sometimes accompanied by thunder. A squall of wind and clouds of dust usually precede the first rains.

Figurative. Lightning is used as a symbol of God's glorious and awful majesty (Rev. 4:5); such as His edicts, enforced with destruction to those that oppose Him (Pss. 18:14; 144:6; Zech. 9:14); and, accompanied with thunder and hail, of great plagues, so that men blasphemed on account of it.

LIGN ALOES. See Vegetable Kingdom: Aloes, Lign Aloes.

LIGURE. See Mineral Kingdom: Jacinth.

LIKENESS. See Form.

LIK'HI (lik'hi). The third named of the four sons of Shemidah, son of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:19), after 1876 B.C.

LILY. See Vegetable Kingdom.

LILY BLOSSOM (Heb. perah shōshān). In the NASB and NIV of 1 Kings 7:26 this term is used in connection with the decoration of the brim of the large cast metal sea in Solomon's Temple. The KJV reads "flowers of lilies." See Laver: Temple Basins; Sea, Bronze.

LILY DESIGN. Part of the ornamentation of the two pillars that were erected (2 Chron. 3:15) before the (Temple) house. The pillars were surmounted by capitals, and these were covered to a depth of four cubits with sculpture in the form of flowering lilies, below which was a cubit of network and pomegranates (1 Kings 7:19, 22).

LILY OF THE COVENANT. See Shushan Eduth.

LIME. See Mineral Kingdom.

LINE. The rendering of several Heb. words and one Gk. word, with various meanings. Thus we have a line such as our measuring line (2 Sam. 8:2; Isa. 34:17; Ezek. 40:3; 47:3; Amos 7:17), a cord (Josh. 2:18, 21; etc.). There can be little doubt that the Hebrews acquired the art of measuring land from the ancient Egyptians, who were early acquainted with it. The language of Josh. 18:9, "So the men went and passed through the land, and described it by cities in seven divisions in a book," evidently indicates that a survey of the whole country had been made.

Figurative. The word line, as a string of a musical instrument, is used for sound (Ps. 19:4). In Isa. 28:10, 13, the expression "line on line, line on line" ("rule on rule, rule on rule," NIV), and so on, is a sneer intended to throw ridicule upon the smallness and irritating character of the prophet's interminable and uninterrupted chidings. The word also means a portion as described by measurement (Ps. 16:6).

LINEAGE (Gk. patria, paternal "descent," "families," Acts 3:25; Eph. 3:15; family or race, Luke 2:4). See Genealogy.

LINEAR MEASURES. See Metrology.

LINEN. Linen was well known in the ancient biblical world. The Egyptians were especially famous for their fine linen. The flax was planted in Egypt in November and gathered almost four months later. It had to be separated from its seeds, bunched, retted, laid in the sun, and immersed in water to bleach and soften it for crushing. The flax fibers were beaten out of the woody portions, and it was drawn by a comblike implement into thread for weaving on looms. Palestine as well as Egypt developed dexterity in weaving fine linens. Flax prospered in the tropical climate around Jericho. Rahab is said to have had dried flax on the top of her roof. Blooming flax is a common sight in biblical lands. The Hebr. word pishtūm is rendered "linen" in some versions in Lev. 13:47; Deut. 22:11; Jer. 13:1; etc., and "flax" in Josh. 2:6; Judg. 15:14; Prov. 31:13; Isa. 19:9; Ezek. 40:3; Hos. 2:5, 9. This expression refers not only to flax (Judg. 15:14) but also to the plant itself (2:6) and what is manufactured from it. It was used for nets (Isa. 19:8–9), waistbands (Jer. 13:1), measuring lines (Ezek. 40:3), as well as priestly dress (44:17–18). (See Flax.) The Heb. expression bûš from a root signifying “to be white” (Akkad., bušu) is apparently a late word for fine linen and appears to be identical with Gk. bussos. It was employed for the attire of the Levitical choir (2 Chron. 5:12), for the loose upper garment worn by kings over the close-fitting tunic (1 Chron. 15:27), and for the veil for the Temple, embroidered by the skill of Tyrian craftsmen (2 Chron. 3:14). Mordecai was arrayed in robes of “fine linen and purple” (Esther 8:15) when honored by the Persian monarch, and the dress of the rich man in Luke 16:19 was “purple and fine linen” (bussos). The merchandise of mystical Babylon contained as one of its commodities fine linen (Rev. 18:12). The Heb. word shēsh, an Egyptian word denoting linen of byssus, is used of the linen brought to Tyre (Ezek. 27:7), which was also one of the offerings brought out of Egypt by the Israelites (Ex. 25:4; 35:6). It seems apparent that shēsh is identical with Heb. bûš. It is used to describe the garments of Joseph (Gen. 41:42), of priests (Ex. 28:5; 39:2–3, 5; etc.), and also of the curtains and veil of the Tabernacle (26:1, 31, 36; 27:9, 16, 18; etc.). Linen was extensively used in wrapping the dead, as in the burial of our Lord. This practice was evidently of Egyptian influence. In the land of the Nile mummy wrappings were of incredible proportions and were exclusively of linen. Laodicea in Asia Minor was an important center of linen weaving. Such cities as Byblos, Tyre, and Beth-shan were famous as linen-manufacturing cities as late as the fourth century A.D. See also Dress. M.F.U.

Figurative. Linen is used as an emblem of moral purity (Rev. 15:6) and of luxury (Luke 16:19).

LINTEL (Heb. mashqôp, “overhanging”). The beam that forms the upper part of the framework of a door (Ex. 12:7, 22–23). This the Israelites were commanded to mark with the blood of the Paschal lamb on the memorable occasion when the Passover was instituted.

LI'NUS (lī'nus). One of the Christians at Rome whose salutations Paul sent to Timothy (2 Tim. 4:21), A.D. 64.

LION. See Animal Kingdom.

Figurative. The strength (Judg. 14:18; 2 Sam. 1:23), courage (17:10; Prov. 28:1; etc.), and ferocity (Gen. 49:9; Num. 24:9) of the lion was proverbial. Hence the lion was symbolical of Israel (24:9), of the tribe of Judah (Gen. 49:9), of Gad (Deut. 33:20) and Dan (33:22, “a lion’s whelp”), of Christ (Rev. 5:5), of God in protecting His people (Isa. 31:4), of God in executing judgments (38:13; Lam. 3:10; Hos. 5:14; 13:8), of the boldness of the righteous (Prov. 28:1), of brave men (2 Sam 1:23; 23:20), of cruel and powerful enemies (Isa. 5:29; Jer. 49:19), of persecutors (Ps. 22:13; 2 Tim. 4:17), of Satan (1 Pet. 5:8), of imaginary fears of the slothful (Prov. 22:13; 26:13). The tamed lion is symbolical of the natural man subdued by grace (Isa. 11:7; 65:25), while the roaring of a lion is used to characterize a king’s wrath.

LIP (Heb. šāpâ, with the idea of “termination”). In addition to its literal meaning the word is often used in the original for an edge or border, as of a cup, a garment, the sea, and so on. It is often put as the organ of speech, thus to “open His lips” is to begin to speak (Job 11:5; 32:20); to “restrain my lips” is to keep silence (Ps. 40:9; Prov. 10:19). The “fruit of our lips” (Hos. 14:2; Heb. 13:15) is a metaphor for praise, a thank offering. “The lips of strangers” stands in Scripture for language or dialect (1 Cor. 14:21). The moral quality of speech is represented by “lying lips,” i.e., falsehood (Prov. 10:18; 17:7), wickedness (Ps. 120:2; cf. Prov. 17:4), or truth (12:19). Ardent professions are represented by “burning lips” (26:23). To “separate with the lip” (Ps. 22:7) has always been an expression of the utmost scorn and defiance; so “unclean lips” are used to express an unfitness to impart or receive divine communications (Isa. 6:5, 7), and the touching of the lip with a “burning coal” is figurative for cleansing it.

LITTER (Heb. ṣāb, Isa. 66:20; “wagon,” NIV). A covered and curtained couch provided with shafts, and borne by men or animals, that was in general use as a conveyance throughout the East.

LITTLE OWL. See Animal Kingdom: Owl.

LIVER (Heb. kābēd, “heavy, weighty,” as the “heaviest” of the internal organs). The word often occurs in the natural sense, as indicative of a vital organ in the animal system, especially with reference to the part of animals slain in sacrifice (“the lobe of the liver,” Ex. 29:13, 22; Lev. 3:4, 10, 15; 4:9; etc.). See Sacrificial Offerings. The liver was used by the ancients for the purpose of divination (which see), and such use was not unknown to the Jews, though it is only once referred to in the Scriptures, and then with reference to the conduct of a heathen prince (Ezek. 21:21). In common with other ancient peoples, the Israelites were inclined to identify the liver more with the source and center of life than we do and sometimes put liver where we would put heart (see Prov. 7:23; Lam. 2:11, see marg.).

LIVING BEINGS (Ezek. 1, 3, 10). Living Creatures (Rev. 4:6–9). Both are identical with cherubim (which see).

LIZARD. See Animal Kingdom: Lizard; Great Lizard; and Sand Lizard.

Figurative. In Prov. 30:28 the lizard is introduced as one of the instances of instinctive discernment and providence; tolerated, even in palaces, to destroy flies.

LOAVES OF BREAD (Heb. kikkār, “circle”; Gk. artos; sometimes only lehem, “bread”). Round cakes or biscuits, the usual form of bread among the orientals (Ex. 29:23, “cake of bread”; Judg. 8:5; 1 Sam. 10:3; 1 Chron 16:3; Matt. 14:17; Mark 6:38; etc.). See Bread; Offering.

LO-AM’MI (lō’am-i; “not my people”). The figurative name given by the prophet Hosea to his second son by Gomer, the daughter of Diblaim (Hos. 1:9), to denote the rejection of the kingdom of Israel by Jehovah. Its significance is explained in vv. 9–10.

LOAN. The law of Moses did not contemplate any raising of money by loans to obtain capital; and bankers and sureties, in the commercial sense (Neh. 5:3; Prov. 22:26), were unknown in the early ages of the Hebrews. The law made the following provisions respecting loans.

Interest. It strictly forbade any interest to be taken for a loan to any poor person, and at first, as it seems, even in the case of a foreigner; but this prohibition was afterward limited to the Hebrews only, from whom, of whatever rank, not only was no usury on any pretense to be exacted, but relief to the poor by way of loan was enjoined, and excuses for evading this duty were forbidden (Ex. 22:25; Lev. 25:35–37; Deut. 15:1–3, 7–10; 23:19–20).

As commerce increased, the practice of usury, and so also of suretyship, grew; but the exaction of it from a Hebrew appears to have been regarded to a late period as discreditable (Ps. 15:5; Prov. 6:1; 11:15; 17:18; 20:16; Jer. 15:10; Ezek. 18:5–17; 22:12). Systematic breach of the law in this respect was corrected by Nehemiah after the return from captivity (Neh. 5:1–13). The money changers, who had seats and tables in the Temple, were traders whose profits arose chiefly from the exchange of money with those who came to pay their annual half shekel.

Pledges. In making loans no prohibition is pronounced in the law against taking a pledge of the borrower, but certain limitations are prescribed in favor of the poor. (1) The outer garment, if taken in pledge, was to be returned before sunset. (2) The prohibition was absolute in the case of (a) the widow's garment (Deut. 24:17) and (b) a millstone of either kind (24:6). (3) A creditor was forbidden to enter a house to reclaim a pledge, but was to stand outside until the borrower should come forth to return it (24:10–11). (4) The original Roman law of debt permitted the debtor to be enslaved by his creditor until the debt was discharged; and he might even be put to death by him. The Jewish law, although it did not forbid temporary bondage in the case of debtors, did forbid a Hebrew debtor to be detained as a bondsman longer than the seventh year, or, at furthest, the year of Jubilee (Ex. 21:2; Lev. 25:39–42; Deut. 15:9).

LOCK (Heb. verb nā'al, to “fasten”; noun man'âl). The doors of the ancient Hebrews were secured by bars of wood or iron, the latter generally used in the entrances of fortresses, prisons, and towns (see Isa. 45:2). The locks are usually of wood and consist of a partly hollow bolt from fourteen inches to two feet long for external doors or gates, or from seven to nine inches for interior doors. The bolt passes through a groove in a piece attached to the door into a socket in the doorpost. In the groove-piece are from four to nine small iron or wooden sliding pins or wires, which drop into corresponding holes in the bolt, and fix it in its place (Neh. 3:3, 6, 13–15). The key has a certain number of iron pegs at one end, which correspond to the holes in the bolt of the lock, into which they are introduced to open the lock; the former pins being thus pushed up, the bolt may be drawn back. These keys were from seven inches to two feet in length, and so heavy as sometimes to be as much as a man could conveniently carry. It is to a key of this description that the prophet probably alludes: “Then I will set the key of the house of David on his shoulder” (Isa. 22:22). But it is not difficult to open a lock of this kind even without a key, namely, with the finger dipped in paste or some other adhesive substance. The passage in Song of Sol. 5:4–5, is thus probably explained.

LOCUST. See Animal Kingdom.

Figurative. The locust is used in Scripture as a symbol of destructive enemies (see the highly poetical description in Joel 1:4, 6–7; 2:2–9) and also of armed men (Nah. 3:17).

LOD (lod, 1 Chron. 8:12; Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37; 11:35). The city of Lydda (Acts 9:32; etc.). See Lydda.

LO-DE'BAR (lō-de'bar; “no pasture”). Probably identical with Debir (Heb. Lidebir, Josh. 13:26, see marg.), in Gilead, N of the brook Jabbok, not far from Mahanaim. It was the residence of Ammiel, whose son Machir entertained Mephibosheth (2 Sam. 9:4–5) and afterward sent supplies to David (17:27). The place is identified with Ummel-Dabar, S of the Wadi el-'Arab, E of the Jordan.

LODGE (Heb. lîn or lûn, to “stop over night,” and several Gk. words). In the general sense of stopping for rest, or the place of lodging (Gen. 24:23; Josh. 4:3; Ruth 1:16; etc.). See also Hut; Inn.

LOG. (1) Used for building purposes (Matt. 7:3–5; Luke 6:41–42). In the passages referred to reference is made to a common proverb among the Jews respecting those who, with greater sins, reproved the lesser faults of others. The KJV renders “beam,” and the NIV “plank.” See Speck. (2) A liquid measure of capacity. See Metrology.

LOGOS (Gk. ho logos, “the Word”). A term used by the apostle John conveying most expressively the mission of Jesus as the revealer of the Godhead (John 1:1, 14). The title declares Christ's eternity and absolute deity (“In the beginning was the Word, and ... the Word was God”) as well as His assumption of humanity for man's salvation (“and the Word became flesh”). Words are the vehicle for the revelation of the thoughts and intents of the mind to others. In the Person of the incarnate Logos, God made Himself fully known to man. Nothing knowable by man concerning God is undisclosed by incarnate deity. Christ as the Word constitutes the complete and ultimate divine revelation. God has spoken with finality in “His Son” (Heb. 1:1–2), who was Himself God, coequal and coeternal with the Father. Only such a Being coming forth from “the bosom of the Father” could, as a distinct Person of the Godhead, “explain” the Father—literally “show Him forth” (John 1:18). The question of whether John was influenced by Philo and Alexandrian Greek speculation is frequently debated. It is preferable to see the origin of his thought in the OT where the Word of God is the divine agent in creation and the revelation of God’s will to men. Moreover, studies in the Dead Sea Scrolls have led a number of scholars to the conclusion that the background of John is Jewish rather than Hellenistic. John further discourses profoundly on the Person and work of “the Word” in his first epistle (1:1, 5, 7), and finally in Rev. 19:13. M.F.U.

LOINS. Literally, the parts of the back and sides of the human or animal body that parallel the spine on each side and extend between the ribs and the hips. In Heb., the main word, motnayim (Gen. 37:34; Ps. 66:11), and related words, kesel (Ps. 38:7), ḥālāsayim (Job 40:7), mayim (Isa. 48:1), and yerek (Ex. 1:5), are sometimes also translated back, hips, waist, thighs, sides, and, in the KJV, flanks (Lev. 3:4, 10, 15; 4:9; 7:4; Job 15:27). The one Gk. term is osphus (Eph. 6:14; Heb. 7:10; NIV, “waist”). Ancient people commonly used “loins” figuratively for the center of emotions such as pain or terror (Deut. 33:11; Job 40:16). It is used by euphemism for the reproductive power (Gen. 35:11; 2 Chron. 6:9; both KJV). The loins were especially dressed with sackcloth symbolizing a mourning heart (1 Kings 20:31, 32). The loose and flowing garments of the orientals required that they be gathered and belted at the waist before one engaged in any exertion or enterprise; hence, “to gird up the loins” (1 Kings 18:46; Job 38:3; 40:7) is used as a picture for vigorous effort.

LO'IS (lō'is; perhaps “agreeable”). The maternal grandmother of Timothy, his father being a Greek (Acts 16:1). She was commended by the apostle Paul for her faith (2 Tim. 1:5).

LONGSUFFERING. See Patience.

LOOKING GLASS. See Mirror.

LOOP. The curtains of the Tabernacle were fastened by loops to their corresponding clasps. They were probably made of goat’s hair cord and were dyed blue (Ex. 26:4–6, 10–11; 36:11–13, 17–18). See Tabernacle.

LORD. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words, which have different meanings:

1. Jehovah (yahweh; Heb. YHWH, “self-existent”). This is used as a proper name of God and should have been retained in that form by the translators. See (The) LORD; Yahweh.

2. Lord (Heb. ʾAdôn), an early word denoting ownership; hence, absolute control. It is not properly a divine title, being used of the owner of slaves (Gen. 24:14, 27; 39:2, 7, rendered “master”), of kings as the lords of their subjects (Isa. 26:13, “master”), of a husband as lord of the wife (Gen. 18:12). It is applied to God as the owner and governor of the whole earth (Ps. 114:7). It is sometimes used as a term of respect (like our sir) but with a pronoun attached (“my lord”). It often occurs in the plural.

3. Adonai (Heb. ʾădônāy), emphatic, “the Lord”; many regard it as the plural of no. 2. It is used chiefly in the Pentateuch—always where God is submissively and reverently addressed (Ex. 4:10, 13; Josh. 7:8) and also when God is spoken of (1 Kings 13:9; 22:6; etc.).

The Jews, out of a superstitious reverence for the name Jehovah, always pronounce Adonai where Jehovah is written. The similar form, with the suffix, is also used of men, as of Potiphar (Gen. 39:2, “master”) and of Joseph (42:30, 33).

4. Lord, Master (Gk. kurios, “supreme”), he to whom a person or thing belongs, the master, the one having disposition of men or property, as the “owner of the vineyard” (Matt. 20:8; 21:40; Mark 12:9; Luke 20:15, see marg.); the “Lord of the harvest” (Matt. 9:38; Luke 10:2); the “master of the house” (Mark 13:35, see marg.); “Lord of the Sabbath” (Matt. 12:8; Mark 2:28; Luke 6:5), as having the power to determine what is suitable to the Sabbath, and of releasing himself and others from its obligation. The term is also a title of honor sometimes rendered “sir” and is expressive of the respect and reverence with which servants salute their master (Matt. 13:27; Luke 13:8; 14:22; etc.); employed by a son in addressing his father (Matt. 21:29); by citizens toward magistrates (27:63); by anyone wishing to honor a man of distinction (8:2, 6, 8; 15:27; Mark 7:28; Luke 5:12; etc.); by the disciples in saluting Jesus, their teacher and master (Matt. 8:25; 16:22; Luke 9:54; John 11:12; etc.). This title is given to God, the ruler of the universe, both with the article ho kurios (Matt. 1:22; 5:33; Mark 5:19; Acts 7:33; 2 Tim. 1:16, 18; etc.) and without the article (Matt. 21:9; 27:10; Mark 13:20; Luke 2:9, 23, 26; Heb. 7:21; etc.). The title is also applied to Jesus as the Messiah, since by His death He acquired a special ownership of mankind and after His resurrection was exalted by a partnership in the divine administration (Acts 10:36; Rom. 14:8; 1 Cor. 7:22; 8:6; Phil. 2:9–11).

5. Baal (Heb. ba'al, “master”), applied only to heathen deities, or to the man as husband, and so on, or to one specially skilled in a trade or profession. See Baal.

6. Other and less important words in the original are rendered “Lord,” such as mārē, “master” (Acts 2:47), an official title, and seren, a Philistine term found in Joshua, Judges, and 1 Samuel, where “the lords of the Philistines” are mentioned.

(THE) LORD; KJV, “Jehovah” (je-hō’va; Heb. YHWH, LXX; usually ho Kurios). The name of God most frequently used in the Hebrew Scriptures but commonly represented—we cannot say rendered—in the KJV and NIV by LORD.

Pronunciation. The true pronunciation of this name, by which God was known to the Hebrews, has been entirely lost, the Jews themselves scrupulously avoiding every mention of it and substituting in its stead one or other of the words with whose proper vowel points it may happen to be written, usually the name Adonai. They continued to write YHWH, but read Adonai. Where God is called “My Lord Jehovah” (Heb. Adonai YHWH), Elohim was substituted to avoid the double Adonai. When the vowel points were added to the Heb. text the rule, in the case of words written but not read, was to attach to these words the vowels belonging to the words read in place of them. Thus they attached to YHWH the points of ādōnāy; hence the form Yhōwāh and the name Yhōvāh. The strong probability is that the name Jehovah was anciently pronounced Yāhwēh, like the Iabe of the Samaritans. This custom, which had its origin in reverence, and has almost degenerated into a superstition, was founded upon an erroneous rendering of Lev. 24:16, from which it was inferred that the mere utterance of the name constituted a capital offense. According to Jewish tradition, it was pronounced but once a year by the high priest on the Day of Atonement when he entered the Holy of Holies; but on this point there is some doubt.

For the LeClerc-Haupt-Albright view that Yahweh was originally a causative finite verb see Yahweh.

Import. The passage in Ex. 3:14 seems to furnish designedly a clue to the meaning of the word. When Moses received his commission to be the deliverer of Israel, the Almighty, who appeared in the burning bush, communicated to him the name that he should give as the credentials of his mission: “God said unto Moses, I am that I am [Heb. ehyeh ash ehyeh]: and he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I am hath sent me unto you” (KJV).

In both names ehyeh and YHWH, the root idea is that of underived existence. When it is said that God’s name is He Is, simple being is not all that is affirmed. He is in a sense in which no other being is. He is, and the cause of His being is in Himself. He is because He is. But compare the etymology that Yahweh means “He causes to be”—“He creates” (P. Haupt and W. F. Albright’s view). See Yahweh.

When Made Known. The notice in Ex. 6:3, “By my name Jehovah was I not known to them” (KJV), does not imply that the patriarchs were completely ignorant of the existence or the use of the name. It simply means that previous to their deliverance from Egyptian bondage they had no experiential knowledge of such redemption. Under Moses they were to experience such deliverance and have the redemptive power of God made real to them and the redemptive name of God vouchsafed to them. Previously, as shepherds in Palestine, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob had known God as El Shaddai (“the Almighty,” Gen. 17:1, KJV), proving His power, but not in redemption as such.

(THE) LORD IS MY BANNER. KJV, Jeho’vah-Nis’i (je-hō’va-nis’i; “Jehovah my banner”). The name given by Moses to an altar that he erected upon the hill where he sat with uplifted hands during the successful battle against the Amalekites (Ex. 17:15). Nothing is said about sacrifices being offered upon the altar, and it has been suggested that the altar with its expressive name was merely to serve as a memorial to posterity of the gracious help of Jehovah.

(THE) LORD IS PEACE. KJV, Jeho’vah-Sha’lom (je-hō’va-sha’lom; “Jehovah-peace”). The name given to an altar erected by Gideon in Ophrah after the Lord had given him the commission to deliver Israel from the Midianites, confirming it by miracles and a message of peace (Judg. 6:24; marg., “Yahweh-shalom”). As it was a time of backsliding, Gideon gave expression to his surprise and gratitude by erecting this altar as a monument to Jehovah as the God of peace.

(THE) LORD IS THERE. KJV, Jeho’vah-Sham’ah (je-hō’va-sham’a; “Jehovah is there”). The figurative name given by Ezekiel (48:35; NASB, NIV, and KJV, “The Lord is there”) to millennial Jerusalem seen by him in his vision. The expression signifies that Jehovah has turned His favor once more to Jerusalem, which will enjoy great prosperity as the capital of the earth in the Kingdom age.

(THE) LORD WILL PROVIDE. KJV, Jeho’vah-Ji’reh (je-hō’va-jī’re; “Jehovah will see,” i.e., “provide”). The name given by Abraham to the mountain on which the angel of the Lord appeared to him and not only arrested the sacrifice of Isaac but provided a ram in his place (Gen. 22:14; marg., “YHWH-jireh”). See Moriah.

THE LORD'S DAY. This, the first day of the week in the Christian order, commemorates the new creation with Christ Himself as its resurrected head. It is not a mere changeover from the Sabbath but a new day marking a new dispensation. The Sabbath related to the old creation (Ex. 20:8–11; 31:12–17; Heb. 4:4). There are prophetic foreshadowings of the Lord's Day in the OT (Ps. 118:22–24; cf. Acts 4:11–12; Lev. 23:11; cf. Matt. 28:1). The term "Christian Sabbath" is scarcely biblically defensible. This day of grace marks the beginning of the week with a day of privilege, whereas the Sabbath came at the end of a week of labor, an order expected under the law. It must carefully be remembered that the Lord's Day, the term Sunday (which see) being of pagan origin, is strictly a Christian institution. It is not for all men, and it is scarcely justifiable to attempt to legislate its observance upon unsaved people. As Lewis Sperry Chafer points out, "Men are not justified in returning to the rules provided for the Sabbath in order to secure directions for the observance of the Lord's Day. When Christ came from the grave, He said to His friends, 'Rejoice' (cf. Ps. 118:24), and, 'Go tell ...' (Matt. 28:9–10, literal rendering). These words may well be taken as a wise direction respecting observance of the day. The Lord's Day, moreover, can be extended to all days whereas the Sabbath could not be (cf. Rom. 14:5–6)" (Systematic Theology, 7:229). M.F.U.

THE LORD'S PRAYER. This prayer is in reality a prayer for the kingdom and in the kingdom (Matt. 6:8–15; 7:7–11). "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven" can only be realized in its contextual meaning in the coming millennial kingdom. There is no doubt that this prayer, so universally recited and often sentimentally entrenched in human affections because of childhood training, was nevertheless evidently not intended as a ritual prayer for this age. Its petitions, however, are remarkably comprehensive, and it has served as a vehicle of blessing for countless millions. The prayer is not given as a set form that is to be slavishly followed but rather as setting forth the general sentiments and desires that are acceptable to Him to whom we pray. M.F.U.

LORD'S SUPPER (Gk. kuriakon deipnon, a "meal belonging to the Lord").

Name. The meal established by our Lord (1 Cor. 11:20) and called "Supper" because it was instituted at suppertime. Synonymous with this is the phrase "the table of the Lord" (10:21), where we also find the term "the cup of the Lord." Other terms were introduced in the church, such as Communion (Gk. koinōnia, "participation," i.e., a festival in "common," 1 Cor. 10:16) and Eucharist ("a giving of thanks") because of the hymns and psalms that accompanied it.

Origin. Of this we have the accounts recorded by Matthew (26:26–29), Mark (14:22, 25), Luke (22:19–20, 30), and Paul (1 Cor. 11:24–26), whose words differ little from those of Luke. The only difference between Matthew and Mark is that the latter omits the words "for forgiveness of sins." Paul declares (1 Cor. 11:23) that the account that he wrote to the Corinthians he "received from the Lord," which would seem to imply a communication made to himself personally by the Lord, contrasting it with the abuse among them.

Jesus instituted the supper while He was observing the Passover with His disciples, so some reference to that feast should be given. The following order of observing the Passover prevailed at the time of Christ: (1) Where the celebrants met, the head of the household, or celebrant, blessed a cup of wine, of which all partook. (2) The hands were then washed, this act being accompanied by a benediction. (3) The table was then set with the Paschal lamb, unleavened bread, bitter herbs, and sauce. (4) The celebrant first, and then others, dipped a portion of the bitter herbs into the sauce and ate them. (5) The dishes were removed and a cup of wine brought, followed by an interval for asking questions as to the meaning of this strange procedure, and then the wine was passed. (6) The table being again set, the celebrant then repeated the commemorative words that opened what was strictly the Paschal supper—a solemn thanksgiving and reading of Pss. 103–104. (7) Then came a second washing of hands with a short blessing, the breaking of one of the two cakes of unleavened bread, with thanks. The bread was then dipped, with the bitter herbs, into the sauce, and eaten. (8) Meat was eaten with the bread, accompanied by another blessing, a third cup of wine known as the “cup of blessing,” and then (9) a fourth cup, with the recital of Pss. 115–18, from which this cup was known as the cup of the Hallel (which see), of the Song of Sol. (10) There might be, in conclusion, a fifth cup, provided that the Great Hallel was sung over it (possibly Pss. 120–38).

“Comparing the ritual thus gathered from rabbinic writers with the New Testament, and assuming (1) that it represents substantially the common practice of our Lord’s time; and (2) that the meal of which he and his disciples partook was either the Passover itself or an anticipation of it, conducted according to the same rules, we are able to point, though not with absolute certainty, to the points of departure which the old practice presented for the institution of the new. To 1 or 3, or even to 8, we may refer the first words and the first distribution of the cup (Luke 22:17–18); to 2 or 7, the dipping of the sop (John 13:26); to 7, or to an interval during or after 8, the distribution of the bread (Matt. 26:26; Mark 14:22; Luke 22:19; 1 Cor. 11:23–24); to 9 or 10 (‘after supper,’ Luke 22:20), the thanksgiving and distribution of the cup, and the hymn with which the whole was ended.” (Bennett, Christian Archaeology, p. 416).

Observance. The Passover was an annual festival, but no rule was given as to the time and frequency of the new feast, although the command “Do this, as often as you drink it” (1 Cor. 11:25) suggests a more frequent observance. It would appear that the celebration of the Lord’s Supper by the first disciples occurred daily in private houses (Acts 2:46), in connection with the agape, or love feast, to indicate that its purpose was the expression of brotherly love. The offering of thanks and praise (1 Cor. 10:16; 11:24) was probably followed with the holy kiss (Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20). It was of a somewhat festive character, judging from the excesses that Paul reprovved (1 Cor. 11:20), and was associated with an ordinary meal, at the close of which the bread and wine were distributed as a memorial of Christ’s similar distribution to the disciples. From the accounts in the Acts (2:42, 46) and from Paul’s letter to the Corinthians (11:20–21) it is safely inferred that the disciples each contributed a share of the food necessary for the meal, thus showing a community of love and fellowship. To this unifying power of the Eucharist Paul evidently refers (10:16–17). From the account given in 11:17–34 it is evident that each person ate of that which he brought and held therein his own private meal in place of the Lord’s Supper. There was not a proper waiting for the distribution of the elements by a church officer, and there seems to be no evidence that a priestly consecration and distribution of the bread and wine were regarded as necessary to the validity of the sacrament. It is true that a blessing was spoken over the cup (1 Cor. 10:16), but every Christian would probably offer this blessing at that time, when the arrangements of church life as regards public worship were as yet so little reduced to fixed order.

Early Church. In the earliest notices of the Lord’s Supper a simple and almost literal imitation of the meal as instituted by Christ is prevalent. In the “Teaching of the Twelve” the instructions for celebrating the Eucharist are as simple and archaic as those respecting baptism. In Justin Martyr’s account of the Lord’s Supper is noticed an almost like simplicity as in the “Teaching.” A change is in the fact that special celebrants or officers are now recognized: "There is brought to the president of the brethren bread and a cup of wine mixed with water." The deacons distribute the consecrated elements and carry away a portion to those who are absent. In Tertullian's account there is scarcely more formality.

In ante-Nicene times the following order was observed: the prayers, the kiss of peace between man and man, and woman and woman; the offerings for the feast, the poor, and the clergy; and the communion of the partaking of the consecrated elements. The wine was mingled with water, and the communicants, standing, received both elements in the hands of the officiating deacons. Portions of the sanctified bread were sometimes borne to their homes by the members, where the family Communion was repeated in kind. The custom of the apostolic church for all communicants to make offerings of bread and wine and other things, to supply the elements of the Eucharist and gifts to the poor, was continued through all the early history of Christianity and in a modified form until the twelfth century.

As church government and discipline developed, the ceremonies connected with the Eucharist became more formal and involved.

At the institution of the Lord's Supper Christ used unleavened bread. The early Christians carried with them the bread and wine for the Eucharist and took the bread in common use, which was leavened. When this custom ceased the Greeks retained leavened bread, while in the Latin church unleavened bread became common since the eighth century.

We have no evidence as to whether the wine used by Christ was pure, mixed with water, fermented, or unfermented; although general practice, as well as other facts, would lead to the conclusion that it was fermented.

Essential Nature. There is controversy concerning the essential nature of the Lord's Supper.

Transubstantiation. Transubstantiation is the view held by the Roman Catholic church. The Council of Trent teaches that after the consecration the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, are contained "truly, really, and substantially in the sacrament of the most holy eucharist," and it anathematizes those who say that Christ's body and blood are there in sign and figure only. Furthermore, the Roman Catholic church teaches "that the worship of sacrifice was not to cease in the Church, and the Council of Trent defines that in the eucharist or mass a true and proper sacrifice is offered to God" (Cath. Dict., s.v.).

Consubstantiation. The Lutheran church rejects transubstantiation, while insisting that the body and blood of Christ are mysteriously and supernaturally united with the bread and wine, so that they are received when the latter are. This is called consubstantiation.

Spiritual Presence View. According to this view, "this hallowed food (the bread and wine), through concurrence of divine power, is in verity and truth, unto faithful receivers, instrumentally a cause of that mystical participation whereby I make myself wholly theirs, so I give them in hand an actual possession of all such saving grace as my sacrificial body can yield, and as their souls do presently need, this is to them, and in them, my body" (Hooker, Eccles. Polity, book 5, p. 167). "The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the supper only after a heavenly and spiritual manner. And the means whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the supper is faith" (Discipline, Methodist Church, Art. 18).

Symbolic, or Zwinglian, View. According to this view, partaking of the supper merely commemorates the sacrificial work of Christ, and its value to the participant consists only in the bestowal of a blessing.

LO-RUHA MAH (lō-rū-ha'ma; “not pitied, not favored”). The name divinely given to the second child (a daughter) of the prophet Hosea (1:6) to indicate that the Lord would not continue to show compassion toward the rebellious nation, as He up to this time had done under Jeroboam II (2 Kings 13:23). In Hos. 2:23 the expression is translated “her who had not obtained compassion.” A daughter is named to represent the effeminate period that followed the overthrow of the first dynasty, when Israel was at once degraded and irreverent. When God restored His favor to the people her name was changed to Ruhamah (which see).

LOSS. See Law of Moses: Civil.

LOT. 1. (Heb. gōrāl, a “pebble”; hebel, “measuring line, portion”; Gk. lanchanō, to “cast lots,” Luke 1:9; klēros, “pebble, bit of wood”; to cast lots with, Acts 1:26). The custom of deciding doubtful questions by lot is one of great extent and high antiquity, recommending itself as a sort of appeal to the Almighty, secure from all influence of passion or bias, and is a sort of divination employed even by the gods themselves (Homer Iliad 22.209; Cicero De divinatione 1.34; 2.41). Among the Jews also the use of lots with a religious intention, direct or indirect, prevailed extensively. The religious estimate of them may be gathered from Prov. 16:33. The following historical or ritual instances are: (1) choice of men for an invading force (Judg. 1:1–3, see marg.; 20:9); (2) partition of the land of Palestine among the tribes (Num. 26:55; Josh. 18:10), of Jerusalem, that is, probably its spoil or captives among captors (Obad. 11), of the land itself in a similar way (1 Macc. 3:36); apportionment of possessions, or spoil, or of prisoners, to foreigners or captors (Joel 3:3; Nah. 3:10; Matt. 27:35); (3) settlement of doubtful questions (Prov. 16:33; 18:18), a mode of divination among heathen by means of arrows, two inscribed and one without mark (Ezek. 21:21), detection of a criminal (Josh. 7:14), appointment of persons to offices or duties, such as the priests (Luke 1:9); also successor to Judas (Acts 1:26); selection of the scapegoat on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:8, 10). See Urim and Thummim.

2. That which falls to one by lot, as a portion or inheritance (Deut. 32:9; Josh. 15:1; 1 Chron. 16:18; Pss. 105:11; 125:3, marg.; Isa. 17:14; 57:6; Acts 8:21; cf. Acts 13:19).

LOT (lot). The son of Haran and nephew of Abraham. The genealogy given in table 23 exhibits Lot's family relations (Gen. 11:27–32). After the death of his father (Gen. 11:28), Lot was left in the charge of his grandfather Terah, with whom he migrated to Haran (11:31), c. 2120 B.C. Following the death of Terah, Lot accompanied Abraham to Canaan (12:4–5), c. 2086 B.C., thence to Egypt, and back again to Canaan (12:10; 13:1).

Separation. The flocks and herds of both increased so greatly that the land did not furnish enough pasture, and consequently disputes arose between their herdsmen. To put an end to strife Abraham proposed a separation and magnanimously left the choice of territory to his nephew, who selected the plain of Jordan and fixed his home at Sodom (13:5–12).

A Prisoner. A few years after, Lot was carried away by Chedorlaomer, along with other captives from Sodom, but was rescued and brought back by Abraham (14:12:8–16), c. 2060 B.C.

Escape from Sodom. When Jehovah had determined to destroy Sodom, Lot was still residing there and, sitting at the city gate, met the messengers (angels) of the Lord. He pressed them to pass the night at his house, and they yielded to his entreaty. While they were at supper the house was beset by a number of the inhabitants, who demanded, with the basest violation of hospitality, that the strangers should be delivered up to them for sexual relations. Lot went out to them, shut the door behind him to protect his guests, and resisted the demands of the crowd. This enraged them still more, and they were about to break in the door when the angels pulled Lot into the house, shut the door, and struck the people with blindness. Lot was then informed of the coming destruction of the city and exhorted to remove his family. In the morning he was hastened away by the angels. Instead of cheerfully obeying the commandment to flee to the mountain, Lot entreated that he might be allowed to take refuge in Zoar, the smallest of the cities of the plain. While on their way Lot's wife, disobedient to the divine command "Do not look behind you" lingered behind, probably from a longing for her home and earthly possessions, and "became a pillar of salt." Lot, moved by fear, soon left Zoar and moved to a cave in the neighboring mountains (19:1–30).

Daughters' Crime. While there his daughters, dreading the extinction of their family, resolved to procure children through their father. This they succeeded in doing by making him drunk with wine and in that state seducing him into an act of which he would not in soberness have been guilty. The son of the elder daughter was Moab, progenitor of the Moabites, and of the younger Ben-ammi, "the father," that is, ancestor of the Ammonites (19:31–38). Lot is not mentioned again in the OT, and the time and place of his death are unknown. He is alluded to in 2 Pet. 2:7–8, being described as "righteous," that is, a type of the carnal worldly believer in contrast to Abraham, the man of faith.

LO'TAN (lō'tan). The first named son of Seir, the Horite, and a chief of Edom prior to the ascendancy of the Esauites (Gen. 36:20, 29; 1 Chron. 1:38). His sons were Hori and Hemam (or Homam; Gen. 36:22; 1 Chron. 1:39), and through his sister, Timna, he was related to Eliphaz, Esau's son (Gen. 36:12).

LO'TUS (Heb. ṣe'el). A marshy plant that provided shelter and a hiding place for the behemoth (Job 40:21–22). The KJV translates "shady trees." See Vegetable Kingdom.

LOVE (Heb. ḥābâ; Gk. agapē). Chiefly represented in the Scriptures as an attribute of God and as a Christian virtue. Its consideration, therefore, belongs to both theology and ethics.

An Attribute of God. According to the Scriptures, God has feeling, affection, although rationalistic theologians (e.g., Schleiermacher, Bruch) have asserted the contrary. We must derive our conceptions of God from the special revelation that He has given of Himself, and this declares His love as strongly as His existence. It is held by some to be inadequate to speak of love as a divine attribute. "God is love" (1 John 4:8, 16). The Scriptures contain no equivalent statements with respect to other qualities of the divine nature. Love is the highest characteristic of God, the one attribute in which all others harmoniously blend. The love of God is more than kindness or benevolence. The latter may be exercised toward irrational creatures, but love is directed toward rational, personal beings. The eternal love of God has never been without its object, a fact upon which we receive some light from the Scripture revelation of the threefold personality of God (see Trinity; see also Matt. 3:17; John 15:9; 17:23–26). The gracious love of God to men, even to sinful men, is most strongly declared in both the OT and NT (e.g., Ex. 34:6; Isa. 63:9; Jer. 31:3; John 3:16; 1 John 4:10). The love of God underlies all that He has done and is doing, although many facts exist that we cannot reconcile with His love on account of our limited understanding. The highest disclosure and most complete proof of divine love is in redemption (see Rom. 5:8; 8:32–39; 1 John 4:9–10). The reality and power of this love are properly apprehended only under the influence of the Holy Spirit. “The love of God has been poured out within our hearts through the Holy Spirit who was given to us” (Rom. 5:5).

A Christian Virtue. Love (Gk. agapē; NASB and NIV, “love”). The only word in the Bible translated charity means love. It is affection, tender and passionate attachment, a sentiment of our nature excited by qualities in a person or thing that command our affection; a virtue of such efficacy that it is said to be the fulfilling of the law. Its absence invalidates all claim to the Christian name. It is the antithesis of selfishness. Luther calls it “the shortest and longest divinity.” It is active, and dissatisfied if not blessing others. Christian love is piety, the greatest boon that God can give, for “God is love.” “In it all human duty is summed up” (Matt. 22:37–40; Rom. 13:8; 1 Cor. 13:13). Love is the first named element in the composite “fruit of the Spirit” (Gal. 5:22).

Charity, in modern speech, has other meanings: first, that sentiment that prompts us to think and speak well of others, judge their acts kindly, and make them happy; second, generosity to the poor; third, that which is thus given; and fourth, a benevolent foundation.

Love is the preeminent virtue inculcated and produced by Christianity. The whole law is summed up in love, not in the sense of rendering all other requirements as inconsequential, but in the sense that love is fundamental, expresses the spirit of all others, and with enlightenment will lead to the observance of all others (Matt. 22:37–39; 5:43–48; John 14:15, 21; 15:12–14; Rom. 13:8; 1 Cor. 13; Gal. 5:14). Accordingly, love is declared to be the chief test of Christian discipleship (John 13:35; Matt. 5:44; 1 John 3:14). Also, love is the highest motive or ground of moral actions. Without this all other motives fall short of furnishing the true stimulus of Christian living. As all sin roots itself in selfishness, so all virtue springs out of love; and yet the love that is presented in the NT as the mainspring of holy living is grateful love as distinct from the love that is wholly disinterested. “We love, because He first loved us” are words that rightly express the whole matter (1 John 4:19; see also 2 Cor 5:14; Rom. 12:1–2). The contention of Fenelon that true Christian love should be disinterested, that we must love God exclusively on account of His perfection, so that if He did not bless us, but were to cast us off, we would love Him still, finds no support in the Scriptures. It contains a measure of truth inasmuch as it emphasizes the warning that we are certainly not to love the gifts of God more than the Giver and that we are not to love God wholly on account of His gifts. In reality, grateful love includes adoring love, or that which loves God for His own sake. Christian love, it is also important to note, is made possible only by divine grace. It is one of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22; see also 1 John 3:14). E.MCC.

LOVINGKINDNESS (Heb. hesed, "desire, ardor"). In a good sense hesed is zeal toward anyone, kindness, love. Of God toward men, goodness, mercy, grace (Pss. 17:7; 26:3; 36:7, 10; etc.).

LOWER See Depths.

LOWLAND (Heb. hashshāpēlâ). A broad, swelling tract of many hundred miles in area that sweeps gently down from the mountains of Judah toward the Mediterranean. It is referred to in Deut. 1:7; Josh. 9:1; 10:40; 11:2, 16; etc.). See also Shephelah. The NIV usually translates "foothills."

LU'BIM (lū'bīm; Nah. 3:9; 2 Chron. 12:3; 16:8; cf. Dan. 11:43). An African race, the primitive Libyans (always the translation of lubim in the NIV). They are always mentioned in connection with Egyptians and Ethiopians. They formed part of the armies of Shishak (2 Chron. 12:3) and of Zerah (16:8), and they helped No-amon, or Thebes (Nah. 3:9). In Dan. 11:43 they pay court to a northern conqueror. The Lubim were probably the Rebu, or Lebu, of the Egyptian monuments, a fair race of Semitic type, warlike but not able to stand against Merneptah and Rameses II. Their home appears to have been on the N coast of Africa, W of Egypt. They doubtless belonged to the oldest stream of colonization that flowed westward along the northern coast of Africa. The territory of the Lubim and their kindred tribes may be likened to that of the great Arab tribe of the Benee 'Alee, which extends "from Egypt to Morocco." "Reduced by the Egyptians about 1250 B.C., and afterward driven inland by the Phoenician and Greek colonists, they still remain on the northern confines of the great desert, and even within it and in the mountains, while their later Semitic rivals pasture their flocks in the rich plains." Probably the Mizraite Lehabim (Gen. 10:13; 1 Chron. 1:11) are the same as the Lubim. See Libya. W.H.; M.F.U.

LU'CIFER (lū'si-fer; Heb. hēlēl, "brightness"). This designation, referring to Satan, is the KJV rendering of NASB, "star of the morning," that is, "bright star" (Isa. 14:12–14), probably what we call the "morning star" (so NIV). As a symbolical representation of the king of Babylon in his pride, splendor, and fall, the passage goes beyond the Babylonian prince and invests Satan, who, at the head of this present world-system is the real though invisible power behind the successive world rulers of Tyre, Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome. This far-reaching passage goes beyond human history and marks the beginning of sin in the universe and the fall of Satan and the pristine, sinless spheres before the creation of man. Similarly Ezekiel (28:12–14), under the figure of the king of Tyre, likewise traces the fall of Satan and the corruption of his power and glory. In the Ezekiel passage Satan's glorious and splendid unfallen state is described. In Isa. 14:12–14 his fall is depicted. In both passages representation is not of Satan as confined to his own person but working in and consummating his plans through earthly kings and rulers who take to themselves divine honors and who, whether they actually know this or not, rule in the spirit and under the aims of Satan. Daniel 10:13 and Eph. 6:12 show that there are human as well as superhuman agencies in world governments in the satanic world system. M.F.U.

LU’CIUS (lū’shi-us; for Lat. Lucius). Of Cyrene, one of the “prophets and teachers” at Antioch who, at the command of the Holy Spirit, ordained Barnabas and Saul (Acts 13:1; Rom. 16:21), A.D. 45.

LUD (lud; Gen. 10:22; 1 Chron. 1:11, NASB and NIV; 1:17; Isa 66:19; Ezek. 27:10; Ezek. 30:5, NASB only). The NIV renders Lydians in Isa. 66:19; Ezek. 27:10; 30:5. See Ludim.

LUDIM (lu’dim; Gen. 10:13; 1 Chron. 1:11, KJV and NIV), Lydia (Ezek. 30:5, KJV and NIV), Lydians (Jer. 46:9).

The Lud of Gen. 10:22 and 1 Chron. 1:17 was the fourth son of Shem; the Ludim of Gen. 10:13 and 1 Chron. 1:11 (KJV only; “people of Lud,” NASB; “Ludites,” NIV) were the first mentioned among the descendants of Mizraim, the second son of Ham. In Jer. 46:9 (“the Lydians”) and Ezek. 30:5 (“Lud,” NASB; “Lydia,” KJV and NIV), Lud and Ludim are associated with African nations, and partly so in Isa. 66:19 and Ezek. 27:10. Our first impulse would be to refer all these prophetic passages, especially Jer. 46:9 and Ezek. 30:5, to the Mizraite tribe. It is hinted, however, that the Lud and Ludim of the prophets may have been the Ionian and Carian mercenaries that were employed in the Egyptian army from the time of Psammethichus I to the final subjugation of the country. This might explain the ambiguous manner in which they are associated with both Asiatic and African nations. In the time of the prophets Lydia might well be taken to represent the western part of Asia Minor.

Lydia was a kingdom in western Asia Minor that was wealthy and powerful in the seventh and sixth centuries B.C. As a result of their extensive trade with the Greeks, they invented the coinage of gold and silver money. Their smeltery/mint has been excavated at Sardis (which see), their great capital. Cyrus the Great (which see) of Persia brought an end to the Lydian kingdom and the reign of its famous king Croesus in 546 B.C. Under the Persians Sardis was the western terminus of the great trunk line that extended from Susa to Sardis (about fifteen hundred miles). Later Lydia became part of the kingdom of Pergamum, which entered the Roman Empire as the province of Asia in 133 B.C. Three of the cities of Revelation—Thyatira, Sardis, and Philadelphia (Rev. 2:18–3:13)—were located in Lydia.

LU’HITH (lū’hith; Jer. 48:5; Isa. 15:5). A Moabite town situated upon an ascent, to which the people fled from the invading Babylonians.

LUKE (lūk; Gk. Loukas; Lat. Lucanus). The evangelist and author of the gospel bearing his name and the Acts of the Apostles. See Gospels; Bible, Books of.

The materials found in Scripture referring to the life of Luke are scanty and seem to yield the following results: (1) Luke was of Gentile origin. This is inferred from the fact that he is not reckoned among those “who are from the circumcision” (Col. 4:11; cf. v. 14). When and how he became a physician is not known. (2) He was not one of the “eyewitnesses and servants of the word” (Luke 1:2). (3) On the supposition of Luke’s being the author of the Acts we gather from those passages in which the first person we is employed that he joined Paul’s company at Troas and sailed with them to Macedonia (Acts 16:10–11). He accompanied Paul as far as Philippi (16:25–17:1) but did not share his persecution or leave the city, for here the third person they is used. The first person we does not reappear until Paul comes to Philippi at the end of his third journey (20:6), from which it is inferred that Luke spent the intervening time—a period of seven or eight years—in the city or neighborhood; and as the we continues to the end of the book, that Luke remained with Paul during his journey to Jerusalem (20:6–21:18), was that apostle’s companion to Rome (27:1), sharing his shipwreck (28:2), and reaching the imperial city by way of Syracuse and Puteoli (28:12–16). According to the epistles he continued to be one of Paul’s “fellow workers” till the end of his first imprisonment (Philem. 24; Col. 4:14). The last glimpse of the “beloved physician” discovers him to be faithful amid general defection (2 Tim. 4:11). Tradition since the time of Gregory of Nazianzus makes Luke a martyr, yet not unanimously, since accounts of a natural death slip in. Where he died remains a question; certainly not in Rome with Paul, for his writings are far later (Meyer, Com., on Luke, in introduction).

LUKE, GOSPEL OF. The third synoptic gospel, a work of high literary quality ascribed by almost universal Christian tradition to Luke, the beloved physician and traveling companion of Paul.

Characteristics. Renan viewed Luke’s gospel as “the most beautiful book that has ever been written.” The subject matter as well as the author’s literary talent combine to give the book an interesting appeal and polish conspicuous in the NT. The elevated subject matter was a challenge to the author’s literary endeavor. Whereas Matthew presents Christ as King, Mark presents Him as Servant, John presents Him as the Son of God, and Luke presents Him as the Son of man, the human-divine One in contrast to John’s divine-human One. The term “Son of Man” acts as a key phrase, and 19:10 is commonly taken as the key verse: “For the Son of Man has come to seek and to save that which was lost.” In agreement with his purpose, Luke narrates those events that demonstrate the humanity of Christ. The divine genealogy is traced to Adam. A detailed account of Christ’s mother and of His infancy and childhood is presented. The parables included by Luke have a human touch. Although Luke beautifully sets forth the humanity of the divine One he carefully shields His deity and kingship (1:32–35). It has truly been said that Luke is the gospel of “a man whose name is Branch” (Zech. 6:12). Luke is distinctive in that it catalogs much material that is not included in the other evangels. This new material amounts to more than 50 percent of its content. For example, Luke has a joyous note and records five great outbursts of song—Elizabeth’s Beatitude, Mary’s Magnificat, Zachariah’s Benedictus, the angels’ Gloria in Excelsis, and Simeon’s Nunc Dimittis. His gospel is emphatically “good news of a great joy.”

Purpose. The evangelist proposes to write in order that Theophilus might know the “exact truth” of the things wherein he had been instructed (Luke 1:4). Theophilus seems to have been a Gentile, and the epithet kratistos, often given to persons of rank (Acts 23:26; 24:3; 26:5), suggests that he was an individual of eminence, most likely a recent convert. Some believe that he was a patronos libri and acted as a patron for the production of the book. Everyone is of the opinion that the gospel was intended for people at large, especially the Greek-speaking world.

Date. Since the book was written before the Acts, which is to be dated c. A.D. 61, it was likely written while Paul was at Caesarea. Since internal evidence that Luke wrote both the gospel and the book of Acts (and he divulges the fact that the gospel was written first, Acts 1:1), it must be concluded that the gospel was penned prior to A.D. 61. Luke was in Caesarea where Paul was in prison (Acts 27:1). This circumstance would furnish him opportunity for the research he mentions with such fine literary style and classical flourish in Luke 1:1–4.

Attestation. External evidence is strong concerning the early existence and use of Luke. Justin Martyr quotes 22:44; 23:46. The Muratorian Fragment calls the third gospel “Luke.” Heggesippus, Tatian, the unbeliever Celsus, Marcion, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian all refer to “Luke.” Robertson’s statement in the International Standard Bible Encyclopedia on Luke sums up the evidence: “Surely the general use and acceptance of the third gospel in the early second century is beyond reasonable doubt. It is not easy to decide when the actual use began, because we have so little data from the first century.”

LUNACY, LUNATIC. See Démoniac; Diseases: Madness.

LUST. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words with various meanings.

1. In the KJV the term is sometimes used simply to express intense longing and desire; in those cases the NASB and NIV replace the word with various terms as appropriate (“desire,” or “want,” Ex. 15:9; Deut. 12:15; “greedy,” Num. 11:34; etc.).

2. In the ethical sense lust is used to express sinful desire—sinful either in being directed toward forbidden objects or in being so violent as to overcome self-control and to engross the mind with earthly, carnal, and perishable things.

“By lusts Paul, like Peter and James, understands, not the natural appetites of the body, but the sinful, godless inclinations (Rom. 1:24), whether these be of a sensuous or of a spiritual nature. He purposely quotes the Old Testament commandment against sinful lust (Ex. 20:17; Deut. 5:21) in such a manner that it is not any definite objects of lust, but the longing for them as such that he calls forbidden (Rom. 7:7, see margin). In his sense every lust is a product of sin (v. 8), which compels us to obey the lusts of the body (6:12); every natural appetite may be perverted by sin into lust (13:14)” (Weiss, Theology of the N.T., 1:328).

LUTE. See Music.

LUZ (luz; “almond tree”).

1. The ancient (Canaanite) name of Bethel (Gen. 28:19; 35:6; 48:3), or a town that formerly stood upon or near the latter city (see Bethel). In Josh. 16:2 “Luz is distinguished from Beth-el because the reference is not to the town of Beth-el, but to the southern range of mountains belonging to Beth-el, from which the boundary ran out to the town of Luz, so that this town, which stood upon the border, was allotted to Benjamin (18:13)” (K. & D., Com.).

2. A town in the land of the Hittites, built by an inhabitant of the former Luz. He was spared when the latter was destroyed by the Benjamites (Judg. 1:23–26). Luweiziyeh, a ruin 4½ miles NW of Baniyas, is suggested as the site by Conder.

LYCAONIA (līk-a-ō’ni-a). A small Roman province of Asia Minor, bounded N by Galatia, E by Cappadocia, S by Isauria, and W by Phrygia. It is not fertile, though level, and therefore adapted to pasturage. Its cities are Derbe, Iconium, and Lystra. The “Lycaonian language” (Acts 14:11) was a corrupt Greek mingled with Assyrian. Paul preached in this region (14:1–6) and then revisited it (cf. 16:1–2).

LY´CIA (lī’si-a). A mountainous province in SW Asia Minor belonging to Rome. Patara and Myra are its towns, which were visited by Paul (Acts 21:1; 27:5). It is a part of the region now known as Tekeh.

LYD´DA (lid’a). A town about eleven miles SE of Joppa, called Lod in the OT (1 Chron. 8:12), and modern Israelis have reverted to the OT name. It is located in the midst of a rich and fertile plain. It was one of the most westernly of the Jewish settlements after the Exile, the site of which is described as Ge-haharashim, the valley of the smiths or craftsmen. It was here that Peter healed the paralytic and secured many converts (Acts 9:32–35). It was not Jewish, but pagan, under the name Diospolis. See Lod.

LYD´IA (lid’i-a). A seller of purple of the city of Thyatira (which see) who dwelt in Philippi. She sold the purple-dyed garments from Thyatira in Philippi and traded in both the cheap and expensive merchandise. As her husband is not mentioned and she was a householder, she was probably a widow. She was not by birth a Jewess, but a proselyte, as the phrase “a worshiper of God” suggests. Converted by the preaching of Paul and baptized by him, she pressed upon him the use of her house so earnestly that he was constrained to accept (Acts 16:14–15, 40). Whether she was one of the women who “shared” Paul’s struggle as a fellow Christian (Phil. 4:3) is impossible to say.

LYSA´NIAS (lī-sā’ni-us). A tetrarch or governor of the region known as Abilene. This country was drained by the Abana River and located between Baalbek on the N side of Mt. Hermon and Damascus. This Lysanias ruled in the time of John the Baptist (Luke 3:1) in the fifteenth year of Tiberias. So critics insist that Lysanias, the son of Ptolemy who reigned in Chalcis in Coelesyria (40–34 B.C.), gave the name to this tetrarchy and that Luke has made a historical blunder. Lysanias, however, who ruled Chalcis is never called tetrarch nor does Abila appear in his kingdom. In A.D. 37 the emperor Caligula appointed Herod Agrippa king of the tetrarchy of Philip and added Lysanias to the tetrarchy. The tetrarchy of Lysanias, with its capital at Abila some eighteen miles NW of Damascus, was distinct from the kingdom of Chalcis. (Josephus Ant. 19.5.1; 20.7.1). In the time in which Luke writes, the region about Abila was ruled by the tetrarch Lysanias, and therefore Luke is correct. M.F.U.

LYS´IAS (lis’i-as).

1. Claudius, the “commander” of the Roman troops in Jerusalem who rescued Paul from the fury of the Jews (cf. Acts 22:24–30) and sent him under guard to the procurator Felix at Caesarea (23:17–30; 24:7, 22), A.D. 55.

2. A general under Antiochus Epiphanes and Antiochus Eupator (1 Macc. 3:32–37). See Maccabees, the.

LYS´TRA (lis’tra). A town of Lycaonia (which see), where Paul preached after being driven from Iconium (Acts 14:2–7). Here he healed a lame man and because of this was taken by the inhabitants to be the god Hermes (vv. 8–12). Through the influence of Jews from Antioch and Iconium the tide was turned, and Paul was nearly stoned to death (v. 19; 2 Tim. 3:11). Paul left for Derbe but soon returned (Acts 14:21). It is not definitely stated that he ever visited Lystra again but the route of his third missionary journey (18:23) makes that probable. Lystra was a Roman colony located on a hill about one mile NW of Khatyn Serai, which is situated eighteen miles SSW of Iconium.

M

MA´ACAH (ma´a-ka; “oppression”; sometimes “Maachah,” KJV).

1. The last named of the four children of Nahor by his concubine Reumah (Gen. 22:24). Whether this child was a son or daughter is not stated.

2. One of David’s wives and the mother of Absalom. She was the daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur (2 Sam. 3:3). Geshur lies to the N of Judah between Hermon and Bashan.

3. A city and small Syrian kingdom at the foot of Mt. Hermon, near Geshur (Josh. 13:13, “Maacath”; 2 Sam. 10:6, 8; 1 Chron. 19:7). The kingdom embraced the southern and eastern descending slopes of Hermon, and a portion of the rocky plateau of Iturea. The Israelites included this territory in their grant but never took possession of it (Josh. 13:13). Its king contributed 1,000 men to the Syrian alliance against David (2 Sam. 10:6–8), which was defeated (v. 19).

4. The father of Achish, king of Gath, to whom Shimei went in pursuit of two runaway servants and by so doing forfeited his life by going beyond the limits prescribed by Solomon (1 Kings 2:39).

5. The mother of King Abijam. She was the daughter (granddaughter) of Abishalom, and wife of Rehoboam (1 Kings 15:2), about 926 B.C. In v. 10 she is called the “mother” of Asa, but there the term is used in a loose sense and means “grandmother.” The following seem to be the facts: Maacah was the granddaughter of Absalom (Abishalom), and the daughter of Tamar (Absalom’s only daughter) and Uriel of Gibeah (2 Chron. 11:20–22; 13:2, where she is called “Micaiah”). Because of the abuse of her power as “queen mother” in encouraging idolatry, Asa removed her from her position as queen (1 Kings 15:10–13; 2 Chron. 15:16).

6. The second named of the concubines of Caleb (son of Hezron) and the mother by him of several children (1 Chron. 2:48).

7. The sister of Huppim and Shuppim and wife of Machir, by whom he had two sons (1 Chron. 7:15–16).

8. The wife of Jeiel and mother of Gibeon (1 Chron. 8:29; 9:35).

9. The father of Hanan, one of David’s valiant men (1 Chron. 11:43).

10. The father of Shephatiah, military chief of the Simeonites in the time of David (1 Chron. 27:16), c. 1000 B.C.

MAAC´ATH (mā-ak´a-th; Josh. 13:13). See Maacah, no. 3, above.

MAAC´ATHITES (ma-ak´a-thīts). Inhabitants of Maacah (Josh. 13:13), a small kingdom S of Mt. Hermon, located in the northern part of the Golan Heights, bounded on the S by the kingdom of Geshur. There were Maacathite warriors among the mighty men of Israel. One was apparently the father of Ahasbai in 2 Sam. 23:34; one was the father of Jezaniah, or Jaazaniah (2 Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8); another, Eshtemoa (1 Chron. 4:19), may have taken the title from Maacah, Caleb’s concubine (2:48). Indeed, Maacah was so common as a personal name that other Maacathites may have received the epithet in the same way. It is possible that the kingdom of Maacah may have taken its name from the Maacah of Gen. 22:24. The Maacathites are mentioned in Joshua in connection with the Geshurites as bordering the territory of Og, king of Bashan (12:5; cf. 13:11) but not dispossessed by Israel.

MA´ACHAH. See Maacah.

MAADA´I (ma-a-dī). A Jew of the family of Bani who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:34), 456 B.C.

MAADI´AH (ma-a-dī´a; “ornament of Jehovah”). One of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:5), about 536 B.C. He is thought to be the same as Moadiah (v. 17).

MAA´I (ma-ī). One of the priests appointed to perform the music at the celebration of the completion of the walls of Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh. 12:36), 445 B.C.

MAAL´EH-ACRAB´BIM. See Akrabbim, Ascent of.

MA´ARATH (ma´a-rath; “desolation”). A place in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:59), not positively identified, perhaps Beit Ummar, about seven miles N of Hebron.

MAAS´AI (ma-as´ī; “work of Jehovah”). The son of Adiel, descendant of Immer, and one of the priests residing at Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:12), probably after 536 B.C.

MAASE´IAH (ma-a-se´ya; “work of Jehovah”).

1. One of the Levites of the second class of appointed musicians “with harps tuned to alamoeth,” at the bringing of the Ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chron. 15:18, 20), about 982 B.C.

2. One of the “captains of hundreds” who assisted the high priest Jehoiada in raising Joash to the throne of Judah (2 Chron. 23:1), 836 B.C.

3. An official who assisted Jeiel the scribe in arranging the army of King Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:11), about 783 B.C.

4. A person slain by Zichri, an Ephraimite hero, in the invasion of Judah by Pekah, king of Israel (2 Chron. 28:7), about 735 B.C. Maaseiah is called the “king’s son,” but this should probably not be interpreted literally, “for in the first years of his reign, in which this war arose, Ahaz could not have had an adult son capable of bearing arms, but” Maaseiah was likely “a royal prince, a cousin or uncle of Ahaz” (Keil, Com., ad loc.).

5. An “official of the city,” appointed by King Josiah to cooperate with Shaphan and Joah in repairing the Temple (2 Chron. 34:8), 621 B.C. He is probably the same as Mahseiah, the father of Neriah, and grandfather of Baruch and Seraiah (Jer. 32:12; 51:59).

6. One of the priests of the descendants of Jeshua who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:18), 456 B.C.

7. Another priest of the “sons” of Harim who put away his Gentile wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:21), 456 B.C. He is probably the one who belonged to the chorus that celebrated the completion of the walls (Neh. 12:42), 445 B.C.

8. A priest of the “sons” of Pashhur who divorced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:22), 456 B.C. Perhaps the same as one of the trumpeters who joined in celebrating the building of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:41), 445 B.C.

9. An Israelite, descendant of Pahath-moab who put away his Gentile wife after the Exile (Ezra 10:30), 456 B.C.

10. A Jew, whose son Azariah repaired a portion of the walls of Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. 3:23), 445 B.C.

11. One of those who stood at the right hand of Ezra while he read the book of the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), about 445 B.C.

12. One of the priests who, with the Levites, expounded the law as it was read by Ezra (Neh. 8:7), about 445 B.C.

13. One of the “leaders of the people” who joined in the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:25), 445 B.C.

14. The son of Baruch and one of the descendants of Judah who dwelt in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:5), about 536 B.C. In 1 Chron. 9:5 the same person is probably listed as Asaiah (which see).

15. The son of Ithiel, a Benjamite, and one whose descendants resided in Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. 11:7), before 536 B.C.

16. A priest whose son Zephaniah was sent by Zedekiah, king of Judah, to inquire of the prophet Jeremiah during the invasion by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 21:1; 29:21, 25; 37:3), before 589 B.C.

17. The son of Shallum, and a doorkeeper of the Temple, with a chamber in the sacred edifice (Jer. 35:4), about 607 B.C.

MAAS'IAI. See Maas'ai.

MA'ATH (ma'ath). A person named as the son of Mattathias, and father of Naggai in the maternal ancestry of Jesus (Luke 3:26). As no such name appears in the OT genealogies, it is thought that this name has been accidentally interpolated from Matthat (v. 24).

MA'AZ (ma'az; “anger”). The first named of the three sons of Ram, the firstborn of Jerahmeel, of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. 2:27), after 1440 B.C.

MAAZI'AH (ma-a-zī'a; “Jehovah is a refuge”).

1. The head of the last (twenty-fourth) division of priests as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:18), before 960 B.C.

2. One of the priests who sealed the covenant made by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:8), about 445 B.C.

MAC'BANNAI. See Machbannai.

MAC'CABEES, THE (mak'a-bēz). The Hasmonaeon family, distinguished in Jewish history, from 167 B.C. until the time when Judea became a province of Rome, were called Maccabees from Judas, a distinguished member of the house, whose surname was Maccabaeus.

Name. The etymology of the word Maccabee is uncertain. Some have maintained that it was formed from the combination of the initial letters of the Hebrew sentence, “Who is like Thee among the gods, O Lord?” (Ex. 15:11), which is supposed to have been inscribed upon the banner of the patriots. Another derivation has been proposed, which, although direct evidence is lacking, seems satisfactory. According to this, the word is formed from Maqqābā, “a hammer,” giving a sense not altogether unlike that in which the Frankish ruler Charles Martel derived a surname from his favorite weapon, the hammer (martel, in French). Although the name Maccabees has gained the widest currency, that of Hasmonaeans, or Asmonaeans, is the proper name of the family. This name probably came from Chasmon, the great-grandfather of Mattathias.

Pedigree. The relation of the various members of the family will be seen in table 24.

Mattathias (Matthias, Josephus Wars 2.1.3; 167 B.C.)

1. Not all family members are listed; m. = married; dau. = daughter. Dates of death are given.
2. Herod had Mariamne I and her mother, Alexandra, executed (29 B.C.); much earlier (35 B.C.) he had engineered the drowning of Mariamne's brother, Aristobulus.

History. The Maccabees first came to prominence through the terrible persecution of the Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes. His accession was immediately followed by desperate efforts of the hellenizing party at Jerusalem to assert its ascendancy. Jason, brother of Onias III, the high priest, secured the high priesthood and bought permission (2 Macc. 4:9) to carry out his design of habituating the Jews to Greek customs (4:7, 20). Three years later Menelaus supplanted Jason by a larger bribe, and the latter fled to the Ammonites (4:23–26). During the absence of Antiochus on his second invasion of Egypt, he was reported as dead, and Jason seized the opportunity of recovering his office, took the city, and inflicted all manner of cruelties on the inhabitants. Antiochus, on hearing of this, and supposing that there was a general revolt of the Jews, hastily returned to Jerusalem, laid siege to the city, put 40,000 of its inhabitants to death, and sold as many more into slavery. He despoiled the Temple of its precious vessels and furniture and returned to Antioch laden with the treasure. On the occasion of his fourth and last invasion of Egypt, he was arrested by the Roman ambassadors and ordered to leave the country on pain of the wrath of the Roman Senate. On his way home he passed through Palestine and vented his wrath upon the Jews, commissioning his lieutenant Apollonius, with an army of 22,000 men, to destroy Jerusalem. Taking advantage of the Sabbath, he came upon the people assembled in their synagogues, massacred the men, and made the women and children captives. He burned the city and erected a fort on an eminence commanding the Temple, so that the worshipers approaching it were slain. The place itself was defiled with every abomination; and the daily sacrifice was made to cease, according to the prediction of Daniel (Dan. 8:9–12; 11:31). Matters were brought to a height by the famous decree of Antiochus, commanding that all the people should conform to the religion of the sovereign on pain of death. This brought about the Maccabean war.

Mattathias. At the time of the great persecution Mattathias was already advanced in years, and the father of grown-up sons. He was a priest of the division of Joarib, the first of the twenty-four divisions (1 Chron. 24:7), and, consequently, of the noblest blood. He retired to Modin, a little town W of Jerusalem. He was required to sacrifice on the heathen altar but refused. When a Judean came forward to sacrifice, Mattathias, carried away by his zeal, struck him, overthrew the altar, summoned all the faithful to follow him, and fled with his sons into the wilderness. He was joined by many from various parts of the country; in many places the idolatrous altars were overthrown, and the old Israelite usages and customs reintroduced. Mattathias did not long survive the fatigues of active service. He died in 166 B.C., and “was buried in the sepulcher of his father at Modin.”

Judas. Mattathias himself named Judas—apparently his third son—as his successor in directing the war of independence (1 Macc. 2:66). The energy and skill of “the Maccabee,” as Judas is often called in 2 Maccabees, fully justified his father’s preference. It appears that he had already taken a prominent part in the first flight to the mountains (2 Macc. 5:27), where Mattathias is not mentioned. His first enterprises were night attacks and sudden surprises (8:6–7); and when his men were encouraged by these means he ventured on more important operations and defeated Apollonius (1 Macc. 3:10–12) and Seron (vv. 13–24) at Beth-horon. Shortly afterward Antiochus Epiphanes, whose resources had been impoverished by the war (vv. 27–31), left the government of the Palestinian provinces to Lysias. Lysias organized an expedition against Judas; but his army, a part of which had been separated from the main body to effect a surprise, was defeated by Judas at Emmaus with great loss, 166 B.C. (3:43–4:25); in the next year Lysias himself was routed at Bethsura. After this success Judas was able to occupy Jerusalem, except the “tower” (6:18–19), and he purified the Temple (4:36, 41–53) on the 25th of Chislew, exactly three years after its defilement (1:59). The next year was spent in wars with frontier nations (chap. 5); but in spite of continued triumphs the position of Judas was still precarious. In 163 B.C. Lysias laid siege to Jerusalem. The accession of Demetrius brought with it fresh troubles to the patriot Jews. A large party of their countrymen, with Alcimus at their head, gained the ear of the king, and he sent Nicanor against Judas. Nicanor was defeated, first at Capharaslama, and again in a decisive battle at Adasa, near the field of Beth-horon (161 B.C.), on the 13th of Adar (1 Macc. 7:49; 2 Macc. 15:36), where he was slain. This victory was the greatest of Judas’s successes, and practically decided the question of Jewish independence; but it was followed by an unexpected reverse. A new invasion under Bacchides took place. Judas was able to gather only a small force to meet the sudden danger. Of this a large part deserted him on the eve of the battle; but the courage of Judas was unshaken, and he fell at Eleasa, the Jewish Thermopylae, fighting at desperate odds against the invaders. His body was recovered by his brothers and buried at Modin “in the sepulcher of his fathers,” 161 B.C.

Jonathan. After the death of Judas the patriotic party seems to have been for a short time wholly disorganized, and it was only by the pressure of unparalleled sufferings that they were driven to renew the conflict. For this purpose they offered the command to Jonathan, surnamed Apphus (“the wary”), the youngest son of Mattathias. He retired to the lowlands of the Jordan (1 Macc. 9:42), where he gained some advantage over Bacchides (161 B.C.), who made an attempt to hem in and destroy his whole force. After two years Bacchides again took the field against Jonathan, 158 B.C. This time he seems to have been but feebly supported, and after an unsuccessful campaign he accepted terms that Jonathan proposed. After his departure Jonathan “judged the people at Michmash” (v. 73) and gradually extended his power. The claim of Alexander Balas to the Syrian crown gave a new importance to Jonathan and his adherents. The success of Alexander led to the elevation of Jonathan, who assumed the high-priestly office (10:21); and not long afterward he placed the king under fresh obligations by the defeat of Apollonius, a general of the younger Demetrius (chap. 10). After the death of Alexander, Jonathan attached himself to Antiochus VI. He at last fell victim to the treachery of Tryphon, 144 B.C. (1 Macc. 11:8–12:4).

Simon. As soon as Simon, the last remaining brother of the Maccabean family, heard of the detention of Jonathan in Ptolemais by Tryphon, he placed himself at the head of the patriot party. His skill in war had been proved in the lifetime of Judas (1 Macc. 5:17–23), and he had taken an active share in the campaigns of Jonathan (11:59). Tryphon, after carrying Jonathan about as a prisoner for some little time, put him to death and then, having murdered Antiochus, seized the throne. Simon made overtures to Demetrius II, 143 B.C., which were favorably received, and the independence of the Jews was at length formally recognized. The long struggle was now triumphantly ended, and it remained only to reap the fruits of victory. This Simon hastened to do. The prudence and wisdom for which he was already distinguished at the time of his father's death (2:65) gained for the Jews the active support of Rome (15:16–21), in addition to the confirmation of earlier treaties. After settling the external relations of the new state upon a sure basis, Simon regulated its internal administration. With two of his sons he was murdered at Dok by Ptolemaeus, 135 B.C. (1 Macc. 16:11–16).

John Hyrcanus. Having been unanimously proclaimed high priest and ruler at Jerusalem, John Hyrcanus marched against Jericho to avenge the death of his father and brothers. The threats of Ptolemy against the mother of Hyrcanus caused him to protract the siege, until the sabbatical year obliged him to lift it. But Ptolemy, after killing her and her sons, fled to Philadelphia. Antiochus soon after invaded Judea and, besieging Jerusalem, reduced Hyrcanus to great extremity. At the feast of Passover, however, he granted a truce for a week, supplied the besieged with sacrifices, and ended with conceding a peace on condition that the Jews surrendered their arms, paid tribute for Joppa and other towns, and gave him 500 talents of silver and hostages. Ewald (History of Israel, 5:344) says that "John sought relief in his financial difficulties by opening the tomb of David. The treasures which he found there enabled him not only to pay the required redemption money, but also to enlist foreign mercenaries." John himself immediately accompanied the king to Parthia, where Antiochus was killed. Hyrcanus availed himself of the opportunity to shake off the Syrian yoke and establish the independence of Judea, which was maintained until it was subjugated by the Romans. He also captured several towns beyond the Jordan; destroyed the Samaritan temple on Mt. Gerizim; captured the towns of Dora and Marissa in Idumaea and forced the rite of circumcision upon the people; renewed a treaty, offensive and defensive, with Rome, and amassed great wealth. His sons, Antigonus and Aristobulus, conducted a campaign against the Samaritans; and when Antiochus Cyzicenus came to the relief of the Samaritans, he was defeated by Aristobulus. After a year or so Samaria fell into the hands of Hyrcanus. Soon after, being exposed to some indignity from a Pharisee, he openly left that sect and joined the Sadducees. He passed the rest of his days in peace, built the castle of Baris on a rock within the fortifications of the Temple, called by Herod "Antonia." His reign lasted from 135 to 104 B.C.

Aristobulus. Aristobulus succeeded his father, John Hyrcanus, as high priest and governor. He was the first since the captivity to assume the title of king. He starved his mother to death and imprisoned three of his brothers. He reigned only one year.

Alexander Jannaeus. Aristobulus was succeeded by his brother Alexander Jannaeus, who killed one brother who displayed ambition but left the other alone. After varying fortunes, he found himself at the head of 60,000 men, and he marched in triumph to Jerusalem. After a reign of twenty-seven years he died, 76 B.C.

Alexander was succeeded by his widow Alexandra (76–67). Her eldest son, Hyrcanus II, became high priest. Her abler and more energetic second son, Aristobulus II, she kept in check. Her reign was peaceful and prosperous. By building up the army and defenses, she escaped attack. Before the death of his mother, Aristobulus II (67–63) had taken measures to rule after her. In the civil war that followed her death, Aristobulus had the support of his father's veterans and soon subdued his brother, who was allowed to retire peacefully to private life. But Antipater, the military governor of Idumaea, saw an opportunity to advance his own cause and persuaded the weak Hyrcanus to fight once again; with the help of Aretas, king of the Nabataeans, he defeated his brother. At this point the brothers' appeals to the Roman general Pompey brought Rome into Jewish politics. Pompey annexed Palestine to the Roman Empire in 63 B.C., but it was decades before peace came to the area. Aristobulus and his sons fought the Romans with great ferocity but ultimately were defeated and destroyed. The situation was complicated by the Roman civil war between the forces of Pompey and Caesar. Hyrcanus managed to achieve sovereignty in Palestine but Antipater, governor of Idumaea (southern province of the Maccabean kingdom) and father of Herod the Great, enjoyed the real power. The two went over to the side of Caesar in the civil war, and Rome subsequently made Herod king of the Jews.

Hyrcanus, who previous to this had been incapacitated for the priesthood by having his ears cut off, was put to death in his eightieth year, 30 B.C. Thus perished the last of the males of the Maccabean line. Herod married Mariamne, in whom the line of the Hasmonaeans came to an end and by her marriage passed into the Idumaeans line of the Herodians.

Two of the first generation of Maccabees, though they did not, like their brothers, attain to leadership, shared their fate—Eleazar, by a noble act of self-devotion; John, apparently the eldest brother, by treachery. Probably history affords no parallel to the courage with which this band of men dared to face death, one by one, in a holy cause. "The Maccabees inspired a subject-people with independence; they found a few personal followers, and they left a nation" (McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia; Smith, Bib. Dict.; Ewald, History of Israel). See Apocrypha; Herod.

MACEDO´NIA (mas-e-dō´ni-a). A country lying N of Greece, whose rivers were the Strymon and the Axios, and whose mountains included Olympus and Athos. Some of its chief cities were Amphipolis, Apollonia, Berea, Neapolis, Philippi, and Thessalonica. It was conquered by the Romans, 168 B.C. Under the famous Philip II and his son, Alexander the Great, it attained the summit of its power (359–323 B.C.). Paul was summoned to preach in Macedonia by a vision (Acts 16:9; 20:1). The history of his journey through Macedonia is given in detail in Acts (16:10–17:15). He again passed through this province (20:1–6) and, after many years, probably visited it for a third time (Phil. 2:24; 1 Tim. 1:3). See Paul.

MACHAE´RUS (ma-ke´rus; "the Black Fortress"). A strong fortress of Perea, and the place, according to Josephus (Ant. 18.5.2), of John the Baptist's beheading. It was built by Alexander Jannaeus as a check against Arab marauders (Josephus Wars 7.6.2), demolished by Gabinius when he made war against Aristobulus, and rebuilt by Herod. It was situated in the gorge of Callirhoe, one of the valleys E of the Dead Sea, 3,860 feet above the sea, 2,546 feet above the Mediterranean, and eighteen miles SE of the mouth of the Jordan River. See John the Baptist.

MACH´BANNAI (mak´ba-nī). The eleventh of the Gadite warriors who joined themselves to David in the wilderness (1 Chron. 12:13), about 1002 B.C. See Machbannai.

MACHBE'NAH (mak-bē'na). If a man, the son of Sheva, and the one after whom the place of the same name was called (1 Chron. 2:49). See Macbenah.

MA'CHI (ma'ki). The father of Geuel, who represented the tribe of Gad among the explorers of Canaan (Num. 13:15), c. 1440 B.C. See Maki.

MA'CHIR (ma'kīr; "sold").

1. The eldest son of Manasseh (Josh. 17:1), who had children during the lifetime of Joseph (Gen. 50:23), after 1876 B.C. He was the founder of the family of the Machirites (which see; Num. 26:29), who settled in the land taken from the Amorites (32:39–40; Deut. 3:15; Josh. 13:31; 1 Chron. 2:23). Because Machir's grandson Zelophehad had only daughters, a special enactment was made regarding their inheritance (Num. 27:1–11; 36:1–12; Josh. 17:3–6). His daughter became the wife of Hezron and mother of Segub (1 Chron. 2:21). Machir's mother was Aramaean, and by his wife, Maacah, he had several sons (7:14–16).

2. A descendant of the former, a son of Ammiel residing at Lo-debar who took care of the lame son of Jonathan until he was provided for by David (2 Sam. 9:4–5), and afterward hospitably entertained the king himself at Mahanaim (17:27–29), about 984–967 B.C. See Makir.

MA'CHIRITES (ma'kir-its; "the Machirites," only in Num. 26:29). Descendants of Machir, who was son of Manasseh by an Aramite concubine. His wife and children are named in 1 Chron. 7:16–17; but the statement in v. 17, "These were the sons of Gilead the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh," with the declaration that Machir was "the father of Gilead" (v. 14) would add Gilead to the list of Machir's sons. At the same time the enumeration of the Gileadites by families in Num. 26:29–32, together with the account of the inhabiting of Gilead in 32:39–40, gives some credibility to the opinion that if Machir was the father of Gilead, Gilead is used collectively for the inhabitants of Gilead, in the same way that Moab is used for the Moabite nation, and that what is meant is that Machir was the ancestor of the Gileadites. The wife of Machir, who seems to have been of the tribe of Benjamin, was Maacah, the sister of Huppim and Shuppim (1 Chron. 7:12, 15–16). And Abiah (2:24) was the last wife of Hezron (v. 21), son of Perez (v. 5), son of Judah (v. 4). Thus did the Machirites connect Manasseh with both Judah and Benjamin. The daughters of Zelophehad, whose story is told in Num. 26:33; 27:1–11; 36:1–12; Josh. 17:3–6, were Machirites. The law that prevented confusion of inheritances by tribal intermarriages was first made in regard to this case (Num. 36:1–12), and was not in existence at the time of the before-mentioned intermarriages. See also Manassites. W.H.

MACHNADE'BAI (mach-na-de'bi; "what is like the liberal?"). An Israelite of the "sons" of Bani who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:40), 456 B.C. See Macnadebai.

MACHPE'LAH (mak-pe'la; perhaps "double"). A field containing the cave bought by Abraham for a burial place (Gen. 23:9, 17) and where he buried Sarah (v. 19). Abraham himself was buried there (25:8–9), along with Isaac and Rebekah, his wife, and Leah, the wife of Jacob (49:30–31), and later Jacob also (50:13). This is the last biblical mention of the cave of Machpelah; and there is no reason to believe that any building was erected on the spot before the captivity. The cave was in Hebron (which see), and is now marked by a Muslim mosque, in which are shown the so-called tombs. Muslim and Christian have together held this sanctuary for 600 years. Much of the structure as it stands today dates to the reign of Herod the Great.

MAC'NADEBAI. See Machnadebai.

MAD. See the article Madness in the general listing; and also Diseases: Madness.

MADA I (mad'ī; a “Mede”). The third son of Japheth (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5), from whom the Medes descended. We hear of Madai upon the Assyrian monuments, about 840 B.C., where they are called Amadâ and found by the Assyrian army in Media Atropatênê.

MA'DIAN. See Midian.

MADMAN'NAH (mad-man'a; “dunghill”). A town in the extreme S of Judah (Josh. 15:31), afterward assigned to Simeon. From 1 Chron. 2:49 it appears to have been founded or occupied by Shaaph, the son of Maacah, Caleb's concubine. It is possibly to be identified with Miniay, or Minieh, S of Gaza.

MAD'MEN (mad'men; “dunghill”). A town in Moab threatened with the sword from the Babylonian invasion (Jer. 48:2), identified as Khirbet Dimneh, 2½ miles NW of Rabba.

MADME'NAH (mad-mē'na; “dunghill”). A town (Isa. 10:31) named on the route of the Assyrian invaders, N of Jerusalem, between Nob and Gibeah. The same word in Isa. 25:10 is rendered “manure pile,” but the verse may mean “that Moab will be trodden down by Jehovah as straw is trodden to fragments on the threshing floors of Madmenah.” Its location is uncertain.

MADNESS. Besides its proper meaning of mania (see Diseases), madness, along with various other words of similar import, is used in Scripture of a violent disturbance of the mental faculties: (1) from overstudy (Acts 26:24–25); (2) from sudden and startling intelligence (12:15); (3) of false prophets (Isa. 44:25; Hos. 9:7); (4) as the result of drunkenness (Jer. 25:16; 51:7); (5) in derision, with reference to the ecstatic utterances of the prophets when in a state of holy exaltation (2 Kings 9:11; Jer. 29:26); (6) from furious passion, as possesses a persecutor (Ps. 102:8; Acts 26:11); (7) idolatrous hallucination (Jer. 50:38), or wicked and extravagant revelry (Eccles. 2:2); (8) a reckless state of mind (10:13), bordering on delirium (Zech. 12:4), whether induced by overstrained mental effort (Eccles. 1:17; 2:12) or depraved tempers (Eccles. 7:25; 9:3; 2 Pet. 2:16).

MA'DON (ma'don; “strife”). A Canaanite city in the N of Palestine, ruled by a king named Jobab (Josh. 11:1) and captured by Joshua (12:19). It is probably to be identified with the village of Madîn, near Hattin, W of the Sea of Galilee.

MAG'ADAN (mag'a-dan; Aram. migdālā; “tower”). A small town in Galilee, on the W shore of the Sea of Galilee, between Capernaum and Tiberias, mentioned only in Matt. 15:39 (“Dalmanutha” in the parallel passage, Mark 8:10), and may be the same as Migdal-el (Josh. 19:38). It was the birthplace of Mary Magdalene, i.e., the Magdalene (John 19:25; 20:1, 18). It is now probably the small village of el-Mejdel, three miles NW of Tiberias.

MAG'BISH (mag'bish; probably “sturdy, strong,” cf. Akkad. gabshu, “massive, powerful”). The name of a man (or place) whose descendants, numbering 156, returned to Palestine with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:30).

MAG'DALA. See Magadan.

MAG'DALEN (mag'da-len), or Magdale'ne (mag-da-lē'ne). The surname of one of the Marys.

MAG'DIEL (mag'di-el). One of the chiefs of Edom, descended from Esau (Gen. 36:43; 1 Chron. 1:54).

MA'GI (mā'jī, Gk. magoi singular, magos from Old Persian magav). The KJV renders "wise men" in Matt. 2:1, 7, 16.

In the Old Testament. In the Heb. text of the OT the word occurs but twice, and then only incidentally. Among the Chaldean officers sent by Nebuchadnezzar to Jerusalem one had the name or title of Rab-mag (Jer. 39:3, 13). This word has been interpreted as equivalent to "chief of the magi." However, it seems here simply to mean "great prince," from Akkad. rab ("great") and mugi ("prince"). The term magi was used as the name for priests and wise men among the Medes, Persians, and Babylonians. These persons were supposed to be adept in that secret learning that in remote antiquity had its seat in Egypt, and later in Chaldea, from which latter fact they were often called "Chaldeans" (Dan. 2:2, marg., "master astrologers," 4-5, 10; 4:7; 5:7, 11, 30). They formed five classes: the Hartummim, expounders of sacred writings and interpreters of signs; the Ashaphim, conjurers; the Mekashephim, exorcists, soothsayers, magicians, diviners; the Gozerim, casters of nativities, astrologists; and the Kasdim, Chaldeans in the narrower sense. The magi took their places among "the astrologers, those who prophesy by the stars, those who predict by the new moons." It is with such men that we have to think of Daniel and his fellow exiles as associated. They are described as "ten times better than all the magicians and conjurers" (1:20). The office that Daniel accepted (5:11) was probably identical with that of the Rab-mag who was first mentioned.

Later Meaning. We find that the word magi presented itself to the Greeks as connected with a foreign system of divination and the religion of a foe whom they had conquered; it soon became a byword for the worst form of imposture. The swarms of impostors that were to be met with in every part of the Roman Empire, known as "Chaldei," "Mathematici," and the like, bore this name also. We need not wonder, accordingly, to find that this is the predominant meaning of the word as it appears in the NT. The noun and the verb derived from it are used by Luke in describing the impostor, who is therefore known distinctively as Simon Magus (Acts 8:9). Another of the same class (Bar-jesus) is described as having, in his cognomen Elymas, a title that was equivalent to Magus (13:6-8). In one memorable instance, however, the word retains its better meaning. In the gospel of Matthew, written according to the general belief of early Christian writers for the Hebrew Christians of Palestine, we find it, not as embodying the contempt that the fraud of impostors had brought upon it, but in the sense that it had of old, as associated with a religion they respected, and of an order of which one of their own prophets had been the head. Thus, the evangelist would probably see in them men who were at once astronomers and astrologers, but not mingling any conscious fraud with their efforts after a higher knowledge (Matt. 2:1). The indefinite expression "from the east" (see also 8:11; 24:27; Luke 13:29; Rev. 21:13) leads us to assume that the writer himself had no more precise information at his command. "It is entirely baseless to determine their number from the threefold gifts, and to regard them as kings on account of Pss. 68:30, 32; 72:10; Isa. 49:7; 60:3, 10." From an early period the church has believed the magi to be the first Gentile worshipers of the Christ. “The expectations of the Jews, that their Messiah was to rule over the world, might at that period have been sufficiently disseminated throughout the foreign countries of the E to lead heathen astrologers, for the object in question, to the Jewish capital” (Meyer, Com., ad loc.; Smith, Bib. Dict., s.v.). See Star. BIBLIOGRAPHY: S. V. McCasland, Journal of Biblical Literature 51 (1932): 323–35; M. S. Enslin, JBL 59 (1940): 317–38; S. V. McCasland, JBL 76 (1957): 149–52.

MAGIC, MAGICIANS (from Heb. heret, to “engrave,” and so to “draw magical lines or circles”). The art or science of working wonders beyond the ordinary powers of man. “Magic may be divided into two classes—natural or scientific, and supernatural or spiritual—the one attributed its wonders to a deep, practical acquaintance with the powers of nature; the other to celestial or infernal agency. But both systems seem to have taken their origin in traditional accounts of early miracles—in attempts to investigate how such miracles were performed, and whether it were possible or not to imitate them. The theory of atoms held by the Epicureans appears to have been the basis of most magical speculations. It may be expressed somewhat after this manner: All changes in nature take place by the operation of atoms and must ultimately, therefore, be effected by mechanical action. Wherever man can substitute artificial action of the same kind, he can produce the same effects as those of nature. It required, in the first place, a knowledge of the mode in which nature acted; and, second, the power of applying the same agencies. On the other hand, the spiritual or geotic (literally ‘terrestrial,’ and so superstitious) magic relied entirely on the powers of spiritual beings; it demanded no knowledge of nature, and rarely required any moral or intellectual preparation. Its works were understood to be purely miraculous; and those who practiced it claimed the wonder-working power only by means of mighty and unseen intelligences in obtaining communion with and authority over whom their science consisted” (Imperial Bible Dictionary, s.v.). As stated in the article Magi, classes who were expert in magical arts were among the Egyptians, Babylonians, and so on. We will refer to these before calling attention to the Scripture accounts.

Egypt. The god Thot, having pointed out evil to men, gave to them at the same time the remedy. The magical arts, of which he was the repository, made him virtual master of the other gods. Their mystic names, their secret weaknesses, the perils they most feared, ceremonies by which they could be subdued, prayers that they must grant under penalty of misfortune or death, were all known to him. This wisdom, transmitted to his worshipers, gave them the same authority in heaven, earth, or the nether-world. Thus, they could bind or loose Osiris, Sit, Anubis, or even Thot himself; send them forth, recall them, constrain them to work or fight for them.

Naturally, this great power exposed the magicians to temptations, being often led to use it to the detriment of others, to satisfy spite, or gratify their grosser appetites. Many made a gain of their knowledge, putting it at the service of the ignorant who would pay for it. They pretended to be able to bring on sicknesses, deceptive or terrifying dreams, specters, or to constrain the wills of men, cause women to be victims of infatuation, and so on. Magic was not supposed to be all powerful against destiny; thus, fate decreed that the man born on the twenty-seventh of Paophi would die of a snakebite, but magic might decide as to the year in which his death would occur. Still more efficacious were the arts of magic in combating the influences of secondary deities, the evil eye, and the spells of man. After expelling the hurtful deity it was necessary to restore the health of the victim, and the magician was naturally led to the study of medicine. Magic was also invoked against magic, and thus rivalry arose among magicians.

Among the officers of distinction in the royal household were the “masters of the secrets of heaven,” those who saw what is in the firmament, on the earth, and in hades; those who knew all the charms of the soothsayers, prophets, or magicians. The laws of the seasons and the stars, propitious months, days, or hours, presented no mysteries to them, drawing, as they did, their inspiration from the magical books of the god Thot. They understood the art of curing the sick, interpreting dreams, invoking or obliging the gods to aid them, and so on. The great lords themselves somewhat reluctantly agreed to become initiated into the occult sciences, and were invested with these formidable powers; sorcery was not considered incompatible with royalty, and the magicians of Pharaoh often took Pharaoh himself as a pupil. The Egyptians believed “that everything that happened was owing to the action of some divinity. They believed, therefore, in the incessant intervention of the gods; and their magical literature is based on the notion of frightening one god by the terrors of a more powerful divinity, either by prayer placing a person under the protection of his divinity, or by the person’s actually assuming its name and authority. Sometimes threats are uttered against a god; or rather, as an Egyptian priest (Abammom by name) said, the daimones, i.e., subordinate ministers of the gods” (Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, pp. 212, 281–82; Renouf, Religion of Ancient Egypt, pp. 219ff.).

Chaldea. The Chaldeans believed that the operations of nature were not carried on under impersonal and unswerving laws but by voluntary and rational agents, swayed by an inexorable fate against which they dared not rebel but still free enough and powerful enough to avert by magic the decrees of destiny, or at least to retard their execution. “From this conception of things each subordinate science was obliged to make its investigations in two perfectly distinct regions; it had first to determine the material facts within its competence—such as the position of the stars, for instance, or the symptoms of a malady; it had then to discover the beings which revealed themselves through these material manifestations, their names and characters. When once it had obtained this information, and could lay its hand upon them, it could compel them to work on its behalf; science was thus nothing else than the application of magic to a particular class of phenomena Chaldea abounded with soothsayers no less than with astrologers, to whom the sick were confided, as expert in casting out demons and spirits. Consultations and medical treatment were, therefore, religious offices, in which were involved purifications, offerings, and a whole ritual of mysterious words and gestures. The use of magical words was often accompanied by remedies, which were for the most part grotesque and disgusting in their composition; [these] filled the possessing spirits with disgust, and became the means of relief owing to the invincible horror with which they inspired the persecuting demons The neighboring barbaric peoples were imbued with the same ideas as the Chaldeans regarding the constitution of the world and the nature of the laws which governed it. They lived likewise in perpetual fear of those invisible beings whose changeable and arbitrary will actuated all visible phenomena.... In the eyes of these barbarians, the Chaldeans seemed to be possessed of the very powers which they themselves lacked” (Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, pp. 780ff.).

Scripture Accounts. The household idols or “teraphim” were consulted by the Israelites for oracular answers (see Judg. 18:5–6; Zech. 10:2). The only account of divining by teraphim is in the record of Nebuchadnezzar’s advance against Jerusalem (Ezek. 21:19–22).

In Gen. 44:5, referring to the cup found in Benjamin’s sack, we read: “Is not this the one from which my lord drinks, and which he indeed uses for divination?” (see Cup, no. 4). It is certainly not to be inferred that Joseph actually adopted this superstitious practice. The intention of the statement may simply have been to represent the goblet as a sacred vessel, and Joseph as acquainted with its common divinatory use.

In the histories of Joseph and Moses the magicians are spoken of as a class. When Pharaoh’s officers were troubled by their dreams, being in prison, they were at a loss for an interpreter. Before Joseph explained the dreams he disclaimed the power of interpreting save by divine aid, saying, “Do not interpretations belong to God? Tell it to me, please” (Gen. 40:8). In like manner, when Pharaoh had his two dreams, we find that he had recourse to those who professed to interpret dreams. Joseph, being sent for on the report of the chief of the cupbearers, was told by Pharaoh that he had heard that he could interpret a dream. From the expectations of the Egyptians and Joseph’s disavowals, we see that the interpretation of dreams was a branch of the knowledge to which the ancient Egyptian magicians pretended.

The Bible narrative of the events immediately preceding the Exodus introduces the magicians. When the rod of Aaron was changed into a serpent, it is said that Pharaoh called his magicians, and they also “did the same with their secret arts” (Ex. 7:11). The same is said of their imitation of the first and second plagues (7:22; 8:7). But when they attempted to imitate Moses in the plague of the gnats, they were unsuccessful, for it is recorded that “the magicians tried with their secret arts to bring forth gnats, but they could not” (8:18). Whether the magicians really did what they appeared to do, or only performed a clever trick, has been a question of much dispute. Some contend that they did produce the same sort of miracle as that wrought through Moses, and that this was through demoniacal influence. It would seem the writer’s intention to intimate that the Egyptian magicians considered Moses to be one of their own profession—what he did, that they claimed to be able to do also—he worked by the same means and only exceeded them in degree. And this was unquestionably the opinion of the king himself. That they could not produce gnats is not conclusive proof against their having acted through supernatural agency. It is quite evident from Scripture that satanic and demonic power, although great, is definitely limited and can go only so far. They admitted that this plague was from Jehovah, and the next plague (boils) attacked them and caused them embarrassment and perplexity.

Balaam (see Num. 22:5–41; Josh. 13:22) furnishes us another case of a man accustomed to using incantations; and it is evident that Balak believed, in common with the whole ancient world, in the power and operation of the curses, anathemas, and incantations pronounced by priests, soothsayers, and so on.

Saul attempted to obtain a knowledge of the future in ungodly ways and commanded his servants to seek for a woman who was a medium—the mistress of a conjuring spirit with which the dead were conjured up for the purpose of making inquiry concerning the future (1 Sam. 28:7–14; see Necromancy, below). The supernatural terror running throughout the account cannot, however, be proved to be due to this art; for it has always been held by sober critics that the appearing of Samuel was permitted for the purpose of declaring the doom of Saul, and not that it was caused by the medium’s incantations. She is no more than a bystander after the first; she sees Samuel, and that is all.

The prophets, through their condemnation of them, tell us that magical practices prevailed among the Hebrews in the later days of the two kingdoms. Isaiah (Isa. 2:6) says that the people were “soothsayers like the Philistines,” understood by Delitzsch (Com., ad loc.) to mean “cloud-gatherers,” or “storm-raisers.” In another place (8:19) he reproves the people for consulting “the mediums and the spiritists who whisper and mutter”; whereas in 47:12–13 the magic of Babylon is characterized by the prominence given to astrology. Micah (Mic. 3:5–7) refers to the prevalence of divination among those who were such pretended prophets as the opponents of Jeremiah, not avowed prophets of idols as Ahab’s seem to have been.

Jeremiah was constantly opposed by false prophets who pretended to speak in the name of the Lord, saying that they had dreamed, but they told false visions and practiced various magical arts (Jer. 14:14; 23:25–32; 27:9–10).

From Ezekiel (Ezek. 8:7–12) we learn that fetishism was among the idolatries that the Hebrews, in the latter days of the kingdom of Judah, had adopted from their neighbors. The passage in 13:18 is thought by some to refer to the making of amulets; whereas others believe that it is figurative of hiding the truth.

Daniel, when taken captive, was instructed in the learning of the Chaldeans and placed among the wise men of Babylon (Dan. 1:4–6), by whom we are to understand the magi (which see), for the term is used as including magicians, conjurers, sorcerers, and Chaldeans, the last being apparently the most important class (2:2, 4–5, 10; cf. 1:20). As in other cases the true prophet was put to the test with the magicians, and he succeeded where they utterly failed.

After the captivity it is probable that the Jews gradually abandoned the practice of magic. Zechariah speaks indeed of the deceit of teraphim and diviners (Zech. 10:2), and foretells a time when the very names of idols should be forgotten and false prophets should have virtually ceased (13:1–4), yet in neither case does it seem certain that he is alluding to the usages of his own day. In the Apocrypha we find indications that in the later centuries preceding the Christian era magic was no longer practiced by educated Jews.

In the NT we read little of magic. Philip the deacon found in Samaria Simon, a famous magician, known as Simon Magus (which see), who, while having great power with the people, is not said to have been able to work wonders. At Paphos, Elymas, a Jewish sorcerer and false prophet, was struck blind for a time at the word of Paul (Acts 13:6–12); while at Ephesus, Jewish believers abandoned their practice of the magical arts. We have also the remarkable case of Paul casting out a “spirit of divination” from a slave girl “who was bringing her masters much profit by fortunetelling” (16:16–18). “Our examination of the various notices of magic in the Bible gives us this general result: They do not, as far as we can understand, once state positively that any but illusive results were produced by magical rites. They therefore afford no evidence that man can gain supernatural powers to use at his will.”

Magic Forbidden. The law contains distinct prohibitions against all magical arts. Besides several passages condemning them, in one place there is a specification that is so full that it seems evident that its object is to include every kind of magical art. The Israelites are commanded not to learn the abominations of the peoples of the Promised Land. Then follows this prohibition: “There shall not be found among you anyone who makes his son or his daughter pass through the fire, one who uses divination, one who practices witchcraft, or one who interprets omens, or a sorcerer” (Deut. 18:10). It is added that these phenomena of demon-inspired paganism are abominations, and that because of them the Canaanites were driven out from before the Israelites.

Various Forms. As stated in the article Divination (which see), there were forms of ascertaining the divine will and future events that were taken in good sense and, therefore, not forbidden. Two other classes of divination are mentioned in Scripture—those forbidden and those without special sanction or reprobation. We group these together for greater convenience in the study of the subject:

Astrologers. Called by the Hebrews “dividers of the heavens,” they are mentioned with “those who prophesy by the stars” (Isa. 47:13). They apparently “cut up the heavens” into certain sections in order to trace the course of them, making an effort to foretell the future. They were a part of the court of Nebuchadnezzar II (Dan. 2:2, marg.) and were characteristic of such ancient courts as that of Babylon and Chaldea. Astrology was widely practiced among heathen nations but was accounted illegitimate among the Hebrews, being considered inconsistent with the worship of Jehovah and classified (as in Isa. 47:12–13) with occultism and demon-inspired paganism.

Belomancy. This is divination by arrows. It is said of the king of Babylon that “he shakes the arrows” (Ezek. 21:21), more strictly, the quiver with the arrows. On this practice itself Jerome writes: “He consults the oracle according to the custom of his nation, putting his arrows into a quiver, and mixing them together, with the names of individuals inscribed or stamped upon them, to see whose arrow will come out, and which state shall be first attacked.” In this case Jerusalem was the ill-fated object of this divination, as we learn from the next verse, “Into his right hand came the divination ‘Jerusalem.’” The arrow lot of the ancient Greeks was similar to this; also that of the ancient Arabs. Another kind of arrow lot was by shooting. Three suitors of an Eastern princess decided their claims by each shooting an arrow inscribed with his own name. The arrow taking the longest flight indicated the name of the successful competitor. This sort of divination is not to be confounded with the arrow shot by Jonathan, which was an understood sign; nor the shooting of the arrows by Joash, king of Israel, at the command of the prophet, in which we have a symbolical prophecy.

The Chaldeans. Among others consulted by the king of Babylon respecting his dream were the Chaldeans. Among an Aramaic people the priests in a stricter sense were called Chaldeans, from the fact of the ancient supremacy of the Chaldean people in Babylonia. These Chaldeans sought their greatest glory in the study of astrology and also possessed the knowledge of divination from omens, of expounding of dreams and prodigies, and of skillfully casting horoscopes (Keil, Com., on Dan. 2:2). See also the articles Chaldean Astrologers; Magi.

Charmers (Heb. lāhash, to “whisper”), a word used to express serpent charming (Ps. 58:5; Jer. 8:17; Eccles. 10:11). In the first of these passages lāhash occurs in connection with the Heb. word heber, meaning a “confederacy” (i.e., with the spirits of the other world), which is rendered in the same manner and has a similar meaning. It is certain that from time immemorial some people of the East have exercised remarkable power over even the most poisonous of serpents (see Serpent Charmer). The “charmer” mentioned in the KJV of Deut. 18:11 is one who pronounced a ban, probably referring to the custom of binding or banning by magical knots, or one who casts a spell (so NIV). Another reference to character is found in Isa. 19:3 (Heb. ittim, “mutterers”).

Divination, Diviners. Generally speaking, “divination differs from prophecy in that the one is a human device while the other is a divine gift—the one an unwarranted prying into the future by means of magical arts, superstitious incantations, or natural signs, arbitrarily interpreted; the other a partially disclosed insight into the future by the supernatural aid of Him who sees the end from the beginning” (Imperial Bible Dictionary, s.v.). In Scripture the diviners were false prophets, and divination was allied to witchcraft and idolatry (Deut. 18:10; Josh. 13:32; 1 Sam. 15:23; Jer. 27:9; etc.), and energized by demon power (cf. 1 Cor. 10:20–21). See also Divination in the general listing.

Dreams, Divination by. The Hebrews, along with other Easterners, greatly regarded dreams and applied for their interpretation to those who undertook to explain them. Such diviners were called oneirocritics, and the art itself oneiromancy. Dreams were looked upon from the earliest antiquity as premonitions from their idol gods to future events. Opposed to this was the command of Jehovah forbidding His people from observing dreams and from consulting explainers of them. Those who pretended to have prophetic dreams and to foretell future events, even though what they foretold came to pass, if they had any tendency to promote idolatry, were put to death (Deut. 13:1–4). In opposition to the word of God no prophets were to be received, although they rained signs and wonders—not even an angel from heaven (Gal. 1:8).

Enchantment. The practice of conjurers and exorcists in employing incantations or magic, ritual procedures in enlisting the aid of evil spirits to effect some design or in purportedly setting free the demonized from their torments (cf. Dan. 1:20; 2:2, 10, 27). It appears as the heathen counterpart of prayer. See Divination; Enchantment; Sorcery.

Exorcist (Gk. ἑξορκιστής, “one who exacts an oath”). One who employs a formula of conjuration for expelling demons (Acts 19:13). The use of the term exorcists in this passage, as the designation of a well-known class of persons to which the individuals mentioned belonged, confirms what we know from other sources as to the common practice of exorcism among the Jews. Among all the references to exorcism, as practiced by the Jews, in the NT (Matt. 12:27; Mark 9:38; Luke 9:49–50) we find only one instance that affords any clues as to the means employed (Acts 19:13). In this passage it is said that “some of the Jewish exorcists, who went from place to place, attempted to name over those who had the evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus, saying, ‘I adjure you by Jesus whom Paul preaches.’” See Demon; Exorcism.

Familiar Spirits, Consulter with. See Familiar Spirit in the general listing.

Idolomancy. Consulting with images, literally teraphim. These household gods of the Semitic nations are often mentioned in the OT from the time of Laban (Gen. 31:19, see marg.). They were wooden images (1 Sam. 19:13, 16) consulted as “idols,” from which the excited worshipers fancied that they received oracular responses (Ezek. 21:21; Zech. 10:2).

Magician. A general term including all those who worked wonders beyond the ordinary powers of man. See head of this article.

Medium. See Necromancer; Spiritist, below; and also the articles Familiar Spirit; Necromancer; and Spiritist in the general listing.

Necromancer (Heb. dōrēsh ʾel hammēthîm, “one who inquires of the dead”). One who pretends to be able by incantations to call up the dead to consult them respecting things unknown to the living, often called in Scripture “mediums and spiritists.” A few, such as Cicero (Tusculanae Disputationes 1.16.37), scoffed at the idea, but the practice has held its ground in pagan and even Christian lands until the present. The Eastern magi were especially famed for necromantic skill. The necromancer was supposed to be the possessor of a conjuring spirit, i.e., of a spirit with which the dead were conjured up for the purpose of making inquiry concerning the future (see Lev. 19:31). Such a person was the medium of Endor, to whose incantations the ghost of Samuel responded (see Saul). It is evident from her exclamation that she was surprised at this appearance, and that she was not able to conjure up departed spirits or persons who had died. The spirit was supposed to be granted to the necromancer as a servant or attendant, and to be bound to him by the ties or obligations of witchcraft. To the spirits of the departed thus evoked the necromancer lent a low, soft, almost whispering voice (Isa. 8:19; cf. 19:3), as seemed natural for such beings. It is not certain that these mutterings and whisperings were produced by ventriloquism, although this may be the case, as ventriloquism was one of the arts of ancient jugglers. “In most parts of Greece necromancy was practiced by priests or consecrated persons in the temples: in Thessaly it was the profession of a distinct class of persons called Psychagogoi (evokers of spirits).” Necromancy was forbidden to the Israelites as a heathen superstition (Lev. 19:31), and those who disobeyed were threatened with death (20:6; Deut. 18:10–14). Still, it found its way among them, especially when idolaters occupied the throne (2 Kings 21:6; 2 Chron. 33:6; Isa. 8:19; 29:4; cf. 19:3, where the Egyptian enchantments are mentioned). See also Spiritists, this entry; and the articles Familiar Spirit; Necromancer in the general listing.

Prognosticators (Heb. môdî-îm lehōdāshîm, “making known as to the months”). These are mentioned in Isa. 47:13, where the prophet enumerates the astrological superstitions of the Chaldeans, who foretold the future by observing the phases of the moon. See Astrology.

Rabdomancy (Gk. hrabdos, a “staff,” and manteia, “divination”). Divination by rods. Cyril of Alexandria calls this an invention of the Chaldeans and describes it as consisting in this, that two rods were held upright and then allowed to fall while forms of incantation were being uttered. The oracle was inferred by the way in which the rods fell, whether forward or backward, to the right or to the left. This custom is referred to in Hos. 4:12: “And their diviner’s wand informs them,” and is evidence of the tendency of Israel to idolatry.

Soothsayer, Soothsaying. The soothsayer (diviner) was the pagan counterpart of the prophet, prognosticating future events, or professing to do so (Josh. 13:22) by various arts. Actually, diviners were energized by evil powers, as the prophet of the Lord was under the control of the Holy Spirit.

Sorcery (Heb. from kāshap, to “whisper”; Gk. mageia, Acts 8:11; pharmakeia, “medication”). A sorcerer was one who professed to tell the lot of others, to have power with evil spirits (Isa. 47:9, 12; Dan. 2:2), and was severely denounced (Mal. 3:5; Rev. 9:21; 18:23; 21:8; 22:15). This art was also practiced in connection with pharmacy, the mixing of drugs and medical compounds. See Sorcery.

Spiritist (Heb. yidd-ōnî, a “knowing” one). A term denoting a person pretending to be wise but usually employed in connection with mediums. A spiritist might employ any of the magical arts (Lev. 19:31; 20:27; 1 Sam. 28:3, 9), and the Israelites were forbidden to consult any such person (Deut. 18:11).

Splanchnomancy. The term refers to divination by inspection of entrails. Splanchnomancy was practiced in Rome by the Etrurian soothsayers and frequently referred to by Greek and Latin writers. Cicero (De divinatione 2.15) mentions the importance of the liver in divination of this kind. One example of this is contained in Scripture (Ezek. 21:21), where it is said that the king of Babylon “looks at the liver,” when deciding future course. Liver-divination was especially widespread in Assyria-Babylonia, and thousands of clay tablets dealing with omens and incantations have been dug up.

Stargazer (Heb. hōzeh, “beholder,” and kōkāb, “star”). One who attempts to foretell what will happen by observing the stars (Isa. 47:13). See Astrology, above.

Witch, Witchcraft. Generally the KJV rendering of the same original words translated “sorcery,” “sorcerer” (see above). Witchcraft (functioning as a medium, NIV) is mentioned in Deut. 18:11 as being forbidden to the Israelites.

Wizard. The KJV term wizard is replaced in the NASB and NIV by spiritist (see above); and also the article Spiritist).

MAGISTRATE. The rendering of several Heb. and Gk. words, and referring to a public civil officer. Among the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans the corresponding term had a much wider signification than the term magistrate with us.

1. “Magistrates and judges” (Ezra 7:25) ought to be rendered “judges and rulers.”

2. Archōn, “first,” rendered “magistrate” (Luke 12:58), signifies one first in power.

Similar in derivation and meaning is Gr. archē (12:11; Titus 3:1, “rulers”). Archōn is also used of the Messiah as “the ruler of the kings of the earth” (Rev. 1:5), and of Moses as the judge and leader of the Israelites. It is spoken of magistrates of any kind, e.g., the high priest, civil judges, a ruler of the synagogue, and so on.

3. General (Gk. stratēgos) properly signifies the leader of an army, commander; but in the NT a civic commander (Acts 16:20, 22, 35–36, 38). In Roman colonies and municipal towns the chief magistrates were usually two in number (called duumviri). These had the power of administering justice in the less important cases. See Israel, Constitution of.

MA´GOG (mā´gog; “region of Gog”). Mentioned in Gen. 10:2; 1 Chron. 1:5 as the second son of Japheth, but understood by some to be the name of a people. Magog is associated with Gomer in Genesis, with Gog in Ezekiel (38:2; 39:6, cf. v. 1). Gog is described by the prophet as belonging to “the land of Magog,” the situation of which is defined by its proximity to the isles of the Aegean. It is clear that Lydia is meant, and that by Magog we must understand “the land of Gog.” Scholars have sought to identify Gog with Gugu (Gyges), king of Lydia, and with Gagaia of the Amarna Letters. See Gog.

MA´GOR-MIS´SABIB (mā´gor-mis´a-bib; “terror round about”). The name given by Jeremiah to Pashhur (which see), symbolic of his fate (Jer. 20:3–6).

MAG´PIASH (mag´pi-ash). One of the chief Israelites who signed the covenant made by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:20), 445 B.C.

MAHA´LAH. See Mahlah, no. 2.

MAHA´LALEEL. See Mahalalel, no. 1.

MAHA´LALEL (ma-ha´la-lel; “praise of God”).

1. The son of the patriarch Kenan, the grandson of Seth. Born when his father was 70, he himself became the father of Jared at the age of 65 and died when he was 895 (Gen. 5:12–17; 1 Chron. 1:2; both Mahalaleel, KJV; Luke 3:37, Maleleel, KJV, Mahalaleel, NASB).

2. An Israelite of the tribe of Judah and family of Perez (Pharez), and ancestor of Athaiah, who resided in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:4), before 536 B.C.

MA´HALATH (ma´ha-lath; “sickness”).

1. The daughter of Ishmael and third wife of Esau (Gen. 28:9; 36:3; in the latter passage called Basemath).

2. The granddaughter of David, daughter of Jerimoth, and wife of Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:18), 926 B.C.

3. Part of the title of Pss. 53 and 88. See Musical Terms.

MA´HALI. See Mahli.

MAHANA´IM (ma-ha-na´im; “double camp” or “double host,” so called because the host of God joined that of Jacob as a safeguard). A place beyond the Jordan, N of the brook Jabbok, where the angels of God appeared to Jacob (Gen. 32:1–2). The name was afterward given to the town then existing, or afterward founded, in the neighborhood. It was on the boundary of Gad and Manasseh, as well as of Bashan (Josh. 13:26, 30), and was a city of the Levites (21:38; 1 Chron. 6:80). Here Ish-bosheth reigned and was assassinated (2 Sam. 2:8, 12; 4:5–8). Many years after David went to Mahanaim and was entertained by Barzillai (17:24, 27; 1 Kings 2:8). Near this the battle between the forces of David and Absalom appears to have been fought (2 Sam. 18). It was named as the station of one of the twelve officers who had charge, in monthly rotation, of the provisions for Solomon’s establishment

(1 Kings 4:14). It has not been positively identified, but it may be represented by a ruined site under the name of Maneh, 2½ miles N of Ajlun.

MA HANEH-DAN (ma'ha-ne-dan; "camp of Dan").

1. A place at which 600 Danites once encamped before the capture of Laish (Judg. 18:11–13). It was to the W of Kiriath-jearim and was called "Dan, after the name of Dan their father" (18:29).

2. In the NASB and NIV, it is also the place where the Spirit of God began to move upon Samson (Judg. 13:25). See Dan, Camp of.

MAHAR'AI (ma-har'ī; "swift, hasty"). The Netophathite who was one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:28; 1 Chron. 11:30) and was appointed captain, for the tenth month, of a contingent of 24,000 men (27:13), about 975 B.C.

MA HATH (ma'hath).

1. A Kohathite, son of Amasai and father of Elkanah, in the ancestry of Heman (1 Chron. 6:35), before 1000 B.C.

2. Another Kohathite, who, with his brother Levites, took part in the restoration of the Temple under Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:12) and was afterward appointed one of the overseers of the sacred offerings (31:13), c. 715 B.C.

MA HAVITE (ma'ha-vīt). Apparently a partial designation of Eliel, one of David's guards (1 Chron. 11:46). Because no place or person called Mahavah, or Mahavai, is anywhere else alluded to from which the title could have been derived, a corruption in the text is supposed. Bertheaw suggests that it should read "he of Mahanaim."

MAHA ZIOTH (ma-ha'zi-oth; "visions"). One of the fourteen sons of Heman the Levite (1 Chron. 25:4) and appointed by lot as leader of the twenty-third division of Temple musicians (v. 30), before 960 B.C.

MA HER-SHAL'AL-HASH'-BAZ (ma'her-shal'al-hash'baz; "spoil hastens, prey speeds"). Words that Isaiah was commanded to write "in ordinary letters," and afterward was given as a symbolical name to a son to be born to him (Isa. 8:1, 3). In v. 1 the word is rendered "swift is the booty, speedy is the prey" (see marg.). The KJV is Maher-Shal-Hash.

MAH LAH (ma'la; "disease").

1. The eldest of the five daughters of Zelophehad, of the tribe of Manasseh, who married among their kindred and so kept their inheritance (Num. 26:33; 27:1; 36:11; Josh. 17:3).

2. The name of a child, whether son or daughter is uncertain, of Hammolecheth, the sister of Gilead, a Manassite (1 Chron. 7:18).

MAH LI (ma'li; "weak, sickly").

1. The eldest son of Merari and grandson of Levi (Ex. 6:19; Num. 3:20; 1 Chron. 6:19; 23:21; 24:26; Ezra 8:18). He had three sons, named Libni (1 Chron. 6:29), Eleazar, and Kish (23:21; 24:28), and his descendants were called Mahlites (Num. 3:33; 26:58).

2. A son of Mushi, a son of Merari, and therefore nephew of the preceding (1 Chron. 23:23; 24:30). He had a son, Shamar (6:46–47), before 1440 B.C.

MAH LITES (ma'lits). Descendants of Mahli (which see), the son of Merari (Num. 3:33; 26:58).

MAH LON (ma'lon; "sickly"). The elder of the two sons of Elimelech the Bethlehemite and Naomi. Having moved to Moab with his parents, Mahlon married Ruth the Moabitess, and died without offspring (Ruth 1:2, 5; 4:9–10), before 1070 B.C.

MA´HOL (ma´hol; a “dance”). A person who seems to have been the father of Heman, Calcol, and Darda, men renowned for their wisdom before the time of Solomon (1 Kings 4:31). If these are the same as those given (1 Chron. 2:6) as the sons of Zerah, the word must be taken, as elsewhere, to denote simply their pursuit as musical composers, an art connected with dancing.

MAHSE´IAH (ma-se´yah). The grandfather of Baruch, the scribe and attendant of Jeremiah (Jer. 32:12; 51:59).

MAID, MAIDEN. In English, “maid” can have a sexual connotation (virgin, spinster) and also a social one (domestic servant, attendant). Although “maiden” can be used in the same sexual sense as “maid,” it has considerably wider social usage.

The KJV and NASB render shibhâ “(hand)maid” (Gen. 30:7; Ps. 123:2; etc.) to describe a maidservant, and na-ãrâ is used in 2 Kings 5:2–4; Prov. 9:3 of a similar relationship. In Gen. 30:3; Ex. 21:20; Lev. 25:6, ãmâ described a general concubine/slave relationship. In Judg. 5:30, rahâam was the term applied to females captured in war. Whereas the KJV rendered b□tûlâ by “maid(ens)” in Judg. 19:24; Job 31:1; Ps. 78:63; etc., the NASB and the NIV (in Judg. 19:24) translated it by “virgin(s).” This is an unfortunate error, because b□tûlâ means basically “a woman of marriageable age,” who may or may not be a virgin. Thus in Joel 1:8, a widowed b□tûlâ (or bethula) was weeping for the husband of her youth (i.e., her young husband). In the NT, paidiske, an enlarged form of pais, “child,” was used of a female servant (Mark 14:66; Luke 22:56).

MAIL, COAT OF. See Armor.

MAIMED (from Heb. hãraş, to “wound,” Lev. 22:22). To be deprived by violence of some necessary member. Such sacrifices were not allowed to be offered. See Lame; Sacrifices; and Diseases: Maimed.

MAINSAIL. See Ship.

MA´KAZ (ma´kaz; “end, boundary”). One of the places in the district under the supervision of Ben-deker, i.e., the son of Deker (1 Kings 4:9), one of Solomon’s purveyors. Its situation is unknown.

MAKER. A term usually applied to God as creator (Job 4:17; 36:3; Ps. 95:6; Prov. 22:2; Isa. 17:7; etc.; Hos. 8:14). It is used of man in Hab. 2:18. The NASB and NIV of Isa. 1:31 replace KJV “maker” with “work,” the former reading, “The strong man will become tinder, his work also a spark.” Delitzsch (Com., ad loc.) observes: “The fire of judgment need not come from without. Sin carries the fire of indignation within itself, and an idol is, as it were, an idolater’s sin embodied and exposed to the light of day.”

MAKHE´LOTH (mak-e´lôth; “assemblies”). The twenty-sixth station of Israel in the wilderness, between Haradah and Tahath (Num. 33:25–26); present location unknown.

MA´KI. See Machi.

MA´KIR. See Machir.

MAKKE´DAH (mak-e´da; “herdsman’s place”). A royal Canaanite city in the low country of Judah (Josh. 12:16), located near the place at which Joshua put to death five kings who had fought against Israel (10:10–29). It was afterward assigned to Judah (15:41). George Smith identifies this place with el-Mughâr, “the caves,” to the SW of Ekron, yet admits that placement as doubtful.

MAK´TESH. See Mortar.

MAL'ACHI (mal'a-kī; “messenger”). The last of both the minor prophets and OT writers (Mal. 1:1). The circumstances of Malachi’s life are unknown, except for what may be inferred from his prophecies. He seems to have been contemporary with Nehemiah, if we may judge from the agreement found between them in the reproof administered for the marriage of Gentile wives (2:11–14 with Neh. 13:23–29) and negligent payment of tithes (Mal. 3:8–10 with Neh. 13:10–14), 432 B.C.

MALACHI, BOOK OF. The last of the OT books and last of the minor prophets.

Name. Malachi (Mal. 1:1) means “my messenger” in Heb. It is common in critical circles to deny that Malachi was a historical person and to make the prophecy anonymous. It is claimed that Malachi is merely an appellative or symbolical expression suggesting the mission of the real author. The reference to “My messenger” in 3:1 is supposed later to have suggested the name. The Gk. version renders 1:1 “by the hand of his messenger” but uses the title Malachias. The Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel assumes that by Malachi, Ezra the scribe is referred to. It is better to take the name Malachi as an abbreviated form of Malakiyah, “the messenger of Jehovah.” It is highly unreasonable to assume the anonymity of the book. None of the other major or minor prophets is anonymous. Nor is it necessary to suppose that 1:1 is connected with 3:1.

Author and Date. The book is obviously a unit, the work of one man. Practically nothing is known of the life of Malachi except what suggestions may be gleaned from the book itself. Certain evidence, however, enables one to fix upon the approximate date of the prophecy. A Persian governor was in authority in Jerusalem, and is called a pehah (1:8). The Temple had been completed for some time, and the religious ritual was practiced for a long time (1:7–10; 3:8). It is patent from these elements of internal evidence that the prophecy is to be dated after Haggai and Zechariah. Religious zeal had waned and enough time had elapsed for abuses to become evident. Personal piety, especially of the priests, had degenerated (1:6–8), foreign marriages flourished (2:10–14), and paying tithes for Temple support had fallen into neglect. The book is reminiscent of the era of Ezra-Nehemiah. A date around 455 B.C. or later would be probable.

Unity and Authenticity. Critics have been in general agreement as to the unity of the book. Editorial additions are taken to be inconsequential. Chapter 2:11–12 is looked upon by Cornill and Marti as being a later interpolation. Chapter 4:4–6 (Heb. text 3:22–24) is sometimes construed to be an interpretation of 3:1 and, according to A. Bentzen, “probably a later commentary.” But all of these critical contentions are pure conjecture. The NT fully attests the canonical and doctrinal authority of Malachi (cf. Mal. 4:5–6 with Matt. 11:10, 14; 17:11–12; Mark 9:10–11; Luke 1:17; cf. Mal. 3:1 with Matt. 11:10 and Mark 1:2; Mal. 1:2–3 with Rom. 9:13). (For a critical discussion see C. C. Torrey, “The Prophecy of Malachi,” Jour. Bibl. Lit. [1898]: 1–15; J. M. P. Smith, “The Book of Malachi,” International Critical Commentary [1912]).

Outline.

- I. Introductory appeal: God’s love for Israel (1:1–5)
- II. Warning against priests’ sins (1:6–2:9)
 - A. Their carelessness and their ritual functions (1:6–2:4)
 - B. Their slovenly teaching (2:5–9)
- III. Forewarning against the people (2:10–4:3)
 - A. First warning: against treachery (2:10–16)
 - B. Second warning: of judgment (2:17–3:6)
 - C. Third warning: to repent (3:7–12)
 - D. Fourth warning: God’s condemnation (3:13–4:3)

IV. Concluding solemn warning (4:4–6)

A. To observe the Mosaic law (4:4)

B. To have in mind the (second) coming of Christ (4:5–6) M.F.U.

MAL'CAM (mal'kām; “their king”). A Benjamite and fourth named of the seven sons of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (1 Chron. 8:9).

MAL'CHAM. See Gods, False.

MALCHI'AH. See Malchijah, Malkijah.

MAL'CHIEL (mal'kī-el; “God is my king”), Malkiel (NIV). The younger son of Beriah, the son of Asher (Gen. 46:17), about 2000 B.C. His descendants were called Malchielites (Num. 26:45), and he himself was the “father” (founder) of Birzaith (1 Chron. 7:31).

MAL'CHIELITE (mal'kī-el-īt). A descendant of Malchiel (Num. 26:45).

MALCHI'JAH (mal-kī'ja; “Jehovah is King”; sometimes Malchi'ah,” KJV), Malkijah (NIV).

1. A Gershonite Levite in the ancestry of Asaph (1 Chron. 6:40).

2. A priest, the father of Pashhur, which latter King Zedekiah sent to Jeremiah to inquire of the Lord when Nebuchadnezzar made war against him (1 Chron. 9:12; Neh. 11:12; Jer. 21:1; 38:1), before 589 B.C.

3. The head of the fifth division of the sons of Aaron as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:9), before 967 B.C.

4. An Israelite, formerly resident (or descendant) of Parosh, who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:25), 456 B.C.

5. Another Israelite of the same place (or parentage) who did the same as no. 4 (Ezra 10:25), 456 B.C.

6. A Jew of the family (or town) of Harim who divorced his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:31), 456 B.C. He also assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:11), 445 B.C.

7. The son of Rechab, an official of part of Beth-haccherem, who repaired the Refuse Gate of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:14), 445 B.C.

8. The “goldsmith” (“son of,” see marg.) who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:31), about 445 B.C.

9. One of those who stood by Ezra when he read the book of the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), about 445 B.C.

10. One of the priests who signed the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:3), 445 B.C.

11. One of the priests appointed, probably as singers, to assist in celebrating the completion of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:42), 445 B.C.

MALCHI'RAM (mal-kī'ram; “exalted is the king,” i.e., God), Malkiram (NIV). The second son of King Jeconiah (Jehoiachin), born to him during his captivity (1 Chron. 3:18, cf. 2 Kings 24:12), after 597 B.C.

MALCHI-SHU'A (mal-ki-shu'a; “the king,” i.e., God is “salvation”; sometimes Melchishua, KJV), Malki-Shua (NIV). One of the four sons of Saul, probably by Ahinoam (1 Sam.

14:49; 1 Chron. 8:33; 9:39). He was slain, with his father, at the battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. 31:2; 1 Chron. 10:2), c. 1004 B.C.

MAL'CHUS (mal'kus; Gk. malchos, from Heb. melek, "king"). The servant of the high priest whose ear was cut off by Peter at the arrest of Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane (John 18:10). Caiaphas is doubtless the high priest intended, for John, who was personally acquainted with him (18:15), is the only evangelist who gives the name of Malchus.

MALEFACTOR. An evildoer, rebel, insurgent.

MALE'LEEL. See Mahalalel, no. 1.

MALICE (Gk. kakia, "badness," 1 Cor. 5:8; Eph. 4:31; Col. 3:8; Titus 3:3; 1 Pet. 2:1). This Gk. word denotes a vicious disposition, evilness, or wickedness. A kindred word is in Rom. 1:29 (Gk. kakoētheia, "bad character"), given by Paul in his long list of Gentile sins and implying malignant subtlety or malicious craftiness. Aristotle defines malice as "taking all things in the evil part" (Rhetoric 2.13), as the Geneva version of the Scriptures likewise renders it. It is "that peculiar form of evil which manifests itself in a malignant interpretation of the actions of others, an attributing of them all to the worst motive" (Trench, Synonyms of the NT, p. 11).

MALKI'JAH. See Malchijah.

MALKI'RAM. See Malchiram.

MAL'LOTHI (mal'ō-thi). One of the sons of Heman (1 Chron. 25:4), appointed by David as head of the nineteenth division of Temple musicians (25:26), before 960 B.C.

MALLOWS. See Vegetable Kingdom.

MAL'LUCH (mal'uk; "reigning" or "counselor").

1. A Levite of the family of Merari and an ancestor of Ethan the musician (1 Chron. 6:44).

2. One of the descendants of Bani who divorced his Gentile wife after the return to Jerusalem (Ezra 10:29), 456 B.C.

3. A Jew of the family of Harim who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:32), 456 B.C.

4. One of the priests who signed the covenant made by Nehemiah and the people to serve Jehovah (Neh. 10:4), 445 B.C. The associated names would seem to indicate that he was one who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (12:2), 536 B.C.

5. One of the "chief of the people" who signed the covenant made by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:27), 445 B.C.

MAL'LUCHI (mal'uk-i). A chief priest whose house was represented in the time of Joiakim by Jonathan (Neh. 12:14; "Melicu," KJV; "Malluch," NIV).

MAL'TA (mal'ta; "Melita," KJV). An island about seventeen miles long, nine miles wide, and about sixty miles in circumference. Paul's ship was wrecked here (Acts 27:27–28:1). The Phoenicians colonized it, the Greeks conquered it, the Carthaginians took it from the Greeks in 528 B.C., and the Romans took it from the Carthaginians in 242 B.C. It has been an independent state since 1964. St. Paul's Bay is shown at the NE of the island as the spot where his shipwreck took place and seems to meet all the requirements of the Acts narrative. MAM'MON (mam'un; Gk. from Aram. māmônā, "wealth"). A term signifying riches (Luke 16:9, 11) but personified and spoken of as opposed to God (Matt. 6:24; Luke 16:13). The phrase "make friends for yourselves by means of the mammon of unrighteousness," and so on, is interpreted as follows by Godet (Com., Luke 16:9): "Instead of hoarding up or enjoying, hasten to make for yourselves, with the goods of another (God's), personal friends, who shall then be bound to you by gratitude, and share with you their well-being." According to Meyer and Ewald the "friends" are the angels, but Godet prefers to understand them as "men who have been succored by one on earth."

MAM'RE (mam're).

1. The Amorite who, with his brothers Aner and Eschol, was an ally to Abraham (Gen. 14:13, 24), about 2065 B.C.

2. The name of Abraham's dwelling place near Hebron (Gen. 23:17, 19; 35:27). Here Abraham entertained three angels and was promised a son (18:1, 10, 14). The cave of Machpelah lay "before [probably to the east of the grove of] Mamre" (23:17, 19; 25:9; 49:30; 50:13). Mamre is now located two miles N of Hebron. There Herod the Great built a wall around the well of Abraham, enclosing an area 150 by 200 feet. Destroyed by Vespasian in A.D. 68, this enclosure was rebuilt by Hadrian in the second century and made the center of a pagan cult dedicated to Hermes-Mercury. Constantine removed Hadrian's pagan altar from the supposed site of Abraham's altar and erected a church. Within Hadrian's enclosure today one may see ruins of this church and Abraham's well. H.F.V.

MAN, MEN.

Names. Several words are used with as much precision as terms of equal importance in other languages. (1) Adam (Heb. ādām, perhaps "red earth," occurring also in Ugaritic and Arab., presents man of the earth, earthy, Gen. 1:26). (a) The proper name of the first man (Luke 3:38; Rom. 5:14; 1 Tim. 2:13-14; Jude 14); see also the remarkable use of it in 1 Cor. 15:45: "the first man, Adam." (b) The generic name of the human race as originally created, and afterward, like our man, a person, whether man or woman (Gen. 1:26-27; 5:1; Deut. 8:3). (c) Man in opposition to woman (Gen. 3:12). (d) Used rarely for those who maintain the dignity of human nature (Eccles. 7:28), that is, who manifest true uprightness. (e) The more degenerate and wicked portion of mankind (Gen. 6:2). (f) Men of inferior rank as opposed to those of higher rank (Isa. 2:9; 5:15; Ps. 62:9). (2) Man, as distinguished from a woman (Heb. īsh; Gk. anēr), presents him with immaterial and personal existence (1 Sam. 21:4; Matt. 14:21); as a husband (Gen. 3:16 rendered "husband," Hos. 2:16, see marg.); and in reference to excellent mental qualities (Jer. 5:1, "roam to and fro through the streets of Jerusalem ... and seek ... if you can find a man," etc.). (3) Enosh (Heb. ēnōsh, "mortal"), also occurring in Ugaritic, describes man as transient, liable to sickness, and so on. "Let not man prevail against Thee" (2 Chron. 14:11). (4) Geber (Heb. geber) connects man with human strength. It is applied to man as distinguished from woman, for example, "nor shall a man put on a woman's clothing" (Deut. 22:5); as distinguished from children (Ex. 12:37); to a male child in opposition to a female (Job 3:3, see marg.), the birth of a male child being a matter of joy in the East, rather than that of a female. It is used often in poetry (14:10; 22:2; Pss. 34:8; 40:4; Prov. 6:34; etc.). (5) Methim (Heb. mūm, "men," males). The singular is to be traced in the pre-Flood proper names Methushael and Methuselah. Perhaps it may be derived from the root mūt, "to die," in which case its use would be appropriate in Isa. 41:14. If this conjecture is to be admitted, this word would correspond to brotos and might be read “mortal.” Other Heb. words rendered man are nepesh, a “breathing” creature (2 Kings 12:4), an animate being, ba'al, “master” or “husband” (Prov. 22:24; 23:2; 29:22); gūlgōlet, “skull” (Ex. 16:16), corresponding to our poll. The Gk. words properly rendered man are: anthrōpos, “man-faced,” and so a “human” being, and anēr, a “male,” as distinguished from a woman.

It is noteworthy that the title Son of Man, which Christ applied to Himself, refers to man in this broadest and most comprehensive sense, and thus expresses the relationship He bears to every human being. For fuller presentation of terms and their force see Young’s Concordance, also lexicons of Gesenius, Liddell and Scott, and so on. It is to be borne in mind, however, that although the precise force of these terms must be understood for accurate interpretation, the Bible doctrine concerning man is so presented that its most general and important features may be otherwise easily discovered.

Origin. Man came into existence by a distinct act of creation. He originally bore, and in an important sense still bears, the image and likeness of God. Although with respect to his bodily organism he belongs to the animal world, he possesses a spiritual nature that gives him an exalted rank above all animals. He alone of all creatures upon earth is truly a rational and moral and religious being, and is capable of communion with God. He alone is represented as sinful, yet the object of redemption. Before him is the certainty of future judgment and an immortal destiny (see Gen. 1:26–28; 9:6; Ex. 4:11; Job 35:10; Pss. 8:4–8; 94:9; Matt. 6:29–33; 12:12; 25:31–46; Rom. 5:12–21; etc.). See Creation; Image of God; Immortality; Atonement; Judgment.

Unity. Man’s original unity, or that the whole of mankind has descended from one human pair, is one of the obvious teachings of Scripture (see Gen. 1:27; 2:21–25; Matt. 19:4; Acts 17:26; Rom. 5:12; 1 Cor. 15:21, 47–49). Although denied by certain natural philosophers, this doctrine is generally accepted not only by orthodox theologians but by such distinguished scientists as Buffon, Linnaeus, Blumenbach, A. Von Humboldt, and many others. This doctrine is of religious and ethical importance inasmuch as it is related to man’s noble origin, the reality of human brotherhood, the universality of sin and of redemption.

Antiquity. With respect to the antiquity of man, the Scripture chronology appears to date his origin to at least 6,000 years, perhaps several thousand years earlier, since the genealogies of Genesis 5 and 11 cannot legitimately be used for chronological purposes (see the article Genealogies). To what extent our understanding of the Scriptures at this point is beset with difficulties, and how such difficulties should be treated, is not practical to consider here. It is to be noted, nevertheless, that natural science agrees with the Scriptures in regarding man as the most recent in origin of all creatures dwelling upon the earth.

MAN, SON OF (Gk. ho huīos tou anthrōpou). This title, evidently taken from Dan. 7:13 where everlasting dominion is ascribed to the Messiah, was assumed by Christ and occurs sixty-one times in the gospels referring only to Him. It is found once in the Acts (7:56), where Stephen sees heaven open and Christ, whom he calls “the Son of Man,” standing at the right hand of God. In the light of the corresponding term “the Son of God,” which stresses Christ’s deity, the term “Son of Man” emphasizes His divine humanity. Whereas the gospel of John presents Christ as the Son of God, the gospel of Luke presents Him as the Son of Man. The term “Son of Man” is Christ’s racial name as a representative man (cf. 1 Cor. 15:45–47). The term “Son of David” delineates His kingly Jewish name, as “Son of God” denotes His divine name. This term “Son of Man” was widely used by our Lord to demonstrate that His mission (Matt. 11:19; Luke 19:10), His death and glorious resurrection (Matt. 12:40; 20:18; 26:2), and His second coming in power (Matt. 24:37–44; Luke 12:40) went far beyond all mere Jewish limitations. Nathaniel, in confessing Him as “King of Israel,” received the reply “You shall see greater things . . . the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of Man” (John 1:50–51). Under the name Son of Man, universal judgment is given to Christ (5:22–27). Under this designation is fulfilled in Christ the OT prophecies of blessing through the seed of the woman and the coming God-Man (Gen 1:26; 3:15; 12:3; Pss. 8:4; 80:17; Isa. 7:14; 9:6–7; Zech. 13:7). The term “Son of Man” is used by the Lord ninety-one times in addressing Ezekiel the prophet. As a term in the case of our Lord, denoting His racial name, as a representative man, it implies transcendence, not mere blessing to the Jews. Somewhat the same thought is involved in the use of the term referred to in Ezekiel. In Ezekiel’s day Israel had forsaken her divine mission (5:5–8). Although Israel is in exile, Jehovah will not forsake His people. On the other hand, He would have them to remember that they are but a small part of the entire race about whom He is concerned. There is therefore natural emphasis upon the word man, as the cherubim that Ezekiel saw in his vision “had human form,” and when the prophet glimpsed the throne of God he saw “a figure with the appearance of a man” (1:26). MAN OF LAWLESSNESS, THE (Gk. ho anthrōpos tēs hamartias, 2 Thess. 2:3; “man of sin,” KJV). This is the devil-indwelt “man of lawlessness . . . the son of destruction” who “opposes and exalts himself against every so-called god or object of worship, so that he takes his seat in the temple of God [at Jerusalem], displaying himself as being God” (2 Thess. 2:3–4). Power will be given him “over every tribe and people and tongue and nation” (Rev. 13:7). A worldwide reign of terror, blasphemy, and murder will be inaugurated by him. “He will speak out against the Most High and . . . will intend to make alterations in times and in law” (Dan. 7:25). It will be his supreme attempt to be “like the Most High” (Isa. 14:14). “He will even oppose the Prince of princes” (Dan. 8:25). His brief but horrible career will be brought to an end by the second coming of Christ (Rev. 19:11–21). He is the Antichrist, the first Beast of Rev. 13:1–10 (J. A. Seiss, The Apocalypse II, pp. 388–412; Clarence Larkin, The Book of Revelation, pp. 103–26; Dispensational Truth, pp. 115–23). Prophetic teaching has been thrown into considerable confusion by identifying the second Beast of 13:11–18 with the Antichrist (W. Scott, Exposition of Revelation, p. 280; W. Kelly, The Revelation Expounded, pp. 159–64; A. C. Gaebelain, Annotated Bible, 4:242–43; C. I. Scofield, Reference Bible, p. 1342). But the first Beast and not the second is the Antichrist of Scripture. This is well demonstrated by W. R. Newell (The Book of Revelation, pp. 195–201). Satan indwells this monstrous person and through him will strike his final furious blows at the Jewish remnant of the last days, who will be proclaiming “this gospel of the kingdom” (Matt. 24:14), and at the Gentiles, who will believe the good news of the imminent setting up of the millennial kingdom. As a man of lawlessness, the Antichrist will be the consummation of human opposition to God’s will and rule. See Antichrist. M.F.U.

MAN´AEN (man´a-en; Gk. form of Menahem). A Christian prophet or teacher who had been an associate suntrophos (“one brought up with”) of Herod the tetrarch in his youth and was one of those who assisted at Antioch in ordaining Paul and Barnabas (Acts 13:1).

MAN´AHATH (man´a-hath; “resting place”). The second of the five sons of Shobal, the son of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:23; 1 Chron. 1:40).

MANA´HATHITES (ma-na´hath-its; sometimes “Manahethites,” KJV). A term usually taken to mean inhabitants of Manahath, which is commonly identified with a town in Judah. But in 1 Chron. 8:6, where only Manahath is mentioned, it is in connection with Benjamite genealogies. The expression “they carried them into exile,” however, may imply a removal beyond the circle of Benjamite towns; cf. v. 8, where the land of Moab is mentioned. The tribal lines were not always sharply drawn in the early ages, as we have seen under Machirites (which see). And the hostility between Judah and Benjamin included the other tribes as well as Judah and must have been largely ignored from simple necessity, since Benjamin could not live alone and intermarriages with other tribes must have been frequent for a time. We incline, therefore, to the ordinary view, which is favored by Gesenius (Heb. Lex., 12th ed.). But the difference in the Heb. pointing is hard to explain, and some identify the town with the M[□]nûhâ of Judg. 20:43 (see KJV, “with ease”; NIV, “easily”; RV, “at their resting place,” marg., “at Menuhah”). It may be that 1 Chron. 2:52 and 54 refer to entirely different persons. In Gen. 36:23 and 1 Chron. 1:40 Manahath is son of Shobal, son of Seir. The Manahathites in both verses are among the posterity of Caleb, and this is interesting in connection with the possible Edomite descent of Caleb noticed under “Kenizite.” W.H.; M.F.U.

MANAS´SEH (ma-nas´e; “causing to forget”). The name of the fourteenth king of Judah (see article below) and other biblical persons.

1. The elder son of Joseph and his Egyptian wife, Asenath (Gen. 41:51; 46:20), about 1885 B.C. Manasseh and his brother were both adopted by Jacob upon his deathbed, who, however, gave the first place and the birthright blessing to Ephraim (chap. 48). Nothing is known of Manasseh’s personal history. His wife’s name is not mentioned, nor is it certain that he had one. Machir, the son of an Aramitess concubine (1 Chron. 7:14), was probably his only son and sole founder of his house. See Manassites.

2. Given in some versions of Judg. 18:30 as the father of Gershom, whose son Jonathan acted as priest to the Danites when they set up a graven image. It is generally thought that the reading is suspicious and that it should be rendered “Moses,” as in the Vulg., many copies of the LXX, and the NIV.

3. A descendant (or resident) of Pahath-moab, who put away his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:30), 456 B.C.

4. An Israelite of the family of Hashum, who did the same as no. 3 (Ezra 10:33), 456 B.C. MANAS´SEH. The fourteenth king of Judah, and other biblical personages (see article above). Manasseh was the son of King Hezekiah by his wife Hephzibah and ruled for a total of fifty-five years, from 696 to 642 B.C., (2 Kings 21:1; 2 Chron. 33:1). Of Manasseh few facts are given, although his was the longest reign in the annals of Judah.

Sin. Ascending the throne at the early age of twelve, he yielded to the influence of the idolatrous, or Ahaz, party and became in time a determined and even fanatical idolater. As he grew up he took delight in introducing into his kingdom the superstitions of every heathen country. The high places were restored, the groves replanted, the altars of Baal and Asherah rebuilt, and the sun, moon, and all the host of heaven were worshiped. The gods of Ammon, of Moab, and of Edom were zealously worshiped everywhere. Babylonian and Egyptian paganism was common; incense and offerings rose on the roofs of the houses to the fabled deities of the heights; wizards practiced their enchantments, and the valley of Hinnom was once more disgraced by the hideous statue of Molech, to whom parents offered up their children as burnt sacrifices. In the very Temple of the Lord stood an image of Asherah, and white horses harnessed to a splendid chariot sacred to the sun were placed in the entrance of the court. This apostasy did not go unrebuked by the prophets, whom the king endeavored to silence by the fiercest persecution recorded in the annals of Israel (2 Kings 21:2–16; 24:3–4). Fuller particulars are preserved by Josephus, who says that executions took place every day (Ant. 10.3.1). According to rabbinical tradition Isaiah was sawn asunder by order of Manasseh, and after his death the prophetic voice was heard no more until the reign of Josiah.

Retribution. The crimes of Manasseh were not long left unavenged. The Philistines, Moabites, and Ammonites, who had been tributary to Hezekiah, seem to have revolted during Manasseh's reign (Zeph. 2:4–9; Jer. 47–49). But the great blow was inflicted by Assyria, from whence an army came to Judea and, taking Manasseh prisoner, conveyed him to Babylon (2 Chron. 33:11).

Archaeology. In the Assyrian inscriptions of Esarhaddon there is a direct reference to Manasseh that illuminates the account of the wicked king's being carried away to Babylon, his repentance, and subsequent restoration to the throne. According to 2 Chron. 33:10–13 Jehovah brought upon the idolatrous Manasseh and his people "the commanders of the army of the king of Assyria, ... and they captured Manasseh with hooks, bound him with bronze chains, and took him to Babylon." There is no direct confirmation of this notation by the chronicler in Assyrian literature, but Esarhaddon's inscriptions do relate the forced visit of Manasseh to the great Assyrian capital of Nineveh about the year 678 B.C. "At that time the older palace of Nineveh which the kings who went before, my fathers, had built ... had come to seem too small to me, and the people of the lands my arms had despoiled I made to carry the basket and the hod ... that small palace I tore down in its totality ... and I commanded the kings of Syria and those across the sea—Baal, king of Tyre; Manasseh, king of Judah; Kaushgabri, king of Edom; Mussurri, king of Moab ... Milkiashapa, king of Gabail (Byblos), etc., etc.... twenty kings in all. I gave them their orders" (D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, vol. 2, sec. 690). It had been commonly supposed by critics that Manasseh's captivity in Babylon was a mistake for Nineveh. Assyrian cuneiform tablets, however, prove that Esarhaddon did in fact reconstruct the ancient city destroyed by his father Sennacherib. "At the beginning of my rule in the first year of my reign when I took my seat upon the royal throne in might there appeared favorable signs in the heaven and on earth.... Through the soothsayers' rites encouraging oracles were disclosed and for the rebuilding of Babylon and the restoration of Esagila (temple of the gods) they caused the command to be written down" (Luckenbill, sec. 646). Esarhaddon gives the following description of his building of Babylon: "I summoned all my artisans and the people of Babylonia in their totality. I made them carry the basket and laid the head pad upon them. Babylon I built anew, I enlarged, I raised aloft, I made magnificent" (sec. 647). It is enlightening that with such a trophy of his reign, Esarhaddon would have allowed Manasseh and the more than a score of kings whom he compelled to come to Nineveh to return to their countries without seeing this evidence of his splendor. Moreover, on the Senjirli Stela of Esarhaddon, Baal, king of Tyre, appears lifting manacled hands in supplication to Esarhaddon, and beside him Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, is shown with a hook through his lips and fastened by a rope to Esarhaddon's hand.

Reformation. Manasseh was brought to repentance and “humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers.” God heard his prayer and restored him to his kingdom at Jerusalem. His captivity is supposed to have lasted about a year, and after his return Manasseh took measures to secure his kingdom, especially the capital, against hostile attacks. He removed the idols and the statues from the house of the Lord and caused the idolatrous altars that he had built upon the Temple hill and in Jerusalem to be cast forth from the city. He repaired the altar of Jehovah and called upon the people to serve the Lord God of Israel. But the people still sacrificed on the high places, “although only to the Lord their God” (2 Chron. 33:12–19). The last Scripture mention of Manasseh is his death and burial in the garden of Uzza (2 Kings 21:18; 2 Chron. 33:20), 642 B.C.

MANAS'SES. See Manasseh.

MANAS'SITES (ma-nas'its). Descendants of Manasseh, the elder son of Joseph. The relation between Manasseh and Ephraim seems to have been a little like that between Jacob and Esau, the younger brother having priority of influence, while the elder retained the birthright of material prosperity. The great national leader Joshua was an Ephraimite. The territory of Ephraim was rich and well situated for traffic and communication, and, besides Joshua's inheritance, it contained Ebal, Gerizim, Shiloh, Shechem, and Samaria. Samuel, though a Levite, was a native of Ramah in Mt. Ephraim, and Saul belonged to a tribe closely allied to the family of Joseph (see Machirites); so that during the priesthood of the former and the reign of the latter the supremacy of Ephraim may be said to have been practically maintained. And after the division of the kingdom Ephraim formed the essential part of the Northern Kingdom.

Manasseh's population was also great. In the first census at Sinai, Manasseh numbered 32,200 (Num. 1:10, 35; 2:20–21; 7:54–59) and Ephraim 40,500. But fifty years later (26:34, 37) Manasseh took its place in the catalog as the eldest, and numbered 52,700 to Ephraim's 32,500. When David was crowned at Hebron, while Ephraim sent 20,800 men, western Manasseh alone sent 18,000, and eastern Manasseh with Reuben and Gad sent 120,000, “with all kinds of weapons of war for the battle,” out of a total muster of about 350,000 for the whole country (1 Chron. 12:23–38).

The tribe of Manasseh was divided, probably on account of difference of habit and occupation. One section was devoted to the pursuits of husbandry; they sought a quiet, peaceful region, with rich soil and genial climate, and they found these in the fertile valleys and plains of central Palestine. Another, and apparently much larger, section was pastoral in its tendencies. It was also warlike—trained to arms and accustomed to fatigue. Manasseh east—The descendants of Machir, son of Manasseh, invaded northern Gilead and Bashan, ruled by King Og, drove out the Amorites, and occupied the whole kingdom (Num. 32:29–42; Deut. 3:13–15). Manasseh west—This territory was small and not fully defined in the Bible. It lay on the N side of Ephraim and included the northern section of the hills of Samaria, a region of great beauty and fertility.

The children of Manasseh, Machir (Josh. 17:1), Jair (Deut. 3:14), and probably Nobah (Num. 32:42, cf. v. 41) were mighty men of war, of whom it is nowhere hinted that they were unable to drive out the inhabitants of any land that they chose to attack. “The district which these ancient warriors, east of Jordan, conquered was among the most difficult, if not the most difficult, in the whole country. It embraced the hills of Gilead with their inaccessible heights and impassable ravines, and the almost impregnable tract of Argob, which derives its modern name of Lejeah from the secure ‘asylum’ it affords to those who have taken ‘refuge’ within its natural fortifications” (Smith, Bib. Dict., s.v. “Manasseh”).

In general it was Ephraim that mingled in public affairs; yet of fifteen judges Manasseh furnished four: Gideon, Abimelech, Jair, and Jephthah. Gideon has been believed to be the greatest of the judges, and he might have been a king and the founder of a dynasty if he had been willing (Judg. 8:22–23). But being detached from the great body of Israel, the Manassites probably spread themselves like desert nomads over the wide regions whence they had expelled the Hagrites (1 Chron. 5:19). Thus they fell into idolatry (v. 25). Whether their fall was more rapid or deeper than that of western Israel does not appear, for perhaps their exposed position might explain the fact that they were carried away in the first captivity (v. 26). The notices of Manasseh in the reforms of Asa (2 Chron. 15:9), Hezekiah (30:1, 10–11, 18; 31:1), and Josiah (34:6, 9) leave rather a favorable impression, but they seem to refer to W Manasseh only. MA´NEH (ma´ne). The rendering in Ezek. 45:12 of the Heb. māneh, a measure of weight, elsewhere translated “minas.” See Metrology: Mina.

MANGER (Heb. ēbûs, Job 39:9; Prov. 14:4; Isa. 1:3; Gk. phatnē, Luke 2:7, 12; 13:15, “stall”). The Heb. term can mean “manger” or “stall.” It is rendered “crib” in the KJV and “manger” in the NASB and NIV. The Gk. term as well means both stall and manger, from which cattle were fed. Probably it refers here to that portion of the inn that was used as a stable. In the East the cattle were shut up in an open yard enclosed by a rough fence of stones or other material. Poor travelers, or those excluded from the house through lack of room, would share these humble quarters with the animals. Several of the Christian Fathers assert that the stable itself was a cave.

MANNA (Heb. mān, “what?”; Gk. manna). The name given by the Israelites to the miraculous food furnished them during their wanderings in the desert. When they saw it lying on the ground “they said to one another, ‘What is it?’ For they did not know what it was” (Ex. 16:15). The most important passages in the OT on this topic are the following: Ex. 16:14–36; Num. 11:7–9; Deut. 8:3, 16; Josh. 5:12; Ps. 78:24–25; Wisd. of Sol. 16:20–21. From these passages we learn that the manna came every morning, except the Sabbath, in the form of a small round seed resembling frost lying on the ground. It had to be gathered early, before the sun melted it; it had to be gathered every day, except the Sabbath. An attempt to lay aside for a succeeding day, except on the day immediately preceding the Sabbath, failed by the substance’s becoming wormy and offensive. It was prepared for food by grinding and baking, it tasted like fresh oil, like wafers made with honey, equally agreeable to all palates. The whole nation subsisted upon it for forty years, and it suddenly ceased when they first got the new grain of the land of Canaan. It was always regarded as a miraculous gift directly from God and not as a product of nature.

The author of Hebrews (9:4) includes a “golden jar holding manna” among the contents of the Ark of the Covenant for a memorial. It was a constant tradition of the Jews that the Ark, the tables of stone, Aaron’s rod, the holy anointing oil, and the jar of manna were hidden by Josiah when Jerusalem was taken by the Chaldeans, and that these shall be restored in the days of the Messiah. See Vegetable Kingdom.

For a discussion of the tamarisk-manna in the light of archaeology see F. S. Bodenheimer, “The Manna of Sinai,” The Biblical Archaeologist 10, no. 1 (1947): 2–6; F. S. Bodenheimer and O. Theodor, Ergebnisse der Sinai-Expedition 1927 (1929), pp. 45–88.

Figurative. Manna is the symbol of immortality: “to him I will give some of the hidden manna” (Rev. 2:17; cf. John 6:3–13).

MANO'AH (ma-nō'a; "rest, quiet"). The father of Samson, a Danite of Zorah. When his wife told him of the announcement that a son should be born to them, Manoah prayed to the Lord that He would send the messenger again to teach them how they should treat him. This prayer was granted; but when he knew that it was God's angel, Manoah feared that he and his wife would die, because they had "seen God." His wife quieted his fears, assuring him of God's pleasure by His acceptance of their sacrifice (Judg. 13:2–23), before 1070 B.C. We hear of Manoah once again in connection with the marriage of Samson, when both parents protested their son's choice of a wife, but to no avail (14:2–3). They accompanied him to Timnah, both at the betrothal and the wedding (vv. 5, 10) but are not named. Manoah probably did not survive Samson, who was buried "between Zorah and Eshtaol in the tomb of Manoah his father" (16:31).

MANSERVANT. See Service.

MANSLAYER. One who by accident strikes another so as to kill (Num. 35:6, 12). The cases mentioned of manslaughter appear to be a sufficient sample of the intention of the lawgiver: (1) Death by a blow in a sudden quarrel (Num. 35:21). (2) Death by a stone or missile thrown at random (vv. 22–23). (3) By the head of an ax flying from its handle (Deut. 19:5). (4) Whether the case of a person killed by falling from a roof unprovided with a parapet involved the guilt of manslaughter on the owner is not clear, but the law seems intended to prevent the imputation of malice in any such case by preventing as far as possible the occurrence of the fact itself (22:8). In all these and similar cases the manslayer was allowed to retire to a city of refuge (which see). Besides these the following may be mentioned as cases of homicide: (1) An animal not known to be vicious causing death to a human being was to be put to death and regarded as unclean. But if it was known to be vicious the owner also was liable to fine, or even death (Ex. 21:28–32). (2) A thief overtaken at night in the act might lawfully be put to death, but if the sun had risen the act of killing him was to be regarded as murder (22:2–3). See Murder.

MA'OCH (ma'ok; perhaps, "oppression"). The father of Achish, the king of Gath, to whom David fled from Saul (1 Sam. 27:2), about 1004 B.C.

MA'ON (ma'on; "abode, dwelling").

1. The son of Shammai, of the family of Caleb and tribe of Judah. He was the "father" (founder) of Bethzur (1 Chron. 2:45).

2. An elevated town in the tribe of Judah, seven miles S of Hebron, where David hid himself from Saul (1 Sam. 23:24–25), and near Nabal's possessions (25:2–3); probably now Tell Main, a small heap of ruins.

MA'ONITES (ma'on-īts; same form as Maon). Oppressors of Israel, mentioned only in Judg. 10:12, where they are named in connection with the Egyptians, Amorites, sons of Ammon, Philistines, Sidonians, and Amalekites. The name agrees well with the plural, Meunim (which see), but no mention is made of any previous invasion of Israel by the Meunim. And Midian, whose yoke had been so heavy and so lately borne, is not mentioned in the list. These facts have led some to receive the reading "Midian," which is given in both the great manuscripts of the LXX. If the reading "Maonites" is to be retained, we may suppose Maon in Judah to have been originally occupied by this people and to have taken its name from them. Maon was mentioned in connection with Ziph and Carmel. The modern Maîn is seven miles S of Hebron. W.H.

MA'RA (ma'ra; "bitter"). The name chosen for herself by Naomi as being more appropriate to her by reason of her afflictions than her former name, which signifies "my delight" (Ruth 1:20).

MA'RAH (ma'ra; "bitterness"). The sixth station of the desert wandering of Israel (Ex. 15:23; Num. 33:8–9). Here the waters were miraculously sweetened by casting a tree into them, as directed by God (Ex. 15:24–25). It is identified as 'Ain Hawârah, forty-seven miles from 'Ayûn Mousa.

MAR'ALAH (mar'a-la; "trembling, earthquake"). A place four miles from Nazareth, on the southern boundary of Zebulun (Josh. 19:11), apparently within the bounds of Issachar, W of Sarid and E of Dabbesheth.

MARANATH'A (mar-an-ath-a; Gk. from Aram. māranā tā, "our Lord cometh"). An expression used by Paul at the conclusion of his first epistle to the Corinthians: "If anyone does not love the Lord, let him be accursed. Maranatha" (16:22; see NIV marg.). It is thought to have been used as a watchword, common to all believers in the first age. Coupled here with an anathema, or curse (see marg.), it is the Christian's reminder as he waits the advent of the judge to execute the anathema.

MARBLE. See Mineral Kingdom.

MAR'CUS. See Mark.

MAR'DUK. See Gods, False: Merodach.

MARE'SHAH (ma-re'sha; "summit, chief place").

1. A person named as the "father" of Hebron, among the descendants of Judah. From the position his name occupies he is supposed to be the brother of Mesha, Caleb's firstborn (1 Chron. 2:42), about 1380 B.C.

2. A son of, or, more probably, a city founded by, Laadah, of the family of Shelah (1 Chron. 4:21).

3. A town of Judah mentioned with Keilah and Achzib (Josh. 15:44), rebuilt by Laadah (1 Chron. 4:21) and fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:8). It was the native place of the prophet Eliezer (20:37) and near the valley of Zephathah, where the Ethiopians under Zerah were defeated (14:9–13). It was inhabited by Edomites in the Greek period and known as Marisa. It figured prominently in the Maccabean war (1 Macc. 5:66; 2 Macc. 12:35), being destroyed by the Parthians in 40 B.C.

Mareshah is identified with Tell Sandahannah, about one mile S of Beit Jibrin. R. A. S. Macalister and F. J. Bliss excavated at the site in 1900 for the Palestine Exploration Fund. Though they found some Iron Age materials, most of what they discovered concerned the Hellenistic stratum, which contained a city wall about 500 feet on a side, within which was a town laid out on the grid plan with streets intersecting at right angles. In 1902, 1925, and 1962 some fine rock-cut and elaborately painted Hellenistic tombs were found there. H.F.V. BIBLIOGRAPHY: W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (1942), pp. 146–47; id., Archaeology of Palestine (1960), pp. 152–53.

MA'RI (ma'ri). An ancient city on the Middle Euphrates, represented today by Tell Hariri, about six miles N of Abou Kemal. André Parrot conducted excavations sponsored by the Musée du Louvre at the site, 1933–39 and 1951–56; other French teams have worked there in recent years. These diggings have been most successful in revealing a brilliant civilization of this city in the second millennium B.C. Among the outstanding discoveries were a temple of Ishtar and a ziggurat (temple tower). Most famous of all the buildings uncovered in Mari was the royal palace, a sprawling edifice of about 260 rooms covering more than six acres. It consisted of royal apartments, administrative offices, and even a school for scribes. It was ornamented with great wall paintings, some of which were still preserved. From the palace archives more than twenty thousand tablets were recovered. Many of these cuneiform tablets record diplomatic correspondence by the last king of Mari, Zimri-lim, with the great Hammurabi of Babylon. The Mari Letters have helped to date Hammurabi (c. 1728–1626 B.C.), thus settling a difficult point in biblical chronology. In fact, the Mari documents have been a major discovery and have completely revised current knowledge of history, linguistics, and historical background of the OT during the first quarter of the second millennium B.C. The June 1984 issue of the Biblical Archaeologist is devoted to Mari and its legacy. See Scripture Manuscripts: Old Testament; Scripture Manuscripts: New Testament; Dead Sea Scrolls. M.F.U.

MARK (Gk. Markos). The evangelist who was probably the same as “John who was also called Mark” (Acts 12:12, 25). He was the son of a certain Mary in Jerusalem (12:12) and was, therefore, presumably a native of that city. He was of Jewish parentage, his mother being a relative of Barnabas (Col. 4:10). It was to her house that Peter went when released from prison by the angel (Acts 12:12). That apostle calls him his son (1 Pet. 5:13), probably because he was converted under his ministry. He accompanied Paul and Barnabas on their first journey (Acts 12:25; 13:5) but left them at Perga and returned to Jerusalem (13:13). Whatever the reason for this act, it seems to have been sufficient in Paul’s estimation to justify his refusing to allow Mark to accompany him on his second journey. Barnabas was determined to take him, and thus Mark was the cause of a “sharp disagreement” between them and a separation (15:36–39). This did not completely estrange him from Paul, for we find Mark with the apostle in his first imprisonment at Rome (Col. 4:10; Philem. 24). Later he was at Babylon and united with Peter in sending salutations (1 Pet. 5:13). He seems to have been with Timothy at Ephesus when Paul wrote to him during his second imprisonment and urged him to bring Mark to Rome (2 Tim. 4:11), A.D. 66. Tradition states that Mark was sent on a mission to Egypt by Peter, that he founded the church of Alexandria, of which he became bishop, and suffered as a martyr in the eighth year of Nero. In the gospel of Mark his record is emphatically “the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God” (Mark 1:1), living and working among men and developing the mission more in acts than by words.

MARK. Several uses of the term appear in Scripture.

1. God commands the man with writing materials to “put a mark on the foreheads” of all persons in Jerusalem, that they might be spared in the time of judgment (Ezek. 9:4, 6). The Heb. letter tau, the last of the alphabet, was used as a mark or “signature” (Job 31:35, see marg.), and in early times was written in the form of a cross. The mark (Gk. charagma, “stamp”) is to be stamped on the right hand or the forehead as the badge of the followers of Antichrist (Rev. 13:16–17; 14:9, 11; 16:2; 19:20; 20:4).

2. The goal or end one has in view, from the Gk. skopos, something “watched” (Phil. 3:14).

3. In Lev. 19:28 we find two prohibitions of an unnatural disfigurement of the body: “You shall not make any cuts in your body for the dead, nor make any tattoo marks on yourselves.” The latter (Heb. qaṣṣa, “incision”) has no reference to idolatrous usages, but was intended to implant upon the Israelites a proper reverence for God's creation (K. & D., Com., ad loc.).

4. In Gal. 6:17 Paul writes, "From now on let no one cause trouble for me, for I bear in my body the brand-marks of Jesus," that is, the brand of my Master, Jesus Christ. The Gk. stigma is the common word for the brand or mark with which masters marked their slaves. "From the very numerous records [on fragments of marble] of manumissions at Delphi and other shrines in Greece we have learned the legal process by which a slave gained his own liberty. He went to the temple of the god, and there paid his money to the priests; they then with his money bought the slave from his master, on the part of the god. He became for the rest of his life a slave to the god, which meant practically freedom, subject to certain periodical duties. If at any time his master or his master's heirs sought to reclaim him he had the record of the transaction in the temple.

"But on one point these documents are silent: If he traveled, if he were far away from home and were seized as a runaway slave, what security could he have? I believe St. Paul gives us the solution. When liberated at the temple, the priest, if he desired it, branded him with the 'stigmata' of his new master. Now St. Paul's words acquire a new and striking application. He had been the slave of sin; but he had been purchased by Christ, and his new liberty consisted in his being the slave of Christ. Henceforth, he says, let no man attempt to reclaim me; I have been marked on my body with the brand of my new master, Jesus Christ. Probably he referred to the many scars he bore of his persecutions" (Mahaffy, Christian Work).

MARK, GOSPEL OF. The second gospel by order in the English Bible.

Theme. In all the gospels one unique personality dominates. In Mark we have Christ as a Servant, just as He appears as King in Matthew, Man in Luke, and God in John. But Mark's Servant is also King, Man, and God. In Mark, Jesus is seen as the Mighty Worker, rather than as the Great Teacher. It is preeminently the gospel of Jehovah's Servant, "the Branch" (Zech. 3:8). Chapter 10:45 describes the scope of the book, "For even the Son of Man did not come to be served but to serve." No genealogy is included, for such is not important for a servant. In this gospel Christ appears as a lowly servant who, "although He existed in the form of God, ... emptied Himself, ... being made in the likeness of men" (Phil. 2:6-8). This lowly Servant was nevertheless the mighty God (Isa. 9:6). In keeping with the servant character, the gospel is one of deeds rather than of words.

Outline.

- I. The Servant's preparation (1:1-13)
- II. The Servant's Galilean ministry (1:14-7:23)
- III. The Servant's ministry north and east of Galilee (7:24-9:50)
- IV. The Servant's ministry enroute to Jerusalem (10:1-52)
- V. The Servant's ministry in Jerusalem (11-13)
- VI. The Servant's submission to death (14-15)
- VII. The Servant's triumphant resurrection and ascension (16)

Attestation—External Evidence. The gospel circulated early among Christians. By the middle of the second century it was included by Tatian in his Diatessaron, or "Harmony of the Four Gospels" (c. A.D. 168). It is quoted by Irenaeus in the last quarter of the second century as being Mark's. Others before him, such as Papias, assert that Mark was both Peter's disciple and interpreter. Mark's close association with Peter is corroborated by numerous details of internal evidence, suggesting eyewitness testimony. But Mark evidently used other sources besides Peter. Quite a bit of material reveals Aramaic coloring. Rome is fixed by tradition as the place where the gospel was written by Mark. If so, it must be dated around A.D. 65–68, but if Luke’s gospel was written before A.D. 63, Mark must be dated still earlier.

Author. Internal evidence agrees with the traditional Markan authorship. The writer is clearly a Christian Jew. He knows Jewish thought and life. He is acquainted with Aramaic. He writes with a thorough knowledge of Palestine.

Sources. Recent criticism accords this shortest and simplest of the four gospels a place of priority in time and primacy of importance. The reason for this is that it is now viewed as a basic source for Matthew and Luke, and especially underlies John. But in early traditional lists it appears in second, third, and fourth places, never in the first. Until Lachmann’s “discovery” of the priority of Mark in 1835 the gospel had little interest in critical circles. But this critical view is unsound and is not to be accepted without stern challenge. There is, however, a sense in which Mark is dependent not upon any canonical gospel but upon Peter the apostle. See Attestation. M.F.U.

MARKET (Heb. maʿārāb). In the NT the Gk. word agora is rendered “market place” and generally denotes any place of public resort in towns or cities where trials are held (Acts 16:19), where citizens resort (17:17), and where commodities are displayed for sale (Mark 7:4). From this is derived agoraios, “relating to the market place,” and rendered “wicked men from the market place” (Acts 17:5). It is rendered “courts” in Acts 19:38, where it refers to judicial days or assemblies. Agoras in the cities of Greece or Greek cities of Asia Minor were more than markets; they were centers of life. There one might find temples, law courts, and government offices, as well as commercial facilities. Markets in the East were held at or near the gates of cities, where goods were displayed either in tents or the open air (2 Kings 7:18). H.F.V.

MA’ROTH (ma’rōth; “bitterness”). A town W of Judah, not far from Jerusalem, on the route of the invading Assyrian army from Lachish (Mic. 1:12).

MARRIAGE. The rendering of several words and phrases in the Heb. and Gk., meaning to be “master”; to “take,” that is, a wife; to “magnify” or “lift up” a woman; to “contract”; to “dwell together”; to “perform the duty of a brother”; to “become,” that is, the wife of one. In all the Heb. Scriptures there is no single word for the estate of marriage or to express the abstract idea of wedlock.

Origin. Marriage is a divine institution designed to form a permanent union between man and woman that they might be helpful to one another (Gen. 2:18). Moses presents it as the deepest corporeal and spiritual unity of man and woman, and monogamy as the form of marriage ordained by God (2:24; cf. Matt. 19:5). Without the marital tie the inhabitants of this world would have been a mixed multitude. The family circle, family instruction, and parental love and care would have been altogether unknown.

Temporary Reactions. At an early period the original law, as made known to Adam, was violated through the degeneracy of his descendants, and concubinage and polygamy became common. The patriarchs themselves took more than one wife. Abraham, at the instigation of Sarah, took her maid as his subordinate wife. Jacob was tricked, through the duplicity of Laban, into taking Leah first, and then Rachel, to whom he had been betrothed. Afterward, through the rivalry of the sisters, he took both their handmaids. From these facts it has been inferred that polygamy was not wrong in ancient times, nor at all opposed to the divine law as revealed to the Jews. But this is an unwarranted conclusion. It is indeed true (respect being had to the state of religious knowledge, the rude condition of society, and the views prevalent in the world) that the practice could not infer, in the case of individuals, the same amount of criminality as would necessarily adhere to it now, amid the clear light of gospel times. But still, all along it was a departure from the divine law.

For the reasons given above it was tolerated but never with God's approval. Jesus told the Jews, "Because of your hardness of heart, Moses permitted you to divorce your wives; but from the beginning it has not been this way" (Matt. 19:3-8). The Mosaic law aimed at mitigating, rather than removing, evils that were inseparable from the state of society in that day. Its enactments were directed to the discouragement of polygamy; to prevent the injustice frequently consequent upon the exercise of the rights of a father or a master; to bring divorce under some restriction; and to enforce purity of life during the maintenance of the matrimonial bond.

Laws of Intermarriage. An important feature of the law of Moses is the restraint that it imposes upon marriage within certain degrees of relationship and affinity:
